•Mr. Brown attempted to prohibit white voters from voting in Democratic primaries even though they were legally entitled to do so, criticized black citizens for supporting white candidates or forming biracial coalitions, illegally rejected the absentee ballots of white voters, and failed to provide white candidates with information about absentee ballots.

•Mr. Brown and Mr. Mickens discriminated against whites in the selection of persons to work as poll managers and workers, discriminated against whites by not allowing them and their supporters to observe the disposition of challenges to absentee ballots, and allowed blacks who were not residents of Noxubee County to vote in county elections.

•Mr. Mickens treated voters in a "hostile and intimidating manner" after they went to the courthouse to vote absentee ballots, instructing them "in a coercive manner" to vote for candidates he preferred rather than those preferred by the voters.

Attorneys for the Democratic Executive Committee, Mr. Brown and the Noxubee County Election Commission asked last week for the case to be dismissed after the government rested on Monday. Judge Lee denied the request.

Mr. Brown, a former tax preparer who served 21 months in prison in the 1990s on a felony conviction of preparing fraudulent federal income-tax returns, also has denied Justice Department accusations he used racial slurs to alienate blacks who supported white candidates, published the names of white voters to intimidate them, and illegally labeled white voters' absentee ballots so they would be rejected by election officials.

Can Blacks Discriminate Against White Voting Rights? (JCL)

Jackson (MS) Clarion-Ledger, January 31, 2007

A trip to any public library that offers a history book can establish that for more than a century, the white power structure in Mississippi found innumerable methods to discriminate against black voters.

That discrimination took the form of acts as raw and blunt as murder, terrorism, beatings, threats and economic sanctions. It also was as oblique and infuriating as poll taxes and literacy tests that required the voter to successfully ascertain the number of bubbles on a bar of soap.

In 1875, the so-called "First Mississippi Plan" to discriminate against black voters was an open campaign of murder, violence, terror and fraud perpetrated in most cases by undisguised whites against the state's black registered voters.

By 1890, the "Second Mississippi Plan" took up where the first one left off. This time, white voter discrimination against blacks was written into the law in the 1890 Mississippi Constitution and state laws.

Vestiges of those "Jim Crow" laws were routinely practiced in Mississippi well into my childhood in the 1960s and visible in segregated rest rooms, drinking fountains and even hospital and clinic waiting rooms.

In some sections of Mississippi, the murder, violence, terror and fraud continued into and past the 1960s in Mississippi, as well. By then, the perpetrators of the violence hid behind sheets or under cover of darkness.

Against the backdrop of Mississippi's history of white voter discrimination against blacks, does one even dare ask the question: "Can blacks discriminate against white voting rights in Mississippi?"

It's a valid question and the answer is obvious.

The "First Mississippi Plan" - brute violence and oppression - was made expressly illegal in 1964. The Civil Rights Act of 1964 outlawed discrimination based on race, color, religion, sex or national origin.

The "Second Mississippi Plan" - voter discrimination written into the law - was expressly outlawed a year later. The Voting Rights Act of 1965 held that "no voting qualification or prerequisite to voting, or standard, practice, or procedure shall be imposed or applied by any state or political subdivision to deny or abridge the right of any citizen of the United States to vote on account of race or color."

DOJ_NMG_0124737

Neither of those laws declared that civil rights or voting rights were sacred for African Americans exclusively. Therefore, black citizens can under the right circumstances without question discriminate against white citizens' voting rights.

The Voting Rights Act has been used dozens, perhaps hundreds of times to protect the voting rights of black Mississippians against discrimination from whites. But in the federal courthouse in Jackson this month, U.S. District Judge Tom S. Lee has been presiding over the first case in history in which the federal government has accused black Mississippi election officials of violating the Voting Rights Act by discriminating against white voters in Noxubee County.

U.S. Justice Department attorneys have been trying to convince Lee that black Noxubee County Democratic Party leaders now in power have systematically denied the voting rights of white voters.

The feds are alleging that Noxubee County Democratic Party Chairman Ike Brown and his loyalists have rigged the voting process against white voters by manipulating voter rolls, making threats to ban some whites from voting and miscounting ballots to ensure white candidates lost and other discriminatory acts.

Brown has denied all allegations, accusing the white minority in Noxubee County of sour grapes after years of white discrimination against black voters there.

There is no jury. Lee will decide this historic case. The nation will watch the outcome. But if the government proves voter discrimination by Brown, the outcome of the case shouldn't be in doubt.

Discrimination is discrimination - and it's wrong in whatever color it comes. That's the law.

FBI To Interview Student In Greenwood School Confrontation (AP)

By Holbrook Mohr

AP, January 31, 2007

JACKSON, Miss. - The FBI wants to interview a high school student involved in a confrontation with a police officer who twice pulled his gun in front of dozens of pupils at Greenwood High School last month, the bureau confirmed Tuesday.

Carlos Moore of Grenada, the attorney for 18-year-old James Marshall, issued a news release saying the FBI is "launching a preliminary investigation into whether Officer Casey Wiggins of the Greenwood Police Department violated Marshall's civil rights in violation of federal criminal law."

However, Deborah Madden, spokeswoman for the FBI in Mississippi, told The Associated Press there is no investigation at this point.

"In order to determine whether grounds exist to open a preliminary investigation, a request was made to Mr. Moore that the FBI be allowed to interview Mr. Marshall," Madden said.

Moore did not immediately respond to a message left Tuesday at his office.

Moore already has filed a $2 million lawsuit seeking damages from Wiggins, Greenwood High School, the police department and others. He also filed a federal criminal complaint with the U.S Justice Department, accusing Wiggins of violating Marshall's civil rights with excessive force and of making a false arrest under the color of law.

Moore claims race played a factor in the Dec. 6 confrontation that was captured by school surveillance cameras.

The video tapes show a brief scuffle in which the white officer, who was working a security detail at the school, pointed his weapon at an unarmed Marshall, who is black. The officer also appears to put the teen in a choke hold.

The security tapes are the basis of the case. Marshall says they show excessive force. Wiggins and his attorney claim the officer was using necessary tactics to subdue a resisting Marshall.

Marshall has not been charged with a crime, and was released soon after other officers viewed the tapes, Moore has said.

Wiggins' attorney has said his client will be vindicated. Wiggins still is on the police force but no longer works in the school.

Moore has also questioned why Wiggins, who is not certified by the state, was allowed to work in the school.

Robert Davis, director of Law Enforcement Standards and Training for the Department of Public Safety, has said Wiggins should have been under the direct supervision of a certified police officer. In Mississippi, police officers can serve for up to two years as trainees before they get their state certification.

There were no other police officers visible in the video of the scuffle.

Ex-jailers' Sentences On Hold Until After Teel Trial (BSH)

DOJ_NMG_0124738

By Robin Fitzgerald

Biloxi Sun Herald, January 31, 2007

GULFPORT - Former corrections officers who have agreed to plea bargains in an inmate-abuse investigation won't be sentenced until after the trial of Ryan Michael Teel on May 28.

Morgan Lee Thompson, one of five former Harrison County jailers to plead guilty in the federal criminal case, was set for sentencing Tuesday. He and the others won't be sentenced until after Teel's charges are resolved, court orders show.

Nearly a year has passed since the fatal beating that prompted scrutiny of complaints of unnecessary, excessive use of force against inmates at the Harrison County jail. Teel's charges accuse him of attempting to kill Jessie Lee Williams Jr., a 40-year-old inmate beaten Feb. 4, 2006. Williams died when taken off life-support two days later.

It remains unclear if others will be charged in the exposé of jailers who conspired to deprive rights under color of law and covered up the illegal acts.

U.S. Attorney Dunn Lampton on Tuesday said he couldn't give a time frame for the investigation's end.

"The investigation will continue until every avenue and every lead is exhausted," Lampton said. "It's going to be thorough. I'm hopeful we're getting to the end of it and I think we are."

Lampton said he can't discuss details because of Teel's pending trial and the ongoing investigation.

"At the proper time, I will release a detailed report," Lampton said, "but under the circumstances, mainly because of Teel's charges, I'm somewhat limited in what I can say."

Teel, 29, remains in custody at an undisclosed location. The detention order signed after his arrest Aug. 28, 2006, says he is considered a serious flight risk and a possible endangerment to "the safety of another person or the community."

Jim Davis, Teel's lead defense attorney, confirmed his recent meeting with the U.S. Justice Department's death-penalty panel in Washington. The government has until Feb. 16 to announce whether it will seek the death penalty.

If not, Teel faces a life prison sentence plus 20 years if convicted on both counts. He has pleaded not guilty.

Guilty pleas by Regina Lynn Rhodes, 29, and Morgan Thompson, 29, include admission of their roles in Williams' beating and confirmation of a pattern of jailhouse abuse against hundreds of inmates.

Evidence behind the guilty pleas shows the abuse began sometime before August 2001 and continued until at least April 2006, according to federal trial attorney John Richmond. The other pleas came from Dedri Yulon Caldwell, 45, Thomas Preston Wills, 25, and William Jeffery Priest, 34.

Rhodes faces a maximum sentence of 13 years. The others face up to 10 years. They're likely to receive leniency for becoming government witnesses. All five remain free on unsecured bonds of $25,000. An unsecured bond doesn't have to be paid unless a defendant fails to appear in court.

Seattle Violated Constitutional Rights Of 1999 World Trade Organization Protesters, Jury Says (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, January 31, 2007

(AP) - SEATTLE-A federal jury found Tuesday that the city of Seattle violated the constitutional rights of 200 protesters who were arrested during a demonstration during the World Trade Organization meeting in 1999.

The jury found the city liable for violating the protesters' constitutional rights against unreasonable search and seizure, but did not find a violation against their free speech rights.

U.S. District Judge Marsha Pechman had already ruled that police had made the arrests without probable cause.

Attorneys for the city said they plan to appeal the decision.

The week of the arrests, about 50,000 protesters swarmed Seattle, overwhelming police and closing down the meeting. The mayor imposed a curfew and limited the downtown core to WTO delegates, police and emergency workers, store employees, residents and shoppers.

The area became known as the "no-protest zone," even though shoppers, residents and others allowed in the zone were not exempted from protesting.

The group of demonstrators were arrested when they marched within the zone, where they sat down, chanted and sang.

DOJ_NMG_0124739

Chief Denies Police Were Told To Retreat (WT)

By S.a. Miller

The Washington Times, January 31, 2007

U.S. Capitol Police Chief Phillip Morse met privately yesterday with a senator and denied that he ordered officers not to arrest war protesters who painted slogans on the sidewalk near the Capitol.

Chief Morse conceded shortcomings in the police response Saturday at the protest against the Iraq war, however, and vowed to revise plans for managing demonstrations, Sen. Wayne Allard said after meeting with the chief.

"There was no order to retreat [or] not arrest anybody," said Mr. Allard, Colorado Republican. "He had ordered them that if they saw anybody breaking the law, they were to arrest them. ... They did not see them paint the graffiti."

The chief's pledge to review department policy follows public complaints that protesters painted anarchist symbols and slogans on the Capitol sidewalk Saturday right in front of Capitol Police officers.

The graffiti included the phrases "all cops are pigs" and "you can't stop us," officers said.

Sgt. Kimberly Schneider, a department spokeswoman, said a band of protesters splintered from the tens of thousands on the Mall, mixed with visitors exiting the Capitol and in the confusion spray-painted the sidewalk.

However, some officers said the order for "hands off" protesters came from House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat.

"The word going around is that [the order] came from Pelosi's office," an officer told The Washington Times. "The order was not to interfere with the protesters."

Pelosi spokesman Drew Hammill said the speaker, who was in Afghanistan on Saturday, had not communicated with police about the demonstration. "No one from our office had any contact with police about response to [protesters]," he said.

He suggested conservative groups were spreading the story about Mrs. Pelosi's involvement.

Capitol Police officials could not verify whether any orders originated from the speaker's office.

"There are a lot of rumors going around, and I can't confirm that," Sgt. Schneider said. "There was a set of decisions that were made at the time, based on the circumstances."

Those decisions were made by "law-enforcement officers on the scene," she said.

She also said officers discovered the graffiti after a crowd cleared from the west entrance to the building.

A police union leader contradicted the official account of events.

"The officers, who did their job both professionally and courageously, were ordered to withdraw by their officials and let the demonstrators have the area where the graffiti was later discovered," Andy Maybo, chairman of the U.S. Capitol Police Fraternal Order of Police, told members in an e-mail, a copy of which was obtained by The Times.

"We, as officers, take our duties and responsibilities very seriously and are disappointed that no arrests were made," he said. "But we must follow the orders of our officials even when we may disagree with such orders. We are just thankful that no one was injured."

Mr. Allard said that he was satisfied with Chief Morse's explanation that the officers did not see vandals writing on the sidewalk.

"From what I can tell, they worked in a responsible way," he said.

Leaders of the demonstrations, including peace activist Cindy Sheehan, say Democrats owe their election gains to the anti-war movement and now must bow to demands to end the Iraq war. And Democrats have shown tolerance of such protests since taking control of Congress earlier this month.

At a hearing yesterday into whether Congress has the authority to end the war by cutting off funding, a large group of people wearing anti-war T-shirts and buttons repeatedly shouted down senators delivering opening remarks.

One woman shouted that she wanted to know why President Bush's daughters are not being sent into battle. Later, a row of women stood and hoisted a hand-made banner calling for an end to the war.

Capitol Police were summoned, but Democrats running the hearing permitted the protesters to remain, despite the disruptions.

c Charles Hurt contributed to this report

DOJ_NMG_0124740

Prison's Hidden Threat (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 31, 2007

Male inmates and their partners are at high risk of HIV infection, so Maxine Waters' bill for automatic testing is a step in the right direction.

EVERYONE KNOWS THAT male prisoners are one of the highest-risk populations for HIV/AIDS, spreading the virus not just behind bars but out in the community upon release. Yet few public officials have done anything about it. Until now.

Rep. Maxine Waters (D-Los Angeles) is about to introduce legislation to make HIV testing automatic for inmates as they enter and exit federal prisons, unless the prisoners opt out. It's a strong step in the right direction, even if we'd rather see that loophole closed.

Research shows that male prisoners are three to five times more likely to be infected with HIV than are members of the general population, yet many prisons test only when an inmate shows HIV symptoms or when body fluids have been exchanged in detectable incidents such as fights.

Because two-thirds of inmates are black or Latino men, the consequences of unprotected sex in prisons have been particularly devastating for minority communities. HIV rates have skyrocketed among young gay men and the female partners of ex-cons. As of 2003, African Americans and Latinas accounted for 83% of all new AIDS cases among women in the United States.

And it's not just the inmates and their outside partners who are at risk. In a Centers for Disease Control and Prevention study of HIV in Georgia's state prisons, many men who became infected said their partners were prison staff members

Waters is calling for HIV testing to become part of the comprehensive medical exam inmates receive upon entering prison; counseling would be provided before and after the test. The bill also would beef up HIV education for inmates and confidentiality training for prison staff. The Congressional Budget Office estimates that it would cost $750,000 to $2 million annually.

When announcing the bill, Waters lambasted national leaders, African Americans in particular, for their "morally reprehensible" silence on the subject of HIV/AIDS. Fear of testing and of being stigmatized shouldn't block real-world efforts to halt the spread of HIV, she warned.

Yet that's what happened last fall, when Waters first proposed the bill. The American Civil Liberties Union, gay rights advocates and some members of Congress quickly lined up against the idea of mandatory testing, arguing that HIV-positive inmates endure violence and discrimination. But deliberate and potentially life-threatening ignorance is not the solution to that problem.

Making HIV tests automatic for a high-risk, captive population is vital not just for the health of inmates and their partners but for policymakers in understanding what goes on in the nation's disgracefully dysfunctional prisons. Now if only the state of California would follow suit.

Woman Jailed After Reporting Rape (AP)

By Phil Davis, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 31, 2007

A woman who told police she had been raped was jailed for two days after officers found an old warrant accusing her of failing to pay restitution for a 2003 theft arrest.

While she was behind bars, according to the college student's attorney, a jail worker refused to give her a second dose of the morning-after contraceptive pill because of the worker's religious convictions.

The 21-year-old woman was released Monday only after attorney Vic Moore reported her plight to the local media.

"Shocked. Stunned. Outraged. I don't have words to describe it," Moore said. "She is not a victim of any one person. She is a victim of the system. There's just got to be some humanity involved when it's a victim of rape."

Moore said the woman was not allowed to take the second emergency contraceptive pill until Monday afternoon, a day late, after reporters called police and jail officials.

Tampa Police Chief Steve Hogue said the arrest led to a new policy Tuesday that tells officers not to arrest a crime victim who has suffered injury or mental trauma whenever "reasonably possible." The agency also apologized to the student.

DOJ_NMG_0124741

"Obviously, any policy that allows a sexual battery victim to spend a night in jail is a flawed policy," police spokeswoman Laura McElroy said.

The woman is not being identified by The Associated Press because she reported being the victim of a sex crime.

Tampa attorney Jennifer D'Angelo, who represents the jail worker, said Tuesday that her client is prohibited from giving inmates any medication without specific orders. The worker insists she never discussed religion with the woman who reported being raped.

"She was mortified at what was being reported in the press," said D'Angelo, who declined to identify the worker. "She's frightened for her job and she's frightened about community backlash about these allegations."

The employee, who has worked for a jail health care contractor for about six months, was placed on administrative leave, D'Angelo said.

Moore said it was too soon to say if his client would sue. Her first priority was making sure detectives find her attacker.

"She is brave," Moore said. "We are going to work with police to catch this monster."

She was in Tampa on Saturday for Gasparilla, an annual pirate-themed parade that draws thousands of people. She said she was walking alone to her car when a man pulled her behind a building and raped her, McElroy said.

She reported the rape Saturday afternoon, and officers took her to a rape crisis center where she was given the first of two doses of the morning-after pill, McElroy said. The second dose is supposed to be taken within 24 hours.

Later, as she was riding in a patrol car trying to locate the crime scene in the dark, police found the warrant stemming from a 2003 juvenile arrest for grand theft and burglary. It said she owed $4,585.

"They stopped the investigation right there," and put her in handcuffs, Moore said.

Authorities arranged a special bond hearing Monday. "When the chief's office learned we had a rape victim in jail, we began working very aggressively to get her out," McElroy said.

Jennifer Dritt, executive director of the Florida Council Against Sexual Violence, wanted more explanation from the jail, saying the woman's arrest "makes people think law enforcement doesn't have a victim-centered approach."

Moore said his client believes she paid the fine for what he described as a childish mistake. He didn't have details of that arrest, but the woman has no criminal history as an adult, according to the Florida Department of Law Enforcement.

The sheriff's office, which runs the jail, said in a statement Tuesday that it is investigating the complaint and declined to comment further.

ANTITRUST:

Wall Street Firms Bank On Independent Delta (AJC)

By Russell Grantham, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, January 31, 2007

With a decision on US Airways' $10 billion takeover bid looming, Delta Air Lines is trotting out some heavyweight support for its drive to stay independent.

The Atlanta airline announced Tuesday that it had arranged for $2.5 billion in exit financing to fuel its plan to emerge from Chapter 11 proceedings on its own this spring. Such financing is an expected but critical step in any Chapter 11 reorganization.

The news was well-timed for those rooting for Delta to fend off the US Airways merger proposal, which carries a Thursday deadline for a response from Delta's official creditors committee. The committee usually meets on Wednesdays and could announce a position on the merger as soon as today.

Delta said its financial backing comes from six powerhouse Wall Street firms, inluding Goldman Sachs and Merrill Lynch, and represents an endorsement of its independent reorganization.

"We appreciate the confidence the financial markets are showing by making this commitment in support of Delta's standalone plan," Delta Chief Financial Officer Ed Bastian said in a statement.

Delta's press release included endorsements of Delta's exit plan from all six of the firms.

DOJ_NMG_0124742

"UBS is excited to be involved in Delta's exit financing and helping Delta emerge on a standalone basis," the Swiss investment bank said in a statement.

"That little wrinkle is unusual," said Jack Williams, a bankruptcy expert at Georgia State University. He said lenders often express support for their client companies, but not in such detail.

But given the hostile takeover bid, added Williams, "it's not surprising that you'd see some public posturing."

Delta management — aided by employee and retiree groups — has vigorously fought US Airways' stock-and-cash offer to merge with Delta and adopt the Delta name. However, the creditors committee could force the airline to move into serious merger talks if it concludes the proposal offers better returns on claims than Delta's standalone plan. The committee represents the biggest suppliers, banks and other groups owed money by Delta.

A hearing on the next step in Delta's standalone restructuring plan is set for Feb. 7 in bankruptcy court in New York. US Airways wants the creditors committee to signal support for continued merger talks by, among other things, seeking a delay in that hearing.

US Airways Chief Executive Doug Parker told CNBC on Tuesday that he has not gotten a response from Delta's creditors since his airline sweetened its bid earlier this month. He said he's not interested in pursuing Delta beyond Thursday's deadline without creditors' support.

A spokesman for US Airways, Phil Gee, called Delta's exit financing announcement "no surprise."

"It doesn't really mean anything," Gee said.

But analysts say Tempe, Ariz.-based US Airways' bid seems to have lost momentum in the last week or two as Delta rallied support among employees, politicians, communities and industry groups worried about job losses and higher fares. Those issues might work against Justice Department approval of a merger — another factor creditors have to weigh as part of their calculations of a merger's viability.

"I think it's all over," veteran airline analyst Ray Neidl of Calyon Securities said Tuesday of US Airways' run at Delta.

Unlike some other bankrupt airlines trying to get out of Chapter 11 in recent years, Delta's ability to round up financial backers was not thought to be in doubt. While Delta and some other carriers are still dipping into the red in some quarters and struggling with fuel costs, industry conditions are much improved.

"It's a different environment now," said Neidl. "Airlines are in favor now."

Delta plans to use most of the money to pay off earlier, so-called "debtor-in-possession" loans from GE Capital and American Express, which total $2.1 billion.

Getting such financing is "potentially a very difficult hurdle," noted Walter Curchack, a New York bankruptcy attorney who was involved in Pan Am's Chapter 11 case. He said Pan Am died in 1991 when Delta, after buying certain assets from the beleaguered carrier, pullled the plug on a deal to provide exit financing.

"Delta backed out and the rest was history," he said.

But Curchack said the exit financing package announced Tuesday indicates many Delta creditors and lenders have concluded it's safer to back Delta's standalone plan than US Airways' potentially more valuable, but also more risky, proposal.

"I think the uncertainty around the merger proposal doesn't make anyone comfortable," he said.

Delta hopes to emerge in the spring if it can win the backing of a majority of creditors, including at least two-thirds in terms of the value of their claims. It would pay off their claims with newly issued stock.

One group of creditors holding about 15 percent of Delta claims has publicly backed further exploration of a merger. Last weekend it worked to broker a $1 billion boost to the cash portion of US Airways' offer. Parker told CNBC on Tuesday that his airline is "willing to have discussions" about the offer but has put no sweetened offer on the table.

But even if Delta fends off US Airways, it could still face a rough time rounding up enough creditors' votes and getting its plan confirmed at a hearing currently set for April 25, Curchack said.

"There's still lots of things that can go wrong," he said.

Some key upcoming dates

DOJ_NMG_0124743

• Thursday: US Airways' deadline for Delta creditors to indicate interest in merger proposal. If creditors say no, US Airways says the offer will die. If the creditors agree to certain steps, management could be forced to open merger talks and federal regulators would be asked to review any deal.

• Feb. 7: Bankruptcy court hearing on Delta's request for permission to start gathering creditor backing for its standalone reorganization plan.

• March 20:* Delta's deadline to file additional details, including executive compensation.

• April 9: Deadline for Delta to win backing from a majority of creditors — and at least two-thirds in terms of the value of claims — for its reorganization plan.

• April 25: Judge to rule on reorganization plan.

• Shortly after: If judge approves of reorganization plan, Delta would pay off lenders, issue new stock to creditors and exit Chapter 11. Current stock would be eliminated.

* Approximate date, based on company plans

US Airways May Be Ready To Abandon Offer For Delta (USAT)

By Marilyn Adams

USA Today, January 31, 2007

Showing frustration, US Airways CEO Douglas Parker said Tuesday that his company will drop its bid for Delta Air Lines on Thursday if bankruptcy creditors don't signal support for the $10 billion offer.

Delta's creditors "know exactly what they have to do," Parker said in a conference call on quarterly earnings. "If this (creditors) committee is not willing to do what it should do for investors … we're not willing to pursue this transaction anymore."

Although Parker had earlier placed a Feb. 1 deadline on his offer, his comments suggested for the first time that US Airways may be poised to walk away from the deal it proposed in mid-November and sweetened earlier this month.

Parker's comments followed days of frantic maneuvering by people on all sides of the controversial bid. US Airways' cash-and-stock offer for Delta, which has been in Chapter 11 reorganization since September 2005, has been rejected by Delta's management. Delta has lobbied its creditors to accept Delta's own plan to emerge as a stand-alone carrier. A merger would create the country's biggest domestic carrier.

Parker sweetened the offer for Delta by 20% three weeks ago, and the court-approved committee representing Delta's creditors hasn't responded. The committee could act today. Parker wants the creditors to force Atlanta-based Delta to open its books and postpone a bankruptcy court hearing scheduled for next Wednesday on Delta's stand-alone plan.

Delta on Tuesday announced it has landed $2.5 billion in bankruptcy exit financing from JPMorgan, Goldman Sachs, Merrill Lynch, Lehman Bros., UBS and Barclays Capital. Delta hopes to exit bankruptcy in the spring. The loan would be used to repay the $2.1 billion Delta borrowed from American Express and GE Capital when it filed for Chapter 11.

Delta CFO Edward Bastian said the number of A-list lenders shows support on Wall Street for an independent Delta. Delta says it would be worth as much as $12 billion as an independent company.

To win support for its own plan, Delta has told creditors it would not rule out a future merger with another airline and would forgo establishing a "poison pill," a mechanism that would allow directors to block future takeovers. To be approved, Delta's stand-alone plan must win support from creditors representing two-thirds of total claims.

Parker said his airline has become the nation's most-profitable network carrier. For 2006, US Airways posted a $303 million profit, or $3.32 a share. For the last quarter, including special items, it reported a profit of $12 million, or 13 cents a share. That compares with a loss of $261 million, or $3.27 a share, a year ago.

Firms Go Private In Search Of Deeper Pockets (WP)

By David Cho

The Washington Post, January 31, 2007

The world may be eating more doughnuts now that Jon Luther's firm, Dunkin' Brands, has joined the most prominent trend on Wall Street these days: going private.

DOJ_NMG_0124744

Since three private-equity firms bought out the Dunkin' Donuts parent for $2.4 billion in 2005, Luther has doubled store growth, retooled his executives' pay and opened his first branches in Asia. And he did it behind a veil of privacy, away from the glare of analysts and federal regulators.

All of this was made possible by the deep pockets of private-equity firms. "These are not barbarians at the gate," Luther said. "They are more partners than owners."

Not since junk bonds has an alternative form of investment risen to prominence as quickly as private equity, an obscure world where fund managers risk billions to buy and try to turn around slumping companies, and then sell them for a profit.

With unprecedented sums in their coffers, private-equity firms have the ability to buy all but the biggest companies. Among their prize catches are Toys R Us, Neiman Marcus, Hertz, Burger King, Harrah's Entertainment, Clear Channel Communications and HCA, the nation's largest hospital company.

Last year, private-equity firms spent a record $540 billion to acquire companies in virtually every sector, up from $59 billion three years ago, and in the process have been dramatically changing the cast of powerbrokers on Wall Street. Although average investors can benefit from the run-up in stock prices during one of these buyouts, the trend has concentrated control of major swaths of U.S. industry in the hands of a few wealthy groups that do not have to reveal much about their operations.

This year began with the biggest proposed private buyout on record -- for Equity Office Properties Trust, the nation's largest office landlord. Blackstone Group last week put forth a $38.3 billion buyout offer, which would include the assumption of Equity Office's $16 billion debt. That bested a $38 billion bid earlier this month by a group of real estate investors led by Vornado Realty Trust. Today is the deadline for that group to make a counter bid.

The surge in private deals is raising concerns in Washington. The Justice Department is looking into whether some of these buyouts are anti-competitive. Last week, the Federal Trade Commission ordered District-based Carlyle Group, the nation's largest private-equity firm, to give up management control and its board seats at Magellan Midstream because Carlyle is part of the group buying oil pipeline operator Kinder Morgan for $22 billion. The two energy-distribution companies dominate the same 11 markets across the Southeast United States.

Unlike the late 1990s, when founders of Internet start-ups dreamed of seeing their ticker symbol stream across public exchanges, going private is suddenly in vogue.

The success of private equity has drawn the affluent and powerful, including former president George H.W. Bush, former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney and U2's Bono, as well as such corporate luminaries as Jack Welch, the retired head of General Electric, and the former chief executives of Wells Fargo, IBM and Procter & Gamble.

"Today there isn't a public board out there that hasn't talked once about private equity, whereas five years ago it may have been the exception," said Jordan Hitch, managing director at private-equity shop Bain Capital. "The sexiness of being public has been diluted."

Private-equity firms usually accept money from only super-wealthy investors and huge institutions like pension funds. As massive private funds formed over the past few years and returned about 25 percent annually -- with top performers getting 40 percent or higher -- nearly all major pensions reallocated their holdings, pouring billions into the sector despite the higher risks. These pensions now are tied to how private equity navigates the economy, said Colin Blaydon, director of the Center for Private Equity and Entrepreneurship.

Private equity "is seen by pension funds as their best hope," Blaydon said. It will have a huge impact on "the average worker -- teachers, firemen, the guys on the assembly line. . . . It is a big part of their retirement benefit."

But this murky world is not easy to grasp and can be risky. The deals are complex in how debt and financial tools are used to acquire firms. Also, private companies do not have to submit financial statements to the Securities and Exchange Commission or hold public conference calls with analysts.

Yet private equity's imprint on Wall Street is unmistakable. When recent rumors emerged of a possible deal for Home Depot, the company's stock rose while the price of its corporate bonds dropped -- a sign that both stock and bond holders thought a private buyout was possible, despite the company's market capitalization of $87 billion, said Michael Dahood, a fixed-income analyst at Sterne, Agee & Leach Group.

DOJ_NMG_0124745

Analysts say even bigger buyouts than the one proposed for Equity Office could happen this year since private-equity firms often team up to buy companies. Private buyouts drove the volume of mergers and acquisitions to a near record last year, accounting for 30 percent of announced deals, according to Bloomberg Financial. In the 1980s and '90s, that figure had been between 3 and 5 percent.

"If one firm is capable of taking down a $30 billion firm, where is the ceiling for what two or three or four private-equity firms could do [together]?" said Robert Keiser, vice president of proprietary research at Thomson Financial.

Some analysts are concerned that this trend -- like the dot-com era of the late 1990s -- is a bubble that will burst during a downturn when the money for acquisitions becomes harder to borrow. They add that it is hard to track what many of these firms are doing.

"When a credit downturn occurs, there's the potential here for quite high default rates and large losses for debt holders," said Ken Emery of Moody's Investor Service.

For their part, chief executives say going private can be a boon to business. Burlington Coat Factory Warehouse agreed to a private buyout last year after 34 years as a family-owned business. The stock had been languishing when Bain Capital bought the firm for $2.1 billion. Since then, said chief executive Mark Nesci, the firm has invested in new technology and customer research -- expenditures that may pay off down the road but could adversely affect earnings the next quarter.

"As a private company, if the results take a little longer to produce than expected, we don't get crucified," Nesci said.

Chief executives typically restructure executive compensation after a private buyout to align performance and pay. Luther of Dunkin' Brands, for one, insisted that all of his officers invest in the business.

This does not mean pay is lower in the private sector. Millard "Mickey" Drexler, whom private-equity shop Texas Pacific Group hired to run J. Crew, earned a modest $200,000 salary. But he was allowed to invest his own money and held a 12 percent stake when the retailer was spun back to the public market in what was one of the most successful initial public offerings of 2006. The value of his shares is estimated at $194 million.

Private-equity firms make money by charging pensions and other investors about a 2 percent fee each year, meaning a $1 billion fund would produce $20 million for the fund managers. They aim to sell these companies in about three to five years, typically reaping 20 percent of the gain, with the rest going to investors. In some cases, the pressure to sell has created a slash-and-burn attitude. The billionaire investor Warren Buffett decried this aspect of private equity and criticized the firms for bilking investors with high fees.

Private-equity firms acquire companies through leveraged buyouts. In general, firms have two sources of cash for operations, debt and equity. Private-equity buyouts aim to load companies up with lots of debt.

The concept is akin to buying a house with a small down payment. If a buyer purchases a $100,000 home with $10,000 in cash and a $90,000 mortgage loan, that person would enjoy a bigger percentage gain if the house rises in value than someone who buys it outright. The downside, of course, is the risk of taking on so much debt -- a homeowner may not be able to make the mortgage payments. The buyer also could lose the down payment if the value of the property falls.

In recent years, borrowing massive sums has become easier, with more favorable terms offered to borrowers. This cheap credit has been the primary driver behind the surge in leveraged buyouts.

Many industry buffs say this party won't last forever. Even Blackstone Group co-founder Steve Schwarzman said last week that he expects returns from private-equity firms like his to decline as the business cycle turns.

Others say that even if returns decline, companies in the long run would be strengthened by the turnaround efforts of private-equity firms.

"Money has become a commodity," said Daniel D'Aniello, co-founder of Carlyle Group. "It's what you add on the shop-room floor that will make the real difference."

U.S Senate To Look Into Mergers In Pharmacy Benefit Industry (BLOOM)

By Rob Waters

Bloomberg, January 31, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0124746

Jan. 30 (Bloomberg) -- U.S. Senator Herb Kohl, the Wisconsin Democrat who has taken over as chair of the Senate's antitrust subcommittee, said the panel will scrutinize mergers among pharmacy benefit managers.

The subcommittee will examine such transactions ``to ensure that this consolidation does not create any anti-competitive bottlenecks," according to a statement posted today on the senator's Web site.

Caremark Rx Inc., the second-largest U.S. pharmacy benefits manager, is currently the object of a bidding war between Express Scripts Inc. and CVS Corp. If Express Scripts prevails, the merged company would be larger in the pharmacy benefit management field than Medco Health Solutions Inc., now the biggest competitor in the industry.

The subcommittee will also focus on ``eliminating barriers" that might keep cheaper generic versions of name-brand drugs from getting on the market, according to the posting.

AMD Lawyer Sees Easing Of Antitrust Enforcement (MERCN)

By Therese Poletti

The San Jose Mercury News, January 31, 2007

BERKELEY - An attorney for Advanced Micro Devices, longtime foe of chip giant Intel, said Tuesday that regulators are less aggressive in going after monopolistic practices in the United States in recent years.

``Right now from a business perspective, it appears frankly that there has been a retreat from Section 2 enforcement," said Tom McCoy, executive vice president of legal affairs at AMD of Sunnyvale, referring to the part of the Sherman Act that prohibits monopolization. McCoy made his comments during a day of informational hearings held by U.S. regulators on monopolistic behavior.

McCoy was one of several technology company executives who spoke at the event, held at the University of California at Berkeley's Haas School of Business to examine whether and when specific types of single-company conduct may violate Section 2 of the Sherman Act. The hearings were informational and were meant to provide ``real-world insight" for regulators, said FTC assistant general counsel Karen Grimm.

In answer to a question from Grimm on whether the FTC and the Department of Justice are failing to challenge single-firm conduct, McCoy said he believed that Section 2 violations ``are not getting the same kind of energetic enforcement and investigation" as they have in the past. Grimm declined to comment on McCoy's response.

In June 2005, AMD sued Santa Clara-based Intel for anticompetitive practices in the United States. That suit was on the heels of an action in March 2005 by the Japanese Fair Trade Commission, which told Intel to halt the practice of requiring PC makers to limit the use of competitors' chips in exchange for monetary rebates. Intel said it would adhere to the recommendations by Japan's FTC, but said it did not agree with the agency's findings of fact.

As an example of AMD's concerns, McCoy described an instance cited in its U.S. complaint. In 2003, AMD tried to give computer maker Hewlett-Packard 1 million new processors for free, as an attempt to gain some share in the PC market.

But HP only used 140,000 of the chips, leaving 860,000 on the table, because it was afraid of retaliation from the dominant chip player Intel, AMD said.

``Customers paid more and were forcibly deprived of AMD alternatives," said McCoy.

Intel denies AMD's charges, and says its rivals claims are incorrect and contradictory.

AMD is also pursuing an antitrust case in the European Union against Intel.

In a morning panel, a Microsoft attorney discussed the general chilling effect of the company's constant review of potential antitrust concerns on its product development. He said the consequences are longer product development times, limits to product improvement and increased research and development costs.

NY Teen In Piracy Lawsuit Accuses Record Companies Of Collusion (AP)

By Jim Fitzgerald, The Associated Press

AP, January 31, 2007

WHITE PLAINS, N.Y. (AP) — A 16-year-old boy being sued for online music piracy accused the recording industry on Tuesday of violating antitrust laws, conspiring to defraud the courts and making extortionate threats.

DOJ_NMG_0124747

In papers responding to a lawsuit filed by five record companies, Robert Santangelo, who was as young as 11 when the alleged piracy occurred, denied ever disseminating music and said it's impossible to prove that he did.

Santangelo is the son of Patti Santangelo, the 42-year-old suburban mother of five who was sued by the record companies in 2005. She refused to settle, took her case public and became a heroine to supporters of Internet freedom.

The industry dropped its case against her in December but sued Robert and his sister Michelle, now 20, in federal court in White Plains. Michelle has been ordered to pay $30,750 in a default judgment because she did not respond to the lawsuit.

Robert Santangelo and his lawyer, Jordan Glass, responded at length on Tuesday, raising 32 defenses, demanding a jury trial and filing a counterclaim against the companies for allegedly damaging the boy's reputation, distracting him from school and costing him legal fees.

His defenses to the industry's lawsuit include that he never sent copyrighted music to others; that the recording companies promoted file sharing before turning against it; that average computer users were never warned that it was illegal; that the statute of limitations has passed; and that all the music claimed to have been downloaded was actually owned by his sister on store-bought CDs.

Santangelo also claims that the record companies, which have filed more than 18,000 piracy lawsuits in federal courts, "have engaged in a wide-ranging conspiracy to defraud the courts of the United States."

The papers allege that the companies, "ostensibly competitors in the recording industry, are a cartel acting collusively in violation of the antitrust laws and public policy" by bringing the piracy cases jointly and using the same agency "to make extortionate threats ... to force defendants to pay."

The Recording Industry Association of America, which has coordinated most of the lawsuits, issued a statement saying, "The record industry has suffered enormously due to piracy. That includes thousands of layoffs. We must protect our rights. Nothing in a filing full of recycled charges that have gone nowhere in the past changes that fact."

Tobacco's Stigma Aside, Wall Street Finds A Lot To Like (NYT)

By Andrew Martin

The New York Times, January 31, 2007

There are plenty of reasons cigarettes would seem to be a terrible business.

The number of American smokers usually drops about 1 or 2 percent a year. Government agencies keep adding cigarette taxes and outlawing smoking in restaurants, workplaces and even on public sidewalks. And tobacco companies continue to pay billions of dollars in legal settlements, money that is used in part to produce antismoking ads.

For all the industry's apparent troubles, however, the future of cigarettes appears to be brighter than ever.

That at least is the message investors are sending as the Altria Group — the company once known as Philip Morris and the maker of the world's most popular cigarette, Marlboro — prepares to split itself by spinning off its Kraft Foods division to shareholders and become, once again, primarily a tobacco company. Today, Louis C. Camilleri, the chief executive of Altria, is expected to set a timetable for completing the spinoff.

It is a move that Wall Street is responding to with the equivalent of a standing ovation, but it is not because Kraft Foods, the world's second-largest food company, after Nestlé, will finally shed the taint of tobacco.

Investors are glad that Altria will finally be rid of Kraft Foods, the maker of Oreo cookies, Velveeta and Tang. Since October, when the company announced its plan for the move, its shares have risen 10 percent.

"Something that is forgotten in all of this is people like to smoke," said David Adelman, an analyst at Morgan Stanley, who noted that United States tobacco stocks have beaten the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index in each of the last six years. "It's enjoyable and there's not an alternative product."

He added: "If frozen dinners get too expensive, people will try something else. That's not true with cigarettes — you are not up at night worried about that product that is going to make cigarettes obsolete."

In the five and a half years since Altria sold 280 million shares of Kraft at $31 each in an initial public offering, the stock has remained relatively unchanged, closing yesterday at $34.83. Altria owns 88.6 percent of Kraft's stock.

By contrast, shares of Altria have nearly doubled during that period, moving from $47 to yesterday's price of $87.54.

DOJ_NMG_0124748

It is a remarkable turnabout, considering that in late 2001, Philip Morris announced its plan to change its name to the Altria Group (drawn from the Latin word altus, meaning high, to suggest high performance). At the time, executives said the name change was intended to reduce the damage to the company's reputation that cigarettes were causing, reflected in the long-depressed share price at the time.

Now, it is Kraft that is seen by many investors as a hindrance to the company.

Why is Wall Street so infatuated with cigarettes? Cigarettes have certain advantages over other consumer products, not the least of which is that they are addictive. They are inexpensive to make, require almost no innovation, there is a global market for them, and cigarette makers can raise prices without seeing much of a drop in business.

On top of all that, a recent string of court decisions has convinced investors that the worst of the litigation against tobacco companies is over.

That, in turn, has allowed Altria to move forward with a revamping that begins with cutting Kraft loose and will ultimately allow Altria to use the huge amounts of cash generated by cigarettes to buy back stock or acquire other tobacco companies, particularly overseas.

"You take away Kraft out of Altria and you are left with a balance sheet that is extremely strong," said Charles Norton, portfolio manager at the Vice Fund, a mutual fund that invests in tobacco, gambling, alcohol and military contractors. Altria is the fund's biggest holding. "It's just a cash cow. The free cash flow on this business is just tremendous."

The future prospects are particularly attractive in developing countries, where smoking has not yet declined as it has in more developed parts of the world like the United States and Europe.

In China, for instance, the Philip Morris International unit of Altria signed a deal in 2005 that allows it to manufacture and sell Marlboro cigarettes to the country's 350 million smokers. There are an estimated 1.3 billion smokers worldwide.

But even in the United States, with 45 million smokers, the Philip Morris USA unit of Altria continues to generate sizable profits by raising prices. It also hopes eventually to lure consumers with new tobacco products, including a small tea-bag-like pouch that is smoke-free, spit-free and tucks into the cheek.

It says it is also working on developing cigarettes that are less harmful.

"The exciting part for me," said Bonnie Herzog, an analyst at Citigroup, "is that tobacco use today will evolve. It's unlikely that there will ever be a 100 percent safe cigarette, but we feel that a reduced-risk cigarette is on the horizon."

But some health advocates say that the diminished social acceptability of cigarettes will hurt the long-term prospects of companies like Altria.

"The industry knows that its days of successfully selling their product in this country are limited," said Dr. David A. Kessler, who called for regulating the tobacco industry as commissioner of the Food and Drug Administration in the 1990s and is now dean of the medical school at the University of California, San Francisco.

"They may be finding favor on Wall Street, but they're not finding favor in the public arena," he added. "There are fewer and fewer places that you can go and smoke in public."

Still, on Wall Street, analysts are much less enthusiastic about the future of an independent Kraft Foods — which makes a wide range of well-known food products — compared with Altria's prospects.

Kraft has struggled for several years to find its way in a rapidly changing marketplace, and Irene B. Rosenfeld, the chief executive, is expected to lay out her plans for a turnaround next month.

While many analysts say that Kraft is better off without the taint of tobacco, it still faces formidable challenges in repositioning its products at a time when consumers are less loyal to brands and more attracted to natural products, analysts said.

Investors in Altria are expected to get 0.695 share of Kraft for every share of Altria they own, said Ms. Herzog, who predicted that Altria would distribute the shares early in a 120-day period between the announcement and the distribution.

There is, however, a possibility that the distribution could be delayed by a legal challenge.

Michael D. Hausfeld, a lawyer in a pending class-action lawsuit against tobacco companies, said he might file an injunction to stop a spinoff of Kraft. The lawsuit, first filed in 2004 and known as the Schwab case after the lead plaintiff, Barbara

DOJ_NMG_0124749

Schwab, contends that cigarette manufacturers defrauded consumers by marketing light cigarettes as safer than regular cigarettes.

The idea behind seeking an injunction is that a judgment could be so enormous that Altria might need Kraft — with a market capitalization of $57.25 billion — to pay off the damages.

"Apparently at this point they have decided to spin Kraft off because they believe there's a diminishment in their legal exposure," Mr. Hausfeld said. "We disagree. If anything, the light's fraud presents the strongest legal merit claims against the industry and Philip Morris."

He estimated that a judgment in the case could be "several hundreds of billions of dollars" because 30 million to 50 million people who smoked light cigarettes made by several different tobacco companies were affected over more than 30 years. Asked to comment on Wall Street's affection for tobacco stocks, Mr. Hausfeld said: "Wall Street loves money. And cigarettes are money. You are clearly earning huge returns at the expense of people's lives."

Several analysts who track Altria have dismissed the chances of an injunction's success, and in an October conference call with investors, Mr. Camilleri, the Altria chief executive, said, "We believe that such an action would not have merit and that we would ultimately prevail."

Altria's plan to spin off Kraft is part of a long-term revamping plan that may ultimately split the domestic and international tobacco businesses into two companies because Altria thinks they would have more value as independent companies.

For example, Philip Morris International would no longer be dragged down by problems associated with smoking in the United States, like diminished demand and government intervention.

"At times, as a tobacco investor or a tobacco analyst, it seems like an unending stream of negative news," Mr. Adelman of Morgan Stanley said. "You hear about smoking bans, a new piece of legislation. You hear about criticism from the World Health Organization.

"And then lo and behold, manufacturers release their results," he said. "And they are good."

Change Of Control Or Out Of Control? (WP)

By Steven Pearlstein

The Washington Post, January 31, 2007

One thing you can count on in any merger or acquisition is that the executives who negotiate them always come out winners.

That's not the case for shareholders, who, according to academic studies, are as likely as not to see a decline in the value of their holdings. Or rank-and-file employees, some of whom inevitably lose their jobs. These deals are not even a sure win for customers, who often suffer from glitches when organizations combine operations.

But there's never any doubt about the executives. The history of mergers and acquisitions is full of deals that fell apart over the issue of which chief executive would wind up running the show. And I've yet to run across the corporate executive who doesn't emerge from a merger with a set-for-life severance payment or a pay-and-stock-option package bigger than it was before.

A case in point is the proposed purchase of Caremark Rx, the pharmacy-benefits manager, by CVS, the pharmacy chain, which was announced late last year.

Under the merger terms, Caremark's top executives, down to the level of senior vice president, are to receive change-of-control payments due under their employment contracts. The top five executives are collectively entitled to about $100 million, with more than half going to Mac Crawford, the chief executive who oversaw the CVS negotiations. Add to that at least another $10 million going to other top executives.

These change-of-control payments are now standard fare in the executive-compensation game. Their purpose is to attract highly sought individuals by offering them a measure of financial security in case they lose their jobs as a result of mergers and acquisitions. In the case of top executives, these provisions are also meant to align their personal interests with those of shareholders, so they remain open to any offer to buy the company that might involve losing their jobs.

We could have a lively debate about the size of these payments, or why comfortable executives ought to be protected from the vicissitudes of market capitalism while the working stiffs are left to fend for themselves. But the more immediate question is why Caremark executives are in line to get any change-of-control payments, given that the merger agreement also guarantees them generous employment contracts in the newly combined enterprise.

DOJ_NMG_0124750

To be fair, not everyone is staying. Crawford agreed to step down as an executive and will serve only as chairman of the new board of directors. We also learn from the company's proxy statement that, as an indication of his commitment and confidence in the merger, the 58-year-old Crawford has agreed to reduce his change-of-control payments by at least $10 million.

For the others, however, the question remains: Why should shareholders provide millions of dollars in what amounts to severance payments to executives who aren't being severed?

Caremark officials argue these are not severance payments but "signing" bonuses designed to keep a successful management team in place. After all, under the terms of the agreement, the money will be paid only if the executives remain with the company for three years.

This sounds reasonable, until you think about it a bit. Last year, these executives were apparently willing and eager to work for Caremark for $500,000 or $750,000 a year, plus bonuses and stock options. But now that the name on the door is about to change, we are supposed to believe these same executives are available to do the same jobs only if they get a million-dollar signing bonus.

This isn't the only item that has caught the attention of shareholders. Some have criticized provisions that indemnify executives and directors from lawsuits or legal penalties that might arise from anything they did while at Caremark -- including possible backdating of stock options, which is now the subject of a federal inquiry. Questions have also been raised about the $625 million "breakup fee" Caremark will have to pay if it backs out of the deal and the offer of board seats for many of Caremark's directors.

These concerns take on greater significance now that Caremark's executives and directors have rejected a competing bid from Express Scripts valued at 13 percent above the CVS offer. Irrespective of the other issues raised by the Express Scripts offer, have the views of Caremark executives and directors been colored by the sweet terms they negotiated for themselves in the CVS deal?

That question will be explored by Delaware's chancery court, where Express Scripts and two public pension funds have filed suit to stop the merger. The judge in the case, William Chandler, will have a chance to review all particulars, including evidence of other offers Caremark spurned before it accepted the one from CVS. But the case also gives Chandler an opportunity to set some reasonable limits on the widespread use of breakup fees, indemnification clauses and change-of-control payments, all of which may be of greater value to corporate executives than to the shareholders whose interests they are supposed to represent.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Scientists: White House Pressured Us To Downplay Global Warming (USAT/AP)

USA Today, January 31, 2007

WASHINGTON — Federal scientists have been pressured to play down global warming, advocacy groups testified Tuesday at the Democrats' first investigative hearing since taking control of Congress.

The House hearing focused on allegations that the White House for years has closely controlled what scientists have been allowed to tell the public.

"It appears there may have been an orchestrated campaign to mislead the public about climate change," said Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif. Waxman is chairman of the Oversight and Government Reform Committee.

Two private groups produced a survey of 279 government climate scientists showing that many of them say they have been subjected to political pressure aimed at downplaying the climate threat. Their complaints ranged from a challenge to using the phrase "global warming" to preventing scientists from talking to the media.

The survey and separate interviews with scientists have "brought to light numerous ways in which U.S. federal climate science has been filtered, suppressed and manipulated," Francesca Grifo, a senior scientist at the Union of Concerned Scientists, testified. Grifo's group and the Government Accountability Project produced the report.

DOJ_NMG_0124751

Drew Shindell, a climate scientist with NASA, described how a news release on his study forecasting a significant warming in Antarctica was "repeatedly delayed, altered and watered down" at the insistence of the White House.

Administration officials were not called to testify. In the past, the White House has said it has only sought to inject balance into reports on climate change. President Bush has acknowledged concerns about global warming, but he strongly opposes mandatory caps of "greenhouse gas" emissions, arguing that such an approach would be too costly.

Waxman, White House Are At Loggerheads On Climate Papers (LAT)

By Richard Simon

Los Angeles Times, January 31, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Following through on the Democratic Party's pledge to conduct aggressive oversight, Rep. Henry A. Waxman of California headed toward a possible confrontation Tuesday with the White House over his demands for documents that could show whether the Bush administration interfered with the work of government climate scientists to downplay the dangers of global warming.

Waxman, presiding over his first hearing as chairman of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, did not threaten to issue subpoenas, but said he would "insist on Congress' right" to the information. Waxman and the committee's top Republican, Rep. Tom Davis of Virginia, sent a strongly worded letter to the White House Council on Environmental Quality calling on it to "reconsider the confrontational approach" and produce the documents within 10 days.

"The committee isn't trying to obtain state secrets or documents that could affect our immediate national security," said Waxman, complaining that he and Davis have been asking for the documents for six months. "We are simply seeking answers to whether the White House's political staff is inappropriately censoring impartial government scientists."

Davis added: "We have every right to understand what the science is showing and how the administration is spinning it."

A spokeswoman for the Council on Environmental Quality branded as "false" allegations that the administration has attempted to interfere with the work of climate scientists. Kristen Hellmer also said the agency has provided more than 10,000 pages of documents and would try to work with the committee.

The oversight hearing was one of the first held by the new Democratic majority in Congress. Waxman plans to hold four hearings next week on fraud, waste and abuse in government spending in Iraq and other areas.

Tuesday's hearing was prompted by reports that administration appointees, including a former oil industry lobbyist who was chief of staff at the Council on Environmental Quality, edited climate change reports or pressured scientists to tone down statements about the dangers of global warming.

The White House has opposed mandatory caps on greenhouse gases, such as carbon dioxide, blamed for global warming, contending they could prove costly to industry and harm the economy.

Waxman said that the evidence examined by his staff so far strongly suggests administration officials have attempted to "mislead the public by injecting doubt into the science of global warming."

He cited documents that were edited to add "balance" by emphasizing the "beneficial effects" of climate change, to delete a discussion of the human health and environmental effects of climate change and to remove the statement that changes "observed over the last several decades are likely mostly the result of human activities."

Appearing before the committee, Rick Piltz, a former official in the U.S. Climate Change Science Program who is now director of Climate Science Watch for the Government Accountability Project, a "whistle-blower protection" group, said he experienced first-hand the administration's "politicization of climate science."

"Administration political officials appeared increasingly to take an interest in managing the flow of communications pertaining to climate change in such a way as to minimize the perception that scientifically based communications might be seen as conflicting with the administration's political message on climate change policy," he said.

During the hearing, the Union of Concerned Scientists reported that it has found 150 government scientists who say they have experienced political interference in their work in the last five years.

Drew Shindell, a NASA scientist, told the committee that the title of a news release was changed from "Cool Antarctica may warm rapidly this century, study finds" to "Scientists predict Antarctic climate changes."

DOJ_NMG_0124752

"Not surprisingly, it generated relatively little media interest and the results have been slow to enter the wider public discussion regarding the level of scientific understanding of global warming," he said.

Davis, however, said that he hadn't seen evidence of anything other than an administration attempting to put its own political spin on research, something he said that Democratic and Republican administrations have done.

Has The White House Interfered On Global Warming Reports? (CSM)

By Peter N. Spotts

Christian Science Monitor, January 31, 2007

More than 120 scientists across seven federal agencies say they have been pressured to remove references to "climate change" and "global warming" from a range of documents, including press releases and communications with Congress. Roughly the same number say appointees altered the meaning of scientific findings on climate contained in communications related to their research.

These findings, part of a new report compiled by two watchdog groups, shed new light on complaints by a scattering of scientists over the past year who have publicly complained that Bush administration appointees have tried to mute or muzzle what researchers have to say about global warming.

"We are beyond the anecdotal," says Francesca Grifo, director of the scientific integrity program at the Union of Concerned Scientists (UCS), one of the two groups, referring to press reports of a dozen instances of interference that have emerged over the past 12 months. "We now have evidence to support the view that this problem goes deeper than just these few high-profile cases."

Global-warming science must be accurately represented to enable lawmakers to craft adequate policies to control the problem and adapt to climate change, Dr. Grifo says. Scientists at the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, and other agencies working on climate-related issues are doing excellent work. "But it's under threat, and they are struggling to get their results out" to the general public, she says.

Grifo described some of the report's findings during hearings Tuesday before the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform and during a press briefing afterward. The two groups say they will release additional material next week, when the Senate Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation holds similar hearings.

On the eve of 'consensus' report

The hearings and the new report come as climate scientists from around the world have gathered in Paris to put the finishing touches on a comprehensive "state of the science" report on global warming. The volume is a "consensus" document that summarizes the past five years of peer-reviewed research on the subject and is set for release Friday.

Meanwhile, Congress is considering several pieces of legislation that would impose controls on industrial carbon-dioxide emissions – blamed for trapping heat in the atmosphere and contributing to the noticeable warming effect on the earth's climate.

The question is not so much about federal scientists' ability to publish their results in specialized journals that few but their colleagues read, the report's authors say. Instead, the trouble arises when agencies translate "journalese" into language the general public or lawmakers can grasp for use in official government reports or media releases.

The UCS is an environmental group with a longstanding interest in the politicization of science. The other watchdog group behind the report, the Government Accountability Project (GAP), supports strong protections for whistleblowers.

Their report combines a written survey the UCS gave to 1,600 scientists (of which 279 responded) with in-depth interviews GAP held with some 40 scientists and officials, such as agency press officers. GAP also pored over thousands of pages of documents gathered via the Freedom of Information Act, says Tarek Maassari, a staff attorney with the group.

Sometimes scientists and career public-affairs officers would send press releases related to global warming up the ladder for review, then never hear back. Or appointees changed the wording in ways that scientists felt distorted the results or their implications, and the researchers weren't given a chance to argue their case. One of the most blatant examples focuses on the issue of hurricanes and global warming. According to the report, in 2005, the White House stepped in to block an interview MSNBC sought with NOAA scientist Thomas Knutson, who a year earlier had published a modeling study on the potential link between hurricanes and global warming. The interview was to focus on new research by other scientists that suggested global warming has contributed to trends toward stronger hurricanes.

DOJ_NMG_0124753

Documents GAP obtained showed that instead of approving subsequent interviews with Dr. Knutson, high-level public-affairs officers routed interview requests to NOAA scientist Chris Landsea in Miami, who argued, in part, that the quality of global hurricane data was too poor and inconsistent to draw meaningful conclusions. In another instance, reporters interested in interviewing a NOAA scientist who had coauthored a new research paper concluding that modern warming "is dominated by human influences" were sent instead to then-deputy administrator Jim Mahoney.

Details of interference

In all, 150 scientists reported a combined 435 instances of real or perceived "interference" related to global-warming research within the past five years. This has led to self-censorship, Mr. Maassari says,

During Tuesday's hearing, additional evidence came from Rick Piltz, who resigned from his position as senior associate with the administration's Climate Change Science Program (CCSP) in 2005 over what he saw as repeated instances of interference in the program's reporting process – often with pressure coming from two conservative think tanks that have spearheaded efforts to debunk global warming. One of their key contacts in the White House, he says, was the chief of staff of the president's Council on Environmental Quality, Philip Cooney, who served as an attorney and lobbyist for the American Petroleum Institute prior to joining the council.

The UCS and GAP offer what they call a model policy that they say would reduce the likelihood of political interference in communicating scientific results on climate. "We respect the idea that policy needs to be coordinated within agencies," Grifo says. "We're not talking about having scientists coming out with policy" but rather with their specific results.

The issue of climate-science politicization reemerged last year following a report in The New York Times about a NASA public affairs officer's attempt to muzzle James Hansen, a noted climate researcher at NASA's Goddard Institute for Space Studies in New York. Subsequent stories alluded to similar activities at NOAA.

This led NASA Administrator Michael Griffin and NOAA's chief, retired Vice Adm. Conrad Lautenbacher Jr., to issue strongly worded statements in support of scientific openness and the need to communicate federal science to taxpayers accurately, and without political interference. But while some NASA researchers say the climate has improved in their agency, many in NOAA say they are still waiting to see change.

It's unclear whether the hearings this week and next will lead to legislative changes to reduce political interference. Some analysts suggest that in the governmental realm, politics and science are tightly intertwined. Roger Pielke Jr., a science-policy specialist at the University of Colorado at Boulder, noted in testimony before the committee Tuesday that selecting which results to highlight with a press release is by nature a political act.

Yet even Dr. Pielke says that "the Bush admininstration has engaged in hypercontrolling strategies for controlling information" on global warming.

Adds Grifo, "It's time for the public to stand up and be angry, too. It's their knowledge, their scientists, just like Washington is their capital."

Scientists Criticize White House Stance On Climate Change Findings (NYT)

By Cornelia Dean

New York Times, January 31, 2007

Under its new Democratic chairman, Representative Henry A. Waxman of California, the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform took on the Bush administration's handling of climate change science yesterday, and even the Republicans on the panel had little good to say about the administration's actions.

The subject of the hearing was accusations of administration interference with the work of government climate scientists. Almost to a person, Republicans on the panel introduced themselves by proclaiming their agreement that the earth's climate was warming and that the principal culprit was greenhouse gases generated by people and their machinery.

And when witnesses spoke in defense of the administration, it was often to say only that there were still some scientists who doubted that climate view or that the administration's approach was not unique.

DOJ_NMG_0124754

"Cherry-picking" science to suit policy or political goals is at least as old as the Eisenhower administration, said Roger Pielke Jr., a professor in the Environmental Studies Program at the University of Colorado. The committee itself is guilty of it, he added, pointing to a news release linking rising ocean temperatures to bigger and more frequent coastal storms, something about which there is still debate.

But the other witnesses spoke about how the administration had delayed, altered or watered down the findings of government scientists, the kind of thing they said they had not experienced in the Clinton administration.

Drew Shindell, a NASA scientist who said he was speaking as an individual, not for his agency, described research he and his colleagues did on ozone depletion and greenhouse gases over Antarctica.

Dr. Shindell said the findings helped explain recent cooling on the continent, a phenomenon cited by climate dissidents as challenging the mainstream view. And, he said, the findings suggested Antarctica might warm rapidly in the future, melting ice and sharply raising sea levels. By the time the administration had signed off on the work, he said, its importance had been played down and references to "rapid warming" had been deleted.

Another witness, Rick Piltz, said he resigned in protest in 2005 from his job with the federal Climate Change Science Program when he became convinced that the administration's goal was to "impede" the understanding of climate science among the public and even the Congress.

Part of his job, Mr. Piltz said, was to compile periodic assessments of government climate research for the Congress. "This report has essentially been made to vanish by the Bush administration," he said.

The fourth witness was Francesca Grifo, who directs the scientific integrity program of the Union of Concerned Scientists, a private group that researches environmental, arms control and other issues.

Dr. Grifo's testimony drew largely from a report produced by the Union of Concerned Scientists and the Government Accountability Project, a private group that defends whistle-blowers. The report, made public yesterday, is based on a Union of Concerned Scientists survey of federal climate scientists and interviews and document searches by the Government Accountability Project. It says it is common for scientists to be pressured to eliminate references to climate change, for their work to be changed to misrepresent their findings, and for climate-related materials to disappear from Web sites.

Almost 60 percent of the scientists who responded to the survey said they had personally experienced such an incident in the last five years, the report says, and those who said their work was most closely related to climate change experienced the most interference. (Information about the report is available at www.ucsusa.org.)

Representative Darrell Issa, Republican of California, noted that a majority of scientists queried had not responded to the survey. Dr. Grifo said she attributed that to the "chilling effect" of administration actions. Anyway, she said, scores of scientists reported problems. "That number should be zero," she said.

Bush 'distorted' Climate Change Reports (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner And Fiona Harvey

Financial Times, January 31, 2007

The Bush administration has routinely suppressed or -distorted communication of climate change science to the public, a climate specialist at Nasa's Goddard Institute said on Tuesday.

The accusation, before the chief oversight committee in the House of Representatives, was reinforced by claims by Democratic lawmakers that the White House was withholding documents proving that Philip Cooney, a former Bush administration official who now works as a lobbyist for ExxonMobil, regularly edited climate reports for political reasons.

"We know that the White House possesses documents that contain evidence of an attempt by senior administration officials to mislead the public by injecting doubt into the science of global warming and minimising the potential dangers," said Henry Waxman, the Democratic chairman of the oversight committee.

In one instance of political interference described by Drew Shindell, the Nasa specialist, a press release he drafted in 2004 about future warming in Antarctica was "repeatedly delayed, altered and watered down" by Nasa headquarters. After being told to soften the title of the proposed press release, officials altered the title of the document from "Cool Antarctica may warm rapidly this century" to "Scientists predict Antarctica climate changes".

DOJ_NMG_0124755

Rick Piltz, a former government official who co-ordinated and edited reports on climate change, said he resigned from his post in 2005 in protest against the Bush administration impeding communication on -climate science and its implications.

Mr Piltz testified that the administration systematically attempted to “bury” a “national assessment” report that had been published during the Clinton administration that analysed the consequences of climate variability on the US.

He also accused Mr Cooney of editing reports that had already been drafted and approved by scientists in a way that added an “enhanced sense of scientific uncertainty about global warming”.

ExxonMobil said on Tuesday that Mr Cooney was not giving interviews.

The testimony risks embarrassing the Bush administration ahead of the release on Friday of a landmark report on climate change science that will say there is a 90 per cent certainty that human activity is changing the world’s climate and temperatures will rise by 3 degrees Celsius by 2100. It paints the most dramatic and comprehensive picture yet of a future of heatwaves, droughts and floods.

The report from the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, a scientific body convened by the United Nations, is based on research carried out over six years by more than 2,500 scientists.

The White House has been accused of attempting to weaken or change crucial wording on the state of climate science in this and previous IPCC reports, which form the basis of international climate change policy.

Panel Hears Climate 'Spin' Allegations (AP)

By H. Josef Hebert

AP, January 31, 2007

Federal scientists have been pressured by the White House to play down global warming, advocacy groups testified Tuesday at the Democrats' first investigative hearing since taking control of Congress.

The hearing focused on allegations that White House officials for years have micromanaged the government's climate programs and has closely controlled what scientists have been allowed to tell the public.

"It appears there may have been an orchestrated campaign to mislead the public about climate change," said Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif. Waxman is chairman of the Oversight and Government Reform Committee and a critic of the Bush administration's environmental policies, including its views on climate.

Climate change also was a leading topic in the Senate, where presidential contenders for 2008 lined up at a hearing called by Sen. Barbara Boxer. They expounded — and at times tried to outdo each other — on why they believed Congress must act to reduce heat-trapping "greenhouse" gases.

"This is a problem whose time has come," Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., proclaimed.

"This is an issue over the years whose time has come," echoed Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz.

Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., said "for decades far too many have ignored the warning" about climate change. "Will we look back at today and say this was the moment we took a stand?"

At the House hearing, two private advocacy groups produced a survey of 279 government climate scientists showing that many of them say they have been subjected to political pressure aimed at downplaying the climate threat. Their complaints ranged from a challenge to using the phrase "global warming" to raising uncertainty on issues on which most scientists basically agree, to keeping scientists from talking to the media.

The survey and separate interviews with scientists "has brought to light numerous ways in which U.S. federal climate science has been filtered, suppressed and manipulated in the last five years," Francesca Grifo, a senior scientist at the Union of Concerned Scientists, told the committee.

Grifo's group, along with the Government Accountability Project, which helps whistle-blowers, produced the report.

Drew Shindell, a climate scientist with NASA's Goddard Institute for Space Studies, said that climate scientists frequently have been dissuaded from talking to the media about their research, though NASA's restrictions have been eased.

Prior to the change, interview requests of climate scientists frequently were "routed through the White House" and then turned away or delayed, said Shindell. He described how a news release on his study forecasting a significant warming in Antarctica was "repeatedly delayed, altered and watered down" at the insistence of the White House.

DOJ_NMG_0124756

Some Republican members of the committee questioned whether science and politics ever can be kept separate.

"I am no climate-change denier," said Rep. Tom Davis of Virginia, the top Republican on the committee, but he questioned whether "the issue of politicizing science has itself become politicized."

"The mere convergence of politics and science does not itself denote interference," said Davis.

Administration officials were not called to testify. In the past the White House has said it has only sought to inject balance into reports on climate change. President Bush has acknowledged concerns about global warming, but he strongly opposes mandatory caps of greenhouse gas emissions, arguing that approach would be too costly.

Roger Pielke Jr., a political scientist at the University of Colorado who was invited by GOP lawmakers, said "the reality is that science and politics are intermixed."

Pielke maintained that "scientific cherry picking" can be found on both sides of the climate debate. He took a swipe at the background memorandum Waxman had distributed and maintained that it exaggerated the scientific consensus over the impact of climate change on hurricanes.

Waxman and Davis agreed the administration had not been forthcoming in providing documents to the committee that would shed additional light on allegations of political interference in climate science.

"We know that the White House possesses documents that contain evidence of an attempt by senior administration officials to mislead the public by injecting doubt into the science of global warming and minimize the potential danger," said Waxman, adding that he is "not trying to obtain state secrets."

At Boxer's Senate hearing, her predecessor as chairman of the Environment and Public Works Committee, Sen. James Inhofe, R-Okla., had his own view of the science.

There is "no convincing scientific evidence" that human activity is causing global warming, declared Inhofe, who once called global warming a hoax. "We all know the Weather Channel would like to have people afraid all the time."

"I'll put you down as skeptical," replied Boxer.

Senator Boxer Calls For Action On Global Warming (MCT)

By David Whitney

McClatchy Newspapers, January 31, 2007

WASHINGTON - A key Senate committee found broad bipartisan support Tuesday for doing something about global warming, but deep divisions remained over how to curb the emissions that scientists think are causing the Earth to warm rapidly.

"A consensus is developing that we must take action at the federal level now," declared Sen. Barbara Boxer, a California Democrat, who's presiding over her first hearing as the chair of the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee.

In the House of Representatives, Democrats charged Tuesday that they'd found repeated instances in which the Bush administration had ordered changes to scientific studies to soften references to the cause and effect of global warming.

Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., the chairman of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, said top administration officials had sought "to mislead the public by injecting doubt into the science of global warming and minimizing the potential dangers."

Boxer said she'd try to steer the Senate committee toward enacting something like California's tough global-warming law, which requires lowering emissions to 1990 levels by 2020. But she acknowledged that she was uncertain how far she'd get.

The hearing, the first of many that Boxer will hold before trying to craft a compromise bill, was limited to senators describing where they stood on the issue. Several Republicans joined committee Democrats in calling for legislation.

There was less agreement on how far and how fast Congress should go to reduce emissions from cars, power plants and industry. The emissions, primarily carbon dioxide, are thought to be contributing to global climate change by enveloping the Earth in a virtual greenhouse.

Many Democrats and industry leaders favor "cap and trade" legislation, which would set tough federal emissions standards and allow companies to sell emissions credits when they fall below that standard and to buy credits when they exceed the limits.

DOJ_NMG_0124757

Others want to limit emissions reductions to power plants, which are responsible for about 40 percent of total U.S. emissions. That could invite a fight with states that rely heavily on coal-fired power plants, particularly in the Midwest, or states that provide coal for them.

Another controversial issue is whether a uniform national standard should pre-empt tougher state laws, an issue that could divide California lawmakers if the deal Boxer cuts falls short of the state's standards.

At least out of the starting gate, Boxer kept the hearing from drifting into an ideological argument with a minority of Republican committee members who remain skeptical that human activity is at the root of rising temperatures and changing global weather patterns.

Sen. James Inhofe, R-Okla. - who was unseated as committee chairman by the November elections, which thrust Boxer into her most prominent role in Congress - is a skeptic of global warming who was able to bottle up remedial legislation.

He didn't seriously challenge the science Tuesday. The harshest Republican critic was Idaho Sen. Larry Craig, who said the rush to enact legislation was driven by the 2008 presidential elections, which Democrats didn't dispute.

Some of the more prominent advocates of global-warming legislation are candidates for the White House. Among those speaking at Tuesday's hearing were Arizona Republican Sen. John McCain and New York Democratic Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton.

Differences have emerged already between Boxer and Sen. Dianne Feinstein, California's senior Democratic senator, over whether federal legislation should pre-empt the state law to create a uniform national standard.

"If you think about it, there should be one system," Feinstein testified Tuesday. "And that system should be worldwide."

Feinstein had considered pre-empting state law when she introduced legislation to curb power plant emissions two weeks ago. But she said she backed off because of concerns from the state and Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger.

Boxer is a strong states' rights supporter. In an exchange after Feinstein's testimony Tuesday, however, the two senators seemed to move closer together.

"If we have one system with good goals, then one system is the best," Boxer said. "One system is what we need if we can do it."

The exchange demonstrates the formidable task ahead for Boxer, with issues such as the future of coal far from resolved. Feinstein noted that 40 states rely on coal, and together those states hold 80 percent of the seats in the Senate.

After testifying before Boxer's committee, Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts, the 2004 Democratic presidential nominee, was asked whether he thought there ever would be enough votes for global-warming legislation to beat back a promised Republican filibuster. It takes 60 votes to stop a filibuster.

"We have to gin up the grass roots on this," Kerry said. "People are going to have to understand that this is an election issue for `08."

Lawmakers On Hill Seek Consensus On Warming (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, January 31, 2007

As 600 scientists meet this week in Paris to finalize the first worldwide assessment in six years of the evidence on global warming, lawmakers on Capitol Hill searched for a political consensus yesterday on how to address climate change.

In a prolonged Senate hearing that one senator compared to "open-mike night," several lawmakers spoke in passionate terms about a need to put a cap on U.S. carbon dioxide emissions before global warming's effects become irreversible, while others sketched out possible policy compromises on the contentious issue. In a separate House hearing, a bipartisan group of lawmakers questioned whether the Bush administration has been suppressing climate science.

Sen. Thomas R. Carper (D-Del.), a member of the Environment and Public Works Committee who has pressed to regulate greenhouse gases for several years, said he did not want his children and grandchildren chastising him for inaction in decades to come.

DOJ_NMG_0124758

"I don't want them to say, 'What did you do about it? What did you do about it when you had an opportunity? Weren't you in the Senate?' " Carper asked, adding that he hoped to tell them, "I tried to move heaven and Earth to make sure we took a better course."

The panel's chairwoman, Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.), said several hours into the hearing that lawmakers would heed the warnings of Carper and others, including Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.): "I think this is the moment we will take a stand."

Several lawmakers said they felt a new sense of urgency in light of the mounting scientific evidence that the globe cannot sustain an additional temperature rise of more than two degrees Fahrenheit. On Friday, the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (IPCC), a U.N. body, will release its first report since 2001 on the current state of science on global warming: According to scientists who have read the latest draft of the report, it will conclude there is at least a 90 percent chance that human activity accounts for much of Earth's warming over the past half-century.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), who testified before the Environment and Public Works Committee on her proposal to "cap and trade" carbon emission credits, said in an interview the U.S. political debate on global warming has recently "shifted considerably because people know it's real. The science has coalesced."

Some scientists and lawmakers, including Feinstein, have raised concerns in recent weeks that the final IPCC report may in fact understate global warming's impact because the science is changing so rapidly. Yesterday the Zurich-based World Glacier Monitoring Service reported that the rate of mountain glacier melt is accelerating, with initial reports for 2005 suggesting key glaciers lost an average of 3 1/2 feet of thickness.

Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.), chairman of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, who held his own hearing yesterday, said that as a result of the rapidly changing data, when the international report comes out Friday, "in many ways it will be dated." The IPCC cannot incorporate any scientific data published after December 2005 in its report.

Still, advocates of action on global warming said the IPCC will further strengthen the public perception that the United States must move more aggressively to curb its carbon dioxide emissions. The report will outline how climate change will transform the planet -- with summer sea ice virtually disappearing from the Arctic by the end of the century -- as well as assess the spike in global temperatures in the past 15 years, in which Earth has experienced roughly a dozen of the hottest years on record.

"The timing of this report is critical for the debate that's taking place in Congress, in the business community, and in the evangelical community," said Robert T. Watson, who chaired the IPCC during its last round and now serves as the World Bank's chief scientist.

In the House hearing, lawmakers questioned whether the White House had altered reports by government scientists over the past several years to mask the problems posed by climate change. They highlighted a survey published yesterday by two advocacy groups, the Union of Concerned Scientists and the Government Accountability Project, which found that 46 percent of the federal scientists they polled reported they personally had experienced or perceived pressure to eliminate the words "global warming" or "climate change" from their writings, and roughly the same percentage had experienced edits that changed the meaning of their findings.

"All of us have a right to our own opinions as to the seriousness of global warming," Waxman said. "We don't have the right to our own science."

Waxman and the panel's top Republican, Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (Va.), sent a letter to the White House yesterday demanding that the administration hand over documents that could shed light on whether political appointees had altered climate reports. Davis said he was "disappointed at the [administration's] lukewarm response" to the panel's requests for information but added that when it comes to pressing the case for action to combat climate change, "we're seeing a dangerous trend toward inflammatory statements and hyperbole."

Kristen Hellmer, spokeswoman for the White House Council on Environmental Quality, said the administration had provided 10,000 pages of documents to the panel and allowed staffers to review some "deliberative documents" on climate change. "CEQ has been working with the committee and hopes to continue working with the committee to reach an appropriate accommodation," she said.

While House members debated the administration's approach to global warming yesterday, senators focused on promoting their own proposals. Feinstein told the Environment and Public Works Committee that any good climate-change bill must be "practical and doable," citing her plan to reduce greenhouse-gas emissions by 25 percent by 2020, while Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) told reporters after testifying that a plan he introduced with Sen. Olympia J. Snowe (R-Maine) to reduce emissions 65 percent by 2050 made the most sense.

DOJ_NMG_0124759

"Anything less than getting the job done is crazy," Kerry said.

Even opponents of a strict cap said they expected lawmakers to craft legislation capping carbon dioxide in the coming months. "The climate-science questions have now given way to real policy analysis -- the tough choices of what policies will work," electric utilities lobbyist Scott Segal said about the Senate hearing. "That will require serious homework, and this hearing doesn't do any at all."

Senators Sound Alarm On Climate (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, January 31, 2007

One-quarter of the Senate yesterday called global warming a serious threat to the world's future and urged quick action, despite disagreement on how to stem its effects.

During a rare open forum that lasted hours, senators from both major parties including four seeking the presidency shared ideas about curbing carbon emissions, which many scientists blame for global warming. The senators also promised substantial legislation this year.

"Global warming is an international problem requiring international effort," said Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican and a candidate in the 2008 presidential race.

His proposal to curb carbon emissions is co-sponsored by several Republicans and Democrats. He said he welcomes amendments.

"We have no pride in authorship; this is too important," he said. "The object is to get something done and soon."

"This is a problem whose time has come," said Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat, who also has eyes on the White House.

Sen. Barbara Boxer, California Democrat, said she sees consensus in Congress, at the state level and even among oil executives. "The time for action is now," she said.

Mrs. Boxer, chairman of the Environment and Public Works Committee, took statements from about 25 senators during the forum. "We're not going to take a lot of time debating this anymore. We're moving beyond the argument, we are moving toward solutions."

She allowed each person 10 minutes to "take their temperature" on the climate change issue.

Sen. Christopher S. Bond and a few other Republicans fear that sweeping legislation to restrict carbon emissions will result in economic hardship.

"I'm not from the state of macroeconomics. I'm from the state of Missouri, and I need to know how these proposals will hurt Missourians," Mr. Bond said. "Do not fight climate change on the backs of the poor, on the backs of certain sectors of this country."

Sen. Larry E. Craig, Idaho Republican, questioned the motivation for rushing legislation. "My sense is the rush at this moment, all due apologies to Senator Clinton, is something about an '08 election," he said.

He said drastic federal legislation could crush business in the United States, even while India and China are revving their economies without taking action against climate change.

"I reject that. We are the most innovative nation in the history of the world," Mrs. Clinton said. "I don't underestimate the task we face, but I am optimistic."

Senators evoked the images of the nation's children and grandchildren.

"This is our generation's test to protect their futures," said Sen. Barack Obama, Illinois Democrat. "The world is going to be watching us over the next several years to see what action we take on this issue."

Mr. Obama compared climate change legislation to an insurance policy. "We don't have to stand helplessly by and accept this future. In fact, we can't afford to," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0124760

He and another Democrat who testified, Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, also have 2008 White House aspirations.

Sen. Lamar Alexander, Tennessee Republican, said that even his conservative district recognizes "it is now time for Congress to take reasonable steps."

Sen. James M. Inhofe of Oklahoma, the ranking Republican on the committee, attended the hearing briefly to give his remarks.

"There is no environmental issue that has become more politicized," he said. "I look forward to vigorously pointing out the lack of scientific consensus, the real economic impact and the effects of unilateral disarmament of our economy if we enact mandatory carbon reductions in the U.S. while the rest of the world is failing to meet its goals."

"I'll mark you down as skeptical," Mrs. Boxer told Mr. Inhofe, who has called global warming a "hoax."

"I hope that when I'm done you'll put my temperature down as hot," said Sen. Joe Lieberman, Connecticut independent and the lead co-sponsor of the McCain bill. "I'm hot to get something done. It's hard not to conclude that the politics of global warming has changed and a new consensus for action is emerging and it is a bipartisan consensus."

Several senators praised former Vice President Al Gore, a Democrat who has publicized the issue through speeches and a documentary film, "An Inconvenient Truth."

The senators also noted that President Bush, in his State of the Union address last week, acknowledged the "serious challenge of global climate change."

Sen. Benjamin L. Cardin, Maryland Democrat, displayed photos projecting heavy flooding of the Delmarva Peninsula as a result of global warming.

Global Warming Is Hot Topic In Congress (LAT)

By Janet Hook and Richard Simon

Los Angeles Times, January 31, 2007

WASHINGTON — All of a sudden, global warming is hot.

After years of languishing on Capitol Hill, efforts to curb global warming have picked up momentum, powered by a growing bipartisan belief that climate change can no longer be ignored.

Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., has declared it a top priority for the House. Presidential candidates from both parties call it one of the biggest issues faced by the next occupant of the White House. Even President Bush, long a skeptic, is sounding the alarm.

That's an abrupt break from the past, when the issue -- the role man-made pollutants play in the increase in the Earth's temperature -- was shrugged off by many politicians. Especially among Republicans, it was regarded as an untested theory or an alarmist fantasy.

Polls show that most Americans believe the studies that show pollution is a cause of climate change. And politicians now are scrambling to keep up with science and public opinion.

Legislation to curb global warming is still a long shot in Congress because there is no consensus on a solution. But almost all the candidates who want to succeed Bush -- from Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., to former Sen. John Edwards, D-N.C. -- are far ahead of him in proposing ways to reduce carbon emissions.

"There has been a sea change in this issue over the last year," said Cathy Duvall, national political director of the Sierra Club. "It went from a backburner issue to something people understand is a problem. Now they are looking for leaders to take action."

The United States is the leading emitter of carbon dioxide, about one-quarter of the worldwide total. About 80 percent comes from fossil fuels, with power plants and vehicles as the leading culprits. Presidential politics and legislative debate came together Tuesday when McCain and several other candidates discussed their climate change legislation at a Senate hearing.

"The number of individuals in Washington who reject the clear evidence of global warming appears to be shrinking as its dramatic manifestations mount," McCain said. "We are no longer just talking about how climate change will affect our children's and grandchildren's lives, as we did just a few years ago, but we now are talking about how it is already impacting the world."

DOJ_NMG_0124761

McCain, considered a front-runner for his party's presidential nomination, has introduced a bill to impose mandatory limits on the greenhouse gases that contribute to global warming and intends to introduce another to target vehicle emissions by raising miles-per-gallon rules. His cosponsors on the first bill include two leading Democratic presidential contenders, Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois.

Other candidates have their own proposals. New Mexico's Democratic Gov. Bill Richardson touts his efforts to get his state to generate more electricity from cleaner sources, such as solar and wind power. Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., D-Del., recently introduced a resolution calling for the United States to return to international negotiations on climate change that Bush spurned.

Edwards, who ranks global warming as one of his top three issues, recently pointed out that he has given up his old-fashioned sport utility vehicle for a hybrid one. Even conservative Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., mentioned the need to reduce carbon dioxide emissions in announcing his candidacy.

The issue's prominence is rising for a variety of reasons.

There is mounting scientific evidence that pollution plays a significant role in global warming. Climate scientists who advise the United Nations will meet in Paris this week and are expected to issue a report on how it is likely to affect sea levels.

Former Vice President Al Gore's Oscar-nominated documentary, "An Inconvenient Truth," raised awareness of the issue, vividly depicting the consequences of a warmer planet.

Some states are beginning to act on their own, causing influential business leaders to call for federal regulation to avoid a patchwork of different state and local laws.

Most important, Democrats who want action on the issue now control the House and the Senate, and the party's leaders have moved it to center stage.

Pelosi has asked committees to produce legislation by July 4 and has moved to establish a special global warming committee to bypass Rep. John Dingell, D-Mich., an auto industry ally who chairs the House Energy and Commerce Committee. He is seen as a potential obstacle to legislation, including new limits on tailpipe emissions.

Despite signs that Congress might shift from talking to legislating, advocates of limits on greenhouse gases warn against high expectations, noting that any measure must make it through the narrowly divided Senate and past Bush's veto.

And proposals to cap emissions, especially from coal-fueled power plants, also face opposition from many Republicans and some Democrats who contend they would harm the economy.

"There's going to be a lot of sound and fury," said Dan Becker, director of the Sierra Club's global warming program, "but unless something changes pretty radically, it's really hard to see how an important bill passes this Congress -- and is signed by this president."

That's why many environmentalists are looking ahead to the 2008 elections. The League of Conservation Voters Education Fund has launched an initiative, called "The Heat Is On," to ensure global warming is at the center of debate. The organization is tracking what candidates say and hopes to pressure them through town hall meetings and ballot initiatives.

"We will make sure there is an expectation they will outline clear solutions," said Navin Nayak, director of the project.

Like ethanol in Iowa, global warming could become a litmus-test issue for candidates in New Hampshire, which holds the first primary. More than 100 Granite State towns are planning votes on a resolution calling for federal action to curb greenhouse gas emissions.

Ted Leach, a Republican and former state lawmaker from New Hampshire, is co-chairman of the Carbon Coalition, which persuaded the towns to weigh in. He has issued a warning to presidential contenders: "If we don't hear out of you what we want to hear, you're probably not going to get our votes."

The 2008 presidential candidate most deeply involved in the issue is McCain, who has for years pushed legislation to impose mandatory limits on emissions that contribute to global warming. It is a goal that has put him at odds with most in his party, and one that helped him build his reputation as a maverick.

One candidate who has kept a distance from the issue is Republican Mitt Romney. As governor, he pulled Massachusetts out of a regional accord to reduce emissions, worried about its effect on energy bills. But GOP pollster Whit Ayres said Republican candidates would do well to follow McCain's lead. Ayres argues that global warming is a winning issue.

DOJ_NMG_0124762

In a July 2006 survey of GOP voters, he found that a majority agreed that the Earth's temperature was rising and that human activity, not normal climate cycles, was the cause. Ayres said the issue "is an opportunity for Republicans to reach out to people in the middle and demonstrate their sensitivity in an area not normally thought to be a Republican strength."

He acknowledged, however, that there is political risk for candidates in certain regions, such as coal- and auto-producing states.

Fossil Fuels Are To Blame, World Scientists Conclude (USAT)

By Patrick O'driscoll And Dan Vergano

USA Today, January 31, 2007

A major international analysis of climate change due Friday will conclude that humankind's reliance on fossil fuels — coal, fuel oil and natural gas — is to blame for global warming, according to three scientists familiar with the research on which it is based.

The gold-standard Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (IPCC) report represents "a real convergence happening here, a consensus that this is a total global no-brainer," says U.S. climate scientist Jerry Mahlman, former director of the federal government's Geophysical Fluid Dynamics Laboratory in New Jersey.

"The big message that will come out is the strength of the attribution of the warming to human activities," says researcher Claudia Tebaldi of the National Center for Atmospheric Research (NCAR) in Boulder, Colo.

Mahlman, who crafted the IPCC language used to define levels of scientific certainty, says the new report will lay the blame at the feet of fossil fuels with "virtual certainty," meaning 99% sure. That's a significant jump from "likely," or 66% sure, in the group's last report in 2001, Mahlman says. His role in this year's effort involved spending two months reviewing the more than 1,600 pages of research that went into the new assessment.

Among the findings, Tebaldi says, is that even if people stopped burning the fossil fuels that release carbon dioxide, the heat-trapping gas blamed most for the warm-up, the effects of higher temperatures, including deadlier heat waves, coastal floods, longer droughts, worse wildfires and higher energy bills, would not go away in our lifetime.

"Most of the carbon dioxide still would just be sitting there, staring at us for the next century," Mahlman says.

"The projections also make clear how much we are already committed" to climate change, Tebaldi says, echoing the comments of more than a dozen IPCC scientists contacted by USA TODAY. Even if every smokestack and tailpipe stops emissions right now, the remaining heat makes further warming inevitable, she says.

The report will resonate worldwide because the current debate over global warming has been more about what is responsible — people or nature? — than about whether it is happening.

President Bush only recently has acknowledged the link, mentioning global warming in last week's State of the Union address. It was the first time he has included climate change in the annual speech before Congress. Bush called for developing renewable and alternative fuels.

The IPCC was established in 1988 by the World Meteorological Organization and the United Nations Environment Program. This will be its fourth climate assessment since 1990. The last one, in 2001, predicted average global temperatures would rise 2.5 to 10.4 degrees by the end of this century. The rise from 1901 to 2005 was just 1.2 degrees.

The report is the work of more than 2,000 scientists, whose drafts were reviewed by scores of governments, industry and environmental groups. The document is based on research published in the six years since the last report.

The analysis comes at a time when awareness of global warming in the USA and efforts to combat it are more intense than ever. Former vice president Al Gore's climate-change documentary An Inconvenient Truth scored two Oscar nominations last week. Meanwhile, some states and hundreds of American cities are taking steps to curb emissions that intensify the heat-trapping "greenhouse gases" in the atmosphere.

Officially, the panel's 2007 findings are still under wraps, but details have been leaking out for a year, particularly in recent weeks.

News accounts have featured projections of more droughts, floods, shrinking glaciers and rising sea levels.

DOJ_NMG_0124763

There is so much media attention now, "I almost think there won't be any surprises compared to six years ago," says Steve Running, a University of Montana ecologist. "When the report came out (in 2001) it was all 'new' news. This time, I think everybody will say, 'Well, yeah, that's already what we've been hearing about.' "

Michael MacCracken, chief scientist for the Climate Institute, a Washington, D.C., think tank, says the studies underlying the report make the broad conclusions clear anyway. A 2005 Nature magazine study, for example, narrowed the 2001 estimate of warmer temperatures to an increase from 2.7 to 8.1 degrees by the year 2100.

Similarly, two Science magazine studies in 2005 of satellite and balloon measurements of temperature confirmed the Earth's atmosphere is warming exactly as predicted from human-caused increases in carbon dioxide.

What will be released this week is the first of three parts of the report: a scientific synthesis of global warming's physical manifestations that includes measurements and projections of temperature, precipitation, storms, wind, polar melting and sea levels. New this time is a chapter on paleoclimatology, the study of climate change from fossils and the reconstruction of data and clues going back hundreds of thousands of years.

In addition to the extensive scientific conclusions, which MacCracken says have been settled, a short "summary for policymakers" is still being hammered out and will be released Friday in Paris.

The second phase of the report is on the effects of those measured and projected changes and is due in April. A third group's work on ways to try to lessen those impacts is to be released in May.

The IPCC report lands amid a rush of climate-change developments. Sharing the spotlight:

•Congress. After winning a majority in the House and Senate in November's election, Democrats have climate-change bills in the works. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., is creating a special committee on climate change. Next week, the House Science and Technology Committee will discuss the IPCC report.

•States. More than 12 states are taking steps to reduce greenhouse gases. California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger this month ordered the world's first low-carbon limits on passenger-car fuels in the most populous state. The new standard would reduce the carbon content of transportation fuels at least 10% by the year 2020.

•Cities. More than 375 mayors who have signed pledges since 2005 to cut greenhouse-gas emissions in their communities launched a drive last week for major climate legislation in Congress this year. They represent 56 million people in all 50 states. The day after the State of the Union address, the U.S. Conference of Mayors announced global warming is No. 1 on its top-10 list of priorities.

•Industry. Ten major companies, including industrial giants General Electric, Alcoa and DuPont, joined four environmental and climate groups last week to demand swift passage of federal legislation to cut emissions that worsen warming. Their U.S. Climate Action Partnership says further delay only "increases the risk of unavoidable consequences … at potentially greater economic cost and social disruption."

In their own studies, Tebaldi and her colleagues at NCAR found broad agreement in climate projections for North America by 2100, including a rise in average temperatures from 3 to 9 degrees.

That could lead to more frequent heat waves and more warm nights when daytime temperatures linger longer after sundown, especially in the South and West, Tebaldi's group concluded. NCAR also says increasing rain would soak northern states but bypass the already dry Southwest, where drought would be more common except when torrential rains bring flash floods.

The IPCC report is likely to reflect climate uncertainties and disagreements, too. Scientists have strongly debated the last two years, without resolution, whether global warming intensifies hurricanes.

Rising sea levels are a huge concern for the USA because more than half the population lives within 50 miles of the coastlines, according to the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration. The 2001 report contained a wide estimate of the rise this century — from 3.5 inches to 34. MacCracken says that projection has fallen to about 20 inches or less.

Such a drop in the top estimate alarms glacier experts such as John Turner of the British Antarctic Survey, who was quoted in the United Kingdom's Guardian newspaper as saying the low projection is "misleading." He says the low number accounts only for the heat-related rise of sea level and slow trickles from ebbing glaciers, and it ignores potential ice-sheet collapses in Antarctica or Greenland.

DOJ_NMG_0124764

"Greenland is just a relic of the last Ice Age, after all, just jutting out into the Atlantic, frozen at latitudes further south than anything else," MacCracken says. "What might happen when it gets warmer?"

MacCracken contends past IPCC reports have been too conservative, partly by design, in warning about the dangers of climate change, especially sea level rise.

"Scientists don't like to be wrong, so they tend to discount the most uncertain things," MacCracken says. "And that's good, but policymakers and risk managers usually want to know the worst case, as well as the middle one, when they plan for things."

Every IPCC report has been controversial. When the 1995 report's economic analysis estimated that the worth of a human life in a developing nation is less than in developed ones, it triggered protests and sit-ins.

In 2005, federal hurricane researcher Chris Landsea resigned from the IPCC, suggesting its hurricane warnings were too overblown and "politicized."

Climate scientist Roger Pielke Sr. of the University of Colorado at Boulder has suggested that development and deforestation, rather than the burning of fossil fuels, are the main drivers behind global warming. He says on his climate-science website that the IPCC should recognize the importance of these other factors.

In contrast, Australian scientist Tim Flannery has complained in his 2005 book The Weather Makers: How Man is Changing the Climate and What it Means for Life on Earth that IPCC estimates downplay the impact of warming.

In Paris this week, the process of negotiating and revising the short summary is painstaking and "line by line," says Kevin Trenberth, one of the lead authors and climate analysis chief at the National Center for Atmospheric Research. More than 100 of the panel's 193 member nations are taking part in the negotiations on the summary, he says.

"They'll do a lot of rewriting. It's all going to change to cover the concerns of each nation," whether it's monsoons in India or polar bears in Canada, says MacCracken, who helped lead the USA's involvement in the IPCC in 1995 and 2001. The summary also must be translated in six official U.N. languages.

In 1995, MacCracken says, negotiations at the meeting in Madrid stretched from 8 a.m. to an hour past midnight.

"But luckily, it was Madrid," he adds, "so the restaurants were still open at 1 a.m."

Scientists To Advise EPA To Cut Smog Limit (USAT)

By Traci Watson

USA Today, January 31, 2007

WASHINGTON — Scientists at the Environmental Protection Agency will recommend today that the level of smog allowed in the nation's air be cut to protect public health, the EPA said Tuesday.

The scientists will advise the agency to cut the nation's smog limit by as much as 25%. When the EPA last cut the smog limit, in 1997, industry groups fought the change all the way to the Supreme Court. Industry ultimately lost.

If adopted by the government, a drop in the smog standard could lead to fewer "Code Red" days and easier breathing for those with asthma. Smog exacerbates asthma and other lung disorders.

Nearly 160 million people live in counties that do not meet the federal smog limit. Most are in California or on the East Coast.

Further cuts to the amount of smog in the nation's air could also require strict regulations on cars, power plants and factories, which emit the chemicals that make up smog. States and counties struggling to achieve federal clean-air limits have taken measures such as requiring car-emission inspections and mandating the sale of cleaner but more costly grades of gasoline.

EPA Administrator Stephen Johnson has until June to decide whether to take his staff's advice. The new limit would become final after a year of public comment and review.

Industry groups have already told the EPA that they oppose tightening the smog limit.

"This is going to be a royal fight, because the cost is too big," said William Kovacs, a vice president of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

The EPA's current rule requires counties to adhere to a limit of no more than 0.08 parts of smog per million parts of air. The scientists will advise Johnson to consider a new standard as low as 0.06 parts per million.

DOJ_NMG_0124765

The last time EPA scientists advised Johnson to tighten air standards, in December, he slightly lowered the amount of soot from diesel engines and other sources allowed in the air, though EPA staff and a panel of independent scientific advisers urged a larger decrease.

William Wehrum, the Environmental Protection Agency's chief of air pollution, said Johnson would not be bound by his staff's recommendation.

"We will take the recommendations very seriously," he said. "The administrator is the ultimate decision-maker here, and he has to make the best decision he can, based on the facts he has available."

In Brief EPA Staff To Suggest Cuts In Allowable Smog Levels (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 31, 2007

Environmental Protection Agency staff today will recommend as much as a 25% cut in allowable smog levels, after new health data showed smog in traffic-congested cities is more dangerous than previously thought. The agency's experts will also recommend new ways to measure smog's impact on crops. If cuts are approved, the result would be tougher requirements on cities and states, which would have to figure out how to meet them by tighter controls on industries and perhaps on traffic.

Germany Sees Muted Inflation

Lower oil prices helped to offset a tax increase to keep German inflation below expectations in January, but the data are unlikely to sway the European Central Bank from raising interest rates a quarter point to 3.75% in March. Consumer prices in the euro area's largest economy rose 1.8% from January 2006, according to an estimate from the Federal Statistical Office. Many economists had expected that Germany's three-percentage-point sales-tax increase to 19% would propel the inflation rate to around 2%.

Merkel Snubs Car-Emissions Plan

Germany will block any attempt by the European Commission to impose general emission-reduction standards for all cars and will oppose including the auto industry in its carbon-dioxide trading program, Chancellor Angela Merkel said. The German auto industry opposes mandatory emission limits because it claims the tough standards will lead to lost profits and job cuts.

Manchester Wins Megacasino Bid

Manchester unexpectedly won the fight to host the United Kingdom's first Las Vegas-style supercasino, beating out favorites Blackpool and London's Millennium Dome. The advisory panel announcing the decision said that Manchester, a northwestern industrial city of 440,000, badly needed economic development.

Mixed News For Wolves (NYT)

The New York Times, January 31, 2007

The Interior Department's decision on Monday to remove the gray wolves that inhabit the western Great Lakes region from the endangered species list represents yet another triumph for the much-maligned Endangered Species Act. First listed in 1974, when their numbers had dwindled to the low hundreds, the wolf population there now numbers about 4,000, thanks almost entirely to the act's prohibitions on hunting and trapping. State and tribal governments will now be responsible for keeping their numbers at healthy levels.

This good news, however, was immediately spoiled by the department's proposed delisting of the gray wolves (also known as timber wolves) that roam the northern Rocky Mountains. Virtually eliminated from their range in the 1920's, these wolves have also staged a remarkable comeback.

What's disturbing about this proposal is that two of the states that will assume responsibility for managing the wolves have shown little interest in protecting them. At a recent rally, Idaho's governor, C. L. Otter, called Butch, said he would authorize the destruction of more than 80 percent of the state's 650 wolves, leaving the bare minimum required to keep them from being returned to the endangered list. Not to be outdone, Wyoming said it would allow 16 of its 23 wolf packs to be killed on sight. Montana, by contrast, will bar any hunting until officials see how well the wolves are doing, and even then hunting will be strictly monitored.

This eagerness to resume the slaughter is based on claims that the wolves are devastating livestock populations and game animals like elk. These claims have little basis in fact and should be rigorously examined during the public comment period ahead. Even then, the wolves should not be de-listed until Idaho and Wyoming adopt adequate regulatory mechanisms for protecting wolf populations that present no threat to humans, are valuable to the ecosystem and have taken years to rebuild.

DOJ_NMG_0124766

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Hiring Freeze Could Deplete FBI Staffs (FEDTIMES)

By Stephen Losey

Federal Times, January 31, 2007

The FBI may not be able to replace 800 crucial agents and intelligence analysts who are expected to retire this year because Congress has failed to pass a 2007 budget, the agency's deputy director said Jan. 25.

John Pistole, the second-highest ranking official in the FBI, told the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence that continuing to fund the agency at fiscal 2006 levels, as the current continuing resolution does, could prevent the agency from replacing 400 agents and 400 analysts when they retire this year.

That would hit the bureau's analysts particularly hard. The FBI has more than 2,200 analysts, and the retirements could gut their ranks by almost one-fifth. Pistole said 370 analysts have less than a year of experience with the FBI.

The FBI has 12,659 special agents.

Pistole said those losses would particularly hurt the FBI's ability to investigate and counter domestic extremists such as the Earth Liberation Front, Animal Liberation Front and white supremacists.

Most agencies are experiencing tight budgets due to the continuing resolution passed last fall. Congress only approved budgets for the Homeland Security and Defense departments before fiscal 2007 began. Republicans passed the job of approving permanent spending bills for most federal agencies onto the incoming Democratic majority, which is preparing a joint funding resolution that will include funding increases for some agencies. That funding resolution will replace the current continuing resolution, which expires Feb. 15.

Sen. Barbara Mikulski, D-Md., lambasted the previous Congress for leaving agencies unfunded. And that failure is even worse considering the FBI is the only major part of the nation's intelligence community without a fiscal 2007 budget, Mikulski said.

Pistole said that a continuing resolution also will jeopardize the FBI's attempts to upgrade its case management system, called Sentinel. The second phase of the $425 million project — which is meant to convert the FBI's vast paper files into a Web-based system of searchable electronic documents — is scheduled to begin in April. But the FBI warns that Sentinel will be endangered if the FBI does not get $157 million in funding by February and could miss its planned 2009 debut.

Pistole said the FBI has done a poor job analyzing data to find leads on terrorist acts and sharing information with other agencies. Collecting data and acting on it have traditionally been the FBI's strong suits, he said.

The FBI has started at least 10 new training classes for analysts since 2001, Pistole said, and other national security courses are being lengthened. Not only are new FBI agents and analysts undergoing training, but veterans are receiving refresher courses or learning new skills.

"There's been a very intentional focus on how we can professionalize and make sure we are full players in the intelligence community and law enforcement community," Pistole said. "We are trying to share everything and restrict only what has to be restricted."

But committee chairman Sen. John Rockefeller IV, D-W.Va., said he is troubled that needed reforms are not in place, more than five years after the Sept. 11 attacks.

The FBI still hasn't finished setting up standardized field intelligence groups or an automated intelligence collection management project, and it has just begun setting a strategy for field offices to collect threat intelligence, Rockefeller said. It also has just started trying to set up a cadre of senior analysts to understand threats in a strategic context, he said.

"If this were late 2002, I would feel much better about the bureau's pace of change," Rockefeller said.

E-mail: slosey@federaltimes.com

DOJ_NMG_0124767

Democrats Move Leftover Spending Measure (WP)

By Lyndsey Layton

The Washington Post, January 31, 2007

House and Senate Democratic leaders agreed yesterday to a $463 billion spending plan for the remainder of the fiscal year that would freeze many federal agencies at 2006 levels but include more money for veterans' health, education, scientific research, HIV programs and public parks, among other things.

In an unusual move, the congressional leaders stripped the spending bill of all earmarks, or narrow, special-interest provisions. The measure had to be cobbled together now because Congress did not finish its work last year and failed to pass nine of 11 spending bills.

Four months into the current fiscal year, the federal government has been running on a temporary budget that is set to expire Feb. 15. The House is scheduled to vote on the spending package today, while the Senate will take it up in the coming weeks.

A spokeswoman for the House Appropriations Committee said enough additional money will be provided to the Social Security Administration and other agencies that none will have to furlough employees, close offices or take other such measures as a result of a budget crunch. She also said that federal employees will see a 2.2 percent pay increase set by President Bush.

Among the priorities for the District that are preserved in the plan is a $20 million upgrade to the Navy Yard Metro station near the new Nationals baseball stadium, officials said.

Republicans grumbled about the fact that Democrats in the House will not allow amendments to the budget and said the party in power plans to ram through a spending bill without committee hearings or meaningful debate. Democrats said that they have no choice, because the previous Congress left the budget process in such disarray that they are under great pressure to quickly pass a spending bill for the remaining eight months.

"I don't expect people to love this proposal. I don't love this proposal and we probably have made some wrong choices," said House Appropriations Committee Chairman David R. Obey (D-Wis.). "But in contrast to last year's Congress, which decided to duck these choices, at least we have made them in order to bring last year's issues to a conclusion so we can turn the page and deal with next year's priorities."

Both Republican and Democratic budget analysts said that the bill is not the ideal way to fund the federal government but that it is pragmatic. "If your strategy is to get it out of here and move it on, fine, this works," said Jim Dyer, a former Republican staff director for the Appropriations Committee.

By declaring a one-time moratorium on earmarks, the Democratic leaders are granting the Bush administration more leeway in spending. The Army Corps of Engineers construction budget, for instance, typically outlines funding for specific projects. But under the no-earmarks pledge, Obey and Senate Appropriations Committee Chairman Robert C. Byrd (D-W.Va.) decided that Congress cannot spell out spending, so they opted to give a lump sum of $2.3 billion to the Army Corps -- about $38 million less than it received in 2006 -- and to allow the agency to decide which projects deserve the money.

"They really delivered on their promise to wipe out earmarks," said Richard Kogan, a federal budget expert at the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities.

Among the winners in the bill are veterans' health, which will get $23.3 billion, or $3.6 billion more than it got last year. The Defense Department will receive $21.2 billion -- an increase of $1.2 billion -- to treat U.S. troops wounded in Iraq and Afghanistan. The FBI will get $6 billion, an increase of $216.6 million to fully fund 31,359 positions, including those of 12,213 agents and 2,577 intelligence analysts.

Other programs that will see a boost include those that Democrats complained were underfunded when Republicans ran Congress.

Pell grants, the federal stipends for low- and middle-income college students, will be increased by $615.4 million, to a total of $13.6 billion. That will allow the maximum Pell grant to rise $260 to $4,310, the first increase in four years.

Head Start, the early childhood program for low-income students, will get $6.9 billion, an increase of $103.7 million. Democrats say that Head Start funding has been cut by 11 percent since 2002 and that centers nationwide have reduced hours, transportation and instruction as a result.

DOJ_NMG_0124768

The National Institutes of Health will receive $28.9 billion, an increase of $619.5 million, which Democrats say will pay for an additional 500 research grants. The National Science Foundation will get $4.7 billion, an increase of $335 million for research.

When it comes to housing, the Democrats' bill would allot $15.9 billion, an increase of $502 million, to renew 70,000 housing vouchers under the Section 8 program, which provides federal housing subsidies to low-income families and individuals. It would provide $5.9 billion, an increase of $939 million, to the Department of Housing and Urban Development to renew subsidies for 157,000 housing units.

Before adjourning last year, Congress ratified money for defense and homeland security but left the rest of the federal budget -- including Social Security, Medicare, veterans programs, education and transportation -- in limbo. Most of the government has been operating at 2006 levels through a series of stopgap measures.

Democrats Offer Fiscal 2007 Joint Funding Bill (GCN)

By Mary Mosquera, GCN Staff

Government Computer News, January 31, 2007

House and Senate Democrats banded together to write a $463.5 billion measure to complete appropriations bills left over from last year. The House is expected to consider it tomorrow.

House Appropriations Committee Chairman Rep. Dave Obey (D-Wis.) co-wrote the measure, which he filed yesterday, with Senate Appropriations Committee chairman Sen. Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.).

To avoid a partial government shutdown, Congress must complete work on funding by Feb. 15, when the current continuing resolution expires.

Last year, the Republican leadership was unable to complete work on nine of the 11 annual appropriations bills. In December, Byrd and Obey announced a plan to wrap up the bills in a joint funding resolution.

"This legislation is a good step forward for the nation. But, in order to meet the challenges ahead in our economy, in technology and in security, we must not settle for 'good enough,'" Byrd said.

The legislation remains within the overall budget cap established by the Republican-led 109th Congress.

Under the measure, most programs will continue to be funded at the 2006 levels adjusted for increased pay costs. Limited adjustments were made within the confines of the Republican budget resolution to increase funding for veterans and military health care, public housing, scientific research, and for the Labor, Health and Education bill to keep up with inflation, Obey said.

Among major IT projects, the measure also includes $100 million to proceed with Sentinel, the FBI's system to move to electronic data sharing from paper-based case management.

Last fall, the Senate Appropriations Committee agreed to provide $40 million for the Sentinel case management system on top of $100 million in reprogrammed 2006 funds. By contrast, the House passed a $100 million increase for Sentinel on top of the reprogrammed funds. The Senate panel said it expected the FBI to recover funds from the contractor for Sentinel's failed predecessor, the Virtual Case File system, and use that money to help pay for the new system.

The Office of Personnel Management has $6.9 million available for the Enterprise Human Resources Integration project and $1.4 million for the Human Resources Line of Business, similar to what the Senate committee bill last fall also contained.

The recent explosion in earmarks left Congress unable to ensure the integrity of the system and public confidence is at an all time low, Obey said. The chairmen decided to place a moratorium on the practice until a new, reformed process is fully in place. The joint resolution is free of earmarks.

"I don't expect people to love this proposal; I don't love this proposal, and we probably have made some wrong choices," Obey said in a statement. "But in contrast to last year's Congress, which decided to duck these choices, at least we have made them in order to bring last year's issues to a conclusion so we can turn the page and deal with next year's priorities."

Democrats' Spending Plan Would Raise Some Budgets (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, January 31, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0124769

WASHINGTON, Jan. 30 (Bloomberg News) — Education, veterans' health care, international AIDS relief and the Federal Bureau of Investigation are among the government programs that would receive more money this year under a spending plan released Tuesday by House Democrats.

The House is scheduled to vote Wednesday on the $463.5 billion spending bill.

The measure, if passed and signed into law, would deliver the budgets that federal agencies have been awaiting for the fiscal year that began Oct. 1. The government has been operating on a stopgap spending measure that expires Feb. 15.

The chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, Representative David R. Obey, Democrat of Wisconsin, said the measure would leave most federal programs near last year's financing levels, drop thousands of pet projects known as earmarks and give larger increases to a few programs backed by Democrats or deemed to be in need of more money.

"I don't expect people to love this proposal — I don't love this proposal," Mr. Obey said in an e-mailed statement. "But in contrast to last year's Congress, which decided to duck these choices, at least we have made them in order to bring last year's issues to a conclusion so we can turn the page and deal with next year's priorities."

The legislation was greeted with complaints from Republicans who said they had been given little opportunity to amend or debate a measure that would provide almost half of the government's discretionary budget.

"It is legislation that few have seen, which we are informed by the majority leader will not be able to be amended and that will pass the House after only one hour of debate," said Representative Jerry Lewis, Republican of California and the ranking minority member of the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. Obey dismissed the complaints, saying the overdue spending measures should have been completed last year when Republicans were in charge.

The plan would increase financing for veterans' health care by $3.6 billion, to $32.3 billion.

The budget for the National Institutes of Health would expand by $620 million, to $28.9 billion. The National Science Foundation would get an additional $335 million, for a total of $4.7 billion.

The Office of Science in the Department of Energy would get an additional $200 million. The F.B.I.'s budget would grow by $217 million, to $6 billion.

Financing for prison construction would jump by $343 million, to $432 million. Efforts to combat AIDS abroad would get an additional $1.3 billion, for a total of $4.5 billion.

The plan would cut the budgets of more than 60 programs from last year's level of spending.

Most programs would see their budgets frozen at current levels, with small increases to accommodate required raises for government employees. Critics have said that would amount to a cut once inflation and other additional costs are considered.

Couple Await Extradition In Meth Case (AZREP)

By Joseph W. Cox, The Arizona Republic

Arizona Republic, January 31, 2007

A Scottish couple is awaiting extradition to the United States today on charges alleging they distributed chemicals used in the production of methamphetamines to labs all over the United States.

Authorities said the investigation and subsequent arrests of Brian Howes, 43, and Kerry Ann Shanks, 28, led to the dismantling of about 100 meth labs across the country, including 20 in Arizona.

The couple were taken into custody today by Central Scotland police after an 82-count indictment was handed down by an Arizona grand jury in September 2006, according to the U.S. Department of Justice.

advertisement

The couple ran a Web site, KNO3.com, which distributed iodide crystals as well as red phosphorus used in the making of some methamphetamines, according to a press release by the Central Scotland Police department.

Chemicals from the site sold between August 2004 and November 2006 totaled enough to produce 1,400 pounds of methamphetamines, the Justice Department said.

The site first came to the attention of officials after finding containers marked with the name in numerous busts around the country, according to the U.S. Department of Justice.

Scottish Couple Arrested On U.S. Smuggling Indictment (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, January 31, 2007

(AP) - PHOENIX-A British couple indicted on charges they ran a company that illegally supplied chemicals to clandestine drug manufacturing operations were arrested Tuesday, the U.S. Attorney's office announced.

Brian Howes, 43, and Kerry Ann Shanks, 28, of West Lothian, Scotland, were arrested by Central Scotland Police in the culmination of an investigation involving local and federal authorities in the U.S. and Great Britain. They are named in a sealed 82-count indictment handed up in September by a federal grand jury in Phoenix and await extradition to the U.S., said Wyn Hornbuckle, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney in Phoenix.

The couple allegedly ran an internet-based operation that supplied chemicals to illicit manufacturers of methamphetamine for the past several years. Investigators began the probe of the couple's firm, http://www.KNO3.com, nearly three years ago, when raw chemicals from the company began showing up at clandestine labs raided by Arizona police.

The indictment alleges that the couple sent enough red phosphorus and iodine to U.S. customers to make 1,400 pounds (635 kilos) of methamphetamine.

More than 100 illicit drug labs, including 20 in Arizona, were broken up during the investigation of shipments of chemicals from the couple, Hornbuckle said.

The 82 counts include two conspiracy charges, 64 felony counts of illegally importing or distributing chemicals and 15 counts of using the mail or the Internet in a crime.

Attention: Drug Dealers (BNNJ)

By Sean C. Mccullen, Staff Writer

Bridgeton News, January 31, 2007

CAMDEN -- A federal judge on Tuesday sentenced a "major" Bridgeton crack dealer to more than 10 years in prison, U.S. Attorney Christopher J. Christie announced.

Nearly six months after pleading guilty to a one-count indictment for possession with intent to distribute more than 50 grams of crack cocaine, 29-year-old Rufus Kirkland Jr. learned on Tuesday that he will spend the next 14 years in federal prison.

U.S. District Judge Robert B. Kugler also ordered that Kirkland must serve five years of supervised release upon completion of his prison sentence, according to a press release issued by the U.S. Attorney's Office for the District of New Jersey.

City, county and federal narcotics investigators recovered a total of approximately five ounces of crack cocaine when arresting Kirkland on two separate occasions last year.

Kirkland was arrested for distributing crack cocaine by Bridgeton narcotics detectives last January and then by a task force consisting of investigators with the federal Drug Enforcement Administration, Bridgeton Police Department, and Cumberland County Prosecutor's Office last March.

The news of Kirkland's lengthy prison sentence was welcomed at the Bridgeton Police station Tuesday afternoon.

"That's excellent. Fourteen years on drug charges -- there's nothing that sends a message more than that," Det. Lt. Michael Gaimari said.

Bridgeton Police are hopeful that word of Kirkland's 14-year prison sentence will help reduce drug trafficking in the city, specifically among those who are selling crack cocaine.

"I would think it would definitely cause them to think twice before dealing crack," Gaimari said.

Kirkland's crack-dealing enterprise was investigated over a six-month period beginning in late 2005. The investigation included four controlled buys from Kirkland, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office press release.

The investigation was initiated by the Bridgeton Police Department Anti-Crime Team (ACT), which focuses on narcotics investigations. It was headed by former ACT Det. Thomas Gramp, who now serves in the department's patrol division.

Kirkland was arrested Jan. 28, 2006, as city police raided his apartment at 123 N. Pearl St. and recovered nearly five ounces of crack, less than a half-ounce of marijuana, and roughly $3,000, which was believed to be the proceeds of narcotics trafficking.

Kirkland's initial arrest followed a three-month investigation by Bridgeton ACT detectives.

On March 16, 2006, city, county and federal narcotics investigators arrested Kirkland outside of his home -- and found him to be in possession of 30 bags of crack -- on a federal warrant for the crack distribution charge.

The distribution charge had been moved from state to federal jurisdiction on March 15, when a federal grand jury handed down the one-count indictment against Kirkland.

Bridgeton Police had indicated in March 2006 that Kirkland would not be additionally charged for possessing the 30 bags of crack since the total weight of the drug was not enough to warrant an upgrade of the indictment.

The fact that he was in possession of the crack at the time of his second arrest was, however, added to the indictment.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Allen Harberg Jr. prosecuted the case.

Christie credited Bridgeton Police and the DEA, under the direction of Special Agent-in-Charge Gerard P. McAleer, who is based in Newark, for their roles in the investigation.

Gaimari credited Gramp and the ACT detectives for raiding Kirkland's apartment last January when he had a solid supply of crack.

"They hit him when he was loaded," he said.

Gaimari pointed to Kirkland as yet another Cumberland County drug dealer the federal government was able to prosecute and put behind bars for relatively lengthy sentences, including Bridgeton's Timmy Smith and Kamal Martin and Fairfield Township's Lavinston Lamar.

The Bridgeton lieutenant was pleased when he learned last year that DEA Special Agent Jim Kerrigan was interested in bringing the case against Kirkland to the federal level.

Careful to distinguish between the prosecutors and the courts, Gaimari was critical Tuesday of "liberal" rulings and sentences handed down in recent years by the state's courts -- rulings and sentences he asserted have made the war against drugs more difficult for law enforcement and easier on dealers.

In determining Kirkland's sentence, Kugler consulted the advisory U.S. Sentencing Guidelines, which provide appropriate sentencing ranges that take into account the severity and characteristics of the offense, the defendant's criminal history, if any, and other factors. Federal judges are not bound by those guidelines in determining sentences.

Parole has been abolished in the federal system. Defendants who are given custodial terms must serve nearly all that time.

Safety Kiel Cited For Relieving Himself In Public In San Diego (AP)

AP, January 31, 2007

SAN DIEGO -- Chargers strong safety Terrence Kiel was cited for urinating in public last month, his second run-in with the law in less than three months and the eighth by a San Diego player since April.

Maria Velasquez, spokeswoman for City Attorney Mike Aguirre, confirmed that Kiel was cited and released by police outside a nightclub in the Gaslamp Quarter at 1:50 a.m. on Dec. 18. The case is being reviewed and no charges have been filed yet, Velasquez said. Kiel is scheduled to make a court appearance on Feb. 20.

"It's very disappointing when you hear of things like this," Chargers general manager A.J. Smith said.

Kiel faces five felony drug charges stemming from his arrest in late September by Drug Enforcement Administration agents. The DEA said Kiel admitted to shipping at least two parcels of prescription cough syrup to Texas, apparently to be mixed with soft drinks to make a concoction known as "lean."

Kiel was led off the practice field and arrested in the locker room on Sept. 26. He didn't accompany the team to its game at Baltimore the following Sunday.

The Chargers were an NFL-best 14-2 and earned home-field advantage throughout the AFC playoffs, but were upset 24-21 by the New England Patriots in the divisional round. AP NEWS

Kiel Cited For Urinating Outside Downtown Club (SDUT)

By Brent Schrotenboer, Union-tribune Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, January 30, 2007

Chargers safety Terrence Kiel was cited by police for public urination outside a downtown club last month, the latest incident in a string of legal embarrassments for the Chargers stemming from the Gaslamp Quarter.

Kiel was cited in the 600 block of J Street, by the popular Jbar lounge. The San Diego City Attorney's office is reviewing the case, with Kiel scheduled for a court hearing on Feb. 20.

Meanwhile, cornerback Cletis Gordon will not face drunken-driving charges after he was arrested near the same corner, at 6th and J, in November. His blood-alcohol was below the legal limit of .08.

"However, the City Attorney's Office will keep the file open and will not pursue this case provided there are no other violations of the law," city attorney spokeswoman Maria Velasquez said.

Tight end Ryan Krause's DUI case also still is under review by the city attorney's office, stemming from his arrest Jan. 6, this one in Pacific Beach. He also faces a court hearing in February, a busy month for Chargers legal proceedings.

In addition to his public urination citation, Kiel is to appear in court in February hoping to reach a deal with the San Diego County District Attorney on felony charges of theft and possession of a controlled substance. Kiel was arrested in September after Drug Enforcement Administration agents intercepted two packages containing 18 pint bottles of a codeine-based cough syrup. Authorities said Kiel admitted to shipping the syrup to his native Texas, where it can sell for up to $325 on the street.

Linebacker Steve Foley is facing two DUI counts after being shot near his house Sept. 3 by an off-duty police officer, who suspected him of driving drunk. Foley had been driving home after leaving Stingaree, another Gaslamp club.

Another Chargers linebacker, Shaun Phillips, was arrested in April in the Gaslamp after a struggle with police. The district and city attorneys declined to file charges in the matter.

Coaches The Chargers continue to wait out the siege on their assistants. As coordinator Wade Phillips yesterday awaited to hear whether he's the Dallas Cowboys' next head coach, linebackers coach Greg Manusky interviewed with the San Francisco 49ers about their defensive coordinator job. Meanwhile, head coach Marty Schottenheimer has not yet named his next running backs or tight ends coach.

California Man To Be Jailed For Mailing Cocaine, Meth (NOTP)

By Gwen Filosa, Staff Writer

New Orleans Times-Picayune, January 31, 2007

He shipped dope through N.O. port

A California man faces at least 20 years in federal prison for using the U.S. mail to traffic pounds of illegal drugs from his hometown to ports across the country.

Andy Huynh, 36, of El Monte, Calif., worked in a drug-dealing ring that shipped parcels of methamphetamine and cocaine to New Orleans; Honolulu, Hawaii; and Paoli, Pa.; from April 2005 until Hurricane Katrina hit the Gulf Coast, a jury concluded Tuesday at U.S. District Court.

During the two-day trial, federal prosecutors William Quinlan Jr. and Emily Greenfield detailed how Huynh's illicit business venture sent 9 pounds of nearly pure crystal meth, or "ice," through the mails, along with at least 890 grams of cocaine.

The shipments originated from El Monte, which is part of Los Angeles County, and were destined for drug dealers outside Philadelphia, New Orleans and Hawaii's capital city, according to prosecutors.

El Monte is about 12 miles east of downtown Los Angeles, and is known as the hub of the San Gabriel Valley, where Interstate 605 and Interstate 10 intersect.

Huynh was convicted on two counts of illegal drug distribution and faces a minimum of 10 years to life for each, along with fines of up to $4 million on each count.

Postal inspectors seized the parcels.

Huynh is due back in court for sentencing May 16, before Judge Eldon Fallon.

Letten's office worked the drug trafficking case with the El Monte police force, the Drug Enforcement Administration and the U.S. Postal Inspection Service.

4 More Colombian Politicians Face Probe (WP/AP)

By Toby Muse, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, January 31, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0124773

BOGOTA, Colombia -- The Supreme Court opened preliminary investigations into four more politicians for alleged ties to illegal right-wing militias after it was revealed they signed a 2001 letter of understanding with the paramilitary groups, the court's president said Tuesday.

The court also ordered another four politicians, including the foreign minister's brother, to submit to additional questioning as probes deepened into their relations with paramilitaries.

"A preliminary inquiry is going forward, this is the initial phase of the process and to hear their testimony does not imply formal charges," said Alfredo Gomez, a Supreme Court judge.

Seven of those called to testify are backers of President Alvaro Uribe, while one belongs to an opposition party.

Senator Miguel de la Espriella, one of those called to testify, revealed the existence of the document in a November interview with the national daily, El Tiempo.

Some 30 politicians signed the letter, which was headed "confidential and secret," including congressmen, governors, mayors and regional deputies. The pact proposed "rebuilding our country" and the creation of a "new social contract."

While some of the politicians have claimed they were coerced into signing, others said they thought it was the foundation for a peace process. Top commanders of the paramilitaries were present at the meeting.

The pledge is the latest indication of the collusion of Colombia's political establishment with the paramilitaries. Seven current politicians have so far been jailed and are awaiting trial on charges ranging from the creation of paramilitary groups to homicide.

Originally created by landowners and drug traffickers to fight leftist rebels, paramilitaries are accused of some of the worst massacres in Colombia's long-running conflict. They are also accused of exporting hundreds of tons of cocaine abroad.

The paramilitaries are in a peace process with the government that has led to more than 31,000 fighters laying down their arms.

New Details On Sintia Mesa Murder (WUSA)

By Phyllis Armstrong

WUSA-TV, CBS 9, Washington, DC, January 31, 2007

9 News Now has learned disturbing new details about the murder of a Hyattsville woman reported missing last week.

Sources say federal agents with the Baltimore office of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms arrested a man named Jamal Jones (multiple spellings) earlier this month. He was charged with conspiracy to distribute heroin and released. An ATF spokeswoman says federal authorities had been looking for Jones since September of 2005. Sources had also identified the murdered woman's boyfriend as a Jamal Jones. Police have not confirmed or denied that it is the same man.

Baltimore City Police found the body of 25-year-old Sintia Mesa in the trunk of her Toyota Solara on Monday. The cause of death has not been released, but her body showed signs of trauma. Mesa's family reported her missing after she failed to show up for a nail appointment Friday afternoon in Baltimore County and a mandatory work meeting that evening.

Baltimore County police investigators began the search for the Morgan State University Graduate shortly about 12:25 am on Saturday. They say detectives discovered that someone had broken into Mesa's storage locker in Laurel, Maryland. Sources say authorities are looking into the possibility that money was taken from that locker.

Relatives have said Mesa lived with her boyfriend in Laurel until moving back with her parents last year. Police say they interviewed her boyfriend and other people close to her on Saturday about Mesa's disappearance. It is not known whether the arrest of Jones on drug charges had any connection with the murder of Mesa.

Last Sunday morning, police located Mesa's cell phone and other personal belongings in a dumpster. Sources say a signal from that cell phone was picked up around 9:30 pm Friday in the same area as the dumpster. Baltimore City homicide detectives are continuing the search for her killer.

IMMIGRATION:

Citing Persecution, Judge Grants Gay Mexican Immigrant Asylum In U.S. (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0124774

By Tami Abdollah, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 31, 2007

An immigration judge granted a Mexican immigrant asylum, citing his sexual orientation and the severe persecution of gays in Mexico, the immigrant's lawyer said Tuesday.

Jorge Soto Vega, 38, said he had suffered harassment and violence from family members and authorities in Mexico because he is gay.

According to court documents, while living in Guadalajara, Soto Vega was beaten by police with a "metal baton or flashlight" and then robbed, called "anti-gay slurs" and told that he would be killed if he was ever seen again.

In 1988, Soto Vega paid a smuggler to sneak him into the United States, and he settled in the Hollywood and Silver Lake areas. In 2001, Soto Vega returned from a brief visit to Mexico after his mother's death, during which he said he was afraid to go outside. He said he found out about the asylum process upon his return and filed an application the following year.

Soto Vega's request for asylum was denied in 2003 by immigration judge John D. Taylor, who said he could return to Mexico since "it would not be obvious that he was homosexual unless he made it obvious himself."

The case was returned to Taylor after the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals ruled it is the government's responsibility to prove Soto Vega had no "well-founded fear of persecution" in Mexico.

At the hearing Tuesday, the judge agreed that a person should not have to conceal his or her sexual orientation in order to be free from persecution, said Jon W. Davidson, legal director at Lambda Legal, a nonprofit gay-rights group. The U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency waived the right to appeal in the case, spokeswoman Virginia Kice said.

Davidson, who represented Soto Vega, said there was "overwhelming testimony showing severe persecution of gays in all areas of Mexico and therefore the inability of [Soto Vega] to move safely to any other area."

"He's a 38-year-old man who is not married and has never been married. In Mexico, that means you're gay," Davidson said.

Citing strict confidentiality provisions regarding asylum cases, Kice would not comment on the decision.

Soto Vega, who moved to Brooklyn, N.Y., to be near his partner's family about four years ago, said he can now live without fear of deportation.

"It's been a long, long wait to get to this point where I feel today, secure and happy," Soto Vega said.

*

tami.abdollah@latimes.com

US Visa Policy To Come Under Attack (FT)

By Edward Luce

Financial Times, January 31, 2007

US private-sector bodies will on Tuesday criticise the Bush administration for persisting with strict visa policies that they say are damaging the country's reputation around the world and harming US business interests.

The group, which includes bodies representing US universities, business exporters, student associations and think-tanks, will urge the White House and Capitol Hill to make rapid changes to the US visa regime.

These would include steps to expand the number of countries that benefit from the US visa waiver programme and ending the requirement that all visa applicants to the US must submit to a personal interview at US consular offices.

The National Foreign Trade Council estimated that US businesses lost more than $30bn in the two years before mid-2004 because of the visa restrictions imposed after the 2001 terrorist attacks. That figure is likely to be much larger now.

"American businesses now routinely hold training seminars, conferences and sometimes even board meetings outside of the US," said Bill Reinsch, head of the NFTC. "At the same time you see foreign universities attracting more students by advertising the fact that they don't have a US-style visa regime."

The State Department says it has responded to private sector criticisms by employing more than 500 new consular officers, increasing the use of electronic visa processing and cutting down the waiting time for scientists to obtain a visa.

"We recognise the critical importance for the US economy and American public diplomacy of making it easier for students and business travellers to get visas," Dina Habib Powell, US assistant secretary of state, told the FT in a recent interview. For example, the number of visas granted to foreign students last year stabilised at 565,766 after consecutive years of decline, she said.

DOJ_NMG_0124775

However, private sector groups say the Bush administration has not done nearly enough to address the seriousness of the problem. "US agencies must recognise that the conduct of visa policy and the treatment of visitors at ports of entry is public diplomacy," says the private sector statement that will be issued today.

Last year the Discover America partnership – a coalition of travel and tourist groups – found that two-thirds of the 2,011 international business travellers it surveyed thought the US was "the worst country in the world" in the way it treated foreign visitors at the border.

Similar proportions said they feared mistreatment at the hands of US immigration officials. There was no difference in response between visa waiver countries, such as France and Germany, and those requiring visas, such as China and India. Discover America will separately today issue a recommended "blueprint for change" to persuade 10m more foreign visitors to visit the US.

U.S. Is Urged To Step Up Plan To Attract More Visitors (NYT)

By Rachel L. Swarns

The New York Times, January 31, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 30 — One year after the Bush administration vowed to try to slow the decline of overseas visitors to the United States, travel industry executives and some Democratic lawmakers say that the initiative needs to be stepped up.

The lawmakers and executives point to continuing delays in processing visas, staff shortages at international airports here and American consulates abroad and what they describe as a failure to promote the United States adequately as a travel destination since the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

Officials at the Departments of State and Homeland Security counter that they have already made significant progress in addressing such problems. But Senator Daniel K. Inouye, Democrat of Hawaii and chairman of the Senate Commerce Committee, and Senator Byron L. Dorgan, Democrat of North Dakota and chairman of the tourism subcommittee, say legislation is needed to prod the administration to do more.

"Announcing a new initiative is the easy part," Mr. Dorgan said of the administration's plan, which is intended to encourage tourism and business travel. "The follow-through is what is important. And the fact is the results so far have been less than impressive."

Between 2000 and 2005, the number of overseas visitors dipped from 26 million annually to 21 million, according to the Travel Industry Association. In some places in Brazil, Mexico, Venezuela and the Dominican Republic, travelers still wait nearly two months or more to get an interview for a visa, State Department statistics show. And travel industry executives say that an effort to transform the Houston and Dulles international airports into model airports has made "marginal progress."

An association of travel industry executives, called the Discover America Partnership, has hired Tom Ridge, the first homeland security secretary, to help promote its efforts.

The group includes Jay Rasulo, chairman of Walt Disney Resorts and Parks; Jonathan M. Tisch, chairman of Loews Hotels; and Roger Dow, president of the Travel Industry Association. The travel executives are calling for legislation that would increase financing for consular and airport staff and require the administration to report to Congress on its efforts to improve visa processing and customer service at customs checkpoints, among other things.

Mr. Dorgan, who will hold a hearing on the issue on Wednesday, praised the partnership's proposals and said he and other lawmakers would consider them as they drafted legislation. "Other countries have become more aggressive while we have become less aggressive," he said. "It seems to me we ought to change that."

Maura Harty, assistant secretary for consular affairs in the State Department, said critics failed to acknowledge progress that had been made. In September 2006, 47 of the 219 American embassies and consulates that handle nonimmigrant visas had wait times of 30 days or more for visa interviews. Now, she said, only 20 of the postings have wait times of that length.

DOJ_NMG_0124776

Ms. Harty noted that the number of business visas issued in Brazil had surged by 70 percent over the past year and that the number of student visas had increased by 32 percent in China and 30 percent in India. In the meantime, she said, the State Department was testing video conferencing of interviews and mobile consular units in remote locations.

She expressed disappointment that such achievements were not recognized. “We have in essence been changing out the engine while the aircraft is in midflight,” she said. “We have enhanced our service delivery.”

Jarrod Agen, a spokesman for the Department of Homeland Security, echoed her concerns. He said his department was pressing ahead with legislation that would expand the number of countries where travelers are not required to apply for visas in exchange for tougher security reviews of those travelers, among other changes.

“A number of the points are areas where we’re already working to improve and have made strides,” Mr. Agen said.

Stevan Porter, the chairman of the Discover America Partnership, said more needed to be done. “America is experiencing a travel crisis, one that hurts our economy, national security and global standing,” said Mr. Porter, who is also the president of the Intercontinental Hotels Group.

Mr. Ridge said a concerted effort was needed to make sure that America was viewed as a welcoming destination. “I suspect every congressman, senator, ambassador, business leader as well as thousands of individuals citizens have a litany of anecdotes that confirm that it is more difficult traveling to this country,” Mr. Ridge said.

Immigrant Groups Want 'Legalization For Everyone' (CHIT)

By Emma Graves Fitzsimmons

Chicago Tribune, January 31, 2007

An alliance of Chicago immigrant advocates called on Congress Tuesday to give undocumented immigrants legal status when the Democratic majority takes another look at immigration reform in February.

"The language in Washington, D.C., is different from the language here at the grass-roots level," said Carlos Arango, the executive director of Casa Aztlan, a cultural center for the Mexican community in Pilsen. "This is the agenda that comes from the community. It is not negotiable. We want legalization for everyone."

The United Front of Immigrants released a set of demands at a news conference Tuesday that included suspending construction of a fence along the border, establishing a path to citizenship for more immigrants and ending recent attempts by customs officials to intimidate immigrants.

In February, the Senate is expected to reconsider a bill it passed in May that proposed a three-tiered approach for illegal immigrants, requiring some to leave and permitting others to stay.

U.S. Rep. Luis Gutierrez (D-Ill.) is working on a bill in the House and has been in early discussions with Sens. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and John McCain (R-Ariz.) about addressing immigration reform.

Gutierrez "is committed to an earned legalization program that helps people already here to adjust their status," said Scott Frotman, the representative's press secretary. "The congressman believes the time for real comprehensive immigration reform is now. The current system is badly broken. It's hurting families, it's harming business, and it's hindering efforts to guard our homeland."

Chicago has been at the foreground of the national immigration debate after several marches last spring brought hundreds of thousands of protesters calling for the legalization of undocumented immigrants to downtown streets. There are 1.5 million Mexican immigrants residing in Illinois, according to figures from the 2000 U.S. Census.

Immigrant advocates have been trying to harness those numbers to support candidates backing an opportunity for illegal immigrants to earn legal status.

Since 2004, the Illinois Coalition for Immigrant and Refugee Rights has registered 42,057 people in the Chicago metropolitan area. The organization had more than 1,500 volunteers calling voters and knocking on doors on Election Day in November.

A more just immigration reform bill will test how much the Democrats value Latino voters that helped them get elected last year, Arango said.

DOJ_NMG_0124777

The United Front alliance includes several groups that participated in the marches, including Casa Aztlan, the United Network for Immigrant and Refugee Rights, Latino Organization of the Southwest and the International Coalition of Mexicans Abroad.

The guiding principles behind the group's demands are keeping families together and allowing immigrants to live and work in the U.S. without the fears of deportation and discrimination, organizers said.

The alliance plans on working with immigrant advocates in New York and California to pressure Congress, in addition to appealing directly to legislators.

TAX:

The Barrett Report (WT)

By Mark Goodman

The Washington Times, January 31, 2007

The bell has just rung on the 2008 presidential sweepstakes and already more entries have crowded into the gates than the American grandstand can count, much less account for. That's all to the good, as the only winners over the past two decades have been named either Bush or Clinton. Still, since nothing less than the fate of the nation seems to be at stake, it is imperative that all candidates be measured as closely as possible for merit and accountability, beginning with the most visible pretender, Sen. Hillary Clinton.

The disturbing problem is, neither the Democrats or Republicans on Capitol Hill are disposed to brace Mrs. Clinton, even though it is immediately within their power to do so.

Let's return one year to the yellowing Barrett report. In February 2006, after nine years of hard labor, Washington lawyer David Barrett, the independent counsel appointed to investigate the Henry Cisneros scandal, finally published his 684-page report. His study provoked commentary mainly for what was missing — 120 pages of evidence, reportedly devastating to both Clintons, which Democratic congressmen, led by Sens. John Kerry, Dick Durbin and Byron Dorgan, had redacted by attaching a rider to another bill.

Deeply frustrated by nine seasons of blockading by Clinton lawyers and Democratic congressmen, Mr. Barrett issued a statement saying, "An accurate title for the report would be, 'What We Were Prevented from Investigating.' " What, indeed. In an online column written before he signed on as President Bush's press secretary, Tony Snow reported that by all accounts the redacted pages contained enough damning evidence to sink Mrs. Clinton's presidential ship.

Mr. Snow's widely held view made sense, else why would the Democrats go to such extravagant lengths to shield the pages from the light of day? However, there was a catch to the redaction: Any congressman could secure a copy of the vaulted evidence merely for the asking.

As it happened, I had trod a path parallel to Mr. Barrett's in my own investigation into corruption in the highest precincts of a global media conglomerate which led in turn led to evidence of obstruction by President Clinton.

An abiding theme in the redacted pages, insiders say, is the Clinton camp practice of using the IRS to punish its enemies. Mr. Clinton plainly did not leave this illegal practice behind in the Oval Office. By all accounts he has maintained a tight grip on a number of government departments and agencies, notably the Justice Department and the IRS, the folks who can deal the deadliest damage.

I can personally vouch for the Clinton-IRS strategy. In 2002, after I had learned of Mr. Clinton's intrusion into the case I had reported to the IRS, I informed Mrs. Clinton of the facts I'd uncovered. Soon enough the IRS came calling with unwarranted tax demands and threats of criminal investigation. I replied accusing the IRS of conspiring with the Clintons and the media conglomerate to perpetrate "institutionalized terrorism." The agency, finally grasping the irony that it was seeking to punish its own whistleblower, quickly backed off.

So: You really can Just Say No to Clintonian bullying. All of which brings me back round to the 120 missing pages of the Barrett report, still smoking in some nether Beltway trash barrel. I tried to pry the pages out of Florida Republican Rep. E. Clay Shaw Jr. (who, in this tale's one comic episode, referred me to my local Democratic representative) and even appealed to Mr.

DOJ_NMG_0124778

Snow and the chairman of the Republican National Committee — and got nowhere. It's a puzzlement: Why would the Republicans sit on a report they think destined to deep-six the presidential campaign of the Democratic front-runner?

Alas, there are several unholy answers to that riddle. The first is the cynical theory that we don't really live in a democracy but in a series of autocracies changed at fixed intervals. Thus the inevitable corollary: At the top, power-brokers stick together. It further must be clear to the Republican brain trust that the party is on course to take an even worse drubbing in 2008 than it did in 2006, so they're surely counting future cards. And if they have to suffer a Democrat in the White House, who better than Mrs. Clinton, poster girl for moral ambiguity? In that event, it follows, the sequestered pages of the Barrett Report would surely give the Republicans a dandy wild card when upcoming hands are dealt on Capitol Hill. Bluntly put, they'd have Mrs. Clinton at least halfway in their pocket.

Finally, under the law of unintended consequences, it occurs to me that Mr. Bush's Roman abuses of power have provided welcome cover and concealment for Clinton crimes and misdemeanors. I'm an avowed liberal and a registered Democrat, but I do understand that a wrong Bush doesn't make two right Clintons. I submit that in this crucial election season the American public — which, after all, paid $20 million in hard tax dollars for the Barrett report — has every right to access of all pertinent information available on presidential candidates.

Now that the senator from New York has announced "I'm in to win," voters should demand that their representatives release the mystery pages so that they may examine Mrs. Clinton red in tooth. Otherwise, Americans run the risk of going to the polls in 2008 seeking the rebirth of a nation only to discover that they have merely traded the devil for a witch.

Mark Goodman is a veteran journalist and author of the novel "Hurrah for the Next Man Who Dies."

IRS Calculators Offer Guidance Web Site Can Help Figure Out AMT, Sales Tax Deduction (WSJ)

By Tom Herman

The Wall Street Journal, January 31, 2007

Looking for help on your taxes? Consider what may seem like an unlikely source: the Internal Revenue Service.

This year, the IRS Web site (irs.gov) offers a handy new feature designed to help taxpayers calculate whether it is better to deduct their state and local sales taxes instead of their state and local income taxes. More than 11 million people claimed the sales-tax deduction on their returns last year.

The IRS also recently updated a calculator that could help some perplexed taxpayers figure out whether they are likely to be ensnared by the alternative minimum tax, or AMT.

IRS National Taxpayer Advocate Nina Olson says the AMT is the most serious problem facing individual taxpayers. More than 3.5 million people are expected to get hit by it for 2006.

Here is a guide to these features, and their strengths and weaknesses:

Sales-tax deduction. If you itemize your deductions, you can choose to deduct either your state and local sales taxes or your state and local income taxes -- but not both. This provision, which expired at the end of 2005, was recently resurrected by Congress. It is especially helpful to people in Florida, Texas, Washington and other states that have no state income tax. But you don't have to live in those states to benefit.

To figure your deduction, you can use the amount of sales taxes you actually paid, assuming you saved all those receipts. The other, easier choice is to use the standard amount allowed by the IRS -- plus the taxes you paid on certain purchases, such as a car, boat or material to build a house.

That is where the IRS's new calculator comes in handy. It is remarkably easy to figure out the standard amount. Just go to the IRS site and type "sales tax calculator" in the search box. You don't have to give your name or Social Security number. Just plug in details such as your adjusted gross income, number of exemptions and ZIP Code. I tried it for a hypothetical taxpayer with more than $200,000 of income for last year, two exemptions and a 33480 ZIP Code for Palm Beach, Fla. The answer: $2,137.42.

Initial reviews from tax professionals have been favorable. "I'm impressed," says Claudia Hill, owner of Tax Mam Inc., a tax-preparation and planning firm in Cupertino, Calif. Donna LeValley, a tax lawyer and contributing editor of the book "J.K. Lasser's Your Income Tax 2007," says the IRS tool is "easy to use, has clear explanations" and -- most important -- was accurate for the areas in the country she tested. But be sure to print out a copy of your results to show how you calculated the amount, just in case you are questioned, Ms. LeValley adds.

DOJ_NMG_0124779

If you don't want to use the online calculator, you can use the worksheet in Publication 600, posted on the IRS Web site.

Warning: Because of the intricacies of the AMT and how state and local income taxes are calculated, residents of some states who are hit by the AMT might be better off claiming the sales-tax deduction even if they paid more in state income taxes. Deducting sales taxes may make more sense from a state income-tax perspective. To be safe, crunch the numbers both ways to see which is best for you.

Alternative minimum tax: The IRS recently updated an online tool that it says will help most taxpayers figure out in about five or 10 minutes whether they might owe AMT. "Nobody likes the AMT. But this tool helps people learn quickly whether they're going to be paying this tax," says IRS Commissioner Mark W. Everson.

The IRS says this is an automated version of a worksheet used to see if you should fill out Form 6251 for the AMT. But it won't be much use to people who have any of 17 items, such as accelerated depreciation, tax-exempt interest from private-activity municipal bonds or investment interest expense reported on Form 4952. If you check yes to any of these, you still have to fill out Form 6251. * * *

SOME EARLY BIRDS seek inflated phone-tax refunds.

The IRS is investigating "potential abuses" on some individual income-tax returns filed this year. The agency says "some" individual taxpayers have claimed "large and apparently improper amounts" for the special telephone-tax refund.

The IRS says the government stopped collecting the long-distance excise tax last August after several court rulings. Federal officials have authorized a one-time refund of tax collected on service billed in the prior 41 months, from the start of March 2003 to the end of July 2006.

Officials have spotted "some clear abuse involving overstated refund requests," Mr. Everson says. Those requesting an inflated amount "will likely see their refund frozen, may have their entire tax return audited and even face criminal prosecution where warranted."

In some cases, people appear to be requesting a refund of the entire amount of their phone bills, not just the 3% tax on long-distance and bundled service they are entitled to, the IRS said. Some people are requesting "thousands of dollars, indicating they had phone bills topping $100,000 -- an amount exceeding their income."

Some tax preparers "are helping their clients file apparently improper requests," the IRS said. * * *

BRIEFS: IRS Publication 17, "Your Federal Income Tax for Individuals," a general guide for individual taxpayers, is available on the IRS Web site....Rep. John Lewis, a Georgia Democrat, is the new chairman of the Ways and Means subcommittee that oversees the IRS. He succeeds Rep. Jim Ramstad of Minnesota, now the panel's ranking Republican.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Lauds Caterpillar's Teamwork (JSO)

By Paul Gordon

Journal Star (Central Illinois), January 31, 2007

EAST PEORIA - Caterpillar Inc. has shown American companies can compete in a global economy, and do it well, President George W. Bush said during a speech at a Caterpillar plant here Tuesday.

That's why Bush chose Caterpillar and Building SS, where its largest earthmoving equipment is built, as his backdrop in an address about the U.S. economy and the need to continue working toward free trade throughout the world.

"The good folks here show others that in the manufacturing world, we can compete. And that's really what Americans wonder, can you compete in a global economy? My answer is, darn right you can, with good policy. And in this company, you've shown how to compete," Bush told an audience of more than 500 consisting of Caterpillar employees and officials and invited area dignitaries. He was accompanied from Washington, D.C., by U.S. Rep. Ray LaHood, R-Peoria, whom Bush said "has been buggin' me" about coming to Peoria since he was elected.

DOJ_NMG_0124780

But in an address where he spent much time touting his own policies on trade, tax cuts, education and other issues, Bush cautioned that there are some who favor protectionist policies he believes would close off free trade for American companies.

Those companies, including Caterpillar, make up the largest exporting country in the world, one that can get even stronger if free trade agreements are allowed to multiply and flourish.

"I strongly believe that if we can compete with people on a level playing field, nobody can compete with us. And so the key is to make sure the rules are fair," Bush said, addressing an issue that is important to Caterpillar.

While the president used the speech to discuss issues that affect the entire country, he interwove Caterpillar into most of it, holding the company up as an example of a firm that gets things done.

"People say, why would you want to go to Peoria â€¦ I want to get out of Washington and sit down with folks that are really the backbone of this country. And I wanted to come to one of America's great companies, and that's Caterpillar," he said.

Bush praised the company's motto, Team Caterpillar, as meaning "everybody works together for the common good and if it benefits one, it benefits all. And that's the spirit I have found here."

His speech followed an hour-long tour of Building SS, including viewing some of the training programs Caterpillar has in place for employees and visiting with workers on the assembly lines.

He even took a brief spin on a D10 bulldozer. "If you've never driven a D10 - it's a cool experience," he said to the laughter of the audience.

Bush used what he saw and learned on his tour in his speech when discussing trade and exports, when talking about attitudes of the American work force and in connection with the need to make our children skilled and educated.

"Let me talk to you about Caterpillar. Half the products you make in America are exported. It's an interesting statistic, isn't it? You walk by one of these things, it's sold right here in the United States, but the other one right here is sold overseas," he said, motioning to the bulldozers that stood near the podium.

He pointed out that Chile, a country with which he signed a free trade agreement only a few years ago, is now Caterpillar's fifth largest export market.

Bush said the growing export market for Caterpillar is why the company is adding jobs.

"People want Caterpillar products. Why? Because they work. They generally don't break down, the master craftsmanship is great, and there's a demand for them," he said.

Bush said he knows trade with China is controversial. "But I want to tell you something, if you're a Caterpillar worker or a Caterpillar shareholder, what that has meant. It meant that Caterpillar exports to China have increased by 40 percent since the market was opened. That's helped to create more than 5,000 new jobs right here in America."

Bush also discussed his tax cut policies that he said has helped companies like Caterpillar to better afford research and development and small companies to purchase needed equipment. Those cuts, he added, also meant people kept more of their hard-earned income in their pockets.

He intends to continue those cuts, he said, and will submit a budget to Congress next week showing how to balance the budget in five years while keeping taxes down.

Bush spoke about new technologies and how those, including new batteries for autos and ethanol development from sources other than just corn, will help reduce the country's dependence on foreign oil.

Bush In Illinois To Tout Policies (CHIT)

By James P. Miller

Chicago Tribune, January 31, 2007

EAST PEORIA, Ill. -- President Bush plugged his economic policies Tuesday, telling an audience at Caterpillar Inc.'s manufacturing plant that his administration's actions played a role in helping Caterpillar achieve its three-year string of record earnings.

After touring the company's factory, and test-driving one of the mastodon-size tractors made at the plant, Bush told the crowd that the economy is strong and said, "The fundamental question is, what are we going to do to keep it strong?"

DOJ_NMG_0124781

The answer he proposed was a continuation of the tax and trade policies that the Bush administration has pursued for the last six years. But with Congress now controlled by the Democrats his policies are being challenged.

Bush's trip to the heartland was part of a two-day campaign aimed at focusing public attention on the economy's health. On Wednesday the president is scheduled to deliver what is being billed as a "State of the Economy" speech in New York.

In Caterpillar the White House selected a company that competes successfully on the global stage and has profited from global trade. It has operations in 23 of the world's 24 time zones and it is enjoying strong sales in China and other offshore markets, even as its U.S. sales have sagged in response to the steep falloff in housing starts.

The company has been riding a global boom in commodity prices, which has spurred demand for its mining and oil-exploration equipment, its construction equipment, and its massive diesel-powered electric generators.

"In this company," Bush told a crowd of about 400 Caterpillar employees and local officials, "you've shown how to compete in a global economy."

Caterpillar has long been known for its organizational and logistical prowess in support of its far-flung operations. However, it was not always as lean and efficient as it has become over the past decade. In the early 1990s Caterpillar endured a series of lengthy and bitter strikes by the United Auto Workers union, as it sought to rein in wages and benefits.

The company eventually prevailed, and for more than a decade has experienced labor peace with the UAW. The Peoria-based company employs about 17,000 people in the local area, but its production workforce is smaller than it once was, thanks in part to the company's expansion of production in Asia and Europe. A residue of bitterness over those strikes still lingers among former workers for the town's leading employer.

White House spokesman Tony Snow told reporters Monday that the president's address in East Peoria would be "highlighting, among other things, the benefits of global trade and the way in which free and fair trade have enabled companies like Caterpillar to prosper on the global market."

Caterpillar is a major exporter, and it also produces products in foreign markets for sale in those regions. But it was apparent when Bush spoke that the rank-and-file workers remain unconvinced on the issue.

When Bush told the crowd, "We don't need more taxes," he drew a big round of applause. But the group failed to respond with similar warmth when he told the workers that "the temptation is to say: 'Let's protect ourselves. Let's isolate ourselves.'"

Because international trade is so crucial, Bush said, "it would be a mistake for Caterpillar workers to do that."

The president's speech had been expected to include a call for a legislative renewal of what used to be known as "fast-track" trade authority. In essence, that power enhances the president's ability to make trade deals with other nations, because it obliges Congress to simply vote yes or no on accords that the president negotiates.

But in his speech, delivered from a podium situated among huge pieces of equipment in the factory's cavernous shipping area, Bush did not raise the issue of renewing the trade authority.

But he praised "fair trade" accords, such as those his administration helped bring about between the U.S. and the nations of Chile and Australia, and said those pacts had played a major role in the surging sales Caterpillar has seen in both countries.

Of course, a dramatic run-up in the price of metals such as copper, nickel and iron ore, which is largely attributable to China's fast-growing industrial economy, has been a key driver of Caterpillar's booming sales overseas.

Bush's effort to align his administration with Caterpillar's success has drawn mixed reviews in this industrial town on the Illinois River.

An editorial in Tuesday's Peoria Journal Star conceded that the administration's efforts in certain areas have benefited the company. But, the editorial continued, "the difficult decisions Cat made to put the company in the position it enjoys today … were largely made in Peoria, not in Washington, D.C."

The president arrived at the Peoria airport about 9 a.m., when the temperature was about 7 degrees and a biting wind made conditions even more unpleasant. His first stop was a breakfast with some local small-business owners.

"People say, 'Why would you want to go to Peoria?'" Bush told the factory audience, before adding, "I want to get out of Washington and sit down with folks that are really the backbone of this country. And I wanted to come to one of America's great companies, and that's Caterpillar."

DOJ_NMG_0124782

Much of the president's comments involved a detailed defense of numerous policies, including his education plan, his desire to make earlier tax cuts permanent and the administration's alternative-energy proposals.

Before his speech Bush walked through the manufacturing facility accompanied by Caterpillar Chief Executive Jim Owens.

At the end of the tour the president climbed aboard a massive piece of heavy equipment painted the iconic Caterpillar yellow and told the press pool: "I'd advise you to stand back. I'm about to crank this sucker up."

He drove it forward about 20 feet, then backed it into a turn and straightened the giant vehicle out.

Bush then climbed down, saying, "Oh, yeah."

Bush Pushes For More Free-trade Deals In Cat Speech (PG)

By Mike Riopell And Blackwell Thomas

Pantagraph.com, January 31, 2007

EAST PEORIA -- President Bush visited central Illinois Tuesday and stood before Caterpillar Inc.'s iconic yellow bulldozers to call for more free trade agreements that he says make it easier for U.S. companies to export their goods. | Video

"I know it's a bad mistake for the country to lose our confidence and not compete," he said.

The president, during a 24-minute address to a crowd of about 500, said exports by the giant manufacturer of earth-movers increased following trade agreements his administration negotiated with other countries.

But it's not clear the Democratic leadership in Congress will wholeheartedly endorse creating more.

U.S. Sen. Dick Durbin says current trade agreements aren't strictly enforced by Bush's administration.

And Durbin suggests Caterpillar's success isn't necessarily reflective of the country's manufacturing climate, noting substantial layoffs in several Illinois communities including Herrin and Pinckneyville.

"As we lose good paying jobs in America overseas to China and other countries, we need to enforce the trade agreements that this administration and others have entered into," Durbin said on the Senate floor Tuesday.

While some have found new work, Durbin said many jobs aren't of as high a quality as many of the ones lost.

"The reality of America's economy is that on his watch we have lost three million manufacturing jobs," he said.

But Caterpillar assembler Raymond Knollenburg said the president's visit to the 1 million square foot East Peoria factory meant a lot to him.

"Our products are all over the world and the president recognizes that," he said.

Bush began the visit at a local eatery and took a spin driving a large bulldozer before speaking to the crowd.

His remarks focused on the economy in order to preface a major policy speech he'll give Wednesday in New York.

But he didn't completely avoid some of the controversial policies of his presidency â€“ promoting the No Child Left Behind education program and defending his tax cuts.

"It's important for you to keep your own money," he said. "You work hard for your money."

Gary Ball, who works in repairs at Caterpillar, said the speech notably didn't deal much the war in Iraq.

"I thought he had a very good message, especially with education," he said. "But I am sure everyone would like to hear something about the war. I guess this just isn't the place for it."

Tuesday's visit to the Peoria area was Bush's only stop in Illinois. About 500 Caterpillar employees and local officials heard the speech, with some workers sitting on bulldozers as part of the backdrop.

Despite the pomp that comes with a presidential visit, Caterpillar spokesman Rusty Dunn said everyone would get back to work soon after Bush left.

"Once the bleachers and seats are removed we'll be back to work immediately," he said.

Bush Pushes Free Trade At Tractor Plant (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang And Molly Hennessy-fiske

The Los Angeles Times, January 31, 2007

EAST PEORIA, ILL. — Using two huge yellow earthmovers as his backdrop, and giddy over driving a third, President Bush sought Tuesday to calm fears about globalization, the nation's economic future and the risks of easing trade barriers, arguing that free trade benefits U.S. workers.

DOJ_NMG_0124783

"The temptation is to say, 'Well, trade may not be worth it, let's isolate ourselves, let's protect ourselves,' " Bush said, adding: "It's a bad mistake for the country to lose our confidence and not compete."

Opening a campaign for renewed trade-negotiating authority before a low-key audience of workers and managers from Caterpillar Inc., which manufactures heavy equipment and sells a large portion of it overseas, Bush is facing a tough battle with an uncertain outcome.

He has not yet specifically asked Congress to renew his "fast-track" negotiating authority, which expires July 1, but he is expected to do so soon. Also known as "trade promotion authority," it allows him to negotiate trade agreements that Congress cannot amend — just vote to approve or disapprove.

Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.), chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, signaled a readiness Tuesday to work with Bush on the issue, saying he was trying to get the two political parties out of "divorce court."

"If we don't give trade promotion authority [to the White House], we've got to have a good reason for not giving it," he said during a committee meeting.

This month, 37 Democrats who had campaigned against free trade urged Rangel to "reverse the troubling results of the administration's trade agreements and trade policies." The issue has taken on added importance in recent weeks because efforts are underway to energize negotiations of a global trade treaty that have been stalled for half a year.

Bush's speech was the first of two this week promoting the nation's economic strength. He is to travel today to Wall Street, where he will speak at historic Federal Hall.

The president told the audience at Caterpillar that the nation's exports of goods and services last year were worth $1.4 trillion, and that exports amounted to 11% of the nation's economic value, with one in six manufacturing jobs dependent on foreign sales.

He noted that half of Caterpillar's products were sold overseas, and that since the United States and Australia initiated a free-trade pact in 2005, Caterpillar's exports to that country had grown 26%.

However, there is a counterpoint to the president's numbers and his optimistic tenor.

Although wages and employment are growing, Bush faces an undercurrent of concern — over the effects of technology, the struggles facing the Big Three automakers and other traditional blue-collar manufacturing employers, and, most notably, globalization.

And though Bush cites recent improvements in the economy, Bureau of Labor Statistics figures indicate that over the six years of his presidency, real earnings of rank-and-file workers, comparing their earnings with purchasing power, have grown only 3%.

Lawrence Mishel, president of the Economic Policy Institute, a liberal research organization, says that the nation's trade imbalance cost 3 million manufacturing jobs in the United States from 2000 to 2005 and has brought down wages in the typical American household by $2,000 to $6,000 a year.

But at Caterpillar, Bush found room to argue for trade's benefits.

The company employs 45,000 workers overseas — nearly half its workforce of 94,000, according to company figures — and Bush said that Caterpillar sales to China, where its staff numbers in the thousands, had boosted the company's workforce in the United States by 5,000.

But Alan Reuther, legislative director for the United Auto Workers union in Washington, responded to Bush's comments Tuesday by noting that as Caterpillar expanded overseas, it "adopted a couple of policies we think are terrible" to cut costs domestically, including a two-tier pay scale for new workers and reduced benefits for retirees and their families.

"Meanwhile, the industry has been booming, and Caterpillar cites record profits," Reuther said. "The feeling among our folks is they could easily do better by their workers." Caterpillar employs about 11,000 UAW members, Reuther said.

Bush's audience, 300 plant workers and company managers, was generally subdued. But it came alive, just as he did, when he described his encounter with a D10 track-type tractor, a behemoth of a machine.

He climbed aboard, telling reporters, "I would suggest moving back. I'm about to crank this sucker up."

DOJ_NMG_0124784

With that, the machine came to life, moving forward on its yellow metal treads, until the president brought it to a halt about 20 feet down the line and started it on a backward turn. When Bush climbed down from the cab, the inner boy was shining through, and a broad, sheepish grin crossed his face.

"Oh, yeah," he said.

"If you've never driven a D10," he told the workers and managers a few minutes later, "it's a cool experience."

Bush Pushes For More Free-trade Deals (AP)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, January 31, 2007

President Bush, pressing his free-trade agenda on a Congress now run by Democrats, said Tuesday more foreign markets need to be opened to U.S. products.

"The temptation is to say, well, trade may not be worth it. Let's isolate ourselves. Let's protect ourselves," Bush said, standing on a factory floor before 300 employees of Caterpillar Inc.

"I know it's a bad mistake for the country to lose our confidence and not compete," the president said.

Bush wants Congress to extend his authority to negotiate free-trade deals, a request that likely will face an uphill battle in Congress. Democrats won the November elections in part by arguing that the administration's free-trade policies were costing U.S. jobs and exposing American workers to unfair competition from low-wage countries.

Now with Democrats in control, Bush faces an even bigger challenge in getting Congress to renew the Trade Promotion Authority. Also known as fast-track authority, it lets the president negotiate trade deals that Congress must approve without amendments. That authority expires on July 1.

"We're going to continue to negotiate free trade agreements," Bush said. "And by that I mean, we just want people to treat us fairly. I'm confident in our ability to sell American products and services overseas if the playing field is level."

Bush used Caterpillar's huge earth-moving equipment as a backdrop for the first of two economic speeches this week. He travels to New York City on Wednesday to give what he's calling an address on the state of the economy.

Since his State of the Union address, Bush, whose job approval ratings are at record lows, has focused his public events on health care, energy and the economy — domestic issues that have been overshadowed by the unpopular war in Iraq.

He traveled to visit Caterpillar because the company is taking advantage of a growing global demand for construction and mining equipment. The company posted record profits and revenues for three straight years, creating about 5,000 jobs at its U.S. plants in Illinois, Colorado, Pennsylvania and Tennessee.

Caterpillar spokesman Timothy Elder says Bush's trade policies helped the company net about $9 billion in sales outside of North America in 2006, when revenues of about $41.5 billion netted profits that topped $3.5 billion — both company records.

Since Bush took office in 2001, however, the country has seen one in five manufacturing jobs disappear, a total of 2.96 million lost jobs, with U.S. automakers and textile companies particularly hard-hit. The U.S. trade deficit is expected to climb to a fifth consecutive record when the final figures for 2006 are totaled up next month.

U.S. Business and Industry Council, which represents small and medium-sized U.S. manufacturing companies and is critical of the administration's trade policies, called Tuesday for a moratorium on all new trade agreements until the trade deficit is brought under control.

Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., said, meantime, he is exploring approaches to bridge the gap on trade between Democrats and Republicans in Congress and the White House. His committee, which oversees trade issues in the House, held a hearing Tuesday to air those differences.

Rep. Sander Levin, D-Mich., said he wished that Bush had decided to visit a factory in an industry that has been battered by foreign trade rather than Caterpillar, which is one of the U.S. success stories. Levin is from Michigan, where American auto companies have been hard-hit by foreign competition.

Before he spoke, Bush stopped at the Sterling Family Restaurant to chat with customers having breakfast near a grill laden with steaming hash browns. He talked in a back room with small business owners before heading to tour the Caterpillar factory.

DOJ_NMG_0124785

"I would suggest moving back. I'm about to crank this sucker up," Bush called from the cab of a yellow tractor. He started the motor. A puff of smoke belched from its stack, and the president steered it around the assembly line. "That was fun," he exclaimed as he got off.

Citi Will Buy Egg To Raise U.K. Presence (WSJ)

By Carrick Mollenkamp And Ian Mcdonald

The Wall Street Journal, January 30, 2007

Citigroup Inc.'s £575 million ($1.13 billion) purchase of Egg Banking PLC from Prudential PLC sets the stage for the U.S. financial-services company to step up its battle in the British credit-card market against entrenched banks such as Barclays PLC and Bank of America Corp.

For Prudential, one of Britain's largest insurers (unrelated to the U.S. Prudential), the transaction is part of a broad review of its United Kingdom business.

The cash transaction, which is expected to close by April pending regulatory approval, gives Citigroup access to online bank Egg's three million customers, 2.9 million of whom are Egg card customers. Before this deal, Citigroup had just 800,000 card customers in the U.K. Egg's share totals about 5.7% of U.K. credit-card outstanding balances.

Citigroup will be up against banks such as Bank of America, which has about a 15% share of U.K. credit-card outstanding balances, and Barclaycard, which has about a 13% share. They dominate the market along with Royal Bank of Scotland Group PLC, which has about a 15% share, according to industry estimates.

Citigroup is paying a high price -- roughly two times Egg's book value, or its assets minus liabilities -- especially considering Egg's recent struggles.

Egg, based in London, is expected to post a pretax operating loss of £145 million for 2006, Prudential said.

Bush Promotes His Free Trade Initiatives (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, January 31, 2007

EAST PEORIA, Ill., Jan. 30 — With Democrats making the case that his economic policies have benefited the rich more than the middle class, President Bush struck back on Tuesday, in the first of back-to-back speeches promoting what the White House characterizes as 41 consecutive months of economic growth.

Mr. Bush came here to East Peoria, home to Caterpillar, the world's biggest manufacturer of earth-moving equipment, to advance his free trade initiatives and press Democrats to make his tax cuts permanent. On Wednesday, he heads to New York's financial district to deliver a more formal "State of the Economy" address at Federal Hall, where he is expected to ask Congress to extend his authority to negotiate trade agreements that cannot be amended.

"The temptation is to say, well, trade may not be worth it, let's isolate ourselves, let's protect ourselves," Mr. Bush told a friendly audience of Caterpillar employees, standing against a backdrop of gigantic tractors in the company's familiar colors of yellow and black.

He added, "It's a bad mistake for the country to lose our confidence and not compete."

The president was mostly preaching to the converted. Caterpillar was carefully chosen by the White House to put Mr. Bush's policies in the best possible light. The company's exports to Chile and Australia have shot up following free trade agreements negotiated by the Bush administration. And China, which negotiated a trade deal with President Bill Clinton, is now Caterpillar's fifth-largest export market.

"Americans wonder, can you compete in a global economy?" Mr. Bush said, before answering himself. "My answer is, darn right, you can."

With Mr. Bush's public approval ratings having crumbled, his domestic agenda faltering and his Iraq strategy running into a wall of opposition on Capitol Hill, White House advisers are hoping to capitalize on economic growth and low unemployment figures as a way to elevate public opinion of the president.

Already, the polls show a fresh hint of optimism. A survey by the Pew Research Center found that while public approval of Mr. Bush's handling of the war had dropped nine points, to 23 percent from 32 percent, from August to December 2006, approval of his handling of the economy went up six points, to 39 percent from 33 percent. A recent Gallup Poll, meanwhile, found 65 percent of respondents predicted they would be better off a year from now than they were today.

DOJ_NMG_0124786

But Democrats, who won control of Congress in part by arguing that Mr. Bush's economic policies are giving short shrift to the middle class, do not intend to give up that ground without a fight. The president's twin appearances this week are setting the stage for a battle between Mr. Bush and Congressional Democrats over the economy in general and trade in particular.

Already, Democrats are signaling they will resist extending the president's "fast track" trade negotiating authority, unless Mr. Bush couples the plan with proposals to demand tougher labor and environmental standards from the United States' trading partners and help for American workers who are displaced by foreign competition.

"We don't want to abandon free trade," Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, said in an interview Tuesday, "but he's got to offer more protections and cushions for people who are caught in its maw through no fault of their own."

On Wednesday, while Mr. Bush is delivering his speech in Manhattan, a House-Senate committee will hold a hearing on the economy, led by Mr. Schumer, who has just published a book outlining how Democrats can hold power by reclaiming their status as the party of the middle class. The chief Democratic witnesses are Robert E. Rubin and Lawrence H. Summers, both former treasury secretaries under President Bill Clinton.

"When the average middle class voter hears the president speak, he or she thinks, 'The guy doesn't know what I'm going through, it's not terrible, but it's not so rosy either,' " Mr. Schumer said, adding that the hearing is "intended to be an answer to the president."

In East Peoria on Tuesday, there was a preview of this same political clash. At Caterpillar, with Representative Ray LaHood, a Republican, in tow, Mr. Bush found what a pool report described as his "inner boy" when he drove one of the giant tractors for about 20 feet.

"I would suggest moving back," Mr. Bush announced as he climbed into the tractor cab. "I'm about to crank this sucker up." And then he did, later pronouncing it "a cool experience."

While the president was busy driving, the freshman Democrat who represents the district next door was busy issuing a press release arguing that Mr. Bush was ignoring the financial condition of his constituents. The congressman, Representative Phil Hare, who worked as an aide to his predecessor before winning election in November, pointed to another Illinois community, Galesburg, where he said free trade treaties "drove 1,600 good-paying Maytag jobs" to Sonora, Mexico.

In Peoria, President Plays Up Economy (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, January 31, 2007

PEORIA, Ill., Jan. 30 -- So it's come to this. As President Bush tries to win back public support and sell his new domestic program, he came here Tuesday to see whether it would play in, well, you know the rest.

Bush flew here to have breakfast with small-business leaders at a diner in perhaps the nation's most famous place for testing the marketability of ideas, then headed over to the Caterpillar plant across the Illinois River in East Peoria to climb aboard a massive D10 tractor and take a presidential spin.

The other presidential spin of the day was about the strength of the economy. While the Iraq war dominates the political dialogue in Washington, Bush reminded audiences that the economy has been growing along with U.S. exports and credited his tax and trade policies. He touted health-care and energy proposals from his State of the Union address and made the case for brokering further free-trade agreements.

"The temptation is to say, 'Well, trade may not be worth it, let's isolate ourselves, let's protect ourselves,' " Bush told workers surrounded by Caterpillar's trademark earthmovers. "I know it would be a mistake for Caterpillar workers to do that. . . . I know it's a bad mistake for the country to lose our confidence and not compete."

U.S. exports increased by 13.1 percent in the first 11 months of last year and 10.7 percent the year before that. Caterpillar has enjoyed particularly strong growth, with $9 billion in exports last year and $41.5 billion in overall sales.

But most Americans have lost faith in Bush's stewardship of the economy. In a Washington Post-ABC News poll this month, 41 percent of Americans approved of the president's handling of the economy, while 57 percent disapproved. Critics argue that

DOJ_NMG_0124787

Bush's ratings reflect a poor economic record, noting increases in the trade deficit, the national debt, the number of uninsured Americans and other barometers since he took office.

Bush argues that his tax cuts have spurred a robust economic recovery and pumped enough additional revenue into federal coffers to cut the deficit substantially. He plans to press his case with a fuller speech on the economy in New York on Wednesday.

He focused here on trade, promoting his record at a time when lawmakers are considering whether to extend his authority to negotiate agreements that are subject to "fast-track" up-or-down votes in Congress without amendment. Every president in modern times has enjoyed such power, but it expires this summer, and with Democrats now in charge of Congress, Bush faces a tough time getting it extended. He has completed trade pacts with Panama, Peru and Colombia that are awaiting congressional approval, and he is negotiating with South Korea and Malaysia. He also wants to jump-start stalled global trade talks.

The president used Caterpillar to make his case, noting that Chile became its fifth-largest export market after a Bush trade agreement. Similarly, he said, Caterpillar sales to Australia rose 26 percent after a 2005 trade pact. And he said Caterpillar business with China since it opened its market has risen 40 percent and helped create 5,000 jobs.

As he toured the facility here with Jim Owens, the chairman and chief executive, though, Bush made no mention of the schism between him and the company over climate change. Owens and Caterpillar joined nine other major corporations last week calling on Bush to support mandatory caps on emissions generally believed to contribute to global warming. Bush rebuffed the idea but proposed cutting gasoline consumption 20 percent over 10 years.

Asked about the disagreement with the corporate executives by ABC News after the visit, Bush said "I appreciate their call" for caps but repeated his preference for innovating out of the problem. "There needs to be time for some of these technologies to kick in, to give them a chance to work," he said.

Caterpillar was the second of the 10 companies in the climate-change alliance that Bush has visited since the State of the Union. He went to a DuPont facility in Delaware the day after the speech. Aides said it was coincidence.

It may be that Bush chose to come here to indulge a male fantasy -- the chance to drive one of those dirt-digging tractors that seem to fascinate every young boy. At the end of his tour, he climbed aboard and plopped down at the controls.

"I would suggest moving back," he warned reporters. "I'm about to crank this sucker up."

The president cranked the sucker up, powered it forward 20 feet, then backed it into a turn and finally straightened it out. No reporters were hit. But Bush was delighted.

"Oh, yeah," he said with satisfaction as he climbed down.

Dems Want Trade Talks To Include Protections (USAT)

By David J. Lynch

USA Today, January 31, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush and congressional Democrats fired the opening salvos Tuesday in what could become a major debate about whether the U.S. pursues additional trade agreements.

On Capitol Hill, key Democrats said Tuesday that they would insist on new protections for workers and the environment before granting President Bush an extension of his trade negotiating authority.

At issue is the president's ability to negotiate trade deals, which expires June 30. Monday, White House spokesman Tony Snow said the president "absolutely" wants an extension of his so-called trade promotion authority, which limits Congress to approving or rejecting trade agreements. The administration's formal request could come as soon as today.

The looming battle about an extension comes amid what Democrats say is rising economic insecurity despite an unemployment rate of 4.5%. The House Ways and Means Committee has scheduled a hearing today on the economic challenges facing the middle class.

Tuesday, Bush touted the benefits of trade while visiting a Caterpillar plant in East Peoria, Ill.: "We're 5% of the people in the world. That means 95% live outside of America, and shouldn't we try to put ourselves in a position where we can sell goods and services to those 95%? I think it makes sense to do so."

DOJ_NMG_0124788

Democrats, however, don't want to give the president a blank check. Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., chairman of the Ways and Means panel, said Democrats required "assurances" before extending the president's authority.

The price of an extension may be administration agreement on new efforts to prepare workers for an era of less job security and help for those who lose their jobs as the economy adjusts. Senate Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus, D-Mont., is calling for a "globalization adjustment assistance" package that would broaden existing programs to cover service industry workers.

But with U.S. exports booming, and a potential new global trade deal at risk, Democrats don't want to appear obstructionist. Rangel said he would try to reach a trade bargain with Republican colleagues on the powerful panel.

"If we don't give (the White House) trade promotion authority, we've got to have a good reason," he said during a hearing on the impacts of trade and globalization.

Levin Fires A Salvo On Fast Track (HILL)

By Ian Swanson

The Hill, January 31, 2007

House Democrats should not hold serious talks on extending fast-track negotiating authority with the Bush administration until it agrees on changes to the labor provisions of three pending free-trade agreements, a senior House Democrat told The Hill yesterday.

“I think we need a breakthrough in those areas before there can be meaningful discussions about renewal of fast track,” said Rep. Sandy Levin (D-Mich.), who chairs the trade subcommittee of House Ways and Means.

Levin’s statement, which was made outside a Ways and Means Committee hearing on trade and globalization, is the latest indication of how contentious trade legislation will be during the 110th Congress.

Levin said the free-trade deals the administration has already negotiated with Colombia, Peru and Panama will have to be renegotiated. The lawmaker said that getting those countries to make commitments in so-called side letters would not be sufficient because the only way to ensure that changes to the deals are enforceable is to make changes to the text.

“I think we’re going to have to renegotiate and put new provisions in those agreements, because I don’t see how else you do it in a way that’s fully enforceable,” Levin said.

If this is done before the end of March, Levin said the three trade agreements, which are opposed by organized labor, could still be submitted under the current fast track authority, which expires at the end of June. Levin suggested these changes would build confidence with Congress that the administration will use fast track in the right way.

Fast track requires that Congress be given 90 days’ advance notice of the administration’s intent to sign a free-trade agreement. The administration has already signed the deals with Peru and Colombia, but would have to renegotiate those deals and sign new ones to meet the demands of Levin and other House Democrats. The administration has completed talks with Panama and announced its intention to sign that deal.

President Bush is expected to ask for an extension of fast track this week. Without fast track, also known as trade promotion authority, the administration could not send deals to Congress for up or down votes. As a result, other WTO members would be unlikely to negotiate with a U.S. administration that lacks fast track.

If Democrats refuse to grant Bush a fast-track extension, the U.S. risks being blamed for killing the WTO negotiations, according to Gene Sperling, a former economic adviser to President Clinton, who testified at the Ways and Means hearing. In response to a question from Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles Rangel (D-N.Y.), Sperling said he thought it was possible for the administration and Congress to agree to an extension of fast track limited to allowing the administration to conclude the current round of WTO talks.

In exchange, Sperling said Democrats should get a commitment that the administration will press for stronger environmental and labor language not only in bilateral agreements, but in the ongoing WTO round. He acknowledged it is probably not possible to win labor concessions in the current WTO discussions, but said stronger environmental provisions were possible.

DOJ_NMG_0124789

"I think that if the administration comes forward with a good-faith down-payment on the type of things that the Democrats are concerned with, the Democrats should at least be willing to consider a temporary extension of [fast track]," Sperling told The Hill after the hearing.

Rangel told reporters after the hearing that U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab has warned him that the U.S. would be blamed for the failure of the WTO talks if fast track is not extended by Congress. Rangel said Schwab spoke to him from Geneva, where she is discussing the Doha round with her counterparts.

Some lobbyists have argued that requesting an extension of fast track is a win-win situation for the administration, since if Democrats refuse to grant the extension, the administration could blame them for the failure of the WTO talks.

Rangel said a fast-track extension would depend on what conditions are tied to the authority, and on how long of an extension is considered. In a joint press release with Senate Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus (D-Mont.), Rangel said a reauthorization required a "great deal of trust," and that Congress would need certain assurances before being willing to extend fast track.

Democrats Give Bush The Business On Trade (WP)

By Peter S. Goodman

The Washington Post, January 31, 2007

As President Bush was out in Peoria touting the virtues of foreign trade and asking for fresh authority to promote it, newly ascendant Democrats on Capitol Hill signaled just how tough it's going to be for the president to get what he wants.

In a hearing, Democrats repeated earlier warnings that they are unlikely to approve pending trade pacts with Peru, Colombia and Panama unless the administration agrees to provisions tightening labor and environmental protections in those countries. They pledged to demand similar labor rules before extending the president's authority to negotiate new trade deals.

"We have had trade policies in this administration that assume that trade is an end in itself, that market forces will work themselves out, that there isn't really an active role for government," said Rep. Sander M. Levin (D-Mich.), who chairs a House subcommittee on trade. "We've had a tremendous loss of U.S. manufacturing jobs."

The new chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.), presided over a wide-ranging discussion that touched on how to prevent companies from shifting production to exploitative factories in poor countries, how to confront China over allegedly unfair trade practices and how to help Americans who lose jobs.

The hearing took place as President Bush visited the Illinois headquarters of Caterpillar, the construction-equipment giant and a highly successful exporter. There, the president asked Congress to extend his so-called trade promotion authority -- his legal right to negotiate trade pacts that he can submit to lawmakers for a simple up-or-down vote. It expires at the end of June, and without it, trade deals stand little chance of getting through Congress as individual legislators pick them apart to protect jobs in their districts.

The administration is intent on gaining an extension in hopes of restarting talks aimed at lowering tariffs around the world. Those talks, known as the Doha round of trade negotiations, have been stalled for months over American and European unwillingness to pare farm subsidies and over claims from India and other poor countries that they will not benefit enough from opening their markets further to foreign goods.

In recent days, trade ministers have been meeting at the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland, to try to jump-start the talks. Though most analysts assume the prospect of a breakthrough remains dim, U.S. Trade Representative Susan C. Schwab offered tempered optimism yesterday.

"This was the first time we had a large group of trade ministers gathering in one venue where there was clear agreement on the need to move forward with the Doha round and a sense of urgency that if at all possible we need to identify a means of achieving a breakthrough," Schwab said at a news conference in Geneva.

During the House hearing, and in a flurry of written statements, Democrats said they would not readily give the president the extension he seeks, expressing skepticism about the administration's willingness to ensure that trade deals benefit American workers.

DOJ_NMG_0124790

"It requires a great deal of trust," Rangel said in a statement. "Congress must have some key assurances before it is willing to extend this leverage."

But as the chairman acknowledged during the hearing, turning Bush down would carry political risks. The Doha talks have been aimed at extending the benefits of globalization to poor countries. If Democrats refuse to extend the president's authority, that could convince the Europeans that concessions would be futile, since any agreement could die in a quagmire of congressional amendment-making.

"If we don't give trade promotion authority, we have to have a good reason for not giving it," Rangel said.

Yesterday's House hearing, which ran for more than three hours, revealed the competing views on trade that now divide the nation.

Several Republican lawmakers from districts where companies enjoy strong exports called for congressional approval of the Colombia and Peru trade deals to extend the good times.

"We're not at the mercy of globalization; we control our own destiny," said Grant D. Aldonas, a former Bush administration undersecretary of commerce for international trade. He noted that Wal-Mart had become emblematic of the threats seen by foes of cheap imports, but those same imports help people living on limited paychecks. "Every day Sam Walton's store is open for business, it's delivering globalization to the American doorstep," Aldonas said.

Democratic lawmakers and some panelists kept the focus on the costs of expanded trade -- the steady move of manufacturing jobs to lower-cost countries.

Lawrence Mishel, president of the Economic Policy Institute, a research group critical of globalization, said the United States needed expanded benefits for laid-off workers and health care coverage to address the gap between rich and poor before embracing further trade.

"How are people going to accept further liberalization when they are anxious in their daily life?" he asked. "Let's get things right in the United States before we press further down this road."

Ex-Clinton Aide Urges Free Trade Deal (FT)

By Eoin Callan

Financial Times, January 31, 2007

The Democratic leadership in Congress has turned this week to old-school Clintonites to help persuade the freshman class of '06 to moderate the militant critique of globalisation that helped get them elected.

Gene Sperling, a former economic adviser in the Clinton administration, on Tuesday testified before the House ways and means committee on the need for a new consensus on free trade during a hearing addressed by both corporate cheerleaders and labour movement critics of trade policy.

The architect of Bill Clinton's pro-trade economic policies has also held private meetings with the new Democratic representatives.

The testimony and encounters are part of a battle for hearts and minds in the hearing rooms and corridors of Capitol Hill as Congress waits to decide on an expected request from President George W. Bush to extend his trade promotion authority.

Lawrence Summers and Robert Rubin – former Treasury secretaries under Mr Clinton – will on Wednesday add their voices to the debate as they advocate a centrist economic policy that ensures middle-class prosperity.

But of the party's distinguished "three wise men" on economic policy, it is Mr Sperling who has spent the most time working the Hill, imparting advice and answering critics.

Mr Sperling has met with scepticism – and even hostility – from rank and file members, according to people familiar with the discussions. In a letter obtained by the Financial Times, a stunning 39 of the 42 freshman Democrats in the House said "the issue of trade and the impact of the administration's policy" was "critically important" to their campaigns during the mid-term elections.

"Vital to our electoral success was our ability to take a vocal stand against the administration's misguided trade agenda," adds the letter, addressed to party leaders.

DOJ_NMG_0124791

The letter is seen as a signal that new members are reluctant to be pressed into voting on controversial, pending trade agreements with Colombia, Panama and Peru or the extension of trade promotion authority, which expires on June 30.

Mr Sperling said on Tuesday he regretted contributing to a polarised debate during his time in the White House by not presenting "a balanced assessment" of the costs and benefits of trade.

But he called on Democratic leaders to negotiate a limited extension of the president's fast-track trade negotiating authority to facilitate an agreement in the Doha round of world trade talks so the US was "not blamed for killing the agreement".

The quid pro quo, he said, would be "limited down-payment" on the demands of Democratic leaders for the inclusion of tougher labour standards in bilateral deals and steps towards a big expansion of the social safety net.

Mr Sperling also called for long-term moves towards universal health care as the "most important" step to address voter anxieties about trade.

There were also signs on Tuesday that business leaders have accepted the new political realities that will shape trade policy in the wake of the mid-term elections.

Terry McGraw, the head of the Business Roundtable, told the Congressional hearing: "We need changes in our trade policy."

The roundtable, which represents 160 of the top US chief executives, indicated it would drop its opposition to the inclusion of tougher labour standards in bilateral agreements.

Consumer Confidence Looks Robust (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, January 31, 2007

WASHINGTON — Consumers had a more upbeat view of the economy in January, but their optimism was tinged with concern that growth could slow in coming months, a private research group said Tuesday.

The New York-based Conference Board's consumer confidence index rose to 110.3 in January, the highest since May 2002 and a slight increase from the revised 110.0 figure of December.

While consumers' assessment of current conditions improved, their expectations for future growth declined to 94.5 from 96.3 last month.

"Looking ahead … consumers are not as optimistic as they were in December. All in all, the index suggests a moderate improvement in the pace of growth in early 2007," says Lynn Franco, director of The Conference Board Consumer Research Center.

The index, based on a telephone survey of 5,000 households, comes as the Federal Reserve winds up a two-day meeting today on interest rates and the economy. Economists surveyed by USA TODAY expect the Fed to hold the target for short-term rates steady at 5.25% at the meeting.

The central bank is trying to engineer a soft landing, in which growth and inflation moderate but the economy continues to expand.

San Francisco Fed President Janet Yellen in a recent speech said one of the biggest puzzles for policymakers right now is why the job market was "going gangbusters" while overall growth is only "middling."

The unemployment rate was 4.5% in December. The January figure will be released Friday.

"If labor markets are as tight as the unemployment rate suggests, then there may be reason for concern about building inflationary pressures. If … they are not, then it is more likely that we are headed for a 'soft landing,' " Yellen said.

In a note to clients, Moody's Economy.com noted that the share of consumers in the confidence survey terming jobs plentiful hit the highest level in more than five years, suggesting employment may still be robust — boding well for near-term wages and spending, but not for Fed rate cuts.

The number of consumers calling current conditions "good" rose to 28.1% from 27.4%, with the level calling jobs "plentiful" rising to 29.9% from 27.6% in December.

DOJ_NMG_0124792

However, the slice of consumers expecting their incomes to rise in the next six months fell to 19.8% from 21.4%. Those expecting business conditions to get better dipped to 16.2% from 16.7%. The share of people planning to buy a home rose to the highest level in five months.

Mike Englund of Action Economics says confidence was "benefiting from solid fundamentals, including falling gasoline prices, lofty stock prices, low interest rates, a tight labor market and surging income."

He calls the survey more evidence the USA should be able to avoid a recession in 2007 and that consumer spending, two-thirds of the economy, should hold up.

U.S. Consumer Confidence Level Is Flat Amid A Softer Outlook (WSJ)

By Michael S. Derby

The Wall Street Journal, January 31, 2007

U.S. consumer confidence was flat in January from December amid softer expectations for the economy's outlook, a report Tuesday said.

The Conference Board said that its consumer confidence-index for January moved to 110.3, from the revised 110.0 in December and 105.3 in November. Economists had expected a reading of 110, according to a survey by Dow Jones Newswires.

A gauge of expectations for the future retreated to a reading of 94.5 in January from December's revised 96.3, though consumers' assessment of current conditions rose to 133.9 from a revised 130.5.

"This month's slight increase in confidence was solely the result of an improvement in the present situation index," said Lynn Franco, who leads the private research group's Consumer Research Center. She tied the better mood over the economy's current state to the labor market, and said that the overall index "suggests a moderate improvement in the pace of growth in early 2007."

The number of consumers who called jobs "plentiful" rose to 29.9% from 27.6% in December. Those calling jobs "hard to get" slipped to 19.7% from 21.3%. The improvement in employment sentiment is unsurprising in light of the economy's solid job creation and its low 4.5% unemployment rate. The government is set to report on the January hiring situation on Friday, in a report economists expect will show further strength.

Survey respondents calling current economic conditions "good" represented 28.1% of the survey, versus 27.4% who held that belief a month ago. But at the same time, those calling conditions "bad" inched up to 16.5% from 14.9%. Consumers' view on the outlook for hiring was mixed, and those who expect to see incomes rise over coming months fell to 19.8% from 21.4%.

The Conference Board survey is based on a mail-in survey of 5,000 households. The cutoff date for responses was Jan. 23.

Stocks Shrug Off Concerns Over Oil Prices, Interest Rates (WSJ)

By E.s. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, January 31, 2007

Oil prices surged and the Federal Reserve began a two-day meeting on interest rates, but stocks rose despite the oil and interest-rate uncertainty.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average advanced 32.53 points, or 0.26%, to 12523.31, back within 100 points of the record hit last week, of 12621.77. It is up 0.48% in 2007.

The gain came despite a 5.5% jump in crude-oil futures to $56.97 a barrel, the highest finish since Jan. 3. Natural-gas futures rose 11.6%.

Traders blamed cold weather, which could increase demand for natural gas and heating oil. They pointed to Saudi Arabia's decision to go through with a small production cut on Feb. 1. (For more on oil's move, see related article1.)

Oil stocks gained on the news, but for most companies and consumers, higher oil prices are a problem.

Money managers looked past the issue because many are becoming more comfortable with the outlook for the economy and interest rates. They think oil prices are rising because of the strong economy, and that they aren't high enough to be a threat. They were reassured to see an index of consumer confidence hit a five-year high.

Few investors now expect a Fed rate cut in the first half of the year, but many believe this is because of the economy's strength. They hope the Fed's meeting will end today with a statement suggesting little change in the Fed's plans for rates.

DOJ_NMG_0124793

"If there is no change in the Fed's interest-rate outlook, the market is likely to just shrug it off," said stock trader Larry Peruzzi of Boston Company Asset Management. "The one thing that could probably cause some reverberation would be if the Fed became more hawkish, and said it had to do something about inflation."

Investors would dislike any hint of Fed plans for a rate rise, since higher rates raise costs for businesses and consumers and tend to hurt stocks.

The Russell 2000 small-stock index hit a record, up 0.61% to 797.97.

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 0.58%, or 8.20 points, to 1428.82, ahead 0.7% this year. The Nasdaq Composite Index advanced 0.31%, or 7.55 points, to 2448.64, up 1.4% in 2007.

Outside the U.S., stocks advanced in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. stocks, rose 0.47%, or 1.14 points, to 244.53.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks advanced2. Trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.65 billion shares, as 2,361 stocks rose and 975 fell.

Bond prices gained3. The 10-year Treasury note rose 4/32, or $1.25 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.875%. The 30-year bond was up 4/32 to yield 4.983%.

The dollar weakened4. Late in New York, it traded at 121.61 yen, down from 121.80, while the euro rose against the dollar to $1.2966 from $1.2953.

Senate Clears Way For Minimum Wage Vote (AP)

By Jim Kuhnhenn

AP, January 31, 2007

The Senate cleared the way for an increase in the minimum wage Tuesday, but only with business tax breaks that House Democrats want removed.

Final Senate passage of the legislation is expected later this week, setting the stage for a round of difficult negotiations between House and Senate Democrats over how to get the legislation to President Bush for his signature.

In a key test, the Senate voted 87-10 to end debate on the bill Tuesday, well clear of the 60 votes needed.

Earlier this month, the House passed the same increase in the wage floor — from $5.15 to $7.25 an hour over two years — without any tax provisions. Senate Democrats tried to push through the House version last week, but failed to get the 60 votes to end debate.

The vote Tuesday emphasized how Senate passage of the bill depends on the tax package to attract Republican votes. The White House has also signaled that Bush wants tax breaks in the legislation.

"Raising the minimum wage will cost some jobs," Al Hubbard, the director of the president's National Economic Council told reporters aboard Air Force One Tuesday. "We think it's important to counter that with tax breaks that will replace those jobs."

"The Senate has recognized that our economy is interdependent," said Sen. Michael Enzi, R-Wyo. "One simply cannot claim credit to be helping workers at the same time that they're hurting the businesses that employ them."

The tax breaks in the Senate bill have divided the private sector, pitting small businesses and retailers that would benefit from them against the larger corporations and manufacturers that would have to pay for them. The package costs $8.3 billion in lost tax revenue over 10 years.

To help pay for the tax breaks, corporations no longer would be able to deduct the cost of jury verdicts or settlements in liability suits against them and their executives' tax-deferred pay packages would be capped at $1 million a year.

The bill's business critics are especially annoyed that the tax benefits would be short-term while the provisions that pay for them would alter tax law for the long-term.

"The permanent tax law changes here far outpace and outweigh the few benefits," said Bruce Josten, the chief lobbyist for the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, which opposes the bill.

DOJ_NMG_0124794

The bill would extend tax breaks that allow small businesses to deduct up to $112,000 in new investments a year. It also would reduce the depreciation period for improvements to retail properties and extend a tax credit for businesses that hire low-income or disadvantaged workers.

"We think they are all significant," said Dan Danner, an executive vice president at the National Federation of Independent Business, whose membership consists mostly of business owners with 10 or fewer employees.

The rift stems from the new Democratic Congress' approach to tax relief, which requires that every tax dollar lost to a new tax break be offset by a tax increase or closed loophole elsewhere. It also signals the new Democratic majority's willingness to pay heed to the small business community even as it irritates larger corporate interests.

Still, House Democrats want to pass a clean bill — without tax breaks — and cite constitutional precedents that require tax legislation to begin in the House. Some Democrats want their leaders to dare Senate Republicans to vote against the minimum wage increase. House Democratic Leader Steny Hoyer said Tuesday that House and Senate leaders have not decided how to proceed.

"The Senate has different challenges than we do," Hoyer said, referring to the 60-vote thresholds needed in the Senate to end debate.

In the Senate, Republican critics of the legislation have argued that raising the minimum wage might force some businesses to stop hiring entry level employees. They also contend that beneficiaries of a higher minimum wage likely will be teenagers working part-time jobs, not the working poor. But few if any Republicans have protested the revenue provisions in the tax package.

Ending the business deduction for court settlements, jury verdicts and fines would generate about $540 million over 10 years. Josten said such a provision would eliminate the incentive for companies to settle liability lawsuits out of court.

The cap on tax-deferred compensation responds to congressional and public criticism of large executive pay packages, including a $210 million severance package for ousted Home Depot Chairman-CEO Bob Nardelli. The Senate bill would allow employees to defer up to $1 million a year or a figure equal to the five-year average of their taxable salary, whichever is less. That cap would generate about $810 million in revenue over 10 years, according to the Senate Finance Committee.

Brigen Winters, an executive compensation attorney at the Groom Law Group in Washington, said the five-year average could end up taxing deferred compensation for middle managers or employees of startup businesses who are offered deferred compensation based on the performance of the enterprise.

"It affects various types of compensations for a very broad array of employees," Winters said.

But congressional tax writers dismissed the complaints, saying the vast majority of people affected by the cap would be highly compensated executives.

"These hypotheticals are really red herrings," said Carol Guthrie, a spokeswoman for the Senate Finance Committee. "When most Americans would be thrilled to be able to put away even a portion of the $15,000 the average worker is allowed to save in a 401(k) every year, it's a pretty hollow argument that $1 million or 100 percent of pay is not enough for executives and managers to add to their tax-deferred accounts."

Danner, speaking of the NFIB's small business membership, said: "Our guys could not be worried less that you could only roll over $1 million in compensation."

Senate Debate Ends On Wage Bill (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, January 31, 2007

ASSOCIATED PRESS

The Senate cleared the way for an increase in the minimum wage yesterday, but only with business tax breaks that House Democrats want removed.

Final Senate passage of the legislation is expected later this week, setting the stage for a round of difficult negotiations between House and Senate Democrats over how to get the legislation to President Bush for his signature.

In a key test, the Senate voted 87-10 to end debate on the bill yesterday, well clear of the 60 votes needed.

DOJ_NMG_0124795

Earlier this month, the House passed the same increase -- from $5.15 to $7.25 an hour over two years -- without any tax provisions. Senate Democrats tried to push through the House version last week but failed to get the 60 votes to end debate.

Yesterday's vote emphasized how Senate passage of the bill depends on the tax package to attract Republican votes. The White House also has signaled that Mr. Bush wants tax breaks in the legislation.

"Raising the minimum wage will cost some jobs," Al Hubbard, the director of the president's National Economic Council told reporters aboard Air Force One yesterday. "We think it's important to counter that with tax breaks that will replace those jobs."

"The Senate has recognized that our economy is interdependent," said Sen. Michael B. Enzi, Wyoming Republican. "One simply cannot claim credit to be helping workers at the same time that they're hurting the businesses that employ them."

The tax breaks in the Senate bill have divided the private sector, pitting small businesses and retailers that would benefit from them against the larger corporations and manufacturers that would have to pay for them. The package costs $8.3 billion in lost tax revenue over 10 years.

To help pay for the tax breaks, corporations no longer would be able to deduct the cost of jury verdicts or settlements in liability lawsuits against them and their executives' tax-deferred pay packages would be capped at $1 million a year.

The bill's business critics are especially annoyed that the tax benefits would be short term while the provisions that pay for them would alter tax law for the long term.

"The permanent tax law changes here far outpace and outweigh the few benefits," said Bruce Josten, the chief lobbyist for the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, which opposes the bill.

The bill would extend tax breaks that allow small businesses to deduct up to $112,000 in new investments a year. It also would reduce the depreciation period for improvements to retail properties and extend a tax credit for businesses that hire low-income or disadvantaged workers.

"We think they are all significant," said Dan Danner, an executive vice president at the National Federation of Independent Business, whose membership consists mostly of business owners with 10 or fewer employees.

Senate Adds Tax Breaks As It Passes A Wage Bill (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, January 31, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 30 — The Senate voted overwhelmingly on Tuesday to move ahead on a bill to increase the minimum wage, signaling that the measure is likely to pass this week.

But the vote also sets up a conflict with the House that is likely to stall any increase.

The Senate bill includes $8.3 billion in tax breaks for small businesses that Democrats who sponsored the bill said were necessary to obtain Republican support.

The 87-to-10 vote on Tuesday was to limit debate on the bill. Democrats say they expect to achieve a similarly wide margin of approval on the final bill.

The House approved a simpler bill, including the wage increase but no tax breaks, this month. The Democratic leaders there insist that it should not be necessary to offer tax breaks in exchange for the wage increase, the first in 10 years.

The two bills would raise the minimum wage $2.10 an hour, from $5.15 to $7.25.

Democratic leaders from both chambers now have to figure out how to reconcile the measures. Assuming that the Senate bill passes, Democratic leaders can hold onto it and negotiate with their House counterparts. Or the Senate can send the bill to the House, which could block consideration of it or strip out the tax breaks and send it back to the Senate for another vote.

In the House, 82 Republicans joined Democrats to approve the wage increase. The Senate rejected the bill without tax breaks.

Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader, said Tuesday that he expected leaders of the two chambers to work out the differences.

“There are many different ways it can happen,” Mr. Reid said, although he offered no specifics.

DOJ_NMG_0124796

Democrats have accused Republicans of trying to stall the bill by offering dozens of amendments. Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts and the chief proponent of the bill, promised to press ahead until the wage increase passes.

"If they're hoping we'll get tired," Mr. Kennedy said, "they're sorely mistaken."

Republicans, however, insisted that the Senate would not go along with the "clean" bill that the House wants.

"Clean means do it my way," said Senator Michael B. Enzi of Wyoming, ranking Republican on the Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee. "That's not how we often do it in the Senate."

Republicans noted that Democrats went along with a combined package for raising the minimum wage and tax breaks 10 years ago and that President Bill Clinton applauded them for it.

"And if it was O.K. in 1997, it ought to be O.K. now," said Senator Charles E. Grassley, Republican of Iowa.

Workers Held Hostage (WP)

The Washington Post, January 31, 2007

THE FEDERAL minimum wage hasn't been raised in a decade. During that time, businesses have received $276 billion in tax cuts. Another $36 billion has been directed specifically toward small businesses. The administration boasts -- though its numbers are overstated -- that, for 2006, 25 million small-business owners will receive an average tax cut of $3,641. So why, you might wonder, are President Bush and Republican lawmakers insisting that even more tax cuts be lavished on small-business owners as the price for approving a $2.10 increase in the minimum wage, from $5.15 to $7.25 an hour, in three steps over two years? The measure on the verge of being passed by the Senate would direct another $8.3 billion in such tax cuts over 10 years to small businesses, supposedly to offset the costs of the wage hike.

Without the tax breaks, the wage hike cannot pass the Senate's 60-vote hurdle for cloture, strategists on both sides insist. Meanwhile, the House version -- it passed 315 to 116, with 82 Republican votes in favor -- does not include tax breaks.

If the tax breaks are warranted, they should be granted as part of a larger review of tax policy -- not as a ransom for raising the minimum wage, now at its lowest level, adjusted for inflation, in half a century. It's good that the Senate has found other tax changes to pay for the cuts, but with the Democrats' commitment to pay-as-you-go rules, those kinds of offsets are going to be harder and harder to find; these could be used for other, perhaps more worthy, causes than another business tax break. To the extent that small businesses need help, the cuts are poorly targeted. For example, one provision would increase from $5 million to $10 million the threshold for businesses to be permitted to use cash accounting; a business grossing more than $5 million hardly sounds like a mom-and-pop shop.

The House got it right. It should stand firm -- and dare Senate Republicans and the president to block the long-overdue increase.

Who's That Senior Administration Official? (POL)

By Mike Allen

The Politico, January 31, 2007

There is no news organization in Washington, including this one, that could get by for long without them. Their wisdom echoes through dozens of Washington columns and broadcasts each day.

They are the ubiquitous "senior administration officials," and they remain one of Washington's more enduring mysteries. Never mind who they are. The puzzle is what they are.

A casual reader might assume that there is some kind of formal protocol that makes it clear to reporters and officials alike exactly who qualifies as senior enough to be quoted anonymously as a senior official. But there is no such thing.

Simply put, the answer to how someone gets to be a senior official is: It depends. If the source insists on being called a senior administration official, chances are he or she can get away with it, no matter if by most objective measures -- title, salary, proximity to power -- they are not really all that senior. This is especially true when reporters are in a jam and eager to prove to editors or readers that they have covert access to serious inside players.

DOJ_NMG_0124797

"I was quoted as a 'senior administration official' even before I became a senior administration official," says Joe Lockhart, who was White House press secretary under President Bill Clinton. "No one in the government wants to be a 'junior administration official,' and no one in the press wants to quote one."

Some of the best reporters, however, know it can be more impressive not to give promotions to anonymous officials. The late Ann Devroy, who covered the White House for The Washington Post, sometimes peppered her stories with vaguely described but apparently well-informed "mid-level" officials.

This attribution was far more worrisome to the real senior administration officials in the West Wing. That's because many of the senior officials quoted in White House stories are not insiders secretly dishing details they are not supposed to talk about. They often are authorized spokespersons who are charged with promoting the official line. The notion that mid-level officials are secretly chatting with reporters without talking points in hand can be genuinely alarming.

These days, the practice of talking as a "senior administration official" is so routine that officials will often begin an interview by saying, "OK, I'm doing this as an SAO."

Bob Schieffer, who has covered seven presidencies and is now host of CBS's "Face the Nation," says the term originated as a variant of "senior American official," which was the designation reporters used to describe a person extremely close to Secretary of State Henry Kissinger during his shuttle diplomacy in the Middle East in the early 1970s.

"'Senior American official' would say things that Henry Kissinger couldn't be quoted on, but he laid out what was happening and what the other side was going to have to do and other things that would have been awkward if Kissinger had been quoted as saying them," Schieffer says. "It sort of ballooned, and then you'd get back to Washington and you'd wind up with 100 people in a room and you'd have some official come in and brief as a 'senior administration official.' It's been abused for a long, long time."

One reason White House officials often want to be called "senior administration officials" is so the speaker could have been from the State Department, the Pentagon or elsewhere in the government. It makes it easier to put some distance from the quote if it spurs unwanted controversy. Sometimes State Department officials begin interviews by saying, "Senior official-no building," meaning they can't be identified by agency.

As recently as November, dueling SAOs also showed up at the White House press filing center in Riga, Latvia, after a memo containing National Security Adviser Steve Hadley's candid appraisal of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki was leaked to The New York Times. The official transcript shows introductory remarks by White House Counselor Dan Bartlett and Press Secretary Tony Snow, then an asterisk break and two speakers, each called "senior administration official," mysteriously take over.

Those two were senior officials by anyone's definition. But the term has become somewhat debased, so that the definition of "senior" often has very little to do with any organizational chart and instead is a shorthand way of saying "someone on the government payroll who would talk to me when I needed a quote or tidbit." An SAO can provide something as momentous as the president's position going into an international summit and as trivial as the menu when he had a few members of Congress over for breakfast.

Olivier Knox, White House correspondent for Agence France-Presse, has a fairly strict definition of who it's kosher to call a "senior" official -- at least in theory.

"It should be someone who talks directly to the president about substantive matters or who talks regularly to top aides about substantive matters," he says. "An assistant secretary is fine."

But does Knox really stick to that? "Nowhere near as often as I should," Knox chuckled. "That's the ideal."

Washington Mysteries will be a regular Politico feature, in which we explain capital customs that everyone takes for granted but no one really understands. If you have a Washington Mystery you want to see unraveled, email us at washingtonmystery@politico.com.

Join The Conversation

You need to be a registered user of Politico.com to "join the conversation". If you are not a member yet, what are you waiting for? Register Now!

by Desert Rat on 01.30.2007 at 10:38 PM

test , I just signed up

DOJ_NMG_0124798

Before you start composing please note that you will need to be a registered user of Politico.com to "join the conversation". If you are not a member yet, what are you waiting for? Register Now!

Democrats Unveil $463.5B Spending Bill (AP)

By Andrew Taylor

AP, January 31, 2007

Democrats say they are making the best of a bad situation as they bring to the House floor a massive bill cobbling together $463.5 billion in unfinished budget business.

The bill, combining the budgets of 13 Cabinet agencies, won praise Tuesday from Democratic Party allies such as activists pressing the fight against AIDS overseas and advocates for boosting education funding.

Lawmakers in both parties hailed the bill for freeing highway construction funds, even as the White House complained that the bill will slow aid to communities harmed by a 2005 round of military base closings and cut a request for basic scientific research.

Still, the White House signaled that President Bush would sign the bill into law once it reaches his desk.

The House debate on Wednesday promises to be bitter, and the measure appears likely to pass on a largely party-line vote. But Republicans in the Senate appear unlikely to place procedural hurdles in its path.

The harshest criticism came from House Republicans, who complained that they were shut out of any chance to offer changes to the bill — and had barely any time to read it.

Rep. Jerry Lewis of California, the Appropriations Committee's top Republican — displaced as chairman last fall — ripped into the Democrats for rushing the bill to the House floor "without any prior debate whatsoever and without the opportunity to offer even one amendment on the floor."

Republicans also took issue with Democrats' claim to have "scrubbed" the bill free of homestate projects. They pointed to, for example, $50 million to match last year's funding for the Denali Commission, which funds rural road, sanitation, energy and other infrastructure projects in Alaska. Then there was the Senate's refusal to kill $45 million in funding for an indoor rainforest project in central Iowa, even though local backers have yet to come up with their required share of funding.

Democrats sought to focus attention of numerous — albeit generally small — funding increases they managed to provide in favored accounts, even while living within tight limits set by Bush and last year's GOP-dominated Congress.

The powerful veterans lobby won a $3.6 billion increase for medical care, earning praise from veterans groups and the White House, while low-income college students would receive a $260 boost in the maximum Pell Grant, to $4,310.

"After five years of broken promises from the administration, this is an important down payment by Democrats on our commitment to help families with high college costs," said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass.

State and local law enforcement agencies, meanwhile, won increases in grants for new equipment and hiring new officers.

Community development block grants, however, were frozen at current levels, as was Amtrak. But advocates for those programs took them as a victory relative to Bush's budget submitted a year ago.

Activists pressing for big boosts to combat AIDS, malaria and tuberculosis overseas won a $1.3 billion increase — to $4.5 billion. That's enough to fund the president's $225 million initiative to fight malaria and increase the U.S. contribution to the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria to $724 million.

The rock star Bono, who sparred with House Appropriations Committee Chairman David Obey in a meeting last month, praised Democrats for the AIDS-fighting boosts — though he might not be invited to Obey's office for a while after making demands the prickly Wisconsin Democrat found unreasonable.

The measure also lifted funding for highways, transit and motor carrier safety programs by $4 billion — to the amount specified in the six-year highway spending bill passed in 2005 and increases funding every year.

Bush's request for the Millennium Challenge Corp., which channels foreign aid to countries implementing economic and political reforms, was frozen at $1.7 billion, drawing a mild rebuke from the administration.

Senate Republicans predicted that Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., would schedule debate close to a Feb. 15 deadline and give them little choice but to pass the bill.

DOJ_NMG_0124799

"What do they want?" Reid asked. "To close the government down?"

Asked how he thought debate might go, Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., said: "Quickly."

Oregon Senator Threatens Filibuster (LAT/AP)

By Matthew Daly

The Los Angeles Times, January 31, 2007

WASHINGTON — An Oregon senator is threatening to filibuster a must-pass spending bill if Congress does not extend payments to rural counties hurt by cutbacks in federal logging.

"The federal government has an obligation to rural Oregon, and it's time to meet that obligation," said Sen. Gordon Smith, R-Ore. "We are talking about people's jobs, children's schools and general public safety in 700 timber counties in 39 states."

Congress is considering a $463.5 billion spending bill that would pay for 13 Cabinet agencies this year. Democratic leaders hope to move the bill through the House as early as Wednesday, with the Senate likely taking it up after that.

Smith said he would try to block the bill if it does not include funding for the Secure Rural Schools and Community Self-Determination Act, a seven-year-old law that has pumped more than $2 billion into Oregon and other states hurt by federal policies that restricted logging in the 1990s. The policies were aimed at protecting the spotted owl and other threatened species.

The law -- known as "county payments" -- expired last year, and the federal government sent out its final checks to counties last month.

Smith and other Western lawmakers have been trying to reauthorize the law, but they have been frustrated by budget constraints and concerns that Oregon gets too much money under the current formula.

Oregon, long a leading timber producer where more than half the land is owned by the federal government, received more than $149 million of the $385 million distributed nationally last year by the Forest Service, far surpassing No. 2 California, which received $66 million. Washington state was third at $42 million; Idaho got about $21 million.

Smith sent a letter Tuesday to Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., and Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., declaring that he will "put the brakes" on the budget bill if it does not include a one-year extension of the county payments program, which he called a "safety net" for rural America.

Some state and local officials have warned that libraries might be closed, deputy sheriffs laid off and other services curtailed if the timber program is not renewed.

The Senate would need 60 votes to overcome a filibuster effort.

Pentagon Is Stunned By $3 Billion Cut (HILL)

By Roxana Tiron

The Hill, January 31, 2007

A continuing resolution released Monday night axes more than half of the money the Pentagon needs to meet its base realignment and closure (BRAC) commitments, potentially preventing the military services from completing the process by 2011 as required by law.

The Army, which has 61 percent of the total BRAC budget, is preparing for the consequences of appropriators' decision to deny the Pentagon more than $3 billion out of the $5.8 billion authorized last year for BRAC.

That decision could have widespread knock-on effects on the rotation of troops in and out of Iraq and Afghanistan, the building of new brigades and the Army's plan to bring troops back from Germany.

Senior military officials had been pressuring lawmakers to add billions of dollars for necessary base closures as well as military construction and quality-of-life projects to the continuing resolution that would fund the government until the end of fiscal year 2007.

A failure to do so could have a grim impact on the services, military officials warned.

But appropriators did not heed the services' call and allotted $2.5 billion for BRAC costs for the military to begin work on the highest-priority programs. The money represents an increase of $1 billion over the 2006 budget level.

"It is pretty devastating for us," said an Army official who asked not to be quoted by name.

DOJ_NMG_0124800

The service has put together a complex plan that links its military construction and troop movement plan with BRAC implementation.

Faced with the loss of billions of dollars this year, the Army is considering how to bring in additional funding for its projects. The delay of those projects ultimately will have an impact on the service's tactical and operational units, according to the official.

The Army and the rest of the military services could get more money in the upcoming emergency supplemental, but several sources pointed out that it is unlikely the military would get the entire $ 3.3 billion, if much of it at all, in the 2007 war supplemental.

Currently, there is no request of such nature in the supplemental, according to the Army official.

The Pentagon is submitting its supplemental request for the rest of 2007 together with its 2008 budget next week. The service would depend on Congress's "generosity" to get more money, the official added.

Moreover, the service may be forced to readjust its 2008 budget submission because several requests for military construction are predicated on the completion of projects in 2007, the Army official said.

"There is a trail of things predicated on getting BRAC money in a timely fashion," the official said.

The Army is standing up new brigades as part of its so-called modularity effort. A lack of funds could shortchange the Army's plan to create a more easily deployable force and affect overseas operations.

The Army's force-rotation plan and overall readiness rely on completing its "modularity" plan on time. The Army now faces the possibility of lacking adequate facilities to train new forces and maintain equipment.

For soldiers rotating in and out of Iraq and Afghanistan, the Army also is building facilities; some of that construction is in part linked to BRAC.

In addition, without full BRAC funding, the Army may delay bringing back forces from Germany and keep units returning from conflicts inactivated for a longer period than desired, the official said.

A lack of funding may force the Army to resort to temporary housing — a practice that has long been criticized by Congress.

While it saves money in the short term, it becomes a "colossal waste of money," according to an industry source. The Army already was criticized for the use of temporary facilities to implement its modularity plans.

"Congress does not consider BRAC as an emergency that they have to do," the Army official said. "They seem to think that they can extend BRAC." Such decisions could have wider implications, the official added.

The Army may look for authority to transfer, or reprogram money from its basic military construction accounts into BRAC accounts, said the industry source.

Ultimately, the services and Congress may have to look at the possibility of delaying the implementation of BRAC, but that won't be able to happen without a change in the law. Currently, the Pentagon has six years after the approval of a BRAC round (in this case, 2005) to finish the process.

In order to increase money for BRAC 2008 and 2009 to catch up, the Army may have to trade money from its regular military-construction accounts, the official said, and that does not come without consequences.

The House is taking up the continuing resolution today and strong debate over the bill is expected.

Some Lawmakers Worried CR Could Affect Reelection Prospects (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan

The Hill, January 31, 2007

Democratic leaders' decision to exclude earmarks and to direct federal agencies to ignore legislative language that might look like pork has worried some House freshman Democrats, said one Democratic lawmaker and a senior Democratic aide.

In a meeting last Friday for Democratic chiefs of staff, some staffers worried that the absence of earmarks and an overall spending decrease — spending in the CR will not rise with inflation — would hinder their drive toward reelection.

While earmarks are not popular inside the Beltway, they do resonate with many voters. That is why most legislators do not announce their earmarks until after they have been signed into law. But in the wake of earmark scandals and both parties seeking to claim the mantle of fiscal discipline, boasting about earmarks will likely be on the decline in the 110th Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0124801

Another drawback of the CR, congressional officials explained, is that Members' Representational Accounts (MRAs) will remain stuck at 2006 spending levels. A 4 percent increase, for example, would allow lawmakers to hire more staffers or pay current staffers more money. Others worried that libraries, hospitals and other institutions in their districts would be adversely affected by the spending freeze.

Budgets always present party leaders with challenges, and Democratic leaders decided to deploy their whip team to gauge support for the CR. Some lawmakers, such as Rep. Jason Altmire (D-Pa.), told House leaders that they would oppose the bill if it included earmarks and a pay hike for lawmakers. Democratic leaders met Altmire's conditions for a yes vote: increased spending on veterans' healthcare and no cost-of-living adjustment for lawmakers.

That lawmakers would complain about spending levels would not be unusual except for the unique predicament in which Democratic leaders found themselves upon assuming the majority earlier this month.

Faced with having to fund the government for the rest of fiscal year 2007, Democrats would have had to pass nine of 11 appropriations bill that the House Republican majority of 2006 did not. Rep. David Obey (D-Wis.) and Sen. Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.), the chairmen of the House and Senate Appropriations committees, respectively, decided to cram those nine spending bills into the continuing resolution and to consider the measure without any earmarks or debate.

Democrats and Republicans blamed each other for the process and substance in the budget. Republicans lit into Democrats, complaining once again that they were not allowed a role in drafting the bill or in amending it on the House floor.

"The CR results from the failure of Republicans to do their work," said Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.), referring to the House Republican majority's inability or unwillingness last year to pass the spending bills. "It would be an unending process to open it up."

The bill, which the House will consider tomorrow, has taken on the form of both a conference report and an omnibus spending bill, depending on which party is talking. Hoyer emphasized that the CR was being treated as a conference report, which is not subject to amendments.

Rep. Paul Ryan (R-Wis.), the ranking Republican on the House Budget Committee, said, "What they're doing is they are rewriting appropriations. This is an omnibus appropriations bill. And to bring an omnibus appropriations bill to the floor with a closed rule and no chance of amendments and no chance at debate is really historic."

In policy memos distributed to GOP staff and reporters, Republicans alleged that the CR included long-term earmarks for programs housed at the Department of Energy and that changes in funding formulas would decimate the Section 8 housing program.

Nevertheless, Democratic lawmakers cheered their leaders at the Democratic Caucus meeting yesterday, said aides who were in the room. House Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman John Dingell (D-Mich.) led his colleagues in applauding Obey. Rep. Jerrold Nadler (D-N.Y.) was excited that Section 8 housing received more money in the continuing resolution.

In addition, some members were content with the CR, for now, because it paid for all transportation projects, added money for community health centers and funded a program created in the 2005 energy bill to provide loan guarantees for alternative-fuel programs. In addition, all of the Army Corps of Engineers' water projects will be funded. The projects initially were funded as earmarks, but Obey reached a deal with the Corps and the Office of Management and Budget to pay for the projects.

Accord On Increasing Pell Grants (NYT)

By Diana Jean Schemo

The New York Times, January 31, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 30— The maximum federal grant for middle- and low-income students to attend college would increase for the first time in four years under a catchall spending bill that House and Senate Democrats agreed to on Tuesday.

The measure would complete budget issues left over from 2006.

The increase, announced by the chairmen of the House and Senate Appropriations Committees, would raise the maximum grants, under the Pell program, to $4,310 a year from $4,050. The last substantial increase in the grants was in 2001.

Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts and chairman of the Senate education committee, called the increase "an important down payment by Democrats on our commitment to help families with high college costs."

DOJ_NMG_0124802

The move follows a vote by the House, under the Democrats' agenda in the new Congress, to cut interest rates on some subsidized loans for middle- and lower-income students.

Although the rate cut passed with overwhelming bipartisan support, that bill was criticized by House Republicans and the Bush administration as benefiting just college graduates faced with repaying loans, rather than broadening access to college for low-income students.

With the announcement on Tuesday, days before President Bush is to release his 2008 budget, Democrats appeared to answer that criticism, part of a broader effort to claim the issue of college affordability.

Even if the president asks for an increase in Pell Grants, as the White House has indicated is likely, Democrats will have already acted to increase the grants.

Republicans generally appeared to support increasing the grants.

Each year, 5.3 million students with family incomes less than $40,000 a year receive the grants. Although the grants have remained steady, the cost of attending college has outpaced inflation, lowering the buying power of the grants.

The budget bill would increase federal grant money by $615.4 million, to $13.6 billion for this year.

An advocate for the U.S. Public Interest Research Group Higher Education Project, Luke Swarthout, said the increase was significant, though students had hoped for a much larger increase.

Letter Exposes Dingell (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, January 31, 2007

House Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman John Dingell (D-Mich.) has written a letter to Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) voicing his objection to working with fellow chairman Barney Frank (D-Mass.) to establish a new task force. The letter, which has been obtained by The Hill, directly contradicts claims Dingell made last week, when he said he was unaware that discussions on the task force were underway.

Dingell's letter also shows how the powerful chairman earned the reputation as a fierce defender of his turf when he headed Energy and Commerce in the 1980s and '90s.

Spurring Dingell is the issue of data security, which is important to senior Democrats on the Commerce Committee and Frank's Financial Services panel. Consumer privacy heated up as a political topic recently when discount retailers Marshalls and T.J. Maxx reported that they had lost potentially millions of customers' financial information to theft.

In a letter to Pelosi dated Dec. 11 , Frank proposed setting up a multi-committee task force on data security but later said he dropped the idea because Dingell had objected to it.

Dingell, who created a stir early this month by opposing the creation of another task force on energy policy, last week sought to dispel more public attention by denying his objections to Frank's idea for data security.

"I haven't said anything about it yet — I haven't said anything at all," Dingell said last week when asked about the proposed data task force. "Frank mentioned something about this at a meeting and I made no comment whatsoever. I never knew it was any kind of formal discussion or offer or proposal or anything else."

But that denial contradicts a letter Dingell sent to Pelosi two days after she received Frank's letter formally suggesting the task force.

"I have received a copy of Rep. Barney Frank's letter dated December 11, 2006, regarding the need for legislation to protect the privacy of consumers' sensitive personal information," Dingell wrote Pelosi in a two-and-a-half page letter claiming jurisdiction over the issue.

"At this time, I do not see a need to subjugate the legitimate committee process to a task force unless regular order fails to produce responsible legislation," he wrote in conclusion.

Dingell's spokeswoman, Jodi Seth, said that her boss did not object to Frank's proposal because he remained open to setting up a task force at a later date.

But Frank proposed the task force to avoid a procedural logjam from developing.

DOJ_NMG_0124803

"The House in the 109th Congress failed to address this issue, due in large measure to unresolved jurisdictional conflicts among the Republican leadership of the affected committees," Frank wrote to Pelosi. "In the next Congress, we should break that logjam by working out these conflicts at the very beginning of the legislative process."

Frank said he was surprised that Dingell denied objecting to the task force.

"I was surprised to see the comments in The Hill's recent story on data security," Frank said. "I followed up with my idea on the multi-committee task force in a letter to Speaker Nancy Pelosi, and Chairman Dingell responded with a letter to the Speaker with his objections."

In his letter, Dingell also took a few swipes at Financial Services, showing that his elbows are still sharp after 51 years of House service.

Dingell asserted that Rep. David Dreier (R-Calif.), a former chairman of the Rules Committee, "made it clear" that when Republicans set jurisdictional boundaries between Commerce and Financial Services they did not intend to limit Commerce's claim over consumer affairs and consumer protection matters.

"I therefore am puzzled by Rep. Frank's assertion that he is 'chairman of the committee with primary jurisdiction on this issue,'" Dingell wrote.

Dingell also raised questions with Pelosi over whether Frank had sufficient control over his committee to pass strong consumer protections.

"I respect Rep. Frank's strong commitment to consumer protection, most notably in the area of his longstanding commitment to affordable housing, but I also know that he faces considerable opposition in his committee," Dingell wrote. "Despite a steady stream of security breaches over the last two years, the banking industry has stated that it will oppose any legislation that imposes stronger requirements than currently exist under the privacy provisions of Gramm-Leach-Bliley."

Dingell went on to write that even the protections created by that law would not be in place "were it not for the strong leadership" of his committee. He also said that in its previous incarnation as the Banking Committee, Financial Services approved "extremely weak privacy protections for consumers' sensitive personal information."

Defending his panel, Frank said in an interview that Dingell's criticism about opposition to strong protections within Financial Services was true in the Republican majority and is still relevant now that Democrats control the panel.

Frank also explained that his committee has primary jurisdiction over credit cards and did not intend to argue that he had first claim over all legislation protecting the security of sensitive personal financial information.

Despite the recent flare-up, however, both Frank and Dingell say they are beginning to cooperate on data security, even though the idea for a multi-committee task force has been dropped.

"I now believe we'll be able to work this out," Frank said. "There's cooperation between our two committees and Ways and Means. Members are talking to each other."

Dingell's spokeswoman said that her boss told Frank on the House floor late last week that he did not have a problem with the staffs of Commerce and Financial Services "beginning to talk with each other" about data security.

FBI Probing Rep. Miller's Land Sales (LAT)

By William Heisel

The Los Angeles Times, January 31, 2007

The FBI is investigating Rep. Gary Miller (R-Diamond Bar) for a series of land transactions in which he avoided paying capital gains taxes after saying he had been forced to sell under eminent domain in Monrovia and Fontana.

The federal investigation was initiated after The Times reported in August that officials in both cities denied that they had acquired Miller's property using eminent domain, which enables governments to buy land for certain purposes even if owners do not want to sell.

After a land sale in Monrovia in 2002 and two subsequent sales in Fontana in 2005 and 2006, Miller claimed an exemption under Internal Revenue Code Section 1033, which grants those forced to sell property through eminent domain at least two years to reinvest the profits without paying capital gains taxes.

Miller's repeated use of the forced-sale exemption has enabled deferment of capital gains taxes through at least 2009.

DOJ_NMG_0124804

Dick Singer, a spokesman for Monrovia, said federal agents had interviewed city officials and requested a videotape from a City Council meeting in 2000 cited by The Times in which Miller asked city officials four times to buy his land.

Glen Owens, a Monrovia planning commissioner quoted by The Times, said he was interviewed by two FBI agents in person. "They were asking mostly about the Monrovia deal and what kind of person he was," Owens said.

Since that time, the FBI has interviewed several other current and former city officials from Monrovia and Fontana, officials said.

The FBI declined to comment Tuesday.

Miller's spokesman said he had not been contacted by the FBI. "Congressman Miller is tired of all the rumor and innuendo that has been in the press regarding his past real estate transactions," spokesman Scott Toussaint said in an e-mail to The Times.

The investigation was first reported in Tuesday's San Gabriel Valley Tribune.

Citizens for Ethics and Responsibility in Washington, a nonpartisan government watchdog group, filed a complaint in August after The Times' story was published. The complaint asked the IRS to investigate and alleged that Miller had violated federal law by invoking the eminent domain provision to avoid paying taxes.

"It looks like this is not casual; it seems like quite a concerted effort," said Melanie Sloan, the group's executive director. "Miller has clearly acted illegally. The idea of running into eminent domain three times is absolutely ludicrous."

Toussaint said Miller had asked, after The Times' story in August, that the House Ethics Committee review the land deals and determine whether he had committed any infractions. A review by the committee would be unrelated to the FBI investigation.

"He voluntarily delivered all relevant documents to the Ethics Committee, as well as all newspaper articles on the subject, and asked for an investigation and opinion," Toussaint said.

When Miller sold 165 acres to the city of Monrovia in 2002, he made more than $10 million, according to a financial disclosure form he filed in Congress.

State and federal taxes would have taken up to 31% out of that profit, but Miller claimed an exemption under Section 1033. He said Monrovia had forced him to sell his land, even though the city bought it from him with state money that specifically prohibited the city from using eminent domain.

He then reinvested some of those profits into land in Fontana and Rancho Cucamonga. When he sold some of the land in Fontana in 2005, again he claimed that he had been forced to sell the land because of eminent domain. When he sold more of the land in 2006, he made the claim a third time.

In Fontana, he asked that the city manager write him a letter saying that eminent domain could be used in the case of his land sale. The city did so but noted that it would have to amend its rules to use eminent domain.

"We do not have the power of eminent domain in that area, and we have no plans of amending the plan to get the power of eminent domain," Kenneth Hunt, the city manager, told The Times in August. "You'll have to talk to him about why he asked for a letter."

Hunt told The Times initially that the city wrote those types of letters regularly.

But when The Times requested copies of all letters mentioning eminent domain, city officials conceded that they had written letters only for Miller and a property owner who owned land near the congressman's.

City Councilman Frank Scialdone said Tuesday that council members were concerned about the letters and asked Hunt to make sure that he didn't write letters like that again.

"The whole thing didn't look right, and we wanted to make sure that we as a city are not in that position again," Scialdone said. "You will not see letters like that coming from us in the future."

The Times reported in December that while Miller was urging the city of Monrovia to buy his property, he tried to secure an appointment for one of Monrovia's City Council members, Robert Hammond, to the National Park System Advisory Board, a prestigious panel that makes policy recommendations. But there were no open positions on the board at the time.

Hammond told The Times in December that he had not been contacted by the FBI. On Tuesday, he did not return calls for comment.

DOJ_NMG_0124805

FBI Examining Video In Miller Land Probe (SGVT)

By Fred Ortega And Gary Scott, Staff Writers

San Gabriel Valley Tribune, January 31, 2007

Monrovia officials have given the FBI a video recording of a 2000 City Council meeting featuring testimony from Rep. Gary Miller, part of a federal investigation into the congressman's Southland business dealings.

In the video, the Brea Republican is seen appealing to the council to purchase his 165-acre hillside plot during the Feb. 29, 2000 meeting. Miller later avoided paying capital gains on the $10-million profit he made on the land sale by claiming the city forced the sale.

City spokesman Dick Singer said federal agents asked for the video within the past three weeks.

The FBI began investigating the Monrovia deal after a government watchdog group accused Miller of violating tax laws in his sale of the property in 2002 and the subsequent sale of two Fontana properties that he bought with the proceeds.

The FBI has contacted at least four current and former city officials in Fontana and Monrovia in recent months to ask about the congressman's land dealings.

FBI officials have declined to comment. Miller has maintained his innocence, adding that he has not been contacted by federal investigators.

An official with Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW), the group

Advertisement

that filed the initial complaint about Miller's use of the tax code, said she is gratified by the FBI's level of response.

"This is not random, this is not casual, and it is not minor," said CREW Executive Director Melanie Sloan, a former federal prosecutor. "The number of people they have contacted means that they have dedicated significant resources on this."

CREW filed a complaint with the IRS last August following publication of a Los Angeles Times article detailing Miller's land transactions. The group alleges Miller improperly used IRS Code Section 1033, which allows individuals who have their land forcibly taken away by the government to postpone paying capital gains taxes for up to two years.

Miller used the same exemption to avoid paying capital gains taxes when he sold his Fontana properties in 2005 and 2006.

Fontana and Monrovia officials have denied forcing Miller to sell his land, and eminent domain was never used in any of the sales.

Glen Owens, a Monrovia planning commissioner, said Tuesday that an FBI agent questioned him about the chain of events that led up to Miller's land sale to the city.

Owens served on a advisory committee with Miller in the 1990s that was formed to come up with a plan for hillside development. He said he believes Miller did not intend to build on his property at the time of the sale.

"He soon realized that he could probably make more money by selling the land than by developing it," said Owens.

He added, "Gary just knows how to work the system and he is not afraid to push the envelope and that is what he's done. But I don't think he has broken any laws. He's just used bad judgement."

The FBI does not investigate minor ethical lapses, said Bruce Cain, director of the University of California Washington Center in Washington, D.C.

"The fact that they have taken an interest shows that this is something they are taking rather seriously," he said.

Cain added that potential conflict of interest charges against Miller might be even more damaging than allegations that he illegally postponed paying capital gains taxes.

Miller came under scrutiny in a 2005 Tribune article when he earmarked $1.28 million for street improvements in Diamond Bar near a planned commercial and residential development he co-owned with Lewis Operating Co., his largest campaign contributor.

Other news articles have also detailed Miller s 2005 use of a highway bill to allow Rialto to close down its airport, a move that allowed Lewis Operating to develop the airport land.

"This is something Democrats are targeting with their ethics reform, going after earmarks that are self-enriching or enriching your friends," said Cain. "It all resonates with the culture of corruption issue, and it could be a problem not only for Miller, but for Republicans as they try not to lose any more seats in 2008."

Miller said Monday that he asked the House ethics committee late last year to review his business dealings to put to rest any rumors of wrongdoing. His spokesman, Scott Toussaint, refused to release any documents relating to that inquiry.

A spokeswoman for ethics committee Chairwoman Rep. Stephanie Tubbs Jones, D-Ohio, would not comment on any committee inquiries. Committee staff members did not return calls seeking comment.

Any congressional inquest would likely have nothing to do with an FBI investigation, said Stanley Brand, a former special counsel to the House ethics committee.

"These are parallel processes," said Brand, now with the Brand Law Group in Washington D.C. "There have been instances where the committee launched major investigations where they have used former or existing FBI agents, but they do not as a matter of course dispatch FBI agents to conduct their work. They have their own investigators."

Sloan was dismissive of any investigation by the House.

"I am highly skeptical that the ethics committee is looking into it," she said. "The committee is a joke. They have never done anything effectual. They have never done anything to (former Rep. Bob) Ney, (Rep. William) Jefferson, to (former Rep. Randy) Cunningham, and they won't do anything to Miller."

Rep. Gary Miller, In Senior Perch, Is Part Of FBI Probe (HILL)

By Susan Crabtree

The Hill, January 31, 2007

After months of GOP ethics scandals, House Republicans chose Rep. Gary Miller (R-Calif.) as the ranking member of a panel charged with investigating financial institutions — even as the FBI was looking into his land deals.

Financial Services Chairman Spencer Bachus (R-Ala.) named Miller to the top GOP spot on the oversight and investigative subcommittee Jan. 9, according to a committee release. Watchdog groups have been raising red flags on several of Miller's land deals since The Hill and other media outlets first scrutinized them early last year. Yesterday, a spokesman for the southern California city of Monrovia confirmed that agency officials had contacted the city about Miller's land deals in the last two months.

Bachus's office did not return calls for comment.

Brian Kennedy, a spokesman for Minority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio), said the leadership team would act "decisively" if a member were found to have violated the law or House rules.

"Mr. Boehner has made it abundantly clear that he and the new Republican leadership team in the House intend to hold members to the highest possible ethical standards," Kennedy said. "If any Republican member is found to have violated ethics rules or broken laws, this leadership team and the Steering Committee will act accordingly and decisively."

After the election, Rep. John Doolittle (R-Calif.), who was under scrutiny for his ties to lobbyist Jack Abramoff, decided not to run again for his conference secretary leadership position, and instead Rep. John Carter (R-Texas) ran and won that post. But Republicans decided not to oust Rep. Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.), another member who is under FBI investigation, from the coveted top spot on the Appropriations panel.

In an interview earlier this year, Boehner said he believes Lewis is innocent until proven guilty, and that prevented him from toppling him from the top GOP spot on the spending panel.

But Melanie Sloan of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW) said Republicans are in the minority because they have operated under just that kind of policy for the past several years. The group filed a complaint about Miller's land deals with the IRS last August.

"Until you can understand that your members have to do better than just avoid indictment, then you're going to stay in the minority for many years to come," Sloan said. "We're gratified that there is an investigation. Miller has been clearly engaged in illegal activity and hopefully this will put an end to it."

A spokesman for Taxpayers for Common Sense, Steve Ellis, said the group has been looking into Miller's land deals over the last year and considers him to be "under an ethical cloud."

"It's questionable at best to put him in charge of the ranking-member slot on the committee," Ellis said. "If more comes out from the FBI investigations, it may end up blowing up in the Republicans' faces."

DOJ_NMG_0124807

Miller's appointment to the ranking slot on the oversight and investigations panel plays into the Democrats' hands. Already this year, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee has repeatedly named Miller as one of its top targets in 2008 and has made it clear that targeting ethically challenged members will be a major piece of their strategy this cycle.

"House Republicans seem to mistakenly believe that being investigated by the FBI qualifies you for an influential position on the oversight and investigative subcommittee," DCCC spokeswoman Kate Bedingfield said. "This kind of lack of leadership and accountability from the GOP is exactly why Americans voted for a change of direction in Congress."

Monrovia spokesman Dick Singer yesterday acknowledged that a government agency had contacted city officials about Miller's land deals "within the last couple of months," but declined to offer any more specifics.

The San Bernardino Sun yesterday reported that the FBI had contacted officials and former officials from several cities in southern California about Miller's land deals.

Miller spokesman Scott Toussaint said the FBI had not contacted Miller or his staff. Miller has consistently denied any wrongdoing and yesterday lashed out at the press for conducting what he called a "smear" campaign against him.

"Congressman Miller is tired of all the rumor and innuendo that has been in the press regarding his past real estate transactions," Miller said in a written statement.

In order to "stop this smear once and for all," Miller said he handed over "relevant documents" to the ethics committee late last year and asked it to render an opinion.

"If he is contacted, he intends to cooperate fully because he has nothing to hide," the statement said.

Among various questionable land deals, The Hill first reported late last year that Monrovia city officials had tried to secure a federal earmark to help purchase a large swath of land to create a wilderness preserve in the nearby foothills, 165 acres of which Miller owned. The city's efforts were unsuccessful and it instead passed a tax increase and secured California state grant money to pay for the land. Miller ended up making nearly $10 million on the deal.

In August, CREW filed a complaint with the IRS alleging that Miller failed to report or pay capital-gains tax on the sale of the land to Monrovia. The Los Angeles Times reported that Miller claimed that the city had exercised eminent domain, which would lighten his tax load; but the city denied doing so.

White House Order Tightens Grip On Policy, Stirs Debate On Control (WSJ)

By John D. Mckinnon

The Wall Street Journal, January 31, 2007

WASHINGTON -- A White House move to tighten its control over federal regulations is providing fresh evidence of the Bush administration's intent to leave its conservative imprint on government over the next two years.

The White House action, in the form of an executive order, is a reminder that despite Democrats' success in November's congressional elections, Mr. Bush retains control of the basic machinery of government that often decides how corporations and citizens go about their business. It is a power that Congress has limited ability to affect.

• What's New: President Bush extended White House oversight of agency regulation to include more informal guidance and more data on costs.

• What's at Stake: Businesses are hoping they've gained new tools to avoid costly regulation, while consumer and liberal groups worry about a conservative power grab.

• What's Next: Democrats in Congress are likely to take a look, but have few options.

Now Mr. Bush aims to exercise more sway.

Most notably, the White House has given itself more review authority over many informal agency dictates known as guidance. Critics say the executive order gives the White House a chokehold over new guidance it dislikes. White House officials deny that, saying it is simply strengthening a review process that already occurs in many instances.

Even defenders of the administration say this change is likely to give the White House more say in how to interpret federal rules. As the White House has assumed more oversight on formal rulemaking, many critics say agencies have done more regulation through informal guidance, such as letters or manuals. Because these aren't formal regulations, the agencies don't have to go through the same elaborate procedures. Labor officials in recent years have issued guidance on hundreds of occupational-safety issues, critics note.

DOJ_NMG_0124808

"I think that's important," James Gattuso, an expert on regulation at the conservative Heritage Foundation, said of the change. "If you believe in review of regulations to ensure they're consistent with administration policy, and no more costly than necessary, you really want guidance documents to be included as well."

Administration officials say the principal aim of the new policies isn't to stifle regulation but to clarify a process that can appear confusing and opaque to the people affected. Several of the changes are aimed at making sure that regulated companies and individuals get more of an opportunity to comment in advance on planned policies, said Jeffrey Rosen, general counsel of the White House Office of Management and Budget.

"Bad, bad, bad," Gary Bass, executive director of liberal advocacy group OMB Watch, said of the changes. He predicted they would hamper the government's ability to respond to regulatory crises -- such as the recent E. coli outbreaks on fresh vegetables.

The House Oversight and Government Reform Committee is considering a hearing on the issue. The administration's new approach "interferes with the ability of agencies to make decisions based on their expert opinions, and is something Congress should carefully review," Chairman Henry Waxman (D., Calif.) said in a statement. Sen. Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut, chairman of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, said in a statement that his panel would monitor the situation to "make sure that essential federal protections are not being undermined."

Mr. Rosen said it's "ironic that a measure that increases availability of guidance documents to the public and allows input by the public would be seen as a problem instead of a benefit." He also said there is an exception for emergencies.

The executive order has three other main parts. It sets a new standard for formal rulemaking that requires agencies to find a "market failure" before proceeding with formal regulation. That's a concept that has been championed by Susan Dudley, the academic Mr. Bush nominated to oversee regulatory matters for the White House. Her nomination has been blocked in the Senate, and the White House has said she instead will be tapped for a senior adviser post.

Public Citizen, a liberal advocacy group, said that provision could derail much new regulation. But Mr. Rosen says it is an attempt to clarify a provision that has governed executive-branch rulemaking since the Clinton administration issued its executive order on regulations in 1993. That 1993 provision called for an agency undertaking a rulemaking to identify the problem it intends to address, including "the failures of private markets," he said.

The new Bush order also requires agencies to put a senior official -- technically, a presidential appointee -- in charge of regulatory policy. Critics say that will extend the reach of the White House further into agencies' operations. But White House officials say it's just institutionalizing a longstanding practice. Most agencies already have designated a presidential appointee as their regulatory policy chief, Mr. Rosen said.

Another change requires agencies to develop annual plans for weighing the combined costs and benefits of all regulation planned for the year. Liberal critics say such analyses are biased against regulation and will cause agencies to postpone new rules.

Lawmakers Unveil Election Financing Bill (SFC)

By Jim Kuhnhenn

San Francisco Chronicle, January 31, 2007

As the cost of presidential campaigns moves toward the $1 billion mark, leading congressional advocates of tougher campaign finance laws want to reduce the influence of special interests by pumping more taxpayer money into the system.

Three House members and one senator on Tuesday introduced legislation that would increase the amount of money in the presidential public financing system and increase the spending limits for candidates who participate in it. It would not change the rules for the 2008 presidential election.

"This system that's in place now is not sustainable," said Rep. Martin Meehan, D-Mass., who introduced the legislation in the House with Reps. Christopher Shays, R-Conn., and David Price, D-N.C. Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., introduced similar legislation in the Senate.

DOJ_NMG_0124809

The legislation would triple the amount available to candidates during state primaries and eliminate state spending limits. It would increase the amount available for general elections to $100 million (More than $80 million would be available in 2008). It also would offer more money to candidates whose opponents chose to decline the public money and raise more on their own.

To pay for the extra money, the sponsors would increase the voluntary presidential campaign checkoff on income tax returns from $3 to $10.

The proposals follow Democratic Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's decision to avoid the public system entirely during her 2008 presidential bid. Other candidates, including Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., and Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., are contemplating taking a similar step.

In 2004, President Bush and Democrats Howard Dean and Sen. John Kerry turned down the money in the primaries. Kerry and Bush did accept general election funds.

Sponsors of the changes said they didn't blame candidates for rejecting public financing altogether.

"The reality is if somebody did comply with this system, they couldn't get elected," Meehan said.

Notable by his absence from the group was McCain, whose name is synonymous with past efforts at toughening campaign laws. Conservatives have criticized him for his previous stands, claiming campaign finance laws have diluted their free speech rights. The Republican National Committee this month passed a resolution denouncing the campaign law that McCain championed in 2002.

"We'd love to improve the system," McCain said in a brief hallway interview Tuesday. But he said he'd been away from Washington and was not familiar with the details of the new proposal. "I haven't focused on it."

Get up to 50% off home delivery of the Chronicle for 12 weeks! ©2007 Associated Press

Honesty In Elections (NYT)

The New York Times, January 31, 2007

On Election Day last fall in Maryland, fliers were handed out in black neighborhoods with the heading “Democratic Sample Ballot” and photos of black Democratic leaders — and boxes checked off beside the names of the Republican candidates for senator and governor. They were a blatant attempt to fool black voters into thinking the Republican candidates were endorsed by black Democrats. In Orange County, Calif., 14,000 Latino voters got letters in Spanish saying it was a crime for immigrants to vote in a federal election. It didn’t say that immigrants who are citizens have the right to vote.

Dirty tricks like these turn up every election season, in large part because they are so rarely punished. But two Democratic senators, Barack Obama of Illinois and Charles Schumer of New York, are introducing a bill today that would make deceiving or intimidating voters a federal crime with substantial penalties.

The bill aims at some of the most commonly used deceptive political tactics. It makes it a crime to knowingly tell voters the wrong day for an election. There have been numerous reports of organized efforts to use telephones, leaflets or posters to tell voters, especially in minority areas, not to vote on Election Day because voting has been postponed.

The bill would also criminalize making false claims to voters about who has endorsed a candidate, or wrongly telling people — like immigrants who are registered voters in Orange County — that they cannot vote.

Along with defining these crimes and providing penalties of up to five years’ imprisonment, the bill would require the Justice Department to counteract deceptive election information that has been put out, and to report to Congress after each election on what deceptive practices occurred and what the Justice Department did about them.

The bill would also allow individuals to go to court to stop deceptive practices while they are happening. That is important, given how uninterested the current Justice Department has proved to be in cracking down on election-season dirty tricks.

The bill is careful to avoid infringing on First Amendment rights, and that is the right course. But in steering clear of regulating speech, it is not clear how effective the measure would be in addressing one of the worst dirty tricks of last fall’s election: a particular kind of deceptive “robocall” that was used against Democratic Congressional candidates. These calls, paid for by the Republicans, sounded as if they had come from the Democrat; when a recipient hung up, the call was repeated over and over. The intent was clearly to annoy the recipients so they would not vote for the Democrat.

While there are already laws that can be used against this sort of deceptive telephone harassment, a more specific bill aimed directly at these calls is needed. But the bill being introduced today is an important step toward making elections more honest and fair. There is no reason it should not be passed by Congress unanimously.

FDA Plans To Boost Safety With Newsletters, Drug Profiles (USAT)

By Rita Rubin

USA Today, January 31, 2007

WASHINGTON — Food and Drug Administration officials unveiled a variety of initiatives Tuesday to improve drug safety and expand information to the public about the medicines they take.

Among the steps announced at a news conference:

•A collaboration with the Veterans Health Administration to share information and expertise related to the review and use of medical products.

•A pilot program to produce safety profiles of new drugs after they have been on the market for 18 months.

•Periodic newsletters on the FDA website to update consumers about post-marketing reviews of drugs.

•Establishment of a committee of outside experts to advise the FDA about how to communicate risks to the public.

•Organizational changes to improve communication between FDA staffers who review drugs before approval and those who track the drugs' safety afterward.

The FDA's efforts come in response to an Institute of Medicine report released last September. The report, which was requested by the FDA, concluded that the agency needs to pay more attention to the safety of drugs once they are on the market, a move that requires more money and regulatory authority. FDA commissioner Andrew von Eschenbach said the agency regards the report as "a substantial amount of advice," not a "rigid blueprint."

Institute committee member Alta Charo, a professor of law and bioethics at the University of Wisconsin-Madison, called the FDA's new report "a very serious effort to respond to the IOM recommendations. It's filled with a variety of first steps that go in the right direction."

Still, Charo said in an interview, "I have to confess I'm disappointed that they ignored one of our most critical recommendations." Specifically, she said, the report advised the FDA to give more clout to the agency's Office of Drug Safety, which monitors drugs after they go on the market.

"If they pick up on a problem," Charo said, "they don't have the ability to force anybody to pay any attention to them."

Probably the best-known FDA drug safety staffer is David Graham, who got a lot of people to pay attention when he told the Senate Finance Committee in November 2004 that the agency was "virtually defenseless" against another "tragedy and a profound regulatory failure" like Vioxx. Merck pulled the arthritis drug off the market in September 2004 because it raised the risk of heart attack and stroke.

Sens. Chuck Grassley, R-Iowa, and Christopher Dodd, D-Conn., said Tuesday that they were reintroducing legislation to revamp the FDA's after-market surveillance. In a statement, Grassley, who chaired the Finance Committee when Graham blew the whistle, said the bill "addresses the fact that the office approving new drugs carries too much sway over the FDA's drug-safety apparatus."

F.D.A. Widens Safety Reviews On New Drugs (NYT)

By Gardiner Harris

The New York Times, January 31, 2007

The Food and Drug Administration announced changes yesterday that were intended to ensure that marketed drugs are as safe as advertised, including the first effort to do a comprehensive assessment of the safety of drugs 18 months after introduction.

The agency also announced the creation of an advisory panel to improve the way it announces safety worries and a collaboration with the Veterans Health Administration to track how real patients fare after taking drugs.

The F.D.A. plan is the latest effort to fix the agency after a series of missteps. In September 2004, Merck withdrew its arthritis drug, Vioxx, after a study showed that it doubled the risks of heart attack. About the same time, the agency announced that antidepressants cause some teenagers to think more about suicide.

DOJ_NMG_0124811

In both cases, the agency took years to acknowledge risks to millions of patients that had been apparent to some researchers.

"We don't see this as the only answer," said Dr. Andrew C. von Eschenbach, the F.D.A. commissioner, at a news conference in Washington announcing the initiatives. "It's merely a step as we continue a process of improvement that will be ongoing."

Senator Christopher J. Dodd, Democrat of Connecticut, said in a written statement that far greater changes were needed at the agency. Mr. Dodd promised to introduce two bills today that would reorganize the F.D.A. and require drug makers to disclose the results of all clinical trials involving humans. The bills' co-author, Senator Charles E. Grassley, Republican of Iowa, has called the agency far too "cozy" with drug makers.

In many cases, the date that the agency will begin the efforts announced yesterday is uncertain. For instance, Dr. Steven Galson, director of the agency's drug center, said at the news conference that the pilot program to assess systematically a drug's safety 18 months after its introduction would probably take about a year to put into place — with the assessment due 18 months after that.

"We're just organizing that process to get started," Dr. Galson said.

In a scathing assessment released in September, the Institute of Medicine concluded that the F.D.A. was rife with internal squabbles and hobbled by underfinancing, poor management and outdated regulations. The institute, the most important medical advisory organization in the country, suggested that the agency undergo 25 major changes, many of which would require Congressional authorization.

Alta Charo, a professor of law and bioethics at the University of Wisconsin and one of the authors of the Institute of Medicine's report, described the F.D.A. announcement yesterday as "a good set of first steps towards improving the safety of the drug supply in the United States."

Professor Charo said she was "disappointed" that the agency had failed to adopt some of the institute's bolder recommendations, including one suggesting that the agency give greater authority to officials who assess the safety of drugs after they go on the market.

"We viewed that as critical," she said.

Alan Goldhammer, deputy vice president for regulatory affairs for the Pharmaceutical and Research Manufacturers of America, praised the F.D.A.'s announcement as a "very thoughtful and comprehensive response" to the Institute of Medicine's report.

"The agency has made substantive and significant progress in improving and enhancing the drug safety system in the U.S." said Mr. Goldhammer, whose organization represents drug makers.

Still, the plan does little to address a problem that nearly all agree underlies many of its woes: a chronic shortage of government money. As Dr. von Eschenbach noted at the news conference, the agency has regulatory authority over about a quarter of the American economy. After the Sept. 11 attacks, the agency was asked to increase its efforts to prevent bioterrorism. Despite having greater responsibilities, its budget has remained relatively flat for years.

There are now thousands of drugs in routine use. Figuring out which of these medicines may have undiscovered side effects will take a lot of money. The agency gets about $400 million of its $1.9 billion budget from fees assessed on drug makers. Under a formula negotiated with the drug industry, this money comes with strings attached. One restriction was that the F.D.A. could use little of the money to track the safety of approved drugs.

That deal between the F.D.A. and drug makers expires this year, and the drug companies have agreed to allow more of their money to be used for postmarket safety assessments. Whether those fees are enough, whether there should be any strings attached to them and whether that money should be coming from drug makers at all has become the subject of fierce debate.

"Drug makers clearly get their money's worth with all this money," said Dr. Sidney Wolfe, director of Public Citizen's health research group. Dr. Wolfe and other consumer advocates say that the F.D.A.'s dependence on drug industry fees has softened its oversight.

Dr. Scott Gottlieb, who last week left his job as the F.D.A. deputy commissioner to return to the American Enterprise Institute, a free-market research group, said the real debate unfolding around the agency is between those who believe that it needs more money and tools to assess drug risks, and those who believe that the agency should begin regulating the practice of medicine.

DOJ_NMG_0124812

"I think we need to give the agency the resources it needs to get information about drug risks quickly," Dr. Gottlieb said. "But we don't need the government telling doctors and patients what to do."

The F.D.A. plan promises to return the agency to its scientific roots. It once had robust laboratories that conducted original studies to assess drug risks on its own. Those laboratories were largely eliminated in the past decade to apply more money to the drug-approval process and the support of a bare-bones computer program to track side effects of drugs.

But in the past two years, the agency has begun an effort to improve the science of drug safety, making itself an active participant in scientific endeavors once left exclusively to drug makers and basic scientists.

The efforts announced yesterday included the creation of a database of genetic codes associated with bad drug outcomes, the development of a computer model to identify patients who are most likely to suffer liver injury, and the design of screening tests that would identify patients most at risk of general drug problems.

Changes Will Ensure Drug Safety, FDA Says (LAT)

By Ricardo Alonso-zaldivar

The Los Angeles Times, January 31, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Food and Drug Administration pledged Tuesday to make major changes in the nation's drug safety system, responding to a blue-ribbon panel that last fall found the agency's priorities skewed toward approving new medications without adequate follow-up to identify rare but risky side effects.

FDA Commissioner Andrew C. von Eschenbach said the improvements would help the agency regain the "trust and confidence" of doctors and patients after a series of highly publicized safety lapses, including the withdrawal from the market of Vioxx, a previously approved and popular painkiller found to cause heart attacks.

But the FDA's internal fixes stopped short of addressing key issues such as increased funding and broad new legal powers for the drug safety program — reforms that depend on congressional action that may come this year. And some critics said the agency had not done enough to bring safety officials into the drug approval process.

Von Eschenbach conceded that more remained to be done, saying, "The initiatives we announce today are not the whole story, and they are not the final chapter in the story."

The changes recognized the need to address safety over the entire lifecycle of a drug, from development to use by patients. They included measures to improve the scientific underpinnings of the safety system, increase monitoring for hazardous side effects, expand communication with patients and doctors, and address long-standing turf battles among FDA scientists that have gotten in the way of alerting the public to safety problems.

A pilot program also will be established to assess the safety record of new drugs 18 months after approval. It will be tried initially with a small number of medications, and results will be reported to the public.

Consumer groups dismissed the FDA's initiative as too little, too late, but members of the panel of medical, legal and policy experts that spent more than a year investigating the drug safety program called it a respectable first step.

"It was a thoughtful and engaged response," said Dr. Bruce M. Psaty, a professor of medicine and epidemiology at the University of Washington in Seattle and a member of the panel that studied shortcomings in the FDA's safety program.

"It looks like they are launching a number of initiatives to address drug safety. Many of them are new, so the degree to which they will improve safety remains to be seen, but I think it's a fairly comprehensive response," he said.

The panel's head, Sheila Burke, a former Republican Senate staffer who is now chief operating officer of the Smithsonian, took a tougher line. "I would have wanted to see more formal involvement of the safety staff in the drug development process," she said.

Nonetheless, she said, "I think they are serious about trying to make some progress."

The committee she led was sponsored by the Institute of Medicine, part of the National Academies that provide scientific, engineering and medical advice to the government. Convened at the FDA's request, the panel issued a scathing report in September that seems to have chastened agency leaders.

DOJ_NMG_0124813

Concerns about the safety of newly approved medications have been building for years. But they gained national attention in fall 2004 when Merck withdrew the blockbuster painkiller Vioxx, after company-funded studies confirmed heart attack risks that safety experts inside the FDA bureaucracy had unsuccessfully tried to warn about.

Testimony later at a congressional hearing showed that agency managers had dismissed their own experts' warnings.

Tuesday's announcement marked the second time in two years that the FDA had pledged to fix the drug safety system. Early in 2005, the agency set up an internal drug safety oversight board. But partly because the board meets in secret, its effects have been hard to gauge.

Some of the improvements announced Tuesday would require congressional approval to increase industry user fees, which would finance new safety initiatives.

Some of those initiatives will apply to drugs in development and after approval. Others attempt to resolve long-standing communication problems within the FDA, and between the agency and the public.

In the development phase, the FDA said it was working on new tests that might predict early on whether a drug would be toxic to humans. It has launched a research program to help identify the potential heart and stroke risks of medications, and is working with the National Institutes of Health to develop a computer model that could indicate a drug's potential to cause liver damage — a common risk.

It also is looking at how the burgeoning field of genetic research might aid drug safety.

Drugs in development are tested on several hundred or a few thousand human subjects. But rare side effects may emerge only after tens of thousands of patients have taken a medication. Many academic experts think new drugs should be considered "experimental" for the first two or three years after they are approved for marketing.

Indeed, the advisory panel recommended a special caution label for new medications, and restrictions on advertising.

To increase detection of unexpected side effects during the early years, the FDA announced several improvements to its drug safety monitoring system.

The agency said it would modernize its "adverse events" database — which now captures only a small fraction of problems — to make it easier for researchers to recognize that something was going wrong. The FDA also said it was teaming up with Veterans Affairs and Medicare to share extensive information that those agencies collect on doctors' prescribing patterns and their patients' outcomes.

And it is proposing the creation of a Sentinel Network that would coordinate private and government vigilance of drug safety problems.

Finally, the FDA said it would improve communication among its own scientists, as well as with doctors and patients. Agency officials said they would redouble efforts to find ways to resolve disputes between scientists who approve drugs and those who act as safety watchdogs.

"We need to improve the way scientific disagreements are handled and resolved," said Dr. Steven K. Galson, director of the agency's Center for Drug Evaluation and Research.

FDA Proposes Report Cards On New Drugs (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 31, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) -- The public outcry over the withdrawal of the painkiller Vioxx is leading to closer government scrutiny of new drugs to identify and disclose late-developing safety problems.

As part of a pilot program, the Food and Drug Administration will issue drug "report cards" that would detail unexpected side effects that emerge within 18 months of a drug's approval. The reports also would include follow-up studies and details about how the drugs are being used.

The proposal is among more than a dozen initiatives the FDA unveiled Tuesday in response to a recent report by a committee of experts at the Institute of Medicine that criticized the agency's handling of drug safety in the wake of the Vioxx case. Nor will it be the last word, said FDA Commissioner Dr. Andrew von Eschenbach.

DOJ_NMG_0124814

"It will be a continuous process of improvement. The initiatives we are announcing today are not the full story, nor are they the final chapter in that story," von Eschenbach told reporters.

Their release comes just days before Sens. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., and Mike Enzi, R-Wyo., introduce legislation to overhaul how the FDA handles drug safety.

"Today's report is thoughtful and provides important recommendations for administrative action, but only legislation can give FDA the tools it needs to ensure that FDA is the gold standard for safety," Kennedy said in a statement.

The Institute of Medicine report was prompted in part by the 2004 withdrawal of Vioxx after research showed it increased risk of heart attacks and strokes. The report said the FDA needs more funding, people and authority to ensure it focuses on the safety of drugs while they remain on the market.

The FDA also hopes to step up its mining of large public and private health care databases to detect emerging safety problems, said agency drug chief Dr. Steven Galson. The Department of Veterans Affairs recently signed an agreement to share such information with the FDA.

The agency also said it would regularly publish newsletters to summarize its safety reviews of older drugs and disclose emerging issues. However, the newsletters would be scrubbed of whatever the FDA deemed confidential commercial and predecisional information, the agency said.

The Institute of Medicine, part of the federally chartered National Academy of Sciences, had pushed for even more public disclosure of that underlying information, said Alta Charo, a member of the committee that wrote the report who is also a University of Wisconsin professor of law and bioethics.

"Crucial to our recommendation was that these postmarketing data be shared with an advisory committee made up of independent safety experts. Their proposal would have the data remain internal," Charo said.

Both the FDA and the drug industry are concerned that broad disclosure of preliminary information about apparent safety problems could do more harm than good.

"One thing we don't want to see happen is if patients get concerned and they decide to stop therapy and don't talk to their doctors," said Alan Goldhammer of the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America, a drug industry group.

The FDA did not address the Institute of Medicine report's specific recommendations for Congress, including its push for additional agency funding and authority.

Without that, the FDA's proposals amount to "small potatoes," said Bill Vaughan, a senior policy analyst at Consumers Union.

FDA Revamps Process For Safety Of Drugs After Approval (WP)

By Shankar Vedantam

The Washington Post, January 31, 2007

The Food and Drug Administration said yesterday that it is making changes in the way it operates to prevent the kind of drug safety controversies that have dogged the agency in recent years.

Officials outlined plans to better monitor safety problems after drugs are approved and to make internal changes to increase the profile of agency scientists who raise red flags about drugs. The steps were announced in response to a report last year by the congressionally chartered Institute of Medicine (IOM) that called for an overhaul of the FDA's culture and structure following safety controversies over drugs such as the painkiller Vioxx.

Officials said the steps will restore the trust and confidence of Congress and the public. They also pledged a renewed commitment to good science as the best way to counter critics who say the agency is too cozy with drug companies.

"We will fight back against those perceptions and that cynicism," said Steven Galson, head of the agency's Center for Drug Evaluation and Research, the division that evaluates new drugs and that has been at the center of the maelstrom.

A member of the Institute of Medicine panel said the FDA had taken steps in the right direction but had fallen short.

"In a number of cases, the FDA does not go as far as the IOM recommendations, but they are first steps and in the right direction," said R. Alta Charo, a professor of law and bioethics at the University of Wisconsin.

DOJ_NMG_0124815

A central contention of the IOM report was that the agency did not focus enough on monitoring drugs once they were approved. Most approvals are based on clinical trials involving a few hundred or a few thousand patients, and many uncommon side effects do not emerge until a drug is being used by millions.

The IOM report said FDA officials who monitor drug safety were being ignored, because top officials were focused on approving new medications rather than monitoring those already on the market.

"There was an asymmetry in esteem and funding between these two groups," Charo said. While the changes the FDA announced yesterday to integrate drug safety experts in the process were a start, she said, the agency's drug safety specialists still lacked power.

When FDA safety officials see a problem with a drug, Charo said, the agency is required to discuss proposed warnings, labeling changes or limits on distribution with the manufacturer. What FDA safety officials need, she said, is the power to impose fines and restrictions on companies that do not voluntarily follow the FDA's directives.

Agency officials said some of the changes proposed in the IOM report require congressional action, because they call for new powers. But officials also said they are starting a pilot program to produce report cards on some new drugs 12 to 18 months after their approval -- a process that would bring problems to light.

FDA Commissioner Andrew von Eschenbach and other senior officials said they were largely in agreement with the institute but called its report useful advice, not a blueprint. The agency is taking steps to break down internal walls and strengthen the role of safety specialists on advisory panels, they said.

Referring to the IOM's concern about a "lack of respect" between agency staff who approve new drugs and those who monitor drug safety, Galson said, "We need to improve the way scientific disagreements are handled and resolved."

Besides the "cultural" issues within the agency, officials outlined a number of initiatives to better understand which patients may be susceptible to particular types of side effects, and which patients may be most likely to benefit from a particular drug. "This new science of safety will help us make products safer from the get-go," said Janet Woodcock, the FDA's deputy commissioner for operations.

The agency also said it is seeking alliances with the Department of Veterans Affairs, the Centers for Medicare & Medicaid Services and private insurers to gather better information about problems with using drugs and the challenges that physicians and patients encounter in the everyday use of medications.

Officials also promised greater transparency in how they select experts to serve on influential panels that assess new drugs and devices, as well as policy issues facing the agency. Some of these panel members have come under criticism for having ties to the drug industry.

While greater transparency is a good thing, Charo said, the FDA also ought to limit the overall number of panel members who have conflicts of interest.

FDA Plans Drug-Safety Moves (WSJ)

By Anna Wilde Mathews

The Wall Street Journal, January 31, 2007

The Food and Drug Administration said it plans to address concerns over how it handles drug safety, including issuing a regular online newsletter summarizing findings about drugs already on the market.

The new initiatives, which also include a pilot program that will review the safety of two or three new drugs after 18 months on the market and issue a "report card" on their performance, are part of the agency's response to an analysis it commissioned from the Institute of Medicine, an independent research organization. That report criticized the FDA's handling of drug safety, citing serious structural and cultural issues. It called for broad changes that would go beyond the steps announced yesterday. The biggest of these recommendations would require congressional intervention.

The initiatives announced yesterday aren't likely to usher in any major, short-term shifts in FDA policy. At any rate, they could soon be overtaken by action on Capitol Hill. Sens. Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts and Michael Enzi of Wyoming, the Democratic chairman and ranking Republican on the Senate Health Committee, respectively, are expected to soon introduce a new version of a drug-safety bill that they had proposed last year. That bill, which aims to boost FDA authority and oversight of drugs after they go on the market, among other changes, has a far better shot at passing this year partly because of the Democratic takeover in Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0124816

"Only legislation can give FDA the tools it needs to ensure that the agency is the gold standard for safety," Mr. Kennedy said in a statement. Mr. Enzi said he will work "closely with the FDA to enact critical drug-safety reform."

Consumers Union, a consumer group, said in a statement that the new FDA initiative includes "minor improvements" but "falls dramatically short of the changes needed to overhaul the nation's drug safety system."

In its response to the Institute of Medicine report, the agency said it needs more funding but "believes it has the statutory and regulatory authority needed to carry out its commitment to ensure drug safety." The agency said it was moving to change its procedures and testing how to more fully involve staff who focus on the safety of drugs after they are approved. "We agree we need to improve the culture of safety at FDA," the agency said.

FDA Commissioner Andrew von Eschenbach said there will be "other steps as we continue a process of improvement that will be ongoing." Yesterday's announcement was the latest of several drug-safety initiatives announced by the FDA in response to criticism stemming from the 2004 withdrawal of the painkiller Vioxx and other incidents.

Under the initiatives announced yesterday, the agency will launch an online newsletter that will include the results of safety reviews after they are completed. But in a move likely to please the drug industry, it "will not include confidential commercial" data or information that could be part of a regulatory decision, the FDA said. The new pilot program "report card" will report on the performance of two or three drugs on the market, including their reported side effects, how the drugs are used and summaries of new studies on the drugs.

The FDA previously proposed a new user-fee deal with the drug industry that would provide new money to pay for safety monitoring, as well as create a new fee to boost the staff that reviews consumer drug television ads.

---- Jennifer Corbett Dooren contributed to this article.

Write to Anna Wilde Mathews at anna.mathews@wsj.com1

Hastert Recovering From Surgery (CHIT)

By James Kimberly

Chicago Tribune, January 31, 2007

Former U.S. House Speaker Dennis Hastert was in a Chicago hospital today recovering from surgery to remove his gall bladder, his office announced.

Spokesman Brad Hahn said the Friday surgery was scheduled because Hastert (R-Yorkville) suffered from gallstones. Hahn did not know when Hastert would be released from the Rush University Medical Center.

"That's a medical decision," Hahn said. "He's looking forward to being released. He's getting restless."

Hahn said the congressman is expected to make a full recovery.

More than 500,000 Americans have surgery every year to remove their gallbladders, typically because the organ is inflamed or to treat painful gallstones.

The pear-shaped organ stores digestive fluid, or bile, produced by the liver. People can function well without a gallbladder; when it is removed, bile from the liver goes directly into the intestine.

Last July, Hastert spent several days in a suburban Maryland hospital after being treated for a skin infection. He also was hospitalized in early 2005 for removal of a kidney stone.

Hastert, 65, has served 20 years in Congress. He was speaker of the U.S. House of Representatives from 1999 until this month.

The Associated Press contributed to this report.

Senate Defies Cheney (RC)

By Ben Pershing

Roll Call, January 31, 2007

HOH thinks Congress has been getting a bad rap.

For years, a few squishy, possibly French, critics have claimed that the legislative branch has not done enough to stand up to the bullying Bush administration.

Need evidence to the contrary? Look no further than Tuesday's Senate Republican luncheon, where a brave group of Senators bucked the wishes of Mr. Executive Branch Power himself, Vice President Cheney.

As his groupies know, Tuesday was Cheney's 66th birthday. So when the Senate President showed up at the GOP luncheon, the assembled lawmakers thought they'd mark the occasion with a little party.

First, Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison (R-Texas) brought in a cake. Then the group, led by Senate Minority Whip Trent Lott (R-Miss.), was set to launch into a rousing chorus of "Happy Birthday."

Now, HOH usually associates Cheney with revelry and general merriment, but surprisingly, Cheney asked Lott and the others not to sing. Did they cower before his wishes? No!

"We did sing 'Happy Birthday.' He insisted that we not, which guaranteed that I insisted we should," Lott said afterward, adding: "I pointed out that he's older than I am."

Lott was then thrown into a military detention camp.

Ha! Kidding! In all seriousness, Cheney took the whole thing good-naturedly, and the chorus of Republicans reportedly sounded pretty harmonious.

"We were more in tune than we usually are on the issues," joked Sen. Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.).

Are Hurricane Jokes Now OK? After the drubbing they took at the hands of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee in November, you would think Republicans wouldn't be feeling so charitable toward former DCCC Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.).

But Rep. Heather Wilson (R-N.M.) — one of the few GOP incumbents who held onto her seat despite an onslaught from the DCCC — wanted to show that there are no hard feelings toward Emanuel, who now serves as Democratic Caucus chairman.

It seems that after Election Day, Emanuel went over to Wilson on the House floor to congratulate her on her victory. Wilson told Emanuel that she had shirts made for her campaign staff that said, "I Survived Hurricane Emanuel November 7, 2006."

Emanuel said he'd like to get one of those shirts, so on Tuesday, he trucked over to Wilson's office in the Cannon House Office Building and picked one up.

While he was there, aides said, Emanuel apologized to Wilson's staff for making their lives miserable, prompting some laughter.

He then said: "I'm really looking forward to wearing this at the House gym tomorrow morning."

HOH can feel the love all around him.

How About Flood Jokes? In the aftermath of last week's well-chronicled House Republican retreat to Maryland's Eastern Shore, one little mystery remained unsolved — Which Member was it who asked President Bush a question about flood control?

After Bush addressed the assembled lawmakers Friday morning, reporters were hustled out of the room so Members could ask Bush the real, tough questions about Iraq and the future of our great nation.

Afterwards, word trickled out that some unnamed Member had taken the opportunity to ask about something decidedly local. As WashingtonPost.com blogger (and Roll Call alum) Paul Kane wrote Friday, "the flood-control lawmaker is, for now at least, a mystery."

No, it wasn't Rep. Virginia Foxx (N.C.) in the drawing room with a candlestick. It was ... Rep. Mike Ferguson (N.J.). And he's pretty proud of it.

Specifically, Ferguson asked Bush about the Green Brook Flood Control Project, which has been a priority in New Jersey's 7th district since Hurricane Floyd devastated the area in 1999.

"It's a really big deal in our district," Ferguson told HOH. "I urged him to include it in his budget."

Did Bush even know what Ferguson was talking about? "I'm certain the president remembers this project because I never miss a chance to advocate for it," Ferguson said.

The White House's budget request comes down Feb. 5. Keep an eye out.

Oh Boy, Famous People. If you enjoy seeing celebrities, particularly of the TV-star kind, you'll want to head over to B. Smith's at Union Station tonight for the Creative Coalition's event to welcome the 110th Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0124818

Since this is Washington, the gathering will of course be hosted by two lobbyists, Morris Reid of Westin Rinehart and Ed Rogers of Barbour Griffith & Rogers.

Attendees will have the opportunity to mingle with a bunch of celebrities, including Heather Graham, Allan Cumming, Tim Daly, Fran Drescher, Morgan Fairchild, Wendie Malick, Joe Pantoliano, Rachel Shelley, Giancarlo Esposito, Anson Mount, Tim Blake Nelson and Tamara Tunie.

Oh yeah, more than 100 Members of Congress are also expected to attend. But you probably see them all the time.

Anyway, back to the celebrities. On Thursday night, Graham, Shelley, Cumming and the lovely Bridget Moynahan will be over at the House of Sweden on K Street for the premiere of the film "Gray Matters." Like Wednesday's event, the premiere and the subsequent reception will be hosted by the Creative Coalition and Capitol File.

Attendees should leave their flasks at home; Absolut is helping to put on the reception.

Liberalism's Energetic Architect (WP)

By Harold Meyerson

The Washington Post, January 31, 2007

Last Friday and Saturday, the eight Democrats who have in varying degrees announced their intention to run for president came before the executive board of the most powerful and strategic organization in American liberalism -- the Service Employees International Union (SEIU). No sooner had this first of countless candidate cattle calls been completed than the SEIU's president, Andy Stern, flew off to Iowa for several days, followed by a couple of more days in New Hampshire.

No, Stern insists, he's not running for president. Rather, he's setting in motion an SEIU program called "Walk a Day in My Shoes," in which the union will encourage (or hector) the candidates to spend a day with a working-class family in one of the first four states (Iowa, Nevada, New Hampshire, South Carolina) to hold primary and caucus elections in 2008.

Besides, Stern is already doing as much as if not more than the presidential hopefuls to shape the Democrats' agenda. This week, as Stern publicizes "Walk a Day" by building cabinets in Iowa and driving a snowplow in New Hampshire (at some danger, he notes, to his co-workers and himself), a new group called Americans Against Escalation is commencing an ambitious lobbying campaign to persuade members of Congress who have voiced their dismay at President Bush's Iraq surge to actually vote against it. The organizations consists of MoveOn.org, the Campaign for America's Future and other progressive groups, among which the SEIU is providing the lion's share of the funding.

Two weeks ago, another new liberal group was officially unveiled. For years Stern has been talking about putting together an organization that would monitor the votes of Democratic members of Congress on economic issues and mount primary challenges against conservative Democrats who represent liberal districts. He suggested calling the group They Work for Us, and this month, a new group with that name -- and whose board members include representatives not just of the SEIU but also the Steelworkers, MoveOn.org, the American Association for Justice (trial lawyers) and the much-read progressive blog DailyKos -- announced its formation, with heavy backing, again, from the SEIU. Stern's longtime friend Steve Rosenthal, the onetime political director of the AFL-CIO and an acknowledged master of voter mobilization campaigns, is the group's executive director. And just to pique Democrats' interest, They Work for Us listed three Democratic members of Congress (California's Ellen Tauscher, Maryland's Al Wynn and Texas's Henry Cuellar) as examples of Democrats whom the group would be monitoring.

"I'm sure it's not what the Democratic Party is hoping for," Stern says, "but we need to give our members options when the people they elected don't live up to what they said they were going to do." Over the past two weeks, Stern has also announced the formation of the group Divided We Fail, which joins the SEIU with the Business Roundtable and AARP in support of a universal health-care program that decouples health insurance from employment. The SEIU is also deeply involved in the discussions over immigration reform and is active in retooling Rock the Vote, the preeminent young voter mobilization program.

There's a clear model for the part that the SEIU and Stern are playing in American liberal politics. Just as the SEIU is the largest and most dynamic union in today's service-dominated economy, so the United Auto Workers was the largest and most dynamic union in the industrial economy of the mid-20th century. Under the leadership of its legendary president, Walter Reuther, the UAW funded the 1963 civil rights march on Washington and provided crucial assistance to Cesar Chavez's United Farm Workers, the student movement of the early '60s, and the fledgling efforts of the National Organization for Women and the first

DOJ_NMG_0124819

Earth Day. The UAW was the anchor tenant in the house of postwar American liberalism, and the SEIU is embracing an analogous role today.

Even Stern's failures have a Reutherian air to them. In 1968, upset with what he saw as the rightward drift of the AFL-CIO under the leadership of George Meany, Reuther pulled the UAW out of the federation to form its own mini-federation, the Alliance for Labor Action, with the Teamsters. But the Alliance for Labor Action, alas, never really did anything. In 2005, upset with what he saw as the generalized drift of the AFL-CIO under the leadership of John Sweeney, Stern pulled the SEIU out of the federation and established the Change to Win Federation with several other large unions. A year and a half since the formation of Change to Win, however, it can't really be said to have done anything, either. Still, Stern's larger lesson from Reuther is a sound one: A powerful progressive union can ultimately thrive only in a progressive nation. And nobody's in a better position to build one.

meyersonh@washpost.com

Homeland Security Employees Feeling The Blues (Column) (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, January 31, 2007

The employees have spoken.

What they have said about job satisfaction has gratified four relatively small federal agencies and sent a jolt through the Department of Homeland Security, which scored last or almost last in job satisfaction, leadership and workplace performance.

The ratings came from the 2006 Federal Human Capital Survey, announced by the Office of Personnel Management yesterday. About 221,500 federal employees responded to the survey and provided a sense of what they think of their agencies as places to work.

The results were surely frustrating for Homeland Security, which has struggled to pull together 22 agencies in one of the government's largest reorganizations, endured endless criticism for its handling of Hurricane Katrina and suffered through high turnover in its leadership ranks.

Nearly 10,400 Homeland Security employees participated in the survey and gave the department essentially rock-bottom scores in key job satisfaction, leadership and management areas when stacked up against 35 other agencies in the survey.

"Obviously, we are somewhat disappointed," Paul A. Schneider, the department's undersecretary for management, said in an interview. He said the department's secretary, Michael Chertoff, and its deputy secretary, Michael P. Jackson, take the survey results seriously and are focused "on turning this thing around."

Chertoff has asked an outside group of advisers to suggest a strategy for creating a stronger common culture at the department, Schneider said. He said he would join Chertoff and Jackson in analyzing the survey results to understand problem areas.

Those areas appear to include communicating with and getting feedback from employees and how the department rewards employees for their accomplishments, Schneider said. He called the survey results "a wake-up call for the leadership that we have to pay attention to these basic communication skills."

On the bright side, Schneider said he was encouraged that Homeland Security employees say they like their jobs, think their work is important and find their co-workers to be cooperative and supportive. Those responses, he said, are "a strong foundation for building on."

To a large extent, the 2006 responses by Homeland Security employees closely track what employees said in 2004, an indication that the department may face a significant morale problem in some of its bureaus. Schneider said the response rates varied dramatically among bureaus and that "we have a lot of work to do to understand where we have these problems."

Linda M. Springer, director of OPM, released the results at a briefing at the National Press Club. She highlighted several agencies that scored well in four indexes created by OPM but said she would not comment on any other agencies.

Springer said the survey results are intended to help employees know where they stand on personnel issues and give managers some insights into workforce problems that need quick attention.

DOJ_NMG_0124820

The Office of Management and Budget, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, the National Aeronautics and Space Administration and the National Science Foundation finished in the top 10 for job satisfaction, leadership and knowledge management, results-oriented performance culture and talent management, Springer said.

Other agencies that won high marks from their employees included the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, the Federal Trade Commission, General Services Administration, National Credit Union Administration, Securities and Exchange Commission, Social Security Administration, Agency for International Development and the departments of State and Commerce.Congress Votes on Raise

The fiscal 2007 funding resolution, scheduled for a House vote today, would maintain President Bush's plan to provide an average 2.2 percent pay raise to the federal workforce this year.

The resolution would allocate $900 million to help agencies pay for half the cost of the pay raise, with agencies expected to absorb the remaining cost through reductions in overhead and other accounts, House Democratic aides said. The allocation for the pay raise breaks with the usual practice, which is to not provide any funding for civil service raises.

Aides said the resolution also provides enough money to prevent layoffs at agencies, including the Justice Department, Social Security Administration, the Federal Aviation Administration and the Food and Drug Administration.

Reid's Whitewater (NYS)

New York Sun, January 31, 2007

Voters looking for clues as to how — or, more to the point, whether — the Democrats are going to redeem their issue of honesty and integrity on Capitol Hill will be keeping an eye on the growing scandal around the majority leader in the Senate, Harry Reid. He is caught up in a corker of a controversy over a questionable land deal.

One might think that after all the legal fees and energy the Clintons spent defending Whitewater, a top Democratic politician would know better than to get into a complicated, questionable land deal. But the message doesn't seem to have reached Mr. Reid, who is the subject of a fascinating dispatch in Sunday's Los Angeles Times.

The Times' dispatch, from Bullhead City, Ariz., begins, "It's hard to buy undeveloped land in booming northern Arizona for $166 an acre. But now- Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid effectively did just that when a longtime friend decided to sell property owned by the employee pension fund that he controlled. In 2002, Reid (D-Nev.) paid $10,000 to a pension fund controlled by Clair Haycock, a Las Vegas lubricants distributor and his friend for 50 years. The payment gave the senator full control of a 160-acre parcel in Bullhead City that Reid and the pension fund had jointly owned.

" Reid's price for the equivalent of 60 acres of undeveloped desert was less than one-tenth of the value the assessor placed on it at the time. Six months after the deal closed, Reid introduced legislation to address the plight of lubricants dealers." And that's not all. The newspaper reports that "since taking full control of the parcel in 2002, Reid has pushed for federal funding for a new bridge over the Colorado River a few miles from his property."

When the Associated Press reported some of these transactions earlier, the senator's response was to launch an attack on the wire service. It'll be interesting to see how Mr. Reid responds to the Los Angeles Times. For our part, we understand why Mr. Reid would feel the need to speculate in real estate development. When in Washington, the senator, who is supposed to represent the party of the common man, lives in the Ritz-Carlton, where he initially tried to pay $3,000 in Christmas bonuses to employees out of his campaign funds.

It's hard to afford the Ritz on a senator's salary. Since Mr. Reid, unlike Senators Rockefeller or Kerry, doesn't have an oil or ketchup fortune at his disposal, real estate seems a reasonable area on which to fall back. From the perspective of hard-pressed taxpayers, though, it'd be a better deal simply to raise the senator's salary directly than to have to subsidize him indirectly through regulating the lubricant market or building bridges to nowhere.

Particularly in this climate. It was the Democrats, after all, who decided to try to make congressional ethics into a national issue. We didn't — and don't — have an objection to that; on the contrary, we're all for a hard line in respect of honest government. But it's been hard to take at face value the idealism the Democrats claim for themselves. And it's going to be harder to credit the Democrats' motives with every day that the scandal over Mr. Reid goes unresolved.

DOJ_NMG_0124821

OTHER NEWS:

Tax-cut Efforts Target Firms (USAT)

By Dennis Cauchon

USA Today, January 31, 2007

At least a dozen states are considering using multibillion-dollar budget surpluses to cut business taxes to become more competitive.

In a departure from earlier times of budget surpluses, few states plan significant reductions in personal income taxes, a trend that has frustrated tax-cut advocates.

"Lowering taxes for the sake of lowering taxes isn't what this is all about," says Nebraska Gov. Dave Heineman, a Republican whose state cut business taxes last year. "We're trying to create a more favorable tax climate to compete in the global economy."

Forty-six states report revenue exceeding projections, according to the National Association of State Budget Officers. State budget surpluses and reserve funds are at their highest level since 2000.

"It's a remarkable trend that states are focusing on business tax reductions," says Chris Atkins of the Tax Foundation, a research group in Washington. "Business tax cuts used to be taboo."

Kansas Senate Majority Leader Derek Schmidt says legislators are wary of across-the-board tax cuts because they contributed to budget shortfalls in 2002 and 2003. "We had big tax cuts in 1998," he says. "Four years later, we were in the tank. Everyone remembers that."

Tax-cut advocates complain that governors and legislators are too timid. "We've got a $2.2 billion surplus, and our relief package is a paltry $281 million. Thanks a lot," says David Strom, president of the Taxpayers League of Minnesota.

Demand for more spending is limiting individual income tax cuts, too. "Many new governors ran on improved health care and improved education, and they want to fulfill those promises," says Nick Johnson, a state budget expert at the liberal Center on Budget and Policy Priorities in Washington.

State tax collections rose 8.5% in the first nine months of 2006 from the same period a year earlier, the Census Bureau reports.

Georgia, Kentucky, Missouri, Texas and West Virginia are among states considering business tax cuts. Hawaii, Nebraska and South Carolina are among the few studying personal income tax cuts.

Deal Struck On Claims Of Nazi Era (NYT)

By Joseph B. Treaster

The New York Times, January 31, 2007

After nearly 10 years of struggling to have a big Italian insurance company pay claims on life insurance policies sold to victims of the Holocaust, lawyers who say they represent most of the victims are giving up the fight.

They say they have struck a deal with the insurer, Assicurazioni Generali, that will give Holocaust victims and their relatives far less money than they had originally hoped. But the lawyers say that their chances of winning a lawsuit seemed increasingly unlikely and that many of their clients are old and, in some cases, in poor health.

“It’s a compromise,” said Robert A. Swift, a lawyer in Philadelphia who began working on insurance cases from the Holocaust in 1997. “In a perfect world with more leverage, maybe I could have negotiated a better formula. But I’m playing the hand I was dealt.”

Judge George B. Daniels of Federal District Court in Manhattan has called a hearing for this morning to determine whether the settlement is fair to all parties.

If he approves the agreement, it will close a painful chapter in the insurance company’s history. It could also provide perhaps several million dollars more to victims of the Holocaust and their heirs.

DOJ_NMG_0124822

Judge Daniels will also hear arguments from lawyers who are refusing to participate in the settlement, contending that the deal will prevent tens of thousands of other Holocaust victims and their heirs from ever being compensated — just as new evidence on the Holocaust is being uncovered in Europe.

Last May, officials of a multinational group said they were taking steps to open half a dozen warehouses in Bad Arolsen, Germany, that have been sealed for 60 years and are filled with documents compiled by the Nazis and by American and Allied forces.

Samuel J. Dubbin, a lawyer in Miami opposing the agreement, said the settlement should be postponed until the German material is examined. But lawyers who worked out the deal — both for the survivors and Generali — want it to go ahead.

"The possibility of finding something in those records, at this point, is remote," said Lawrence Kill, one of the lawyers who negotiated the settlement with Generali.

In the settlement, Generali does not acknowledge assertions by survivors that it, like many other European insurers, routinely refused to pay death benefits for Jews who died in concentration camps and sometimes demanded copies of policies and death certificates from families that had lost everything. Generali says it was never the company's policy to deny valid claims and, in the settlement papers, it denies any wrongdoing.

The settlement includes Generali's reasons for resisting payment. It says, for example, that its offices in much of Europe were seized by Communist governments after World War II and that those governments — rather than the insurance company — should be held responsible for paying Holocaust claims.

Generali also argues that its insurance policies became all but worthless as a result of steep devaluations in European currencies after the war, that United States courts do not have jurisdiction over the Holocaust dispute and that the statute of limitations has long been expired for Holocaust victims.

European insurers over the years declined to publish the names of policyholders, a step that would have helped survivors determine if relatives had bought life insurance and whether they might have reason to make a claim. Generali permitted the publication of many names, its representatives said. But, advocates for the survivors counter, the lists were far from complete.

In the settlement, there is no provision that Generali publish the names of all its Holocaust-era policyholders.

"Where is the historical justice?" asked Thane Rosenbaum, a son of Holocaust survivors and a professor at the Fordham University School of Law. "Tens of thousands of Holocaust survivors are being shut out of the process. This is an abuse of the class-action process."

Christopher J. Carnicelli, a Generali executive in London, said in an e-mail message that the company was proud of the settlement and that only a handful of people opposed it. "The objections of a very small number of individuals with a track record of finding fault with any Holocaust-related settlement cannot obscure this settlement's important benefits," he wrote.

Lawyers first began investigating Holocaust insurance claims in the late 1990s and filed lawsuits against more than 20 European insurers. All the lawsuits except those against Generali were eventually dropped or, in the case of German insurance companies, resolved through a settlement negotiated between the United States and Germany.

Mr. Swift, the lawyer in Philadelphia, and lawyers at three other law firms began drafting the agreement after two courtroom defeats. In 2003, the Supreme Court ruled that a California law pertaining to Holocaust survivors interfered with the ability of the president of the United States to resolve international disputes.

A year later, Judge Michael B. Mukasey, in Federal District Court in Manhattan, cited the Supreme Court decision as the basis for dismissing the class-action claims by Mr. Swift and his colleagues, along with several separate lawsuits.

Mr. Swift and his colleagues and the lawyers pursuing separate cases appealed Judge Mukasey's decision. The appeal is expected to be argued in a few months. But Mr. Swift said he and the other class-action lawyers decided over the summer that the odds were against them and that they could do better by settling.

Sidney Zabludoff, a Holocaust insurance expert, estimated that 850,000 Jews were insured by European carriers at the time of the Holocaust. He put the value of those policies at $18 billion in today's dollars.

Mr. Zabludoff estimated that Generali had coverage on about 110,000 Jews and that the policies could be worth $4.5 billion in today's dollars.

DOJ_NMG_0124823

In court papers, Generali says it has paid $135 million on about 5,200 claims. Marco E. Schnabl, a lawyer for Generali in New York, said the insurance company also paid $40 million through various international funds related to the Holocaust.

Generali agreed to pay about $35 million of the $135 million on about 700 claims as a result of the settlement, Mr. Schnabl said, and it has been accepting new claims over the last few months. Generali had received nearly 1,000 claims by Monday, Mr. Schnabl said, and plans to accept additional claims until the end of March, under the settlement.

On claims with no evidence of a policy, nothing will be paid. But survivors or relatives with at least some proof are expected to receive at least $1,000.

Generali has paid more to Holocaust victims than any other insurance company and provided more than a third of the $288 million that a Holocaust insurance commission in Washington has said was offered on more than 46,000 claims.

The average payment offered on a claim — many involving more than one policy — has been about $6,200. But Generali says it has paid some claims for hundreds of thousands of dollars and more.

William M. Shernoff, a lawyer in California who represents several Holocaust survivors, said he and his clients did not want any part of the settlement.

"We have policies that we think are worth, instead of a few thousand dollars, would be worth hundreds of thousands of dollars," Mr. Shernoff said. "And punitive damages could be substantial. A jury could be so outraged that it could come in with a blockbuster award."

A Changing Battle On AIDS Is Reflected In A Quilt (NYT)

By Jesse Mckinley

The New York Times, January 31, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO, Jan. 30 — It has been 20 years since Cleve Jones started the AIDS Memorial Quilt here, painting the name of a friend who had died from the disease on a simple piece of fabric.

During the next two decades the quilt became the largest piece of community folk art in the world, a 54-ton collage affixed with the names of 91,000 victims of AIDS, a tapestry of grief that was one of the earliest and most effective tools in raising awareness of the disease.

Now Mr. Jones is locked in a legal tug of war with the quilt's caretaker, the Names Project Foundation, over custody of 35 of its 6,000 panels. The dispute is not just about the relatively small swatch of the quilt, or even the simmering personality clash between Mr. Jones, a founder of the group, and his successors. More broadly, the battle reflects the changing symbolism and purpose of one of the most recognizable symbols of the AIDS crisis as the crisis itself has changed.

The confrontation has touched on issues percolating through the AIDS community, including the new racial, social and international demographics of the disease; changes in philanthropic trends; and the question of whether memorials are appropriate at a time when other major problems, including a rebound in unsafe sex and the emergence of new drug-resistant strains, persist.

"The quilt was very effective in the late '80s and early '90s for AIDS awareness," said Michael Petrelis, a writer in San Francisco who has been active in the AIDS movement. "On the other hand, there's hundreds and thousands of people that need a housing subsidy, just trying to keep a roof over their head. Should we be putting our time and money into another vigil? I don't know."

The legal dispute dates to 2004, when Mr. Jones filed a wrongful termination suit against the Names Project Foundation, which is based in Atlanta and was established to care for the quilt, after being fired from a job as a fund-raiser and public speaker. The termination claims were dismissed, but a 2005 settlement granted Mr. Jones custody of the 35 billboard-size panels for his emotional distress. The panels are generally made up of eight individual quilts affixed with names of people who died.

The settlement called for Mr. Jones to establish a nonprofit organization to care for the quilt while it was in his possession. But in December, Mr. Jones informed the foundation that he would use an umbrella group instead of a newly formed nonprofit to sponsor the quilt, a plan the foundation said was unacceptable under the terms of the agreement.

DOJ_NMG_0124824

A lawyer for the foundation, Charles Thompson, said the matter seemed closed. “Mr. Jones didn’t comply with the agreement, and our obligations are over,” Mr. Thompson said.

That assessment has angered some San Francisco city officials as well as Mr. Jones, who said he had planned to return his piece of the quilt “to the front line of activism” in the city, a hot zone in the AIDS crisis where the disease, according to the city’s health department, is still a leading cause of death for men ages 15 to 54. Mr. Jones emphasized that he had no financial gain from the settlement, only a desire for more forceful advocacy.

“They’ve taken it upon themselves to decommission one of the most powerful weapons we have,” said Mr. Jones, who now spends his time in Palm Springs and San Francisco and works for Unite Here, a union representing hotel workers, among others. “It’s not intended as a passive memorial.”

The foundation’s executive director, Julie Rhoad, said more than half of the 6,000 panels had been displayed in each of the last three years, including dozens of times in San Francisco. That said, the quilt, which if unfurled would cover six city blocks, needs constant upkeep, and the foundation has rules about lending it out and caring for it, Ms. Rhoad said.

“Not only do we need to look at our daily work of sending the quilt on the road and making sure we have it as active as possible,” Ms. Rhoad said, “but we also have to plan for long-term stewardship.”

She said the focus in Atlanta has included more efforts in black and Latino communities, which were not “at the epicenter of the disease when we were founded.” Like many AIDS groups, the foundation has been trying keep people’s interest in combating the disease even as it has become a less imminent threat to financially stable gay white men, who long drove fund-raising and awareness efforts.

Kandy Ferree, the president and chief executive of the National AIDS Fund, which channels private and corporate money to AIDS groups, said fund-raising for some groups in the United States had lost a sense of urgency as the disease had begun to devastate other, often poorer parts of the world.

“We did not do a good job as domestic AIDS organizations in keeping the changing face of AIDS on the domestic radar screen,” Ms. Ferree said.

Ms. Ferree added that while she supported the quilt, she believed its place in the AIDS community had diminished in part because it was so large that it was rarely seen in its entirety. The whole quilt was last displayed in 1996 on the Mall in Washington, when it was visited by more than one million people, an event Ms. Rhoad called “transformative.”

But it was also expensive, leaving the group deeply in the red, foundation officials say. That debt also coincided with the emergence of new drugs, which gave many long-suffering patients a new lease on life and caused a serious dip in philanthropic giving to AIDS groups.

By 1999, the foundation had laid off dozens of staff members and substantially curtailed its operations. In 2001, the foundation relocated to Atlanta from San Francisco, in part for financial reasons as well as to bring the quilt closer to minority groups and civil rights leaders. Mr. Jones, who has AIDS, said he spoke publicly in favor of the move, though it was met with outcry from some San Franciscans who thought the quilt should have stayed in the city.

But Mr. Jones said he personally regretted the relocation. “San Francisco is the birthplace of the quilt,” he said. “It’s part of our history. Are you going to move the cable cars to Spokane?”

In 2003, Mr. Jones was dismissed by the foundation. He said he lost his job after he sought to display the entire quilt in Washington during the 2004 presidential election. Foundation officials said such a display would have seriously taxed the group’s financial and administrative resources but denied that the proposal had cost Mr. Jones his job. Court papers state that in 2003 Mr. Jones demanded that the board turn over the organization to him and oust its then-president, behavior the board found “unacceptably disruptive.”

Foundation officials also said the legal proceedings with Mr. Jones had drained the group’s resources and thwarted plans to establish a permanent satellite display in San Francisco, something Mr. Jones calls “nonsense.” The foundation had a $1 million budget in 2006, down slightly from the year before.

“The quilt has always had a footprint in San Francisco,” Ms. Rhoad said. “But certainly you can understand that the institution has to have the financial underpinnings itself to have a satellite venue.” But she added that a San Francisco quilt display was still on her foundation’s “to-do list.”

DOJ_NMG_0124825

City leaders here hope so. Earlier this month, the San Francisco Board of Supervisors adopted a resolution saying it would be an "unconscionable and unthinkable offense against the citizenry of San Francisco" if Mr. Jones's panels were not returned. Some people active with AIDS groups have suggested the quilt be enshrined here in a new museum devoted to the AIDS crisis.

Still, there is a sense among some people that the quilt, like the once-ubiquitous red ribbon on the lapel, may have seen its cultural moment pass. Robert McMullin, the executive director of the Stop AIDS Project, a prevention group in San Francisco, said the quilt, like any symbol, might have "lost its punch" over time.

"The quilt is about loss," Mr. McMullin said. "And while people are still dying, for most of us, the most important part of our message may not be about people dying."

McCain Taps House Team (RC)

By Lauren W. Whittington

Roll Call, January 31, 2007

Sen. John McCain (R) will unveil the members of his House whip team today, as the Arizonan seeks to jump-start his effort to build support for his 2008 presidential bid in a chamber where he has never been terribly popular with his fellow Republicans.

GOP Reps. Spencer Bachus (Ala.), Mark Kirk (Ill.), Dan Lungren (Calif.), John Shimkus (Ill.), John Shadegg (Ariz.) and Fred Upton (Mich.) will serve as McCain's emissaries in the House, with additions to the team expected to be announced later.

"We are incredibly fortunate to have the support of such distinguished officials," said McCain campaign spokesman Danny Diaz. "These Congressmen will play a lead role in growing the base of support Sen. McCain already enjoys in the U.S. House."

The announcement of McCain's six-man whip team comes as former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, one of his top rivals for the GOP nod in 2008, has been aggressively courting support from House Members.

Romney is scheduled to address the Republican Study Committee's retreat in Baltimore on Friday. McCain will not attend the retreat for House conservatives, although his campaign said that former Sen. Phil Gramm (R-Texas) will be speaking on his behalf.

McCain has long had a prickly relationship with Republican House Members over the course of his two decades in the Senate.

At times he has riled conservatives with his willingness to buck the Republican establishment, and his efforts to limit pork barrel spending also have drawn the ire of appropriators and other Members seeking to fund pet projects back home.

Bachus, who is the ranking member on the Financial Services panel and also an RSC member, conceded that McCain has ruffled feathers over the years. But he believes McCain has "offended for all the right reasons" and said the fact that the Senator doesn't seem to be out to win a popularity contest is what ultimately drew him to support his presidential bid.

"He's not afraid of anybody," Bachus said, adding that it is evident that McCain won't be managed. "I don't want somebody who can be manipulated and used."

He added: "I think that John McCain is a courageous person. And I think that the president of the United States in the next decade is going to have to be courageous."

Lungren conceded that he had differences with McCain on issues such as reforming the campaign finance system and immigration policy.

But he said that McCain's record of fiscal conservatism trumped their disagreements over other policies and that he chose to support him because "on the big issues he's right."

"On the [Iraq] War, he's not a guy who's sitting there with his finger in the wind," Lungren said, referring to McCain's support for the Bush administration's plan to increase the number of troops in Iraq.

And as for those who might mistake McCain's maverick reputation for an across-the-board moderate ideology, Lungren had this warning: "I think a lot of liberals are going to be pretty surprised."

From a political standpoint, Lungren said he believes McCain is the type of candidate who could make California competitive in the 2008 general election.

"I think he puts my state in play," Lungren said.

DOJ_NMG_0124826

Republican candidates have all but written off the left-leaning state in recent presidential elections. The last time California was considered in play in a presidential election was 1988, when then-Vice President George H.W. Bush carried the state with 51 percent of the vote.

Both McCain and California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) share a penchant for government reform and at least two operatives from Schwarzenegger's 2006 re-election bid have migrated to McCain's presidential effort: Senior Adviser Steve Schmidt and Deputy Director of Strategy Sarah Simmons.

California-based media consultant Fred Davis, who worked on Schwarzenegger's re-election, signed on to work for McCain in 2008.

Lungren, a former California attorney general, served with McCain in the House in the 1980s.

"Honor is extremely important to him," Lungren said. "Both his own honor and the honor of the institution."

But as for whether McCain will be successful in convincing some of Lungren's more skeptical colleagues to jump on board, the Californian said "time will tell."

Kirk, a leader of House Republican moderates, said that McCain's experience, especially on issues of national defense and foreign policy, were among the chief reasons he decided to get on board.

Kirk has known McCain ever since the Illinois Congressman was a staffer in the House, where McCain served from 1982 to 1986. He also shares a connection with McCain because both men served in the Navy.

"I've built an alliance with him really based on his character more than anything else," Kirk said, calling McCain a reformer in the mold of former President Theodore Roosevelt.

When asked if he was concerned that McCain's maverick image could hurt him among conservatives in the GOP base, Kirk said that last cycle's elections were proof that voters were looking for less partisan bickering and more thoughtful legislating coming from Washington, D.C.

Meanwhile, Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.), a leading fiscal conservative, is not taking a formal role in McCain's outreach efforts to House Members, but he is supporting his fellow Arizonan and asking colleagues to look at McCain's record.

"He's not taking conservatives for granted," Flake said.

Romney, ABM And McCain (HILL)

The Hill, January 31, 2007

Mitt Romney hopes that the endorsement of the ABM Caucus will propel him to the White House.

ABM, in this case, does not stand for "Anti-Ballistic Missiles," but rather "Anyone But McCain."

Recently, Romney has had a boomlet of endorsements from House Republicans, including former Speaker Dennis Hastert (Ill.), Jim McCrery (La.), Buck McKeon (Calif.), Tom Feeney (Fla.) and Marsha Blackburn (Tenn.). Former Rep. and now-Sen. Jim DeMint (S.C.) is also on board, and there have been rumors that Minority Leader John Boehner (Ohio) will jump on the Romney bandwagon. For this early in the campaign, it is a pretty good list, especially for a former governor with no Washington experience.

What these endorsements have in common is that they come from a substantial group of House Republicans who have long disliked John McCain. For many House Republicans, McCain was the antithesis of what they were fighting for. The House would move conservative legislation, only to see the Senate water it down, and McCain was seen as the "waterer-down in chief." His House critics disliked his working with Democrats. They remembered his championing of campaign finance against the majority of the House majority's wishes.

These House Republicans are looking for an alternative, and so far, Romney has been the candidate to capitalize on these lingering resentments.

Romney is looking for a niche in this strange Republican field, which is full of mavericks but has a hole in the traditional mainstream conservative Republican slot. There is room for another candidate to the right of McCain and to the left of Brownback. George Allen (R-Va.) would have filled that space had he not self-destructed in his Senate race.

DOJ_NMG_0124827

I have argued in this column that recent events surrounding the war have not benefited McCain, but he is still the frontrunner in the Republican field. It will likely come down to McCain and someone else, and Romney is angling to be that other candidate.

Romney, of course, has his own definitional problems. Is he a liberal Massachusetts Republican or a conservative Utah Mormon Republican? To his benefit and detriment, he has been a little of both. In another Republican field, he might have run as McCain did in 2000 — as the maverick appealing to moderate Republicans and independents. But that turf is too crowded with McCain, Giuliani, Pataki, and perhaps Sen. Chuck Hagel (Neb.).

To get to the right of McCain, he has trumpeted his stand in Massachusetts against gay marriage and reversed his position on abortion.

The issue that many believe Romney will use as a wedge between himself and McCain is immigration. McCain is firmly committed to a comprehensive plan along the lines proposed by President Bush. Romney has flirted with striking a more anti-immigration stance, which would endear him to a good portion of the Republican base and to many House Republicans. But as Sam Youngman reported yesterday in The Hill, Romney remained silent on the issue at a recent conservative summit.

McCain has made many strides mending fences with religious conservatives and Bush supporters; he has hired many talented Bush campaign veterans. But the divide between McCain and many House Republicans is too great to bridge.

House endorsements by themselves are worth almost nothing. But Mitt Romney is hoping that they send a signal to the wider world of Republican primary voters, party activists, and conservative donors that he is the real Republican in the race.

Fortier is a research fellow at the American Enterprise Institute.

Romney Faces Questions About His Faith (AP)

By Jim Davenport

AP, January 31, 2007

Republican Mitt Romney on Tuesday dismissed questions about whether his Mormon faith would be an impediment to his White House aspirations, echoing the argument that voters will be choosing a president not a pastor.

The former Massachusetts governor faced questions about his faith in this Bible Belt state where a few Republicans expressed deep reservations about backing a Mormon. Romney said he was making inroads with the GOP in this early voting state.

"I've had a number of meetings with pastors of various faiths and religious leaders," Romney said in an interview with The Associated Press. "Almost to a person they've subscribed to what Dr. Richard Land (of the Southern Baptist Convention) said, which was: 'We're not electing Mitt Romney as pastor in chief.'"

Romney added: "In the early days of an acquaintance between a candidate and the electorate, the focus is on the personal, social issues and then it changes to be a focus on the major critical issues of the day."

That failed to sway Republican State Rep. Gloria Haskins.

"I don't think that I could see someone who is a member of a faith so contrary to my faith having my support," said Haskins, a graduate of Bob Jones University, the Christian fundamentalist college. Haskins is backing Sen. John McCain of Arizona.

In September, Charleston County GOP chairwoman Cyndi Mosteller questioned Romney after a speech, asking him to explain his faith.

On Tuesday, Mosteller, who is a Baptist, said, "The question is: Does Governor Romney support Joseph Smith's doctrines? We as evangelicals don't believe we can go in and change Paul's doctrine. I don't see how you move around this."

Romney said he is making inroads with Christian conservatives.

"I've been very encouraged so far," he said. "People have been willing to endorse my efforts."

Romney attended a House Republican Caucus meeting that always begins with a Bible verse and prayer in Christ's name, led by Republican state Rep. Bob Leach.

Leach told caucus members he asked Romney who Jesus Christ was and Romney responded that Christ "was his personal savior."

Leach said that was good enough to earn his vote.

DOJ_NMG_0124828

___

WASHINGTON (AP) — A few presidential hopefuls offered their views on global warming Tuesday at a Senate hearing that sounded more like an echo chamber.

"This is a problem who's time has come," said Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y.

"This is an issue over the years whose time has come," said Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz.

"Will we look back at today and say this was the moment we took a stand?" said Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill.

The candidates may have competing political goals, but there was general agreement on global warming at the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee hearing. The panel chairwoman, Sen. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., convened the session to survey lawmakers as Congress prepares to work on the issue.

Obama and McCain have introduced a bill with Sen. Joe Lieberman, I-Conn., that would impose mandatory caps on greenhouse emissions for power plants, industry and oil refineries. They would also let businesses buy emissions "credits" from other companies that have exceeded their reduction targets.

Clinton and Sen. Joe Biden, D-Del., another candidate who submitted written testimony, also are co-sponsors.

But not everyone is on board.

"My sense is a rush to climate change at this moment, all due respect to Senator Clinton, is something about an '08 election," complained Sen. Larry Craig, R-Idaho.

Romney's Veto Could Hurt Him With Jewish Voters (POL)

By Ryan Grim

The Politico, January 31, 2007

Mitt Romney has been aggressively courting the Jewish community as part of his run for the presidency.

The former Republican governor of Massachusetts returned last week from a five-day trip to Israel, accompanied by Matt Brooks, executive director of the Republican Jewish Coalition, and Mel Sembler, a member of its board of directors.

He's attracted a small team of heavy hitters from the Jewish community. He named Sembler, a former ambassador, as his finance committee's co-chairman. In October, he brought on Noam Neusner, formerly President Bush's liaison to the Jewish community. And the Boston Phoenix reported that Sam Fox, nominated to be the U.S. ambassador to Belgium, gave $100,000 to Romney's Iowa PAC in July.

Now that he's in full presidential campaign mode, Romney may be wishing he hadn't vetoed a budget provision in 2003 that would have reimbursed nursing homes in Massachusetts that provided kosher meals to Jewish residents on Medicaid. The measure promised to pay an extra $5 a day per kosher diner. The state legislature overrode Romney's veto.

Nathan Diament, director of public policy for the Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations, said that his organization was disappointed about the veto. "Access to kosher food is a critical aspect of Jewish observance," he said. "From our perspective, it's a religious liberty issue."

Charles Glick was the government affairs specialist in 2003 for the Boston-area Jewish Community Relations Council, which backed the measure. He said Romney's decision came as a shock.

"The Jewish community had what they thought was a good relationship with the governor," he said. "We knew of his ambitions and his outreach to the community in terms of raising money. So it was a bit of a puzzle."

Romney spokesman Eric Fehrnstrom told The Politico that the governor vetoed the legislation to cut spending.

"The state was in a fiscal crisis, and it would have led to higher Medicaid reimbursement rates for nursing homes, which was unaffordable at the time," he said. "Once we restored fiscal balance, we were in a position to add spending where appropriate."

The provision is now law, and Fehrnstrom said the veto has not become an issue on the campaign trail.

Yet given the intensity of the battle for Jewish donors, it may become one. "Governor Romney has been pushing his strong and unadulterated belief in a very strong state of Israel," said a national Jewish leader with close ties to the Republican Party. "Any sort of dents to his armor become problematic to him. There is hesitation in the community to begin with because of his Mormonism. …These sorts of chinks in his armor will help his opponents."

DOJ_NMG_0124829

"It's definitely going to hurt Romney in the Jewish community," said Ira Forman, executive director of the National Jewish Democratic Council. "You'd think for someone who's of a minority religion he'd be a little more sensitive to these concerns."

Romney has defenders in the Jewish community. Brooks, the Republican Jewish Coalition leader, said the issue should have only a minimal impact. "In difficult financial times, there are difficult decisions the chief executives have to make. They can't fund every project and every particular effort that comes before them," he said. "I don't think anybody's going to view that as an attack or an offense to the Jewish community."

Gary Erlbaum, a Pennsylvania businessman who raises money for both Democrats and Republicans, said the only impact of the veto would be in the Orthodox Jewish community.

"If this were going to affect anyone, it would be someone who's morally Orthodox or cares about those who are. Don't forget that's a small minority of Jews in the United States," he said.

Even in that community, Diament said, the veto issue wouldn't decide the candidate's fate. "We know that Governor Romney has appreciation for religious freedom generally," he added, "and we look forward to continuing to talk to him and work with him."

The veto was reported by The Jewish Advocate in December 2003, but got little coverage elsewhere. Recently, a liberal-leaning blog called the Blue Mass. Group picked up the story and had some fun at Romney's expense, titling the post, "Romney: Let them eat pork!"

Join The Conversation

You need to be a registered user of Politico.com to "join the conversation". If you are not a member yet, what are you waiting for? Register Now!

by jeremy on 01.30.2007 at 10:52 PM

80% of Jews vote democratic.

Are any Jews, except for a few of the deluded who signed up with President George Cuckoo Bananas and his Christianist crusade, even paying any attention to this guy? What mainstream politician isn't generally pro-Israel? Add on top that, as The Economist recently reported, American Jews are increasingly detached from Israel as an important political issue, and it all adds up to a non-issue.

Before you start composing please note that you will need to be a registered user of Politico.com to "join the conversation". If you are not a member yet, what are you waiting for? Register Now!

One Uninsured Group Can Now Exhale (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, January 31, 2007

Former associate attorney general and convicted felon Webb Hubbell, now working for an insurance agency, has an important message for marijuana smokers: You don't have to quit to get life insurance.

"If you've been declined for life insurance or are paying above-market premiums or simply want to know" about life insurance for "responsible" marijuana smokers, then give him a call, he says on an "audio message" he made for the National Organization for the Reform of Marijuana Laws' Web site to explain its new life insurance program.

"Hello, this is Webb Hubbell," the recording begins, with appropriate mellow jazz in the background. "For years, responsible marijuana smokers have not been able to access affordable life insurance," explains the former Little Rock mayor and Arkansas chief justice.

Hubble, longtime close friend of Bill and Hillary Clinton, told us that "responsible" dopers means occasional users as opposed to constant smokers -- something like social drinkers vs. lushes.

So these social smokers "have been forced to lie on applications, forgo the health benefits [for people with AIDS, glaucoma, cancer, multiple sclerosis and epilepsy] of responsible marijuana use . . . or purchase . . . [policies] that did not require an application or a physical. If they were honest about their use of marijuana they were either flat-out declined or rated so high" -- well, how high were they? -- "that they could not afford" the premiums.

DOJ_NMG_0124830

"No longer," Hubbell declares triumphantly. Two carriers have agreed to write policies for users, he said. But wait a minute! This stuff is illegal. Well, "technically it is still illegal even in the Netherlands, where you can buy it over the counter," said Allen St. Pierre, NORML's executive director. "Eleven states, with some 100 million people, have decriminalized marijuana," St. Pierre said, "and medical marijuana has been legal for 10 years in some states." We're talking a substantial underserved market here.

So how did Hubbell, who did 18 months in federal prison in 1995-1996 for bilking his old law firm clients, become NORML's insurance agent? Hubbell told us he met NORML founder Keith Stroup in 1996 when both were working on reform in the criminal justice system. And on the three-minute recording he recounts the moving story of a NORML member who was unable to get a bank loan to expand his trucking business.

The "bank required additional life insurance," Hubbell explains, but "his local insurance agent had told him he simply had to quit smoking marijuana to get the coverage the bank was requiring." Well, " he didn't want to quit, and he wanted NORML's help [and] they contacted me," said Hubbell, who works for the McLaughlin Company -- not to be confused with television's McLaughlin Group.

Hubbell said he found a carrier to write a policy for the man and then "we decided the time was right to make traditional insurance . . . available" to other reefer aficionados. So far, two insurance companies have agreed to write life insurance policies, and Hubbell said he hopes to expand coverage to include health and disability insurance.

"Challenging as it may be," Hubbell says on the message, "NORML is . . . working hard to both reform cannabis laws as well as [to help] cannabis consumers all around the world." And Hubbell is ready to get them insured.

Loop Fans simply must listen to Hubbard's "audio message" about the NORML life insurance program -- and the plug for his agency -- at http://audio.norml.org/audio_stash/staff_psa/webb_jazz_test_2.mp3.One Star Still Shines

Despite her central role in getting the country into that increasingly unpopular war in Iraq, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's star is scarcely diminished. In fact, even though she was President Bush's national security adviser throughout Bush's first term, she still ranks quite high in the national popularity polls -- scoring twice Bush's ratings.

That may be why people keep asking her if she's going to be on the GOP ticket in 2008.

The question came up again last week in an interview on German television.

"Before we say goodbye," the interviewer said, "the German public also is viewing with interest that the presidential race is starting pretty early this season, almost after the midterm elections. So -- and they're also fascinated by you as a person, so let me ask you this. Could you imagine any circumstances under which you would be on a Republican ticket?"

"Oh, I'm going back to Stanford," Rice said.

"I want to generate some news here," the interviewer explained.

"No, maybe the Germans will see me at Stanford in Berlin," one of the university's overseas centers.

"Going back to Stanford," where she was provost? That's what she says. Of course, that's what she said at the end of Bush's first term -- and she's still here.Defer That Junket

Bad news for samba fans on the Hill and in the administration. The embassy in Brasilia says if you haven't booked a hotel room in Rio by now, forget about it. It's Carnival time!

The embassy has asked the State Department to send out an ALDAC -- All Diplomatic and Consular Posts -- message alerting them to the problem.

In its request, the embassy said to "please be advised that due to the high tourism season and the upcoming Carnival acceptable hotel rooms in Rio de Janeiro are booked from now through the end of February," and "it is highly unlikely that any accommodations will be available during this period.

"Post therefore requests that all officials and TDY travelers defer travel to Rio de Janeiro until March 5, 2007." Of course, if you're on one of the Hill appropriations committees or in the leadership and are desperately searching for facts . . .

Mama Hugs Iowa (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, January 31, 2007

DAVENPORT, Iowa

DOJ_NMG_0124831

When she was little, Hillary Rodham would sit on a basement bench and pretend she was flying a spaceship to Mars. Her younger brother Hugh, perched behind, would sometimes beg for a chance to be captain.

No dice. "She would always drive, and I would always have to sit in the back," he once told me.

Through all the years of sitting behind Bill Clinton on his trip to the stars, Hillary fidgeted and elbowed, trying to be co-captain rather than just wingman, or worse, winglady.

Finally, in Iowa, she was once more behind the wheel of her spaceship to Mars. She didn't have to prop up Bill after one of his roguish pratfalls. She didn't have to feign interest in East Wing piffle — table settings and pastry chefs and designer gowns. She didn't have to defer to her male colleagues in the Senate, stepping back to give them the limelight.

She positively glistened as she talked about how "I" — rather than the "we" of '92 — would run the world.

Humbly, graciously, deftly, she offered Iowa the answer to that eternal question, What Is Hillary Owed?

Everything.

John Wood, a self-described "plainsman," Republican and machinery-and-tool salesman from Davenport, asked Hillary how she would handle the world's evil and bad men, provoking the slyly ambiguous retort: "What in my background equips me to deal with evil and bad men?"

He said afterward that he was more worried about her ability to face down villains, "being a lady," but conceded, "The woman did good today."

(His question was reminiscent of Ali G's interview of Newt Gingrich, when the faux rapper asked whether a woman president would be turned on and manipulated by evil dictators, given that, with women, "the worse you treat 'em, the more they want you.")

As YouTube attests, Hillary didn't care about style as first lady; she was too busy trying to get in on Bill's substance. She showed off a long parade of unflattering outfits and unnervingly changing hairdos.

In Iowa, her national anthem may have been off-key, but her look wasn't. It was an attractive mirror of her political message: man-tailored with a dash of pink femininity.

"I think you look very nice," a veteran of the first gulf war told her in Des Moines.

"Thank you!" she answered, beaming and laughing.

When Geraldine Ferraro made her historic run in '84, she tried to blend a mother's concerns into her foreign policy answers, but it did not work so well once she started getting her nuclear terminology mixed up.

Hillary dealt with the issue head on — "I'm a woman; I'm a mom" — hoping to stir that sisterly vote that Ms. Ferraro failed to draw after it turned out that many women were skeptical about one of their own facing down the Soviets.

Unlike Barack Obama, who once said he was bored by the suburbs, she introduced herself in the land of bingo and bacon as a product of the suburbs, wallowing in the minutiae of kitchen-table issues.

W. and Cheney have lavished attention and money on Iraq, leaving Americans feeling neglected. Hillary offered Iowans a warm bath of "you," homey rumination rather than harsh domination.

(Though Jon Stewart warned on "The Daily Show" that her slogan — "Let the conversation begin!" — will not help her with men. "I think the typical response would be, 'Now?' " he said, adding that her new Iraq policy is, "America, let's pull over and just ask for directions.")

Thomasine Johnson, a 66-year-old African-American from outside Des Moines, complained that Hillary talked too much about "traditional women's issues," but many in the audiences seemed enthralled.

The Achilles' heel of "The Warrior," as she is known, is the war. She expressed outrage about Iraq, but ended up sounding like a mother whose teenage son has not cleaned up his room: "The president has said this is going to be left to his successor ... and I think it's the height of irresponsibility, and I really resent it."

She uttered the most irritating and disingenuous nine words in politics: "If we had known then what we know now. ..."

Jim Webb knew. Barack Obama knew. Even I knew, for Pete's sake. The administration's trickery was clear in real time.

Hillary didn't have the nerve to oppose a popular president on a national security issue after 9/11, and she feared being cast as an antiwar hippie when she ran. Now she feels she can't simply say she made a bad decision. And that makes her seem conniving — not a good mix with nurturing.

DOJ_NMG_0124832

The Clintonian Candidate (WP)

By Ruth Marcus

The Washington Post, January 31, 2007

There's a Clinton in the presidential race. The surprise: It may not be Hillary.

The truly Clintonian figure running for the Democratic nomination is Barack Obama. The senator from Illinois, it's struck me lately, seems in many ways more like Bill Clinton than does the senator from New York.

When it comes to Obama and Bill Clinton, there are superficial similarities -- the absent father, the humble roots combined with Ivy League pedigree. Leave aside who would be the first black president, as many said of Clinton -- both represent generational change, Clinton as the first baby boomer president, Obama as the first would-be president of the post-baby boom.

Man from Hope -- meet Audacity of Hope.

Of course, the fit isn't exact: Obama, unlike Clinton, doesn't seem to have been running for the presidency since birth. But there are deeper ways, in his intellectual approach, his message and his personal style, in which Obama evokes Clinton.

Like Clinton before him, Obama presents himself as a new kind of politician who can rise above and bridge partisan differences. Go back to Clinton's 1991 announcement speech, and it's easy to imagine Obama speaking.

"Today, our leaders in Washington seem incapable of working together in a practical, common sense way," lamented one politician. The other called for "a new kind of leadership . . . not mired in the politics of the past, not limited by old ideologies." Can you tell the difference? The first is Obama, the second Clinton, but either could have been channeling the other.

Like Clinton, Obama has a homing instinct for the middle -- maybe too much of one. To read his book "The Audacity of Hope" is to be struck by his constant desire to understand -- even more, to respect -- conflicting views on whatever issue he happens to be discussing.

This is impressive until it becomes, finally, exasperating in its seemingly compulsive even-handedness. "I'm not unsympathetic to Justice Scalia's position," Obama, recovering law review president that he is, writes about the debate on constitutional interpretation. "Like many conservatives . . . I believe we ignore culture factors at our peril," he writes about the values debate. "Not all these fears are irrational," he writes of anti-immigrant sentiment.

In fact, Obama fits himself explicitly into the Clinton mold. "In his platform -- if not always in his day-to-day politics -- Clinton's Third Way went beyond splitting the difference," he writes. "It tapped into the pragmatic, nonideological attitude of the majority of Americans."

To Clinton critics drawn to Obama, equating them seems too facile: Obama's centrist tropism is born of a desire to accommodate and transcend differences, they argue, while Clinton's was an artifact of ruthless calculation in which he submerged differences for political advantage.

To Clinton advocates still unsure about Obama, the younger man has yet to demonstrate the capacity, in his own "day-to-day politics," to put his brand of Third Wayism into action. Clinton's Sister Souljah moment may have been the premeditated political move of a Slick Willie -- Obama suggests as much in his book -- but Obama doesn't have anything similar to brandish as a badge of New Democratic difference.

It's hard to name a prominent moment when, like Clinton pushing welfare reform, he deviated from party orthodoxy. Sorry, senator, but voting for class action lawsuit reform doesn't cut it. Obama's book features an erudite discussion of the folly, and futility, of resisting globalization -- at which point he summarily announces that he voted against the Central American Free Trade Agreement nonetheless. His signature divergence from the other leading candidates in the Democratic field comes from the left: He opposed the Iraq war from the start.

Obama is like Bill Clinton in his natural ease with people and his ability to win them over. A New York Times story about Obama's law school days described how Obama "cast himself as an eager listener, sometimes giving warring classmates the impression that he agreed with all of them at once." As they debated whether to use the term "black" or "African-American," "students on each side of the debate thought he was endorsing their side," the story said. " 'Everyone was nodding, Oh, he agrees with me,' " said professor Charles Ogletree.

Sounds like everyone who's ever emerged from a meeting with Bill Clinton.

DOJ_NMG_0124833

If Obama is the Clintonian figure in the race, Hillary Clinton may be Al Gore, more disciplined policy wonk than natural politician. Like Gore, Hillary Clinton can be more adroit intellectually than politically; both face the challenge, fair or not, of convincing voters of their "authenticity."

It's hard to know whether the tempered Clinton or the untested Obama will prove the stronger candidate -- or would be the better president. But with both of them in the race, the 2008 campaign presents a twist on the 1992 offer: two Clintons for the price of one.

Biden Set To Kick Off Presidential Bid (WP/AP)

By Beth Fouhy

The Washington Post, January 31, 2007

NEW YORK -- Democratic Sen. Joe Biden has been saying for months he's running for president. He makes it official on Wednesday. The Delaware senator will file the paperwork with the Federal Election Commission and release a videotaped campaign message to voters on his Web site, joebiden.com. He also is planning another trip to New Hampshire early next week.

"After nine months of doing this, there is no exploratory committee _ I'm running," Biden told The Associated Press.

A 34-year Senate veteran known for his foreign policy expertise and somewhat windy oratory, Biden acknowledged his campaign would generate little of the buzz surrounding the celebrity candidates New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama.

Even he was moved by his colleagues' trailblazing candidacies, Biden said.

"There's good reason to be excited," he said. "You have the first woman running who is qualified, and a very attractive African-American who has demonstrated crossover appeal. I got involved in politics 40 years ago during the civil rights movement, so yes, it's an exciting thing."

That means Biden, 64, is gambling that in a dangerous world, voters will choose experience over excitement _ particularly regarding the Iraq war.

Biden voted in 2002 to authorize military intervention in Iraq but has since become a vocal critic of the conflict. In his view, resolving the situation in Iraq is by far the gravest concern to most Americans.

"The average voter out there understands that the next president is going to have to be prepared to immediately step in without hesitation and end our involvement in Iraq," Biden said. "It's very difficult to figure out how to move on to broader foreign policy concerns without fixing Iraq first."

Biden will transfer $3 million from his Senate account to his presidential campaign, and said he believed he needed to raise $20 million total to be competitive in next year's early primaries. Analysts believe Clinton and Obama are likely to raise $100 million each this year.

"People ask if I can compete with the money of Hillary and Barack," Biden said. "I hope at the end of the day, they can compete with my ideas and my experience."

Biden was a candidate for the 1988 Democratic presidential nomination, but withdrew from the race in 1987 amid accusations that he had plagiarized passages in his speeches.

Biden Plans To Formally Launch Campaign For Presidency (KCS)

By Thomas Fitzgerald

The Kansas City Star, January 31, 2007

PHILADELPHIA - He's telegraphed it for months in early primary states and on Sunday talk shows, but Delaware Sen. Joseph Biden Wednesday formally launches his campaign for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination.

Stressing his credentials as one of the party's leading voices on foreign policy, Biden, 64, vowed to "make us safe in the world" as president.

Biden is attempting a comeback 20 years after his first presidential candidacy flamed out amid accusations he plagiarized parts of his speeches and cheated in law school.

"I got back up off my back," Biden said in an interview. "I hope I established in the minds of the American public and the press that I went on to be . . . at least a significant senator dealing with the major problems America faces."

DOJ_NMG_0124834

Biden, a senator for 34 years, joins a primary field dominated by New York Sen. Hillary Clinton and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, who are drawing outsized media attention as the potential first female and black presidents, respectively.

Republicans who are running for president include: Sen. John McCain of Arizona, former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney; former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee; and Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback. Former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani is considering a run.

Biden planned to file papers establishing a campaign committee Wednesday and to launch a website, wwww.JoeBiden.com, with a video statement, rather than a traditional rollout in Iowa or New Hampshire or the Senate Caucus room. As the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Biden is working on a non-binding resolution opposing President Bush's plan to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq.

"I'm worried that, God forbid, we may be in the same position, only worse off 18 months from now," Biden said. He blamed Bush's "recalcitrance" and unwillingness to listen to advice from across the political spectrum.

Biden was one of the first to suggest that Iraq should be partitioned into three states along ethnic and sectarian lines in order to reduce violence there.

Though he is a harsh critic of the war now, Biden voted to authorize the use of force in Iraq in 2002, and, along with several other Democratic contenders who did the same, is likely to face questions from the party's influential anti-war left.

Biden said that the use-of-force resolution was designed to tighten the screws on the late dictator Saddam Hussein, and that Bush misused it.

"I didn't have any idea of the degree of incompetence that existed in the administration," said Biden, who was first elected in 1972. "I assumed that these guys were grown-ups. They turned out to be . . . arrogant, immature, and wrong. It actually took my breath away."

Biden, who was elected to his sixth term in 2002, has about $3 million in his Senate campaign account that will be transferred to his presidential committee. Biden has said he needs to raise about $20 million before the early primaries of 2008.

He will need it to keep up with Clinton, who already had more than $14 million at the end of November and Obama, who raised at least $7.5 million in 2006.

Biden also faces the better-known former North Carolina senator John Edwards as well as former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack and New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson.

"We all have different hurdles to overcome: Mine is to demonstrate that I can raise enough money to be competitive and to demonstrate that I can overcome these large figures that are looming out there," Biden said. "Theirs is to demonstrate they have the capacity to be president."

He said he would match up well with the latest stars in the Democratic firmament "once sort of the bloom is off the rose" and all the candidates face tough questioning in Iowa and New Hampshire.

"This is not going to be an election that lends itself to celebrity nor lends itself to wedge issues," Biden said, arguing that voters are serious and looking for assurances of physical and economic security from their next president.

In Sept. 1987, Biden pulled the plug on his first presidential campaign. In addition to using passages from former British Labor leader Neil Kinnock and Robert F. Kennedy without attribution in some speeches, Biden exaggerated his academic record and, in a bizarre incident, berated a voter he thought had questioned his intelligence. (Biden later was cleared of unethical conduct by the Delaware bar.)

He said that lessons he learned had made him a better person and candidate.

"The first (lesson) is that words matter, that you can't say things lightly," Biden said. "And the other thing is that for one to lose his temper is not a good thing . . . I learned to take a punch. I learned what it's like to literally have the thing you value most in the whole world just absolutely decimated and climb back. I think I am tougher, I think I am more seasoned and I think I am more capable of dealing, you know, with tough circumstances."

Biden To Make It Official On Comedy Central (DNJ)

By Cris Barrish

The News Journal (DE), January 31, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0124835

Sen. Joe Biden plans to announce his second run for president today with an online message. Then, at 11 p.m., he'll appear on Comedy Central's "The Daily Show with Jon Stewart." (Buy photo) The News Journal/JENNIFER CORBETT

When U.S. Sen Joe Biden launched his first bid for president in the 1988 campaign, he did so the old-fashioned way: with a flag-waving rally surrounded by hundreds of supporters at the Wilmington Train Station.

Today, when the Delaware Democrat announces his second run for the Oval Office, the process will be, well, different.

No rally.

The candidate will barely even be in his home state.

But in true cyberage style, today should provide Biden with plenty of national exposure, including the debut of his campaign Web site and an appearance on, of all networks, Comedy Central.

Biden's rollout – even his segment on "The Daily Show with Jon Stewart" tonight – is par for the 21st century course, said Stu Rothenberg, editor and publisher of a biweekly political newsletter that bears his name.

"The dramatic change was Bill Clinton, taking a saxophone on late-night TV" on the Arsenio Hall Show in 1992, Rothenberg said. "It's a matter now of reaching people with a variety of media, a variety of forums. It's understanding that different people watch different things. You are sending the message that if you can act funny and hip, people will think you are funny and hip. Candidates want to show the breadth of their personality."

Senate duties

Biden will start the day in more formal style, presiding over a 9:15 a.m. meeting in Washington of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. He and other senators will deal with one of the gravest issues facing America: options for securing war-torn Iraq.

The panel's guests will be former U.S. Secretaries of State Henry Kissinger and Madeleine Albright. Questioning by Biden and his colleagues could draw coverage on C-SPAN, CNN and other news networks, Biden spokeswoman Margaret Aitken said, noting that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's appearance this month was aired extensively.

Late in the morning, perhaps during the hearing, lawyers for Biden's presidential campaign will file formal papers registering him as a candidate with the Federal Election Commission.

Also, the Internet hub of the campaign – www.JoeBiden.com – will go live today, and include a video and information on issues. In the afternoon – the time is not set – Biden will discuss his candidacy in a teleconference with reporters.

Delaware voters, who have elected Biden to six Senate terms dating to 1972, seemed indifferent Tuesday to the fact that their senior senator wasn't holding an in-state event today, though Carol Johnson, 68, of Lewes said "that's kind of fresh."

Opinions differed on his candidacy, which even Biden admits is a long shot with Democratic foes likely to include Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, 2004 vice presidential candidate John Edwards, and upstart Illinois Sen. Barack Obama.

Johnson would vote for Biden. "He's highly respected and I think he has a good record and experience," she said.

'Tired of the stodginess'

On its Web site, "The Daily Show" bills itself as a comedic look at the news for people "tired of the stodginess of the evening newscasts." Stewart and his irreverent team, the site boasts, present "a nightly half-hour series unburdened by objectivity, journalistic integrity or even accuracy."

Biden, who has been on the show three times, said the producers have "been after me to come on, and it's a forum that's available, and by the way, a lot of people listen to The Daily Show."

Today's 11 p.m. Biden segment will draw about 1.6 million viewers, show publicist Steve Albani said. With four repeats Thursday, the appearance could be seen by up to 3 million.

In recent presidential campaigns, candidate appearances on nontraditional news shows, such as MTV, have become commonplace. Edwards unveiled his 2004 candidacy on the Stewart show.

Biden knows, however, that while he can be looser on a comedy show than on "Meet the Press" or other news talk shows, he still must watch his words. "It's a dangerous show because he's funny and smart," Biden said.

Albani said the show provides newsmakers with a chance to reach a younger demographic.

"Of course they realize they are on a fake news show," Albani said. "But the median age of the Sunday news shows is in the 50s, the Jon Stewart show is in the 30s."

DOJ_NMG_0124836

Biden, 64, said that voters shouldn't view his "Daily Show" gig on his filing day as a sign he's taking his candidacy lightly. He's running, he said, because he believes the Bush administration has damaged the nation and its credibility throughout the world.

"I don't want to live in the White House," he said, "but I do want to make the decisions."

Loretta Martin of Dover said Biden's ties to Delaware aren't that important on the national stage. "What he does in Washington is a lot more important than where he's from or the name recognition thing," Martin said. "He's got as good a shot as anyone else."

Janie Anderson, 48, disagreed.

"I wouldn't vote for him. I just really don't care for him," she said. "I just don't think he's trustworthy."

Over the next several months, Biden will give voters in Delaware and elsewhere dozens of opportunities to evaluate his worthiness. He plans a myriad of formal announcements on foreign and domestic issues, including rallies with supporters in several states.

Probably even one in Delaware.

The Pelosi Primary: Who Will Be Her Presidential Pick? (POL)

By Josephine Hearn

The Politico, January 31, 2007

Democratic presidential hopefuls will have to win over thousands of voters in primaries next year, but in one critical contest, they face an influential electorate of one: House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif.

The so-called Pelosi primary on Capitol Hill is largely occurring out of public view, though some second-tier presidential prospects, among them Sen. Chris Dodd, D-Conn., are openly saying that they hope to win the speaker's favor.

But the competition for Pelosi's backing, whether an official endorsement or a friendly nod, could matter most in what for now is the center ring contest between Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton, N.Y., and Barack Obama, Ill. Both earned chits by campaigning and fund raising aggressively last fall for House Democrats. And both are currying support from the liberal party activists for whom Pelosi is now an icon.

Pelosi is far from choosing a favorite and may never make an official endorsement, insiders said. But her good will could smooth a candidate's way with state and local party officials, open wallets and help deliver the support of key interest groups.

Many political power brokers will look to Pelosi and her loyalists for guidance in the presidential race, even if she never makes her choice publicly known.

For now, she's not talking. Asked her thoughts on the field of candidates, Pelosi was circumspect.

"I think they're all great," she said last week. "I think we have a very rich field … If I had anything to say to them, it's: 'Make sure at the end of day we know that one of you will be the nominee of the party, so we don't want to do anything in the primary that will hurt our prospects.'"

Several factors can guide whom Pelosi supports, House insiders said. She likely will look favorably on candidates who aided House Democrats in the 2006 elections and in turn helped her become speaker. She may look for candidates who share her liberal ideology and long-standing opposition to the Iraq War. Or she may opt for a candidate with whom she shares a long personal friendship.

In 2003, she backed a longtime House colleague Rep. Dick Gephardt, D-Mo., her predecessor as minority leader, in his presidential bid. The two reportedly had a working relationship, but not a close friendship.

From a fund-raising standpoint, Clinton and Obama distinguished themselves with their support of House Democrats during last fall's elections, political aides said. Clinton contributed $250,000 to the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee last October, matching the largest check written to the political committee that cycle and solidifying her reputation as the fund-raising front-runner.

Obama anted up $10,000 from his Hopefund political action committee to the congressional campaign committee just days before last year's general election.

DOJ_NMG_0124837

Both candidates also helped out by appearing at campaign events, writing fund-raising appeals and leaning on interest groups. Clinton can also take credit for her husband's work, since former President Clinton was more of an asset to House Democratic candidates than any of the presidential contenders, aides said.

"For us, he was a resource that was unmatched," said a top Democratic aide. "He was hyper-involved day to day. He constantly pushed himself to the point of exhaustion."

But some question whether Pelosi would ever support Sen. Clinton given their deep differences over the Iraq War. Clinton voted for it in 2002; Pelosi voted against. And the two often find themselves at odds on other issues, with Clinton favoring centrist positions over Pelosi's liberal ones. Obama has hewed closer to Pelosi in opposing the Iraq War.

Two of the Democratic presidential candidates, Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., D-Del., and long shot Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich, D-Ohio, told The Politico they did not expect Pelosi's support. "I don't think so, but I don't know," Biden said.

Former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack also appeared an unlikely pick; he and Pelosi reportedly have a frosty relationship stemming from ideological differences. Vilsack's campaign did not respond to a request for comment.

Dodd joined Clinton and Obama in contributing to the congressional campaign committee during the last election cycle. He made a $15,000 donation out of his leadership political action committee, Citizens for Hope Responsibility Independence and Service (ChrisPAC), in mid-October.

Although less active on the campaign trail for House Democrats than Clinton and Obama, Dodd enjoys a decades-long personal friendship with Pelosi. They met more than 40 years ago through Dodd's sister, Martha Buonanno, a close friend of Pelosi's when the two attended Trinity University in Washington, D.C.

Pelosi and Buonanno's friendship has continued since then, and Pelosi made sure her college pal had a seat in the House gallery when she was sworn in as speaker earlier this month. Pelosi reportedly stops in on Buonanno when she passes through New England. The two even competed together several years ago in a bocce ball tournament in East Hartford, Conn., organized by Rep. John B. Larson, D-Conn.

That connection is not lost on Dodd, who is considering asking Pelosi for her backing. He was one of the few presidential candidates who called Pelosi shortly after the November election to congratulate her.

"Obviously I've given a lot of thought to it. I haven't told her that yet! I'll be calling her to discuss things," Dodd said. "Nancy's a great friend. She doesn't forget her friends."

Join The Conversation

You need to be a registered user of Politico.com to "join the conversation". If you are not a member yet, what are you waiting for? Register Now!

by JayPe on 01.31.2007 at 12:26 AM

Pelosi picked the wrong horse in the Majority Leader race, so hopefully she's learned not to back anyone too publicly...

by Bette Jeanne on 01.30.2007 at 07:36 PM

Mrs. Pelosi did not get where she is by backing someone who cannot possibly win more than 10% of the early primary votes, if that. Dodd is not going to get her backing, period.

by vwcat on 01.30.2007 at 07:35 PM

I hope Pelosi picks the one she is most in agreement with and that is Obama. Clinton is more republican lite and she would do little to further our party or cause. she is more about triangulating and cozying up to republicans and follows the DLC line. Obama is the future and a real democrat.

Before you start composing please note that you will need to be a registered user of Politico.com to "join the conversation". If you are not a member yet, what are you waiting for? Register Now!

Md. Pushes Expansive Medical Coverage (WP)

By Lisa Rein

The Washington Post, January 31, 2007

Maryland lawmakers are drawing up ambitious proposals to provide medical insurance to hundreds of thousands of residents without coverage, stepping into the national debate over who should pay the soaring costs of health care.

DOJ_NMG_0124838

Gov. Martin O'Malley (D) will call for expanded coverage of the state's 780,000 uninsured -- one in seven residents -- in his State of the State address today, aides said, highlighting a proposal that would bring more of the poorest residents into public programs and require private insurers to allow young adults to remain on their parents' plans until age 25.

General Assembly leaders are offering more ambitious plans that would add a $1 tax on cigarettes to pay for covering tens of thousands of low-income workers and offer subsidies to small businesses that provide coverage. Many workers who can afford insurance but choose not to pay for it would have to buy it or face penalties.

"Maryland holds out much promise," said Ron Pollack, executive director of Families USA, an advocacy group pushing for affordable, universal health care. The state "may well jump to near the head of the line."

Maryland would join Massachusetts, California, Vermont and a handful of other states that are mapping a path toward universal coverage in the absence of action by Congress or the Bush administration. Instead of the dramatic national overhaul contemplated more than a decade ago, the states are working within the health system, tapping businesses, hospitals, insurers and workers to pay for expanded health care.

The medical repercussions of a lack of health insurance are prodding many states to act.

"Generally, the uninsured get about half the care that the insured get," said Arthur Garson Jr., dean of the University of Virginia's medical school, who has been an outspoken participant in the state and national discussions. And the ultimate consequence? "The uninsured have a 20 percent higher mortality rate than the insured."

Massachusetts is putting in place a plan that would cover 515,000 people. Maryland's approach is more limited: The most ambitious proposal -- a bill to be filed this week by Del. Peter A. Hammen (D-Baltimore), the health committee chairman -- would affect about a third of the state's uninsured but leave a half-million people without coverage.

O'Malley and lawmakers say they are balancing the political will to expand health coverage with the looming state budget shortfall they will tackle next year.

"The administration is interested in working with Delegate Hammen to make health care more accessible in Maryland," Joseph C. Bryce, O'Malley's senior policy and legislative adviser, said yesterday. "But we have some concerns about how some provisions in the bill would be funded."

The governor opposes a tobacco tax increase, and even if lawmakers approve it, there is some sentiment to use the revenue to cover other needs. And despite the momentum in the Democrat-controlled legislature, initiatives of this magnitude often take more than a single session to sell.

Hammen, with strong backing from House Speaker Michael E. Busch (D-Anne Arundel), is crafting a plan that would dramatically expand Medicaid coverage to many low-wage workers who now are eligible only if their income is 40 percent of the federal poverty level, which is set at $10,210 for an individual or $20,650 for a family of four.

"We can provide better care," Hammen said. "Health care is becoming more unaffordable in every community."

The state would subsidize small businesses to encourage them to provide coverage for their employees. And workers earning more than four or possibly five times the poverty level would have to buy insurance if their employer does not offer it. If they don't, they would face a penalty, possibly the loss of a personal income tax exemption.

Even so, the plan would leave about 500,000 people in the middle without easy access to health care. None of the proposals would cover illegal immigrants.

Insurance companies would be asked to offer a bigger menu of policies at affordable premiums. Under O'Malley's plan, small businesses would set up accounts for their workers to use tax-free dollars to buy coverage.

Hammen said he is still working out cost estimates, but his bill would rely on some federal money, a cigarette tax increase and, eventually, a reshuffling of Maryland's practice of reimbursing hospitals for the free care they now provide to the uninsured. The $700 million fund for uncompensated care would shrink as more residents have insurance, he said.

"Cost is an issue," he said, "but we have the potential of using money that's already in the system."

A $1-a-pack increase in the tobacco tax also is the centerpiece of an effort by the Maryland Citizens' Health Initiative to expand health care access through Medicaid and drug treatment. Although other states have approved tobacco tax increases to pay for health care, Senate President Thomas V. Mike Miller Jr. (D-Calvert) has expressed concern that if the tax acts as a deterrent to smoking, the revenue source could plummet.

DOJ_NMG_0124839

About 14 percent of Maryland residents have no insurance, far lower than California's rate of 20 percent.

In the District, where about 13 percent of residents are uninsured, leaders last year agreed to subsidize coverage for children whose families have incomes up to three times the federal poverty level, including those who are undocumented.

"It's ridiculous to talk about two sets of kids," said D.C. Council member David Catania (I-At large), who estimates that the move could add several thousand children.

The District also is seeking federal permission to make more lower-income residents eligible for a subsidy that essentially provides free prescriptions.

In Virginia, 15 percent of the population has no coverage, including one in five adults. Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) has proposed providing prenatal care to more low-income women. A state health reform commission is studying greater access to care.

Maryland lawmakers acknowledge they're taking on a complex, costly effort. "We haven't touched a fiftieth of the pieces here," said Sen. Thomas M. Middleton (D-Charles) , chairman of the Senate Finance Committee.

Staff writer Susan Levine contributed to this report.

Spiritual State Of Union Found Strong (WT)

By Jennifer Harper

The Washington Times, January 31, 2007

In God we (still) trust.

Almost two-thirds of Americans -- churchgoing or not -- say the overall health of the nation is heavily dependent on its spiritual health. About 77 percent say the nation's economy is dependent on its spiritual well-being, while 64 percent say religious expressions are either tolerated or encouraged in their workplaces, according to a Gallup Poll released yesterday.

The findings are part of a greater study plumbing the "spiritual state of the union," said Ted Malloch, director of the Florida-based Spiritual Enterprise Institute.

The poll "measures the extent to which Americans believe in God, act out their belief and impact secular America in real terms: in the workplace, in volunteerism, in business dealings," he said.

Believers are many: 82 percent of the respondents believe in God, while 13 percent believe in a "universal spirit or higher power." Three-quarters say they are Christian, 6 percent are labeled non-Christian and 18 percent have no religious tradition. A majority -- 58 percent -- say success in life is "pretty much determined" by religious and spiritual forces.

Of the respondents, 43 percent were Democrats, 41 percent were Republicans and 13 percent were independents. Ideologically speaking, 58 percent said they leaned conservative, while 32 percent said they were liberal.

The survey also revealed a slow shift in public attitude. Gallup figures in 1999 found 54 percent of Americans called themselves "religious," and 30 percent "spiritual but not religious." Those numbers are now 49 percent and 40 percent, respectively.

Meanwhile, "the 'Protestant work ethic' is alive and well," the survey stated. It found that 78 percent of the respondents would go on working even if they had enough money to quit, while 85 percent agreed that "being ethical will pay off economically." Three-quarters would not bend rules at work, while 97 percent said friends and family respected their line of work. Ninety-two percent said they believe "God wants us to do something with our lives that will be useful to the world."

Such thinking may have its own rewards: 83 percent said their work "is helping make the world a better place." When a 1992 Gallup Poll posed the same question, the percentage was 68 percent.

Spiritual inclinations are either sustained or increasing, the poll found. Eighty-eight percent of the respondents say they are "happy with who I am," up four percentage points from the 1992 survey. Seventy-nine percent said there are clear guidelines to good and evil that apply to everyone, about the same as the previous survey. Almost two-thirds -- 65 percent -- say they are "spiritually committed." The figure was previously 68 percent.

The nation is in a somber mood, the poll noted, with only 29 percent satisfied with the direction of the country, according to separate Gallup findings. But "Americans are fighting back," the current survey stated, noting that seven of 10 regularly volunteer and contribute to charity.

DOJ_NMG_0124840

The poll of 1,004 adults was conducted during February and March last year with an error margin of three percentage points.

A Health-Care Bargain (WSJ)

By David Gratzer

The Wall Street Journal, January 31, 2007

Three years ago this month, insurance companies began offering Americans a new type of medical coverage: health savings accounts, which marry low-cost, high-deductible health insurance policies with pre-tax accounts to pay for day-to-day health care. But the anniversary is muted. A slew of reports have been critical, dismissing consumer-driven health care as unpopular and harmful; and with the Democrats in control of Congress, Washington's enthusiasm for the concept has cooled. Nevertheless, the Republicans should take credit where due. The White House ought to build on the growing success of HSAs, which are integral to the president's vision of "affordable and available" health care.

An executive of an upstart airline recently described her company as having three 757s, more than 200 employees, and one big headache: rising health-care costs. Thus, they made the switch to HSAs in 2006, and premiums rose just 5%, compared with a national average of over 8%. Such successes aren't making the news, but overwhelmingly negative stories are. A much reported Commonwealth Fund survey, for example, concluded that enrollment in consumer-driven plans is stagnant, people are grossly dissatisfied, and care is delayed. But the report was flawed on its face: For one, it was unrepresentative, drawn from a pool of "Internet users who have agreed to participate in research surveys."

Here's the untold story: Despite recent entry into the market, these plans are gaining popularity. Drawing on information from major insurance carriers, William Boyles, publisher of the Consumer Driven Market Report, estimates that enrollment in HSA-type plans or HRAs (a forerunner to health savings accounts) more than doubled since January 2006, to 13.4 million Americans. The estimate is plausible, as last year twice as many employers offered this coverage than in 2005, and the number of financial institutions supporting HSAs tripled.

Early data suggest good results. Following a year-long analysis of consumer-driven health-care members, Cigna reports that costs are 16% lower than for enrollees in traditional plans, but the use of medications for chronic conditions increased. Enrollees in Aetna's consumer-directed HealthFund maintain their health (even if chronically ill), and purchase more preventative services, yet medical costs rose just 3% in HRA-based plans between 2002 and 2005. A Kaiser Family Foundation survey finds 71% of those with the new "consumer-directed health plans" consider cost when seeking health care, compared with 49% of those with more traditional employer-sponsored coverage.

Granted, not everyone is satisfied. Half of the Kaiser respondents, for example, want to switch to a traditional plan. Reservations aren't surprising -- HSAs can seem initially complicated. EOS, the upstart airline, held townhall meetings and offered health coaches to smooth the transition.

Looking back on GOP-era Capitol Hill, welfare reform stands out as the greatest achievement; health savings accounts may eventually be considered a close second. If HSAs can help tame health inflation, the timing couldn't be more critical. According to HHS projections, without significant changes, national health spending will double to about $4 trillion by 2014.

Democrats have their own agenda. The House has already voted to change Medicare's prescription drug benefit so that the federal government can "negotiate" prices. They also want to expand Schip, the Clinton administration's state health program for children. As the minority party, the GOP may be tempted to go on the defensive, opposing Democratic ideas (as they did with HillaryCare) or aiming to temper them (their strategy for Schip). But instead, Republicans should espouse a positive agenda, regardless of whether all its elements can be passed, including the improvement and expansion of HSAs.

One improvement is to loosen the mandated structure of the HSA. Employers have no flexibility, for instance, to decide what the deductible covers, thus lumping diabetic supplies and Viagra into one cost category. Another improvement would allow individuals to make larger annual deposits into HSAs, as President Bush has championed. So too would be, in line with the State of the Union health-care proposals, a leveling of the tax playing field, allowing individuals to purchase HSAs with the same tax preference as employers. While many Democrats loathe HSAs, it is still possible that HSAs can be improved and expanded if tactical opportunities arise. Remember, Ronald Reagan got his tax cut, even though many Democrats loathed that, too.

DOJ_NMG_0124841

Republicans could also urge more state experimentation. Members from both parties -- Sens. Jeff Bingaman and George Voinovich, along with Reps. Tammy Baldwin, Tom Price and John Tierney -- recently proposed legislation to create a super-commission, charged with receiving reform ideas from states and then making grants to enable them. The White House has a bargaining chip here: Without action, Schip will expire, and it might be possible to meet the Democrats half way. They could extend Schip in states that are interested, while other states would have greater freedom to experiment with market reforms such as expanded HSAs.

And that could help make the fourth anniversary of HSAs even more significant.

Mr. Gratzer, a physician and a senior fellow at the Manhattan Institute, is the author of "The Cure: How Capitalism Can Save American Health Care" (Encounter, 2006).

Bush Unveils Security Aid For Palestinians (AFP)

AFP, January 31, 2007

US President George W. Bush has directed about 86.4 million dollars in aid to help Palestinian security forces under President Mahmoud Abbas's direct control, the White House said.

"The idea is to build the legitimate security forces, to help provide law and order in Gaza and the West Bank, fight terror, and to facilitate movement and access especially in Gaza," said national security spokesman Gordon Johndroe.

The money will go "to support efforts to reform Palestinian civil security forces under the direct command of the Office of the President," said the spokesman.

"Our funds will be utilized exclusively for non-lethal supplies and training," he said. "This has obvious security and economic benefits for the Palestinians."

Johndroe spoke after the White House released a memorandum from Bush to US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice directing her to transfer 86.362 million dollars in aid to the Palestinians.

"We are utilizing West Bank and Gaza Economic Support Funds left over from projects suspended earlier this year. This assistance will not impact our ongoing humanitarian, democracy, and private sector programs," said Johndroe.

The spokesman said that aid was "consistent" with US obligations under the so-called diplomatic "roadmap" to peace between Israel and the Palestinians, and that Lieutenant General Keith Dayton, the US security coordinator for Israel and the Palestinians, would oversee implementation of the programs.

Fighting Eases On First Day Of A Cease-Fire By Gaza Factions (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, January 31, 2007

JERUSALEM, Jan. 30 — After five days of clashes in the Gaza Strip, Palestinian factions on Tuesday mostly observed the latest cease-fire, though one Hamas member was shot dead.

Also, the Israeli Air Force bombed a tunnel near the eastern edge of the Gaza Strip, saying that Palestinian militants were digging it to enter Israel and carry out an attack. The tunnel was near the Karni crossing, which is used to move goods between Israel and Gaza.

The two main Palestinian factions, Hamas and Fatah, held late night talks on Monday and agreed on a truce that took effect at 3 a.m. Tuesday. While Gaza was mostly calm during the day, several previous cease-fires have broken down and there were doubts about this one as well.

In one incident, a local Hamas leader was shot dead in the southern Gaza town of Khan Yunis. The shooting appeared to be a revenge attack by a family aligned with Fatah, which recently had a relative killed in the fighting, according to Palestinian residents of the town.

More than 30 Palestinians have been killed in gun battles since Thursday, and about 60 have died over the past two months.

Egypt, which has often mediated between the Palestinian factions in recent years, helped broker the latest truce.

While Gazans welcomed the reopening of shops and the semblance of normalcy that prevailed on the streets on Tuesday, many said the truce would remain vulnerable unless Hamas and Fatah could agree to work together in the government.

DOJ_NMG_0124842

A good deal of the fighting has involved members of the Palestinian security forces. Many members are loyal to Fatah, which long dominated Palestinian politics, but Hamas created a security service, known as the Executive Force, after it came to power a year ago.

Months of negotiations have failed to produce a deal between Hamas, the radical Islamic group that controls much of the government, and Fatah, led by the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas.

Mr. Abbas, speaking in Cairo after a meeting with the Egyptian president, Hosni Mubarak, said Hamas's Executive Force was "illegitimate and illegal."

Mr. Abbas also condemned a suicide bombing on Monday by a Palestinian in the southern Israeli resort town of Eilat, which killed three workers at a bakery.

The Palestinian leader said the bombing was "not in the interest of the Palestinian people." Al Aksa Martyrs Brigades, which is linked to Fatah, had claimed responsibility for the bombing with Islamic Jihad.

Israel has given no indication that it plans a major military response to the suicide bombing, the first such attack in Israel in nine months.

"The initiative will be ours, and we have no intention of relaying what we plan to do," Amir Peretz, the defense minister, said during a visit to Eilat.

However, Israeli newspapers, citing political and military officials, said no large-scale operations were planned.

In a separate development, Israel's deputy prime minister, Shimon Peres, met in Qatar with the emir, Sheik Hamad bin Khalifa al-Thani. That was the highest-level meeting in years between officials of the countries.

The emir urged Israel to hold talks with the Palestinian government, according to the Web site of the Israeli newspaper Haaretz, which had a reporter traveling with Mr. Peres. Israel, which classifies Hamas as a terrorist group, refuses to deal with the organization, and Hamas does not recognize Israel.

Israel and Qatar do not have diplomatic relations, though there is an Israeli trade mission in the Qatari capital, Doha. Mr. Peres visited Qatar when he was prime minister in 1996.

Gaza's Warring Factions Holding Fire (AP)

By Sarah El Deeb

AP, January 31, 2007

Gaza's warring factions began to hold their fire Tuesday as a truce took effect across the volatile territory and brought hopes for an end to the infighting that has left 36 people dead in five days.

But the killing of a Hamas militant by rival Palestinians — combined with an Israeli airstrike on a smuggling tunnel following a suicide bombing — underscored the fragility of any lull in Gaza's bloodshed.

Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas called for a total halt to the violence.

"The past few days were difficult, and everyone paid in blood," he said in Gaza. "Everyone is facing a difficult test, either we maintain this calm ... or everything collapses again, and then everyone will be held responsible."

Previous truces between Hamas and Fatah militants in Gaza have quickly collapsed into new fighting, and it appeared unlikely the two sides would comply with all the terms of the current agreement, such as handing over all those involved in killings and abductions.

Late Tuesday, the two sides began releasing hostages — fighters kidnapped over the past week — both sides said.

Hamas and Fatah gunmen have used prior lulls to prepare for more fighting.

On Tuesday morning, the streets of Gaza were calm, as radio stations loyal to Fatah and Hamas groups played national songs instead of factional music and stopped inciting their supporters against their rivals.

Hopes for an enduring truce fell in the afternoon after a Hamas gunman was killed in the southern Gaza town of Khan Younis. Hamas officials blamed the shooting on Fatah militants, and Hamas supporters took to the airwaves, saying those behind the campaign against their group must be targeted.

However, Hamas officials said they would not retaliate.

Both Fatah and Hamas say bringing suspects to trial is crucial to maintaining the truce.

DOJ_NMG_0124843

"If the killers remain in the streets, the cycle of bloodshed will not stop," said Maher Mekdad, a Fatah spokesman. "Families of victims will take the law in their own hands, and revenge will rule," he said.

The truce agreement did nothing to resolve the underlying power struggle between Hamas and Fatah that has fueled the fighting. The two sides have been at odds since Hamas defeated Fatah in legislative elections a year ago, dividing power in the Palestinian government.

President Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah, elected separately two years ago, has urged Hamas, which faces international isolation because of its anti-Israel ideology, to join Fatah in a more moderate coalition. He hopes a softer platform will help end a crippling international aid boycott imposed after Hamas' victory and allow him to resume peace talks with Israel.

Coalition talks have broken down and appear unlikely to resume soon, though both Saudi Arabia and Egypt have offered to mediate.

Even if the truce holds, it does not necessarily mean peace for Gaza after a Palestinian suicide bomber from Gaza killed three people in the Israeli resort city of Eilat on Monday.

Early Tuesday, the Israeli army bombed a tunnel it said was meant for use by Gaza militants for another attack. No casualties were reported. In the past, militants dug such tunnels to attack Israeli army outposts and other targets.

"We will protect the citizens of Israel, and we will protect the tourism centers of Israel," Defense Minister Amir Peretz said Tuesday as he visited the scene of the bombing.

After meeting Tuesday with top military officials, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert decided to continue to observe a two-month-old cease-fire with the Palestinians, Israeli media reported.

Israeli Arab Official Favors Pragmatism (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, January 31, 2007

JERUSALEM -- Raleb Majadele says his success as the first Arab Muslim to serve in Israel's Cabinet will be judged one student and one classroom at a time.

Although many of his Arab political colleagues rail against symbols that equate the state with Judaism, such as the Star of David flag, Mr. Majadele is more concerned with practical matters, such as improving educational standards for Israeli Arab children.

"You need to be strong enough and influential to say, 'Excuse me, we are missing 2,000 classrooms.' Until now, no one has ever sat there and saw to it that that would be his test," the 53-year-old political trailblazer said yesterday.

Initially tapped for the Science Ministry post recently vacated by a lawmaker from his Labor Party, Mr. Majadele will serve as minister without portfolio while Prime Minister Ehud Olmert decides on a redivision of the vacant ministerial posts.

But Mr. Majadele made clear yesterday that education will be a top priority for him.

"That doesn't mean that I can solve all the problems in the next budget. But if we can build in the next year 500 classrooms, something that we haven't done in five years, it's progress," he said.

It's an attitude that reflects the Arab lawmaker's preference for pragmatism over ideology, accommodation over confrontation and integration over separation in approaching Israel's Jewish establishment.

As Mr. Majadele plied the noisy corridors of the Israeli parliament yesterday, there was ample handshakes and expressions of good will. "Mabruk," congratulated one security guard in Arabic. "Mister Minister," greeted Effie Eitam, a far-right lawmaker and Jewish settler. "I wish you good luck."

Since the appointment of an Arab to Israel's Supreme Court some years ago, Mr. Majadele's entrance into the Cabinet is the most dramatic example of integration for a minority community that sees itself as marginalized and segregated.

But it comes at a time when Jewish-Arab relations are polarized over the Palestinian uprising and a plan by Cabinet member Avigdor Lieberman to force some Israeli Arabs out of Israel, leaving many in that community questioning whether any Arab should serve in the government.

DOJ_NMG_0124844

"The question is: Does this really represent a turning point in the question of inclusion or exclusion," said Elie Rekhess, a scholar at Tel Aviv University and director of the Konrad Adenauer Program for Jewish-Arab Cooperation. "This is definitely not the dream that the more national segment of Arab politics in Israel had in mind."

Mr. Majadele said he considers himself first an Arab, then a citizen of Israel, then a Palestinian and lastly a Muslim. But three Arab parties in parliament voted against his confirmation on Monday.

"Majadele enters the government as a representative of the Labor Party and not of the Arab public," said Jamal Zahalka, a lawmaker from the National Democratic Assembly party.

"He's entering a government that doesn't want peace, carries out crimes against the Palestinian people, opened a war in Lebanon. It's a government that discriminates against Arab citizens in Israel.

"No less important, it's a government that includes" Mr. Lieberman, who would redraw the border with the West Bank to swap Israeli Arabs for Jewish settlers.

Mr. Majadele said that he does not think Mr. Lieberman belongs in the Cabinet, but that he won't feel awkward sitting on the same table as the hard-liner. "Nothing prevents me from feeling good," Mr. Majadele said.

Some liberal Jews hope that Mr. Majadele will both symbolize and take steps toward reconciliation. "You mustn't fail," said Akiva Eldar, a political commentator for the left-wing Ha'aretz newspaper at the end of an interview.

Despite his advocacy of integration and his membership in the Labor Party, Mr. Majadele said he is not a Zionist and won't sing the national anthem, Hatikvah, which romanticizes the Jewish longing for national liberation in the "Land of Zion."

"It doesn't speak to me. You want me to sing the national anthem? Show some respect, and bring one that speaks to me, and universal values -- something I, as an Arab, can live with," he said.

Muslim Nations Move To Prevent Violence (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, January 31, 2007

Terrified that sectarian Muslim bloodshed could soon engulf the region, U.S. allies and adversaries in the Middle East have stepped up joint efforts to head off a religious civil war.

Sunni Muslim Saudi Arabia and Shi'ite Iran have held intensive talks in recent days on ways to tamp down sectarian violence in Iraq and Lebanon. Over the weekend, Saudi King Abdullah issued an unusual public call for calm.

Top Islamic clerics and scholars in Egypt, Qatar and Iraq also have issued statements urging Muslim unity, often blaming the United States and other outside actors of trying to divide the faithful.

"All scholars are condemning the ongoing sectarian war between Sunnis and Shi'ites as a threat to the unity of Iraq and drawing the attention of Muslims away from the real enemy of the [Islamic world]," Aisha al-Mannai, an Islamic law scholar at Qatar University, said last week at the conclusion of an emergency conference in Doha on the growing tensions among various strains of Islam.

According to the Doha conference communique: "Any exchange of insults against the companions of the prophet Muhammad or his relatives should be treated as an un-Islamic act."

The swirl of activity reflects the deep regional fears that Middle East crises, from Iraq to Lebanon to the Palestinian territories, could pit the faith's two largest branches against each other.

In Iraq yesterday, authorities told the Associated Press that at least 58 Shi'ite worshippers were killed in three separate attacks on one of the holiest days in the Shi'ite Muslim calendar. Five Sunnis in Baghdad were killed in an apparent retaliatory mortar barrage later in the day, just the latest in a vicious cycle in nearly two years of sectarian reprisal attacks.

Al Qaeda and other radical Sunni movements have targeted Shi'ites and their holy sites in Iraq as a way to foment sectarian civil war, a strategy that even President Bush has conceded has been successful.

Sunni Muslim rulers such as Saudi King Abdullah and Jordan's King Abdullah II have voiced fears of an aggressive Shi'ite revival, bankrolled and armed by Iran's Islamic republic. They cite the rise of Iraq's new Shi'ite-dominated government, the Shi'ite Hezbollah movement in Lebanon, and Iranian backing for Palestinian militant factions in the conflict with Israel.

DOJ_NMG_0124845

Skeptical of U.S. strategy and resolve in Iraq, Saudi officials have met in Riyadh with Iranian national security chief Ali Larijani and with a delegation from Hezbollah in recent days. Arab-language newspapers close to the Saudi regime said the separate visits focused on containing the crisis in Lebanon and tamping down Sunni-Shi'ite tensions in general.

Saudi Foreign Minister Saud al-Faisal said Iranian leaders had appealed to Riyadh to "cooperate in averting strife between Sunnis and Shi'ites in Iraq and Lebanon."

Mohammed Mehdi Akef, the spiritual leader of the militant Sunni Muslim Brotherhood, late last week issued a statement condemning Sunni-Shi'ite divisions, implicitly blaming U.S. policy in Iraq and the region to fanning the tensions.

"The schemes of the foreign occupier are responsible for the discord," he said.

But the Doha conference also was marred by sharp exchanges between Sunni and Shi'ite clerics, with both sides blaming the other for the violence in Iraq. Sunni scholars also accuse Iran and its Shi'ite allies of a concerted effort to convert Sunnis to their form of Islam.

In a rare interview with a Kuwaiti newspaper over the weekend largely overlooked in the West, Saudi King Abdullah had a double-edged message for Iran.

The king told the Al-Seyassah newspaper that Saudi Arabia "does not support any party that is an enemy of Iran," but also cautioned Tehran against underestimating the danger of antagonizing the United States in Iraq and elsewhere.

"We advised Iran on how you go about cooperating internationally, and to avoid exposing the Gulf region to dangers," the king said of his meeting with Iran's Mr. Larijani.

The king also said he was aware of popular fears in the Sunni world about rising Shi'ite power.

"The majority of Sunni Muslims will never change their faith," he said.

Saudi Arabia FM Says Iran Cooperating (AP)

By Abdullah Shihri

AP, January 31, 2007

U.S. ally Saudi Arabia said Tuesday it was working with Iran, America's top rival in the Mideast, to find ways to ease the crises in Lebanon and Iraq — a departure from Washington's confrontational stance toward Tehran.

The mediation is an unusual step by two rivals that have been competing for influence in the region. Saudi Arabia, which is mainly Sunni Muslim, has been increasingly vocal about its suspicions of mainly Shiite Iran's intentions.

The kingdom's willingness to cooperate with Iran in mediating the conflicts likely points to the alarm that that the bloodshed in Iraq and the possibility of civil war in Lebanon has raised among the Saudi leadership.

But it could complicate Washington's efforts to isolate Tehran. President Bush has stepped up accusations that Iran is fueling turmoil in the Mideast and has vowed to break what he called Iranian support for militants in Lebanon and Iraq. Bush has soundly rejected calls to reach out to Iran for help in the crises.

Saudi Foreign Minister Saud al-Faisal said Tuesday that Iran had approached his country to "cooperate in averting strife between Sunnis and Shiites in Iraq and Lebanon."

"Saudi Arabia wants only peace in the region," al-Faisal said. "Contacts are ongoing between Riyadh and Tehran."

A Saudi envoy is in Iran studying all the efforts being exerted to calm the situation in Iraq and Lebanon and "exploring what Iran can contribute," he said.

The Shiite Muslim Hezbollah — which Iran is believed to support with money and weapons — has been waging a campaign of street protests for the past two months in an attempt to bring down the Western-backed government of Lebanese Prime Minister Fuad Saniora. Last week, the protests erupted into clashes between supporters of the two sides that raised fears in Lebanon and across the Middle East that the country could explode into a sectarian civil war between its Shiites and Sunnis.

Saudi Arabia has close ties to Sunni politicians in the government's ruling coalition and has strongly backed Saniora.

Hezbollah has demanded the formation of a new national unity government that would give it and its allies more than a third of the Cabinet seats, enabling them to veto major decisions. Weeks of talks between the government and opposition have stalemated.

DOJ_NMG_0124846

In Iraq, Iran is believed to back Shiite militias that have been blamed in killings of Sunni Arabs and it has close ties to Shiite parties that dominate the government. Saudi Arabia has strong tribal links to Iraq's Sunni Arab minority.

The contacts come as Saudi Arabia has given tepid support to a new U.S. strategy in Iraq but has expressed skepticism over whether it will succeed. Besides sending 21,000 additional U.S. troops to Iraq, the new strategy takes a tougher stance on Iran.

Hizbollah Blames Bush For Unrest (FT)

By Ferry Biedermann

Financial Times, January 31, 2007

Lebanon's Hizbollah movement used the Shia Muslim Ashura commemoration on Tuesday to accuse the US and Israel of being responsible for the unrest in the country.

Seven people died in political and sectarian clashes in the country last week.

"The one who fomented chaos in Lebanon, who destroyed Lebanon, who killed women and children, old and young in Lebanon, is George Bush," Sayyed Hassan Nasrallah, Hizbollah leader, told a rally in the southern suburbs of Beirut.

He accused the US of ordering Israel to wage war against his movement last summer as part of what he called the American campaign against "resistance groups" in the Middle East.

The war started in July when Hizbollah captured two Israeli soldiers and killed three. The speech followed remarks by the US president on Monday in which he deplored last week's violence and accused Hizbollah, Iran and Syria of trying to destabilise Lebanon.

Hizbollah and its political allies have been demonstrating for the past two months to bring down the pro-western government of Fouad Siniora, prime minister, and gain more of a say in a new cabinet.

Lebanon's schools and universities were set to reopen on Wednesday having been closed since Thursday, when fighting between rival student groups led to widespread clashes.

Violence last Thursday took place mainly between the supporters of the Shia Hizbollah and Amal movements and Sunni and Druze backers of the government. Rival christian groups had clashed earlier in the week.

In the southern town of Nabatiyeh, in the Shia heartland, thousands of young men on Tuesday carried out the Ashura ritual of cutting themselves and allowing the blood to flow freely. One of them said that the Shia harboured no ill will against the Sunni but that the Sunni were less tolerant of them.

One young woman watching the procession of bleeding young men said that the ritual showed the "Shia capacity for sacrificing for a cause".

In Legacy Of A Revered Martyr, Saudi Shiites Find Sustenance (WP)

By Faiza Saleh Ambah

The Washington Post, January 31, 2007

QATIF, Saudi Arabia, Jan. 30 -- Fawzia al-Hani dropped her black veil over her face and wept softly on Sunday, enveloping herself in the sadness of the last days of Imam Hussein, grandson of the prophet Muhammad and Shiite Islam's most tragic and revered martyr.

The women in the packed community center commemorating Ashura, the anniversary of Hussein's death in A.D. 680, watched on a projection screen as a turbaned cleric described how Hussein set out with a small band of family and followers to confront a large army, then was filled with anguish when his favorite son was slaughtered before he himself was killed.

Beside the cleric, men huddled on the floor with their heads bowed, dabbing at their eyes with tissues.

To many of the region's historically persecuted Shiites, the death of Hussein in what is now Karbala, Iraq, the event that triggered the schism between Sunnis and Shiites, remains central to their lives. Shiite belief that Hussein and his descendants were robbed of their rightful succession as rulers of the Islamic world heightens their sense of persecution and victimization.

The story of Hussein, who chose to confront an enemy army with only a small band of men rather than bow to an oppressive leader, permeates Shiite life from childhood, Hani said.

DOJ_NMG_0124847

"You cannot understand Shiites if you don't understand the lessons of Hussein's death," the 44-year-old author added. "Hussein taught us not to fear death because you can achieve victory even through death, as long as you fight injustice and stay true to your principles."

That lesson has not been lost on Saudi Arabia's long-suppressed Shiite minority, a 2 million-strong community living mainly in the oil-rich Eastern Province. Shiites here have only recently been granted greater religious freedoms, including the right to commemorate Ashura publicly. But fears in the Arab world of growing Shiite clout have raised concern among local Shiites that sectarian tensions could roll back some of the progress.

Shiite Iran's increased regional influence, Iraq's newly dominant Shiite majority and the push for more power by Lebanon's Shiites have led to a closing of Sunni ranks in many countries of the region and calls for quashing a Shiite revival.

Shiites, who make up less than 15 percent of the kingdom's 16 million citizens, are considered heretics by the Wahhabi Sunni ideology practiced in the kingdom.

Emboldened by Iran's 1979 revolution, Saudi Shiites began staging demonstrations during Ashura demanding more rights and freedoms. This led to a brutal government crackdown that resulted in scores of deaths, hundreds of arrests and tense relations in the 1980s.

The situation improved after Shiite exiles returned in 1994 following a truce with the government. And several years ago, reform-minded King Abdullah launched a policy of openness, allowing the community to build mosques and once-illegal community centers called husseiniyas. Shiites have also been granted a small measure of political power with wins in local municipal elections in 2004. But many complain that they still face severe discrimination in government positions, in the military and in schools.

Now, after a lull, Wahhabi clerics have again started issuing fatwas, or religious edicts, labeling Shiites infidels who are more dangerous to the faith than Christians and Jews. Abdullah ibn Jebreen, a prominent Saudi cleric, wrote on his Web site last week that Shiites should be expelled from Sunni lands.

The monarch has been brought into the fray. In a widely circulated interview last week, Abdullah was asked about claims in the Arab media that Iran is attempting mass conversions of Sunnis to Shiism. Without mentioning Iran by name, he told the Kuwaiti daily al-Seyassah that the kingdom was aware of the issue but that Sunnis were immune to conversion and would retain their historical dominance.

Shiites here say Iraq's sectarian violence in particular has inflamed local anti-Shiite feelings. Lawyer and activist Sadeq al-Jubran accused extremist Sunnis of importing the problems of Iraq into the kingdom unnecessarily.

"What's happening in Iraq is not my problem. If Sunnis and Shiites kill each other off, that's in Iraq," Jubran said. "But what's worrisome is that you have people here asking clerics whether it's permissible to kill Shiites because Shiites in Iraq are killing Sunnis."

Hassan al-Saffar, the country's most prominent Shiite cleric, said anti-Shiite fatwas are dangerous and should be criminalized. The community's sympathies with Shiites in Iran or Iraq should not be taken against it, the soft-spoken cleric said. "We are Saudi citizens concerned first of all with local issues. Our religious sympathies do not affect the security and stability of the country," he said.

Despite the common religious ties of the region's Shiites, Saudi Shiites have different interests and live in a different context, said Shiite writer and former dissident Taufiq al-Seif. "Shiites here have reached a level of political maturity and have realized that though they sympathize with co-religionists in the region, they have their own concerns and their own very unique situation. Our interests lie not with Iran but very much with other Saudis."

Speaking at a recent Ashura gathering, Seif urged his listeners to distinguish between religion and politics and not to be swayed by ideology. "We should not sympathize with Shiites just because they're Shiites, even when they are wrong," he told the dozens gathered.

Shiite cleric Nimr al-Nimr, who was detained last year for calling for greater religious freedoms, said Shiites have learned from the example of Hussein to refuse injustice imposed by tyrannical leaders.

DOJ_NMG_0124848

"You can't separate Shiite Islam from politics," Nimr said. "It's in the nature of Shiites to fight oppression, and it's in the nature of governments to be oppressive, so naturally there is a confrontation." Nimr said that he did not condone violence or confrontation but that he had learned from the lesson of Hussein not to fear death and to fight for his rights.

Outside, Qatif, a predominantly Shiite enclave that is home to about 900,000 people, was an area in mourning. Black cloth covered entire sides of small apartment buildings, while young boys and girls ran around with red and green mourning bands tied around their heads with the words "O Hussein, O Martyr" sewn on them.

In the Awami neighborhood in the town of Tarut, huge portraits of Hussein, some with blood running down his forehead, lined an empty sandlot in preparation for a reenactment of the events in Karbala surrounding his death. Black and white tents were pitched next to red papier-mache rocks, and plastic sheets were laid out to look like the Euphrates River in Iraq.

On Sunday, after the call to afternoon prayers, Muhammad Zaki Khabbaz took off his jacket and joined several hundred young men for a funeral procession. They snaked their way through narrow, garbage-strewn alleys dotted with green and red banners, beating their chests rhythmically as a poem about the events in Karbala was recited through a bullhorn. The group passed under a covered alleyway with a large cloth banner that read, "Every day is Ashura, and Every Place is Karbala."

"Imam Hussein died rather than bow down to the oppressor," said Khabbaz, a 27-year-old computer company manager. "And by commemorating Ashura, we are confirming our allegiance to never giving up and to upholding those principles.

"When we beat our chests, we are saying that we will never forget Imam Hussein's tragedy," he said. "Every day there is oppression is Ashura, and every place there is oppression is Karbala. And every day, we will fight that oppression."

Talks To Resume On North Korea And Weapons (NYT)

By Joseph Kahn

The New York Times, January 31, 2007

BEIJING, Jan. 30 — China announced Tuesday that talks over North Korea's nuclear weapons would resume in Beijing next week, the latest in a long series of negotiations that have failed to curb its nuclear program.

Discussions are set to resume Feb. 8 though the United States and North Korea have not settled a dispute over freezing North Korean assets at a bank in Macau, a Chinese territory.

United States Treasury officials and their North Korean counterparts met Tuesday in Beijing to discuss American measures that have led to the freezing of $24 million in North Korean assets held at the bank, Banco Delta Asia. No breakthrough appeared imminent, but the talks were set to continue Wednesday.

The dispute overshadowed the last round of nuclear negotiations, which ended in a stalemate in December. Whether North Korea would bargain on its nuclear program while its money remained frozen was unclear.

The United States contends that the matter is separate from the nuclear issue and that the deposits are linked to North Korean counterfeiting and money laundering.

North Korea exploded a nuclear device in October, adding a sense of urgency to six-nation talks that have dragged on for more than three years without tangible progress.

Many American and Chinese analysts say they doubt North Korea will give up its nuclear arms voluntarily after spending decades working to buy and develop the technology.

But the analysts also say that the Bush administration and the North Korean leader, Kim Jong-il, may have more to gain by continuing the talks than abandoning them, at least partly because China, the key intermediary, insists that the talks are the only way to proceed.

The United States and China agreed to impose limited United Nations military sanctions on North Korea after its nuclear test. But China has opposed tougher penalties on North Korea, its former ally.

Christopher R. Hill, an assistant secretary of state and the chief American envoy at the talks, says the North Koreans have signaled their commitment to a 2005 accord on dismantling their arms program. He met his North Korean counterpart, Kim Kye-gwan, in Berlin this month, and both sides said they had set the stage for a productive round.

N. Korea May Accept Deal In Nuclear Talks (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

DOJ_NMG_0124849

The Washington Post, January 31, 2007

North Korea appears increasingly willing to bargain over the terms of ending its nuclear programs, prompting cautious optimism that some sort of agreement may be reached when the six-nation disarmament talks reconvene next week in Beijing, U.S. and Asian officials close to the talks said.

With just two years left in President Bush's term, State Department officials appear to have been given new freedom to explore different outcomes and proposals with their North Korean counterparts, most recently during unusual bilateral talks held in Berlin. North Korean officials have responded in kind, for the first time moving beyond quibbles about the wording in communiques and actually talking specifically about what they might do to end their nuclear programs, the officials said.

Officials cautioned that intensive bargaining will be necessary for any deal in a process that has generally yielded little but disappointment, most recently during a round of talks in December. In September 2005, North Korea agreed to a joint communique in which it said it would abandon its nuclear programs in exchange for economic and security incentives. But then it boycotted the talks for 13 months in anger over a Treasury Department action against a Macau bank allegedly acting as a conduit for North Korean counterfeiting.

North Korea tested a nuclear weapon in October, which put it at odds with longtime ally China. But other nations at the talks -- such as Russia -- recently put pressure on the United States to end the financial crackdown against Banco Delta Asia. The talks also include China, South Korea and Japan.

Sources close to the talks who spoke on the condition of anonymity said the United States, backed by China, is seeking some sort of disablement of the North Korean nuclear facility at Yongbyon, but Pyongyang has thus far proposed only to allow the return of inspectors from the International Atomic Energy Agency. North Korea in the past four years has obtained from spent fuel rods at the facility enough plutonium for an estimated 10 nuclear weapons, and it might consider freezing the facility. But that would be problematic for the Bush administration because that would result in a deal similar to the one obtained by then-President Bill Clinton -- which Bush has said was a bad bargain.

Any agreement is likely to include some sort of resolution of the Banco Delta Asia issue. Pyongyang officials have demanded that $24 million in frozen North Korean accounts be returned, but U.S. officials have indicated a willingness to discuss only the return of some funds that have no clear connection to illicit activity.

Assistant Secretary of State Christopher R. Hill, the chief U.S. negotiator, declined yesterday to discuss specifics or to predict success. "We go there thinking our team has worked as hard as we can, and we have a basis for calling a meeting and a basis for moving forward," he said.

Michael J. Green, the top White House official for Asia policy until a year ago, said the administration will have to balance its interest in winning an agreement against the possibility that North Korea will agree only to a partial solution -- and will ultimately keep its nuclear weapons -- to relieve the pressure from U.N. sanctions. "The devil is in the details," he said.

Green, a Japan expert, added that there is increasing nervousness among Japanese officials that the Bush administration is getting soft on North Korea because of the turmoil in Iraq.

That nervousness extends to U.S. officials deeply skeptical of North Korea. "Any deal that they would agree to now is no good," said John R. Bolton, until recently U.S. ambassador to the United Nations and the top arms-control official during Bush's first term. "It is inconceivable that they will agree to the intrusive inspections regime that we need to have any confidence they would live up to the terms of the deal."

N. Korea Nuclear Talks To Resume (WT)

By Andrew Salmon

The Washington Times, January 31, 2007

SEOUL -- Chinese officials announced yesterday that six-party nuclear talks will resume on Feb. 8, raising hopes that North Korean objections over the freezing of a Macau bank account would be resolved by then.

U.S. Treasury Department officials held talks with North Korean delegates in Beijing on that issue yesterday, and published Asian reports said the Americans were prepared to see some funds released from the Chinese bank.

DOJ_NMG_0124850

Chinese Foreign Ministry spokeswoman Jiang Yu said the new round of six-party talks -- involving the United States, China, Russia, Japan and the two Koreas -- should focus on implementing a September 2005 joint statement on the denuclearization of the entire Korean Peninsula.

Negotiations have been stalled almost since the statement was issued because of Pyongyang's unhappiness with U.S.-backed financial moves, particularly the freezing of a North Korean government account at Banco Delta Asia, or BDA, in Macau.

The Treasury Department charges that the account in Macau, a Chinese autonomous territory, was being used to launder the proceeds of financial crimes, including the counterfeiting of U.S. currency.

Daniel Glaser, the Treasury Department's deputy assistant secretary for terrorist financing and financial crimes, led the American side in the talks, which were to continue today. The North Korean team was led by O Kwang-chol, president of the North's Foreign Trade Bank.

The talks create "the opportunity to discuss the concerns of the international financial community about illicit conduct in the international financial system," Mr. Glaser told reporters.

"I know that there's a lot of focus on Banco Delta Asia, and we'll certainly be talking about the illicit conduct of that bank. We'll also be talking about counterfeiting and other related issues."

A news agency report from Beijing said the U.S. officials had confronted the North Koreans with documentary proof of illicit dealings at BDA.

The Treasury Department warned American and international financial institutions in September 2005 not to have dealings with BDA, because of suspicions of illicit activities on behalf of the North Korean government. Following the warning, international financial companies curtailed trade with BDA, for fear of being blacklisted by the U.S. government.

The Macau government took over the bank and froze an estimated $24 million in North Korean assets.

The North subsequently has made the lifting of what it calls U.S. sanctions against the bank a condition for progress in the six-party nuclear talks. With Washington refusing to link the two issues, the North boycotted the nuclear talks for over a year.

There was little progress when the six-party talks finally resumed in Beijing last month, with the U.S. and North Korean financial teams meeting on the sidelines. But both sides were upbeat after three days of closed-door bilateral meetings in Berlin earlier this month.

While Washington insists the Berlin meetings were held in the context of the six-party talks, it was the first time the countries had met without other countries' delegates in proximity since the process began.

Japanese and South Korean news media, citing unnamed sources, have since reported that the United States might permit the unfreezing of some $13 million held by North Korea in BDA. And yesterday, South Korea's Joongang Ilbo newspaper, without naming sources, said President Bush had ordered the Treasury Department to cooperate with the State Department on the North Korean issue.

Specialists say at least some of the North Korean funds held in BDA are from legitimate business dealings.

In an interview with The Washington Times last summer, Nigel Cowie, head of Daedong Credit Bank, the North's only foreign-run bank, said that some of his bank's funds were also locked up in BDA.

He confirmed the difficulties North Korea was facing, as international financial institutions were reluctant to deal with its banks after the Treasury's September 2005 warning. This situation had forced North Korea to rely on couriers to carry international currencies in and out of the country, he said.

Frozen Funds In Macau Could Thaw N. Korea Impasse (USAT)

By Paul Wiseman

USA Today, January 31, 2007

HONG KONG — By the standards of international finance, the amount is trifling: $24 million — less than a lot of CEOs take home in a year.

But that sum — North Korean money stuck in the sleepy Chinese territory of Macau — could hold the key to ending a 4½-year nuclear standoff with North Korea.

DOJ_NMG_0124851

The money was frozen 16 months ago when U.S. Treasury Undersecretary Stuart Levey accused a small bank in Macau, Banco Delta Asia, of being "a willing pawn" in North Korea's "corrupt financial activities."

North Korea wants its money back, and the money has become a bargaining chip as the United States leads the diplomatic effort to get North Korea's isolated Stalinist regime to give up its nuclear weapons program.

International talks aimed at dismantling North Korea's nuclear program are to resume Feb. 8 after breaking off in December.

Tuesday, a U.S. delegation led by Deputy Assistant Treasury Secretary Daniel Glaser met at the U.S. Embassy in Beijing with North Korean officials to discuss the $24 million and related allegations: that the communist state is a financial rogue engaged in counterfeiting and money laundering.

If the money talks go well, North Korea might be willing to make concessions on its nuclear program, says Park Young Ho, senior research fellow at the Korea Institute for National Unification in Seoul.

Treasury officials won't comment on widespread speculation in Japanese and South Korean media that the United States is ready to OK the release of perhaps $13 million of the $24 million to give a boost to next week's nuclear talks, which will involve South Korea, China, Japan and Russia, in addition to the United States and North Korea.

The Bush administration alleges that North Korea raises hard currency through criminal activities — peddling pirated cigarettes and Viagra, trafficking in heroin and methamphetamine and printing counterfeit U.S. dollars. At least $45 million in North Korean "supernotes" — near-perfect duplicates of U.S. $100 bills — have been found in circulation, the Congressional Research Service (CRS) reported last year. North Korea earns $15 million to $25 million a year from counterfeiting, CRS has estimated.

Some of those bogus North Korean bills have made their way to Macau, 40 miles west of Hong Kong. Banco Delta Asia, which has $320 million in assets and eight branches (including one in a casino) was North Korea's banker in Macau.

In 1994, a teller at the bank caught two executives from Zokwang Trading, a North Korean front company, trying to deposit $250,000 in counterfeit bills; the men carried diplomatic passports.

Despite the incident, Banco Delta Asia continued to do business with Zokwang for more than a decade — a sign of the bank's tolerance for illicit North Korean business, the U.S. Treasury says. The Treasury chided the government of Macau, a former Portuguese colony that is a specially administered region of China, for lax money-laundering regulations.

The Treasury hasn't imposed any sanctions on Banco Delta Asia. The regulatory case against the bank has been pending since September 2005.

Still, when the bank appeared on the Treasury's blacklist, other banks stopped doing business with it. Customers withdrew $133 million — more than a third of the bank's deposits — within a week. Macau's government froze the $24 million in North Korean accounts, replaced the bank's senior management and suspended chairman Stanley Au, a well-known entrepreneur and former Macau legislator who continues to own the bank. The new management team ended the bank's business relations with North Korea.

The bank also hired U.S. lawyers and lobbyists, who have tried unsuccessfully to get the Treasury to drop its case. The United States hasn't offered detailed evidence against Banco Delta Asia, noting that it has relied on classified sources. Glaser says Treasury officials have studied 300,000 pages of bank documents. "We are quite confident of what we said in September 2005," he says. "Now that we've had a chance to look behind the veil a bit, we know we made the right decision."

In Macau, the bank is widely seen as a pawn in the U.S. diplomatic campaign against North Korea. "There's a general perception that the Americans are using this as a weapon, a way to pressure Pyongyang," says Paulo Azevedo, executive director of Macau Business magazine. "Everybody knew for 10 years about the strong connections between North Korea and Macau. (North Korean airline) Air Koryo was flying through Macau. The flights were full of luxury goods going to Pyongyang. Everybody knew — and the Americans didn't? What a coincidence" that the issue emerged in the middle of the nuclear standoff.

Levey, Treasury undersecretary for terrorism and financial intelligence, says, "This is not about punishing North Korea. This is about protecting the international financial system."

Whatever the U.S. motivation, the North Koreans reacted with fury, pulling out of the six-party nuclear talks in November 2005. Park at the Korean unification institute says the North Koreans see the allegations of money laundering and counterfeiting as a slap at their leader and a suggestion that dictator Kim Jong Il is an international gangster. "Face-saving is very important to North Korea," he says.

DOJ_NMG_0124852

Macau, which has overtaken Las Vegas as the world's No. 1 gambling market, has passed a stronger anti-money-laundering act.

"We're really pleased with the progress Macau's made," Glaser says. "It's important they play by the rules."

Azevedo of Macau Business agrees that Macau needed to crack down on money laundering. "If the Americans are the only ones with the muscle to stop it, then OK," he says. "Better late than never."

Seoul Wants Written Accord From NKorea Nuclear Talks (AFP)

AFP, January 31, 2007

South Korea has said it wants a binding written agreement to emerge from next week's six-nation talks on dismantling North Korea's nuclear weapons programme.

Foreign Minister Song Min-Soon said the new round, which starts in Beijing on February 8, should produce a document that sets out firm steps toward a nuclear-free North Korea.

Song said the round will aim to reach agreement on implementing a landmark September 2005 pact, under which the reclusive communist state agreed to abandon its nuclear ambitions in return for security guarantees, economic aid and diplomatic recognition.

"An agreement does not come in words. Lots of words have been exchanged among parties. I expect them to turn into a joint document," he told a weekly news briefing.

The United States said Tuesday it was hopeful that "substantial progress" can be made when the talks, grouping the United States, the two Koreas, China, Russia and Japan, resume.

The 2005 deal went nowhere after North Korea in November that year walked away from the forum in protest at US sanctions on Banco Delta Asia (BDA), a Macau-based bank accused of money-laundering for the regime in Pyongyang.

After conducting its first nuclear test on October 9 last year the North returned to the six-party talks in December. But it made it clear it would not discuss nuclear issues unless there was progress on the banking row.

US and North Korean officials began a second round of discussions on the banking curbs on Tuesday in Beijing.

"The BDA issue has so far had a negative impact on the six-party talks. I am looking forward to the settlement of the issue," Song said.

South Korea's Yonhap news agency said Sunday that North Korea would be told during the next round to dismantle its nuclear facilities within months.

The facilities subject to the shutdown include a five-megawatt reactor, a fuel reprocessing plant, a radiochemical lab and two reactors of 50 megawatts and 200 megawatts now under construction, it said.

'Radical Populism' On Negroponte's List (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, January 31, 2007

John D. Negroponte said yesterday that one of his priorities if confirmed as deputy secretary of state will be countering the rise of "radical populism" and anti-Americanism in Latin America championed by Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez.

Bush administration officials said that Mr. Negroponte, a former ambassador to Mexico and Honduras, is expected to re-energize Washington's policies in the Western Hemisphere, to which the administration has been accused of not paying enough attention.

"Latin America has been a mixed picture in the last couple of years," said Mr. Negroponte, who is still serving as the nation's first director of national intelligence, during his confirmation hearing before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee for his new post as Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's deputy.

"One of the trends we need to be concerned about is a kind of a frustration among some of the populations in Latin America that democracy is not necessarily delivering the kinds of results that people had hoped for, and that has in turn given rise to a certain amount of populism," he said. "That is most clearly symbolized by Mr. Hugo Chavez."

DOJ_NMG_0124853

Mr. Negroponte's remarks, as well as comments by other officials, suggest a more active approach to dealing with Mr. Chavez's influence in the region than the administration has had so far.

Thomas A. Shannon, assistant secretary of state for Western Hemisphere affairs, told The Washington Times last year that Washington had decided to "ignore" the Venezuelan leader.

"It would be a mistake for U.S. foreign policy in the region to overly concentrate on the guy," Mr. Shannon said. "If we allow ourselves to get trapped in the kind of confrontation that he wants to have with us, it lessens our influence with others in the region."

Last week, Mr. Shannon said he had spoken briefly with Mr. Chavez at the inauguration of Nicaraguan President Daniel Ortega earlier this month. Mr. Ortega joined the small but growing circle of Latin American leaders who are allies of Mr. Chavez -- Bolivia's Evo Morales, Ecuador's Rafael Correa and the ailing Fidel Castro in Cuba.

"President Chavez indicated a desire to improve relations and a belief that we could find areas where we could have a positive, constructive conversation," Mr. Shannon said at the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

U.S. Ambassador William Brownfield in Caracas "has held several conversations with the foreign minister and with others in the Foreign Ministry about what such an agenda would look like, and I think we are fairly close to a moment in which we might be able to sit down and talk," Mr. Shannon said.

Mr. Negroponte, a career diplomat since 1960, served as ambassador to the United Nations and Iraq before becoming the top U.S. intelligence official in 2005.

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat and Foreign Relations Committee chairman, promised a speedy vote on the nomination and predicted an overwhelmingly positive outcome.

Mr. Negroponte said that in addition to Iraq and Latin America, he will focus on Asia in his new position. His portfolio will be similar to that of his predecessor, Robert B. Zoellick, who resigned in July, although it is not clear if Mr. Negroponte will devote as much time to Sudan's Darfur region as Mr. Zoellick did.

Venezuela Poised To Hand ChÃ¡vez Wide-Ranging Powers (WP)

By Juan Forero

Washington Post, January 31, 2007

CARACAS, Venezuela -- The line forms every day after dawn at the Spanish Consulate, hundreds of people seeking papers permitting them to abandon Venezuela for new lives in Spain. They say they are filled with despair at President Hugo ChÃ¡vez's growing power, and they appear not to be alone. At other consulates in this capital, long lines form daily.

Two months after ChÃ¡vez was reelected to another six-year term by an overwhelming margin, Venezuela is experiencing a fundamental shift in its political and economic climate that could remake the country in a way perhaps not seen in Latin America since Fidel Castro took power in Cuba in 1959. On Wednesday, the National Assembly is expected to entrust him with tremendous powers that will allow him to dictate new laws for 18 months to transform the economy, redraw the structure of government and establish a new funding apparatus for Venezuela's huge oil wealth.

ChÃ¡vez's government announced earlier that it intends to nationalize strategic industries, such as telecommunications and electric utilities, and amend the constitution to end presidential term limits.

The new, more radicalized era is enthralling to the president's supporters. To them, ChÃ¡vez is keeping the promise he has consistently made over eight years in office -- to reorganize Venezuelan society, redistribute its wealth and position the country as an alternative to U.S. capitalist policies.

"This is a moment that could be key in the history of Latin America," said Joanna Cadenas, 36, a teacher in the state-run Bolivarian University. "I never thought you could love a president."

But the moves -- which opponents say are marked by intolerance and strident ideology -- are prompting some Venezuelans to leave the country and others to prepare for a fight in the last battlegrounds where the opposition has influence. A few are trying, against the tide, to remain apolitical in a country marked by extreme, even outlandish rhetoric.

DOJ_NMG_0124854

"What we're seeing happen here is not good," said JosÃ© Manuel RodrÃ-guez, 42, an accountant seeking travel documents at the Spanish Consulate. "What we see here is the coming of totalitarianism, fewer guarantees, fewer civil rights. I want to have everything ready to leave."

ChÃ¡vez's moves are worrying Bush administration officials, who have voiced concern over the ideological nature of nationalization plans that have targeted companies such as CANTV, the dominant provider of fixed-line telephone service, and the utility Electricidad de Caracas, both of which have stakeholders in the United States. U.S. officials have also expressed concern that the government will not renew the broadcast license of RCTV television, which Venezuelan officials charge supported a short-lived coup against ChÃ¡vez in 2002.

"We should all be concerned about the direction President ChÃ¡vez is taking his country," Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), chairman of the Senate Appropriations foreign operations subcommittee, said in a statement this week. "Any leader who tries to tighten his grip on power by destroying the institutions of democracy, curtailing press freedom and using his office to intimidate pro-democracy opponents is setting in motion a dangerous process with potentially ominous consequences."

Venezuelan government officials argue that the president's moves are the will of the people and that his latest electoral victory is a mandate for ChÃ¡vez to deepen what he calls his Bolivarian revolution.

"We cannot disqualify Hugo ChÃ¡vez as social leader who, with the support of big majorities, makes decisions," said Haiman El Troudi, a former chief of staff to ChÃ¡vez who now works at the International Miranda Center, which is funded by the government. "I don't see people moving forward against this. I see the same old opposition groups."

El Troudi, the author of a book about the kind of companies that should make up the 21st-century socialism that ChÃ¡vez extols, said the government will move quickly to transform the country into a mixed economy of state firms and private ones, "but with conditions." He said that politically and economically, Venezuela is steadfast against capitalism.

El Troudi also acknowledged that the government needs to better woo the 4 million Venezuelans who voted against ChÃ¡vez and now feel they have no political representation. "These 4 million people are not oligarchs, and they don't represent the ideas of the oligarchy," he said.

Still, ChÃ¡vez's own rhetoric, in daily speeches that can last hours, are filled with invective against opponents and the Americans, giving the former paratrooper the air of what prominent Mexican author Carlos Fuentes calls "a tropical Mussolini."

Even some of ChÃ¡vez's allies have raised eyebrows over some of his plans. The president has formed a coalition, the United Socialist Party, to unite the numerous parties in the National Assembly -- all of them pro-government. But the leaders of bigger, well-established parties such as the Communist Party and Podemos are balking, at least for now.

In a recent meeting for leaders of Podemos, one delegate, Pedro Peraza, said that although support was strong for folding into the president's party, Podemos needed to be cautious. "Things cannot be that way, that it's all about what the president says and that we just follow along," Peraza said. "That would be like communism."

Despite concern voiced by several Podemos members, the president of the party, Ismael GarcÃ-a, said that the dissolution of his party was only a matter of time. Asked if folding Podemos and other parties wouldn't give ChÃ¡vez too much power, GarcÃ-a cited the widespread support the president enjoys.

"We're not turning over anything to anybody," he said. "The president has won this through his prestige, his worth as a leader, his courage."

ChÃ¡vez's boundless energy, and broad ambitions, have hardly slowed plans that include putting a satellite into space, sending 100,000 poor Venezuelans on vacations to Cuba and purchasing 4,000 tons of Bolivian coca, once the drug crop is manufactured into flour and other products. Even in a country now long accustomed to ChÃ¡vez, the pace of the changes is hard to keep up with.

"We thought 2007 would be a time for change, a time for constitutional reform, but we never thought one month after the election we'd see a creation of a sole party, the shutdown of RCTV, the nationalization of CANTV and the electricity of Caracas, and the announcement of a new political map of Venezuela," said Julio Borges, an opposition leader.

Rigoberto Lanz, a prominent intellectual who is an adviser in the government's Science and Technology Ministry, said the size of ChÃ¡vez's ever-expanding government has done little to curb what he called the two most serious "enemies" of the ChÃ¡vez administration, corruption and bureaucratic inertia.

DOJ_NMG_0124855

And while Lanz and others are working to empower Venezuelans, he said, there is not a mechanism for people's wishes to be reflected in major policy moves, such as nationalizing companies. Among ChÃ¡vez's plans are communal councils, funded by oil revenue, that would give ordinary people decision-making powers. "We're still far from the big decisions being made by the people," Lanz said.

A recent survey done in Venezuela by Greenberg Quinlan Rosner, a Washington polling firm, showed that a strong majority of Venezuelans were against the plan to eliminate presidential term limits and the decision not to renew RCTV's license. Venezuelans also said it would be preferable if the opposition had more power. And a vast majority said ChÃ¡vez, known for his pugnacious attitude, should be more conciliatory toward the opposition.

"It suggests Chavistas are uncomfortable with some of this and, more importantly, it shows that ChÃ¡vez is misinterpreting his mandate," said Mark Feierstein, a political adviser with the polling firm who helped oversee the survey.

Perhaps surprisingly, some in the opposition see this moment as a time for optimism. Once badly fragmented and discredited, they believe they could find adherents as ChÃ¡vez tries to inject socialist dogma into schools, as he has promised to do, or replace municipal governments with community councils.

"Our job is to present alternatives, and then we need to organize and make people conscious," said Leopoldo LÃ³pez, the opposition mayor of Chacao, an affluent district of Caracas. "I'm not despondent. The lack of hope is the worst enemy we have."

Cuba TV Shows Castro Meeting With Chavez (AP)

By Anita Snow

AP, January 31, 2007

Cuban state television Tuesday showed a video of a healthier looking Fidel Castro meeting with Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez and saying his recovery was "far from a lost battle," in the first images of the ailing leader in three months.

Castro stood and appeared alert in the 10-minute video clip, which state TV said was shot during Chavez's previously unannounced visit to Havana on Monday.

The video seemed to be aimed at knocking down recent rumors about Castro's health, including a report that he was in grave condition.

Castro looked heavier than in previous images that showed him much more thin and frail. Dressed in a red, white and blue track suit, the 80-year-old was shown sitting and drinking juice.

"This also is far from being a lost battle," Castro said of his current health problems.

He noted that when severe intestinal problems struck last summer, he was still not fully recovered from an October 2004 fall that severely injured a knee and a shoulder. "One after the other," Castro said of his health troubles.

Later in the video, Chavez was even more optimistic, saying Castro had already won the battle to recover his health. The Venezuelan president's brother, Education Minister Adan Chavez, was also seen in the video visiting Castro.

Cubans watching the video being shown repeatedly on nightly television news as they sat in open cafes and restaurants said the images reassured them about Castro's health.

"He looks a lot better now," said 28-year-old law student Nicolas Fernandez. "He's well; strong of mind and body."

State Department spokeswoman Joanne Moore declined to comment on the video.

The broadcast came six months after Castro stunned the nation with a July 31 announcement that he had undergone intestinal surgery and was provisionally ceding power to his younger brother Raul. Since then, Raul Castro has led a collaborative leadership that has kept the government running calmly in his brother's absence.

The date that Tuesday's video was taken could not be immediately confirmed. In it, Chavez said the two-hour private meeting took place on Monday and ended at 3 p.m. on Jan 29. In Caracas, a presidential spokeswoman, speaking on customary condition of anonymity, confirmed that Chavez made a one-day visit to Havana on Monday.

On the video, Castro was also heard reading aloud a headline from a printout of an article dated Saturday from the Web version of Argentine newspaper Clarin.

Castro has not been seen in public since July 26 — five days before he stepped aside. He looked more thin and frail the last time video images were broadcast, on Oct. 28.

DOJ_NMG_0124856

Cuban officials told visiting U.S. lawmakers last month that Castro does not have cancer or a terminal illness and will eventually return to public life, although it was not clear whether he would return to the same kind of absolute control as before.

In the latest video, Chavez said he found his friend to be "of good humor, with a good face and in good spirits." He said the pair discussed a variety of issues, including the world's energy crisis, and that Castro showed "much clarity, as always in his ideas and analysis."

A report in the Spanish newspaper El Pais earlier this month said the Cuban leader was in "very grave" condition. The paper, citing two unnamed medical sources from Gregorio Maranon hospital in Madrid, had reported Castro was still recovering after three failed operations and complications from an intestinal ailment common in older people called diverticulitis.

The hospital employs surgeon Jose Luis Garcia Sabrido, who flew to Cuba in December to treat Castro. The article's authors later said Garcia Sabrido was not among their sources and he later dismissed much of the report as half-truths and rumors.

Incoming Rice Deputy Seeks US 'Engagement' With China (AFP)

AFP, January 31, 2007

Incoming number-two US diplomat John Negroponte has said Washington should adopt an engagement policy at all levels with China, which is countering traditional US influence in Asia.

Negroponte, currently the top US spy chief and set to become Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's deputy, also told a Senate hearing on his confirmation that it would not be wise for Washington to review its policy on Taiwan.

"I think we need to engage China on all levels and I think that ought to be our approach to that country, not one of confrontation but engagement," said the 67-year-old veteran foreign service officer whose career began in Asia.

Negroponte also said that he expected to resume a US-China strategic dialogue launched by the previous deputy secretary of state, Robert Zoellick, before his resignation in July last year.

Zoellick had challenged China to be "responsible stakeholder" in the global economy.

Indicating that he has a firm grasp of China's history, Zoellick said he had gone to Beijing as early as 1972 with former top US diplomat Henry Kissinger shortly after then President Richard Nixon's landmark visit to that country.

"I was involved in the first outreach to China back in the early 1970s," he said.

When asked at the hearing about his opinion on Taiwan President Chen Shui-bian's push for a new constitution, Negroponte cited Washington's adherence to a "one-China policy" and three US-China communiques issued after Nixon resumed contacts with China in 1972.

"We believe that it would be unwise to do anything that might be at cross purposes with those three," Negroponte said.

Pressed by Senator Lisa Murkowski, an Alaska Republican, if the proposed new Taiwanese constitution would violate the communiques, he said, "I would want to study the implications but it certainly strikes me that that would be a distinct possibility".

In the three communiques signed between 1972 and 1982, the United States recognized that Beijing considers there is only one China, including Taiwan, but did not explicitly adopt that view as its own.

Negroponte also said that he expected to spend much time trying to secure peace in Northeast Asia, which has been threatened by North Korea's nuclear brinkmanship.

On ties with Japan, the top Asian ally of the United States, he said he expected to devote "an important amount of time" to nurture that relationship.

He said, "Our relationship with Japan has always been a corner storne of our policy towards East Asia.

"I don't think we should take the relationship for granted, I think it needs to be nurtured and Japan remains one of our most important allies in the world."

Members, Manufacturers Push President On China Trade Policy (HILL)

By Ian Swanson

The Hill, January 31, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0124857

The Bush administration is under pressure from members of Congress and domestic manufacturers to change a long-standing practice of not imposing anti-subsidy duties on imports from countries with largely state-driven economies, such as China.

Some congressional sources and manufacturing representatives believe the move could counter rising congressional pressure for legislation tackling the trade deficit with China. The perception that the administration is not dealing effectively with the country could "build a head of steam for legislation," according to Frank Vargo, vice president for international economic affairs at the National Association of Manufacturers, which has lobbied the administration to change its policy.

A second manufacturing source said it would be helpful if the administration opened up a "new avenue" to provide relief for U.S. companies struggling with Chinese competition. If the administration decides that countervailing duties may be applied to counter subsidies China's government gives its exporters, U.S. companies could petition the government to impose duties on Chinese imports.

Senate Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus (D-Mont.) joined 22 other senators in a letter last week to Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez calling on the administration to make the change. "China's trade surplus with the United States continues to explode, fueled in large part by subsidies provided by the Chinese government to favored industries in China," the letter read. Thirty-two House members, including 20 Republicans, sent a similar letter to Gutierrez.

Manufacturing groups and companies pressing for the change include the National Association of Manufacturers, the National Council of Textile Organizations, Mittal Steel USA, United States Steel Corporation and the American Forest and Paper Association.

A handful of associations representing retailers and importers, however, has pressed Commerce to maintain its current policy, and broader groups such as the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the U.S.-China Business Council have not weighed in, possibly because their memberships include companies doing business in China. General Motors Corp. filed a submission that neither rejects nor supports changing the practice, but said Commerce practices should "not unduly handicap imports that are fairly traded or do not result in material injury to domestic producers."

A GM source said his company's concern is that if U.S. trade laws are applied in an arbitrary manner that is detrimental to Chinese trade, China could be in a position to retaliate against U.S. companies. GM's sales in China grew by 20 percent to 700,000 units in 2006, and GM expects the Chinese market to continue to grow rapidly.

Nonetheless, both of Michigan's senators joined Baucus in calling for the change in policy.

Baucus, Finance ranking member Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa) and Sens. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.) and Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) are expected to put together a China trade bill later this year, but have yet to meet on the issue this year, according to a committee aide. Finance expects to hold hearings on China's trade policy in March, which could kick off efforts to develop a bill.

"The trick is going to be to come up with ways that are productive and not counter-productive," said Brian Pomper, a former trade counsel to Baucus who is now a partner with Parven Pomper Schuyler. He said there would be an effort to move legislation dealing with China this year.

In September, Schumer and Graham agreed to back off demands that the Senate vote on legislation imposing tariffs on Chinese goods because of China's manipulation of its currency, which Schumer and Graham charge gives a trade advantage to Chinese exporters. They promised to work with Baucus and Grassley on broader trade legislation targeting China if China did not move forward on currency. One business source said the goalposts for legislation will be somewhere between Schumer and Graham on one side and Baucus and Grassley on the other.

Several business lobbyists noted that talks between administration and Chinese officials on currency may have had little impact, which has led some to conclude that talking with China will not lead to a solution. Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson will testify to Schumer and other members of the Senate Banking Committee today about Treasury's report on international exchange-rate policies and the U.S.-China Strategic Economic Dialogue, which met in China in December.

An aide to one Republican House member who signed the Jan. 19 letter to Gutierrez said an announcement that the Department of Commerce is changing its long-standing policy could be a turning point for China trade legislation. Commerce is set to make a decision on whether to change its policy by April 2.

DOJ_NMG_0124858

However, a Senate Democratic aide predicted there would be legislation no matter what the administration does, although he agreed continuing the current countervailing policy will add momentum. He noted that Commerce's decision to change its policy could be appealed by groups arguing that it is illegal for the U.S. to impose countervailing duties on non-market economies.

If that happens, legislation might still be necessary, the aide said. At a minimum, a business source said legislation would be helpful in the context of possible court cases.

CHURCH AND STATE As China's Bishops Die Off, Clash Looms With Vatican (WSJ)

By Andrew Batson In Yinchuan, China, And Stacy Meichtry In Vatican City

The Wall Street Journal, January 31, 2007

As Beijing and the Vatican escalate their battle for control of the Roman Catholic Church in China, people like Bishop Liu Jingshan are caught painfully in the middle.

The head of a diocese in the dusty plains of western China, the 93-year-old bishop is one of the church's last living links with a pre-Communist China, when Catholics could freely profess their allegiance to the pope. Bishop Liu also serves in the compromised present-day world of Catholicism in this country, in a government-approved church which the Vatican and many Catholics view as illegitimate.

For more than two decades, Bishop Liu and many other Chinese Catholics have discreetly divided their loyalties between two masters, gently nudging both toward a hoped-for rapprochement. But as Bishop Liu's generation ages, the bridge between Beijing and Rome is wearing thin, worsening tensions on both sides.

Each seat of authority claims the right to appoint Catholic bishops, and neither will talk to the other. So every time a Chinese bishop dies or retires, there is the potential for a conflict to erupt over his successor. The average age of a bishop in China is now 74, and at least 18 bishops are known to have died in the past two years.

More than two dozen of the 138 dioceses in China are now without their own bishops. Bishop Liu, already 18 years past the normal retirement age for a bishop, knows only too well his time to step down is coming.

"I know I am old. The priests who were my classmates are all gone," he says.

Last year, the Chinese Catholic Patriotic Association, the official body which oversees local Catholics, appointed three bishops who had not been approved by the pope. That reversed years of quiet progress toward accommodation, which had included signals that the Vatican was willing to switch diplomatic recognition to China from rival Taiwan.

Anger over the consecrations has prompted the Vatican to re-evaluate its effort to restore ties with Beijing. Pope Benedict XVI earlier this month summoned religious leaders from Hong Kong, Macau and Taiwan -- where the church is free of Chinese government influence -- for a two-day meeting with his top foreign policy advisers. Pope Benedict now plans to issue a letter addressed to the estimated 12 million Catholics living in China, according to a Vatican statement. In two statements last year, the Vatican warned that any bishops appointed without papal approval could be excommunicated.

The struggle over who will lead Chinese Catholics is frequently opaque, revealed only in the nuanced signals that are a hallmark of both the Vatican and the Chinese Communist party. Still, the stakes for the church are enormous. China represents an unparalleled opportunity to increase the Catholic faith at a moment when its traditional stronghold of Europe is weakening. The conflicts within the Chinese church have left it lagging behind energetic Protestant sects in preaching to the Chinese.

"It would be a great sorrow to me if, as China develops more and more into one of the most important forces in the world, it does not know the grace and wonder of Christ and his church," says Cardinal Theodore E. McCarrick, the former Archbishop of Washington, D.C., who has frequently traveled to China as an unofficial envoy for Rome.

A Test

The tensions over the Catholic Church are also turning into a test of just how much freedom China's government is willing to allow religious organizations in a materialist society whose people are increasingly hungry for spirituality. The difficulty is made more acute for Catholics by the central role of the pope and the religious bureaucracy he heads, which the Communist Party sees as a rival for political authority.

DOJ_NMG_0124859

In the years following the 1949 revolution, Catholics were denounced as agents of an imperialist power. Foreign priests and missionaries were expelled, and many Chinese priests, including Bishop Liu, were imprisoned. Later, during the chaos of the Cultural Revolution, the church essentially vanished from public life, as mobs hounded believers and tore down many cathedrals.

Today's China is somewhat more welcoming. The country officially recognizes five religions, including Catholicism, but still keeps tabs on their leaders through a government bureaucracy and a collection of five "patriotic" organizations. Catholics, in particular, have long been viewed with suspicion as possible political activists with loyalties to a foreign power in Rome.

"The Chinese government and the Chinese people are afraid of the church turning and playing the role that it did in Poland," says Liu Bainian, vice chairman of the official Chinese Catholic Patriotic Association, referring to the church's influence in the uprising against Poland's Communist rulers in the late 1980s that paved the way for free elections.

On the other side, many Catholics feel the Patriotic Association has traded the true faith for allegiance to the Communist Party.

"The official church in China is not obedient to the pope. They are obedient to the Chinese government. By definition they are not Roman Catholic," says Joseph Kung, who runs the U.S.-based Cardinal Kung Foundation and is an advocate for China's "underground" church -- the semi-secret group of priests and bishops who don't register with the patriotic association and are often harassed and imprisoned. In recent years, at least 17 underground bishops and numerous priests have disappeared, been arrested or detained in isolation, according to Asia News, a Vatican-affiliated news agency that monitors Church affairs in China. Some have died in prison.

Building Up Ties

Even so, traditionalists within the open church have spent decades quietly building up ties with the Vatican. While participating in an organization that has openly called for the Chinese church's "independence" from the pope, they have privately sought his blessing and tried to increase exchanges between Chinese Catholics and those abroad.

"Even though I spent 19 years in prison, I do love my country. But do you think I only love my country? I also love my church," says Bishop Liu.

Born in 1913 to a Catholic family in Inner Mongolia, he studied at a seminary there run by Belgian and Dutch missionaries. After being made a priest, he served as a local pastor and, later, the head of his old seminary.

Bishop Liu was just 38 years old when he was first imprisoned, in the chaos and antiforeign frenzy that followed the Communist revolution. Even after his sentence ended, in 1970, he was a suspect individual. He supported himself by laboring in the fields while the Cultural Revolution engulfed society. It was only after Mao Zedong's death in 1976 that religion was slowly allowed back into the open.

In the late 1970s, as China's new leaders began easing government controls "the churches all opened. We could practice our religion," recalls Bishop Liu. "We didn't have any books or vestments, but we started to preach again."

But the Communist Party's opening to religion came with a stark choice: cooperate with the government, and be allowed to preach openly, or continue in hiding. Bishop Liu wanted to work in the open.

The government in Inner Mongolia, where Bishop Liu had served much of his sentence, still saw him as a political criminal. So, in 1983 he left and went to Yinchuan, capital of the western province of Ningxia. It was there that, at the age of 70, he truly began his life's work.

"I still had something to do for the Lord: find a way to build up the church," Bishop Liu says, holding forth in his room, next to Yinchuan's church, which holds a desk, some chairs for visitors, a spartan cot and a toilet.

Yinchuan has a harsh, dry climate and a heavily Muslim population. Yet it proved fertile ground for the Catholic missionaries who first arrived in 1879. By 1950, Catholic records showed about 35,000 believers in Ningxia.

But when Bishop Liu -- then just an ordinary priest -- arrived in 1983, Catholicism had been driven almost completely from public life. His first task was to make contact with those believers who were left. He traveled around its many isolated mountain villages, reconnecting with Catholics who had gone into hiding. He also scrounged together land, money and material to rebuild Yinchuan's crumbling cathedral.

DOJ_NMG_0124860

The government was prepared to give the church and the land back to local Catholics. Bishop Liu still had to find the resources to rebuild the church and keep it running. In 1984, he cut a deal, giving up part of the church's land to a government real-estate company in exchange for money to build a new church. The building, finished in 1987, still stands.

Building up the human base of the diocese proved just as challenging. A half-dozen nuns had survived, but they were even older than Bishop Liu. So he roamed around northwest China to recruit. Today, Bishop Liu has 11 priests by his side and 20 or so nuns and has also set up 14 churches outside Yinchuan.

His church is still struggling. "Our biggest difficulty here is that the congregation isn't big enough," says Bishop Liu. He estimates he looks after seven or eight thousand Catholics -- many more than in 1983, but just a tiny fraction of the province's roughly six million people.

In 1993, he was named bishop of Ningxia by the Patriotic Association. He squared that with his faith by seeking, and receiving, a blessing from Pope John Paul II. Having a recognized official status has been a help: Bishop Liu has used his government contacts to get some money sent from a seminary in wealthy Shanghai.

Jeroom Heyndrickx, a Belgian priest who has known the bishop for more than 20 years, says Catholics critical of the official church should still respect his accomplishments. "He is in my view a great man, a courageous man," says Father Heyndrickx. "These old priests and bishops have done a tremendous job to rebuild the church, and have been misunderstood for it."

Search for a Successor

While Bishop Liu has found a way to practice in the open church without breaking ties with Rome, he must now find a successor who can do the same. Three years ago, a bishop in a neighboring province recommended a priest who has become his preferred candidate: Li Jing, a German-trained theologian who is now vice-rector at the government-supported National Seminary in Beijing. Father Li, 38, says he feels too young and inexperienced to take up the post, but will not contest the judgment of his elders in the church.

Father Li hasn't been formally appointed yet. To become a bishop in China's open church he must be elected by the diocese, in a meeting that usually includes the local priests and some nuns and prominent laypeople. They will then seek approval for the choice from the patriotic association.

In recent years, the process has often included some kind of informal approach to the pope, where the candidate will write to ask for his blessing, as Bishop Liu did. (Though direct communication is technically not permitted, word can be passed through Catholics in Hong Kong and Taiwan.) The Vatican has tried to bring the open church into the fold, noting in its recent statement that "almost all of the bishops and priests are in communion with the Supreme Pontiff."

The Vatican has maintained hopes that such informal coordination could eventually serve as the basis of a more formal agreement that would end the conflict over the church's status in China, of the sort it has reached with other Communist nations like Vietnam. Just last week, Vietnam's prime minister met with Pope Benedict in the Vatican -- a historic first that Vatican officials believe could eventually lead to a restoration of diplomatic ties.

Mixed Signals

In China, though, the Patriotic Association has been sending mixed signals. Of the five new Chinese bishops consecrated in the official church in 2006, two of them were consensus appointments, with both papal and government approval. However, the other three, who now head the dioceses of Kunming in the southwest and Anhui and Xuzhou in the east, did not receive papal approval.

The Vatican doesn't publicly discuss the selection process, but church observers say the priests who didn't receive the pope's blessing were seen by some as too close to the government and unlikely to stand up for church interests.

One of the priests, Liu Xinhong, the new bishop of Anhui, had asked for the pope's approval. Although he didn't receive it, he took the post anyway. He acknowledged in an interview with state-run media that his decision caused the priests and nuns in his diocese much "internal turmoil."

The Vatican called his appointment and others "a grave wound to the unity of the church." A senior church official who has advised the pope on the issue said the consecrations have revived fears that China's leadership will reverse some of the accommodation of recent years and try to consolidate the open church's independence from Rome. That could mean a schism in the church, creating a rival version of the Catholic faith in the world's most populous country.

DOJ_NMG_0124861

Bishop Liu, whose few remaining wisps of hair float out from his skullcap, knows he may not have enough time to see his ultimate hope realized.

"We are with the pope," he says. "We want to bring the churches together."

Bond In Beijing (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 31, 2007

James Bond and Communist China, foes for more than 45 years, have called a truce -- at least long enough for the latest installment in the Ian Fleming spy series, "Casino Royale," to premiere in Beijing.

It's the 21st film in the Bond franchise and the first to officially screen in China, which has always found something to object to in the plots of previous films. "Die Another Day," starring Pierce Brosnan, portrayed Beijing ally North Korea as a crazy authoritarian regime. In "The World Is Not Enough," Hollywood's version of a Rupert Murdoch-like character buys off a Chinese general to gain exclusive broadcasting rights in mainland China. In "Casino Royale," 007 merely rolls the dice with bankrollers of terrorism.

The longtime Bond ban hasn't stopped Chinese fans from getting their fix. Pirated copies of Bond movies have been circulating in China for years, much like pirated copies of just about everything else made by Hollywood. Hours before "Casino Royale's" Beijing debut, director Martin Campbell found DVDs of his movie for sale on the street. He paid about $1 for one and his name wasn't even on the credits.

The first Bond movie was released in 1962, when Mao Zedong's China was on the brink of the Cultural Revolution. The Party hasn't been quick to embrace the debonair Western spy, who always outwits his hapless Cold War -- often Communist -- adversaries. Now that Agent 007 is finally on Her Majesty's Secret Service in Beijing, we hope it will stir some thought in the Communist Party's halls of power about the ideas that Mr. Bond fights for.

Will The African Union Help Somalia? (CSM)

By Scott Baldauf

The Christian Science Monitor, January 31, 2007

JOHANNESBURG, SOUTH AFRICA

As African leaders met for the second and last day of the African Union (AU) Summit Tuesday in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, there were many questions about unfinished business and what they have actually accomplished.

Chief among them is the shaky AU peacekeeping force planned for war-ravaged Somalia. While a few African countries – Uganda, Nigeria, and Malawi – have pledged 2,500 of the 8,000 requested troops, most remain silent.

South Africa, a regional power normally willing and able to send peacekeepers, gave a definite "no" this week, citing its own overstretched military, the lack of Western donor support, and the lack of a workable peace plan.

Its concerns underscore the stumbling blocks for the AU as a whole. And with multiple peacekeeping missions throughout the continent, the AU may be reaching the limits of its capacity to handle more conflicts.

"I get a sense that troop-contributing countries want a better understanding of the situation in [Somalia] before sending their troops," says Matt Bryden, an analyst for the International Crisis Group in Nairobi. Even if countries do soon commit to sending 8,000 troops, Mr. Bryden says that may not be enough. "With 8,000 peacekeepers, they'll be hard-pressed to provide airport and VIP protection, let alone protecting the cities," he says. "It's not realistic."

Top AU diplomat Alpha Konare chastised African countries Monday. "We cannot simply wait for others to do the work in our place," he said, warning of chaos in Somalia if peacekeepers aren't deployed soon.

In theory, the AU should behave like the European Union (EU), with common policies on trade, development, and defense. African nations should come to each other's aid, to help sort out conflicts, and to provide peacekeeping forces as needed by their fellow governments. But the AU already has missions in Ivory Coast, Burundi, and the Democratic Republic of Congo, to name a few.

"I think it's like the electricity here, at some point the demand is greater than the supply, and it just runs out," says Tom Wheeler, a former South African ambassador, and now a research fellow at the South African Institute for International Affairs in

DOJ_NMG_0124862

Johannesburg. "It's not an unwillingness on South Africa's part; we simply don't have people to send. I believe the US is also finding itself in that same situation."

As AU leaders at the summit scrambled Tuesday to convince member nations to send more troops, Somalia's President Abdullahi Yusuf agreed under intense pressure from the US, the EU, and the UN to start a reconciliation conference with all religious and clan leaders, including moderates among Somalia's Islamists, who were overthrown by Somalian and Ethiopian troops earlier this month.

Willingness to include moderate Islamist leaders in talks could pave the way to a peace plan that analysts say is key to getting African countries and Western donors to contribute enough troops and money for an effective peacekeeping force. The EU reacted to Mr. Yusuf's announcement by pledging to donate $20 million for the peacekeeping force.

Still, many experts believe that the mission will depend on how events unfold in the next few weeks.

Tuesday, Somalia's Islamists posted a videotape on their official Web site warning that any African peacekeepers would be seen as invaders, highlighting the dangers of the mission. But if Somalia's weak Transitional Federal Government (TFG) acts on its announcement to reach out and share power with a broad section of Somali society, then attacks on remaining Ethiopian troops may diminish.

"I think you may well see a staggered deployment, with limited numbers going in doing the most limited tasks, protecting the TFG, and providing escorts for VIPs," say Bryden. "A lot depends on what happens with the first group of peacekeepers. If they find themselves facing attacks the way the Ethiopians and TFG are, you're not going to see a lot of appetite for expansion."

As attacks on Ethiopian troops intensified this week, Ethiopian President Meles Zenawi announced that his country would withdraw one-third of its troops.

Mr. Zenawi said last week that Ethiopia had accomplished its mission, and now the future of Somalia rests in the hands of its new leaders and Western donors.

"The problem might be those who have resources may be reluctant to provide the necessary resources," he said. "If the international community chips in that is fine. If they don't it will be up to them," he added.

AU peacekeeping planners estimate that the AU will need $160 million for the first six months of its mission. Besides the EU announcement to contribute $20 million, the US has promised $40 million.

But, perhaps most important, the AU needs a peace plan to enforce, says Richard Cromwell, a senior analyst at the Institute for Security Studies in Tshwane (as the South African capital city of Pretoria is now called.)

"There is no peace plan, and no political or diplomatic framework on which to hang a mission," says Mr. Cromwell. "If one looks at the context of the AU summit, it's nice to say you are going to send troops, but it's another thing to actually send them. Why would you devote rare African troops to a quagmire when you might need them for future conflicts?"

Early Accolades For UN's New Chief – With Caveats (CSM)

By Howard Lafranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, January 31, 2007

UNITED NATIONS, N.Y.

When spending and accounting questions arose recently about the United Nations Development Program in North Korea, new UN Secretary-General Ban Ki Moon wasted little time moving into damage-control mode.

After all, he was fully aware of the toll that the Iraq oil-for-food scandal had taken on both the UN and his predecessor, Kofi Annan.

And so Mr. Ban summoned a top UNDP administrator, organized media access to some of the program's senior staff, and issued a statement calling for "an urgent, system-wide and external inquiry" into the financial activities of all UN programs.

That quick action within the first month of his arrival on the job has won Ban some early accolades – including from some quarters among US conservatives that are never prone to kind words about the UN.

"Just by promising an investigation into the UNDP scandal, he sets a different tone, and that is very refreshing after the secrecy that cloaked the institution in the Kofi Annan years," says Nile Gardiner, a UN expert and frequent critic at the Heritage Foundation in Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0124863

Yet even as he wins some initial praise, Ban is also raising some questions with his first appointments, while leading others to wonder if he isn't coming off as too much of a big-powers secretary-general. Ban, they worry, is showing signs of paying deference to a time-honored system that divvies up key posts among the powers that formed the UN system six decades ago – the US, Britain, and France in particular.

"So far, there's been some of the same division of senior posts on the traditional great-power spoils system that we've seen in the past," says Michael Doyle, a former senior UN official now at Columbia University in New York.

As necessary as Ban's quick jump to answer questions about UN operations in North Korea may have been, it also runs some risks, says Mr. Doyle.

"It raises the broader perception that Mr. Ban is dancing to a tune being played in Washington," he says. That is especially true, others say, because Ban issued his audits edict right after The Wall Street Journal editorial page – a prominent critic of Mr. Annan and his handling of the oil-for-food scandal – ran a column questioning UNDP's North Korea operations.

Ban's appointments so far

Ban did name a top British diplomat as the UN's humanitarian chief, and speculation is widespread at UN headquarters that Americans and French officials are in line for key diplomatic posts, which could be announced after a reorganization that Ban ordered is complete. Now out of the running for the humanitarian post, the US is seeking the top political-affairs post – a possibility that some UN experts say could actually run counter to US interests by making the UN look too much like a tool of American diplomacy.

Yet other appointments could suggest a worrying turn to UN insiders and inexperienced officials, some say. "On the negative side, I think we're seeing some very questionable appointments," says Mr. Gardiner. "Ban has to be very firm on reform, and while the quick action on the UNDP is a good sign, some of his appointments look less promising."

Some critics are questioning Ban's naming of a Mexican environmentalist and bureaucrat long involved in Latin America development issues to be in charge of reform, or of Tanzania's foreign minister, Asha-Rose Migiro, as his deputy.

This week, Ban has attended the African Union summit in Ethiopia, and he'll be in Washington on Friday for a meeting on the Middle East with other international officials.

A public official with more than three decades of experience maneuvering the tricky diplomatic straits of the Korean peninsula, Ban demonstrated his political acumen by moving fast on the questions about international aid to North Korea: Not only was he recognizing the damage another festering scandal could do to the UN, experts say, but he was also highlighting that this was a problem he inherited, not one of his administration's doing.

"What I sense is a leader very determined to protect his reputation and that of the UN," says Lee Feinstein, an expert in international organizations at the Council on Foreign Relations in Washington.

As important as that may be, it will matter to the world most if Ban uses the strengths flowing from a refurbished UN image to pursue some daunting long-term goals, Mr. Feinstein says. Those goals, he says, include enhanced peacekeeping capacity and the means to head off future repeats of global humanitarian crises – such as what occurred in Rwanda in the mid-1990s and what many consider genocide that is now transpiring in Sudan's Darfur region.

"Can he put some meat on the bones of the concept the [UN] General Assembly endorsed of a 'responsibility to protect' when member states don't protect their own citizens?" Feinstein queries.

Aside from such lofty notions, Ban is also demonstrating what some consider freshness – or what others call unwise unguardedness. An unscripted Ban told reporters in response to questions about the execution of Saddam Hussein that the death penalty is a matter for individual countries to decide. That touched off an uproar among human rights activists who said the UN was on record in opposition to the death penalty – and it caused Ban to quip that he had been given the shortest honeymoon of any UN secretary-general.

A lighter side

He has also offered peeks at what those who know him say is a keen sense of humor. For example, he lavished praise on journalist Sam Donaldson at a Washington news conference, then deadpanned that it was a "great pleasure" to take a question from him. He also used a familiar Christmas tune (Guess which one?) to "warn" UN correspondents at a year-end dinner:

I'm making a list,

DOJ_NMG_0124864

I'm checking it twice

I'm going to find out who's naughty or nice

Ban Ki Moon is coming to town.

He's also quickly showing aides carried over from the last UN administration how he is different from Annan. For example, whereas Annan was happy to have a synopsis of the news faxed to his Astor Place home to peruse over breakfast, Ban wants his personal morning-news briefing early and in the office.

"I told my wife that hours may have been long under Annan," one assistant in the secretary-general's operations says, "but that she should plan on them being even longer under Ban Ki Moon."

Lord Levy Arrested For Second Time (FT)

By Ft Reporters

Financial Times, January 31, 2007

Lord Levy, Tony Blair's chief personal fundraiser, was arrested for a second time in the cash-for-honours police inquiry, it has emerged.

Police sources said that the peer had been arrested on Tuesday on suspicion of conspiracy to pervert the course of justice.

Lord Levy was arrested when he turned up voluntarily at a police station to have his bail terms renewed. He has not been charged and was released on bail pending further inquiries.

This was the third time that Lord Levy had returned to the police to have his bail terms renewed since his first arrest on July 12 last year in connection with the 1925 honours act and the 2001 Political Parties, Elections and Referendums act.

Lord Levy's spokesman could not immediately be reached for comment.

The latest twist in a police inquiry into allegations that Tony Blair sought to reward wealthy businessmen who lent the party millions of pounds in loans by nominating them for peerages follows the arrest of Ruth Turner, Mr Blair's director of government relations and a senior gatekeeper, on January 19.

Ms Turner was arrested on suspicion of perverting the course of justice and in connection with alleged offences under the 1925 honours act. She was later released without charge and bailed pending further inquiries. It was the third time police had quizzed her.

As well as looking into possible breaches of electoral laws and whether honours have been sold illegally, detectives are seeking to establish whether any evidence has been witheld or destroyed. The arrest and release of Ms Turner led to accusations, emphatically denied by Downing Street, of a "cover up" by the government.

Scotland Yard said at the time that, as a result, "additional investigation" would be required and the inquiry could run into March before the police send a file to the Crown Prosecution Service. Ms Turner was the first salaried government official to be arrested as part of the 10-month investigation.

On Tuesday the Metropolitan Police said in a statement: "On July 12 2006, a man attended a London police station where he was arrested in connection with alleged offences under the Honours (Prevention of Abuses) Act 1925 and Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000."

"He returned on bail on September 20 where he was interviewed then re-bailed pending further enquiries. He returned on bail on December 4 and was re-bailed pending further enquiries."

"He returned on bail today in connection with alleged offences under the Honours (Prevention of Abuses) Act 1925 and Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000 and was also arrested on suspicion of conspiracy to pervert the course of justice. He has been bailed pending further enquiries."

Police have given no indication whether anyone will be charged as a result of their inquiry.

In a regular briefing for reporters on Tuesday morning, the prime minister's official spokesman again denied reports that police had discovered there was a second computer system at Downing Street used by senior officials.

"There is only one system in Downing Street," he said, adding that police had had full access to it.

In a statement, a spokesman for Lord Levy said he "completely denies any allegations of wrongdoing whatsoever''.

Blair Ally Arrested In Corruption Probe (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0124865

By Mary Jordan

The Washington Post, January 31, 2007

LONDON, Jan. 30 -- The chief fundraiser for Prime Minister Tony Blair's Labor Party was arrested Tuesday on suspicion of hampering a police investigation into whether the party offered seats in the House of Lords and other government honors in exchange for cash.

Michael Levy, a close friend of Blair's and special envoy to the Middle East, was arrested on "suspicion of conspiracy to pervert the course of justice." He was released on bail and has not been charged with a crime.

In July, Levy was arrested on suspicion of breaking the law by offering government honors to people who lent large sums of money to the ruling party.

A tennis partner of Blair's who became wealthy in the music industry, Levy has been dubbed "Lord Cashpoint" by British tabloids for his central role in the scandal. He issued a statement Tuesday denying "any allegations of wrongdoing whatsoever."

Many people here see the new charge as more significant than last summer's because it suggests an effort by people close to Blair to hide an offense. "The coverup seems to be the main focus now," said Tim Knox of the Center for Policy Studies in London. "It's a serious crime, and it could be easier to prove" than the initial charges.

Appointed seats in the House of Lords, the upper house of Parliament, could be offered to donors with only a "wink, nod and a handshake," Knox said. But he said it might be much easier for police to discover that e-mails or other documents had been destroyed or hidden in an effort to thwart the investigation.

"Increasingly, this sorry affair has the whiff of Watergate about it," Edward Davey, a member of Parliament from the Liberal Democrats, the third-largest political party here, told the BBC. Suspicion of a coverup is particularly angering people, Davey said.

In all, four people have been arrested in a burgeoning scandal that has made Blair the first sitting prime minister to be questioned by police in a criminal inquiry. The next step is for prosecutors to review the police findings and decide whether to press charges.

Blair announced last fall that he would step down, but he did not say exactly when. Under pressure from his own party and with his approval ratings plunging, Blair said he would not attend his party's next conference, to be held in September.

The cash-for-honors scandal, as it is known here, has increased public disillusionment with Blair, and many people say it could force him to resign earlier than he had planned. Blair has said he did nothing wrong.

Scotland Yard has said it is conducting a "cross-party investigation," and all major political parties are widely thought to have acted similarly with major donors.

But the scandal has damaged Blair and his party more because they are in power. In addition, Blair promised to end the sleaze associated with former prime minister John Major's Conservative Party, which he trounced in an election a decade ago.

Earlier this month, Ruth Turner, a close aide of Blair's at his Downing Street office, was arrested on the same charges of offering government honors for money and suspicion of perverting justice. Two other people, Christopher Evans, an entrepreneur and major Labor Party donor, and Des Smith, a Labor government adviser, have also been arrested in the case. All were later released.

The Blair He Could Have Been (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, January 31, 2007

At the beginning of Tony Blair's political career, his Tory opponents gave him the nickname "Bambi" because of his fawn-like appearance. Now at the end of his 10 years as prime minister, Blair is mocked in Britain as America's "poodle," a slavishly loyal supporter of George Bush and the Iraq war.

Blair had a bit of both animal instincts, deer and dog, but he also had the brilliant political gifts that might have made him a truly great prime minister and the defining politician of his era. That's what makes his story so sad: This immensely talented politician was devoured by Iraq -- and by his support for an American president he kept thinking, wrongly, he could dissuade from mistakes.

DOJ_NMG_0124866

Watching Blair deliver a farewell address to the World Economic Forum in Davos last weekend, it was impossible not to think of what might have been. He gave a visionary speech about the values of global interdependence that will be necessary in the 21st century if the world is to survive. The speech seemed to me, in part, a declaration of independence from Bush, the president who took so much from Blair and gave so little in return.

In terms of Blair's reputation, his global manifesto was too late to do him much good. When he leaves office as prime minister, probably this summer, his political legacy will be summed up in one ruinous word: Iraq. But perhaps other politicians -- especially some of the Democratic presidential candidates who are full of ambition but short on ideas -- will pay attention to what Blair had to say at Davos.

Blair tried to address the crucial disconnect of the modern world -- between a global economy that is seamlessly integrated and a global political system that is broken and ineffective. He went to the heart of this problem of global governance: How can institutions be fixed so that the overriding problems of the 21st century, such as climate change, poverty in Africa and the conflicts in the Middle East, can actually be solved?

The British prime minister proposed some specific fixes, most of which departed from current American policy. To strengthen the U.N. Security Council, he suggested adding Germany, Japan, Brazil, India, and perhaps a Muslim or African nation -- initially through a "bridging mechanism" that would provide semi-permanent status without a veto. To make the United Nations itself more effective, he urged consolidating its jumble of ineffective agencies so that it can speak with one voice in each country. He proposed merging the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank, improving their effectiveness and reducing their parochial European and American tilts, respectively. And he urged expansion of the Group of Eight nations to include emerging superstars such as China and India.

"We need a multilateralism that is muscular," Blair said. He argued that the problem wasn't so much a lack of political will as a lack of effective mechanisms to implement goals on which everyone agrees. He cited the genocidal conflict in Darfur, which he described as "a scandal; not a problem, a scandal." He also argued for a new binding agreement on global warming to replace the Kyoto accord and urged the world to meet the target he has set for Britain of a 60 percent reduction in carbon emissions by 2050. In all these comments, he sounded like a leader for a world that badly needs one.

The mystery is how this man who believes so passionately in a multilateral agenda became the apologist and enabler for the most unilateralist U.S. administration in modern history. Blair's supporters say he saw no alternative after Sept. 11, 2001, but to stand with America. At each step deeper into Iraq, he appeared to have misgivings -- as in his insistence on the need for a second U.N. resolution to provide legal authority for the war. But when the U.N. vote failed, and when his later efforts to sway the administration's Middle East policy went unheeded, Blair followed along meekly. The final indignity was when he stood silently by Bush in December as the president trashed proposals to engage Syria and Iran -- an idea Blair had privately championed.

Blair got it right when he said, in answer to a question after his Davos speech, that the West's fine talk of democracy and freedom has little meaning if it is not anchored in a sense of justice. Without such bedrock values, the grand goals of the Atlantic alliance are empty. Sadly, that might be Blair's own political epitaph: A great leader who too often subordinated his own values to please an American president.

The writer co-hosts, with Newsweek's Fareed Zakaria, PostGlobal, an online discussion of international issues athttp://blog.washingtonpost.com/postglobal. His e-mail address isdavidignatius@washpost.com.

Self-rule Gets A Second Chance In Northern Ireland (USAT)

By Jeffrey Stinson

USA Today, January 31, 2007

LONDON — Northern Ireland's Catholics and Protestants got the go-ahead Tuesday for elections and joint self-rule this spring, following moves by the IRA and its political wing to end violence and accept rule of law.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair and Irish Prime Minister Bertie Ahern said voters in Northern Ireland would elect a new legislature March 7. They set a strict timetable: After elections, the new assembly has a week to form a Cabinet and until March 26 to take control of most government functions.

DOJ_NMG_0124867

The two leaders vowed to dissolve the assembly — effectively placing the region back under British administration — if it does not to meet the deadlines. The last attempt at power-sharing failed soon after a government was formed in 2002.

"If at any point it became clear that parties were unwilling to fulfill their commitments ... it would be unreasonable to expect the people of Northern Ireland to continue with an election," Blair and Ahern said in a joint statement.

More than 3,500 people have been killed in fighting in Northern Ireland since 1969. The conflict has pitted Protestant loyalists or unionists, who favored retaining ties to Great Britain, against Catholic republicans, who wanted the north united with the Republic of Ireland.

The 1998 Good Friday peace accord, brokered by the United States, was an attempt to end sectarian violence in Northern Ireland by creating an autonomous government in which Protestants and Catholics shared power.

In the past year, "There has been significant and welcome progress ... and we remain fixed in our determination to see shared government returned to the people of Northern Ireland," Blair and Ahern said. "There is no reason for any further delay."

Once-bitter enemies — firebrand Protestant preacher Ian Paisley and former Irish Republican Army leader Martin McGuinness — head the main Protestant and Catholic parties. They would be in line to be the new government's top minister and deputy.

Tuesday's announcement followed two major developments:

— The Catholic republican party Sinn Fein (pronounced "shin fayn"), the political wing of the IRA, voted to support Northern Ireland's police force and criminal justice system. Sinn Fein had long rejected the authority of the police force. It accused the Protestant-dominated police of acting as an arm of the Protestant majority and the British government.

— A report issued earlier Tuesday by a joint British-Irish monitoring body affirmed that the IRA has ceased involvement in violence and crime and is no longer buying weapons. The Independent Monitoring Commission, which tracks paramilitary activity, said the IRA was adhering to its 2005 pledge to reject violence in favor of achieving its goals through politics.

The commission said IRA members had not been involved in shootings or assaults for more than a year.

The commission said some IRA members "continue to be engaged in crime, including offenses such as smuggling ... and tax evasion." That criminal activity, however, was against IRA policy and was occurring despite IRA efforts to end it, the report said.

Merkel To Fight Vehicle Emissions Plan (FT)

By Hugh Williamson

Financial Times, January 31, 2007

Angela Merkel on Tuesday vowed to fight plans for European restrictions on vehicle emissions.

The German chancellor said the government would “fight with all its strength” against moves by the European Commission to impose a cap on vehicle carbon emissions to combat global warming.

Signalling her determination to defend the interests of Germany’s powerful car industry, the German chancellor told a business conference in Berlin that she “would certainly block” any binding regulation that did not differentiate between different car sizes.

Her forceful intervention – in contrast with her usual co-operative tone towards the Commission – is likely to increase tensions in a heated battle involving the car industry, environmentalists and José Manuel Barroso, Commission president.

Mr Barroso believes legislation is needed to force carmakers to reduce the carbon emissions of the cars they manufacture, but last week announced a delay in reaching agreement on a legislative strategy because of divisions among his commissioners on the issue.

The car industry looks almost certain to fail to fulfil its voluntary agreement to cut emissions to 140 grammes per kilometre by 2008.

Ms Merkel said it was a “regrettable fact” that the European car industry was not fulfilling this agreement, but said a “general regulation for all [car] sizes” would be wrong.

DOJ_NMG_0124868

She said a “sectoral approach”, with different emissions limits for different car sizes, would be appropriate. German companies, including DaimlerChrysler, Volkswagen and BMW, specialise in larger models with higher emissions, so would be hit hard by a general cap, industry officials argue.

She said that not just such emissions, but also other environmental initiatives, especially the increased use of biofuels, should count towards a country’s performance in reaching climate change goals for the car industry. She said Germany was ahead of other European Union member states in its use of biofuels and this “should be taken account of” by Brussels.

Ms Merkel’s intervention was reminiscent of similar comments by her predecessor Gerhard Schröder, who was seen as close to the car industry, and who regularly picked battles with Brussels on aspects of industry policy. Her comments also come at a sensitive time, with Germany just one month into its presidency of the EU.

Mr Barroso’s aides said he was not overly concerned by Ms Merkel’s comments, which were seen in Brussels as an understandable attempt to reassure one of the country's most powerful industries.

His aides also noted that a general cap was not under consideration.

The Nuclear Threat (WSJ)

By Mikhail Gorbachev

The Wall Street Journal, January 31, 2007

The essay "A World Free of Nuclear Weapons1," published in this newspaper on Jan. 4, was signed by a bipartisan group of four influential Americans -- George Shultz, William Perry, Henry Kissinger and Sam Nunn -- not known for utopian thinking, and having unique experience in shaping the policies of previous administrations. It raises an issue of crucial importance for world affairs: the need for the abolition of nuclear weapons.

As someone who signed the first treaties on real reductions in nuclear weapons, I feel it is my duty to support their call for urgent action.

The road to this goal began in November 1985 when Ronald Reagan and I met in Geneva. We declared that "a nuclear war cannot be won and must never be fought." This was said at a time when many people in the military and among the political establishment regarded a war involving weapons of mass destruction as conceivable and even acceptable, and were developing various scenarios of nuclear escalation.

It took political will to transcend the old thinking and attain a new vision. For if a nuclear war is inconceivable, then military doctrines, armed forces development plans and negotiating positions at arms-control talks must change accordingly. This began to happen, particularly after Reagan and I agreed in Reykjavik in October 1986 on the need ultimately to eliminate nuclear weapons. Concurrently, major positive changes were occurring in world affairs: A number of international conflicts were defused and democratic processes in many parts of the world gained momentum, leading to the end of the Cold War.

As U.S.-Soviet arms negotiations got off the ground, a breakthrough was achieved -- the treaty on the elimination of medium- and shorter-range missiles, followed by agreement on 50% reduction in strategic offensive weapons. If the negotiations had continued in the same vein and at the same pace, the world would have been rid of the greater part of the arsenals of deadly weapons. But this did not happen, and hopes for a new, more democratic world order were not fulfilled. In fact, we have seen a failure of political leadership, which proved incapable of seizing the opportunities opened by the end of the Cold War. This glaring failure has allowed nuclear weapons and their proliferation to pose a continuing, growing threat to mankind.

The ABM Treaty has been abrogated; the requirements for effective verification and irreversibility of nuclear-arms reductions have been weakened; the treaty on comprehensive cessation of nuclear-weapons tests has not been ratified by all nuclear powers. The goal of the eventual elimination of nuclear weapons has been essentially forgotten. What is more, the military doctrines of major powers, first the U.S. and then, to some extent, Russia, have re-emphasized nuclear weapons as an acceptable means of war fighting, to be used in a first or even in a "pre-emptive" strike.

All this is a blatant violation of the nuclear powers' commitments under the Non-Proliferation Treaty. Its Article V is clear and unambiguous: Nations that are capable of making nuclear weapons shall forgo that possibility in exchange for the promise by the members of the nuclear club to reduce and eventually abolish their nuclear arsenals. If this reciprocity is not observed, then the entire structure of the treaty will collapse.

DOJ_NMG_0124869

The Non-Proliferation Treaty is already under considerable stress. The emergence of India and Pakistan as nuclear-weapon states, the North Korean nuclear program and the issue of Iran are just the harbingers of even more dangerous problems that we will have to face unless we overcome the present situation. A new threat, nuclear weapons falling into the hands of terrorists, is a challenge to our ability to work together internationally and to our technological ingenuity. But we should not delude ourselves: In the final analysis, this problem can only be solved through the abolition of nuclear weapons. So long as they continue to exist, the danger will be with us, like the famous "rifle on the wall" that will fire sooner or later.

Last November the Forum of Nobel Peace Laureates, meeting in Rome, issued a special statement on this issue. The late Nobel laureate and world-renowned scientist, Joseph Rotblat, initiated a global awareness campaign on the nuclear danger, in which I participated. Ted Turner's Nuclear Threat Initiative provides important support for specific measures to reduce weapons of mass destruction. With all of them we are united by a common understanding of the need to save the Non-Proliferation Treaty and of the primary responsibility of the members of the nuclear club.

We must put the goal of eliminating nuclear weapons back on the agenda, not in a distant future but as soon as possible. It links the moral imperative -- the rejection of such weapons from an ethical standpoint -- with the imperative of assuring security. It is becoming clearer that nuclear weapons are no longer a means of achieving security; in fact, with every passing year they make our security more precarious.

The irony -- and a reproach to the current generation of world leaders -- is that two decades after the end of the Cold War the world is still burdened with vast arsenals of nuclear weapons of which even a fraction would be enough to destroy civilization. As in the 1980s, we face the problem of political will -- the responsibility of the leaders of major powers for bridging the gap between the rhetoric of peace and security and the real threat looming over the world. While agreeing with the Jan. 4 article that the U.S. should take the initiative and play an active role on this issue, I believe there is also a need for major efforts on the part of Russian and European leaders and for a responsible position and full involvement of all states that have nuclear weapons.

I am calling for a dialogue to be launched within the framework of the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, involving both nuclear-weapon states and non-nuclear-weapon states, to cover the full range of issues related to the elimination of those weapons. The goal is to develop a common concept for moving toward a world free of nuclear weapons.

The key to success is reciprocity of obligations and actions. The members of the nuclear club should formally reiterate their commitment to reducing and ultimately eliminating nuclear weapons. As a token of their serious intent, they should without delay take two crucial steps: ratify the comprehensive test ban treaty and make changes in their military doctrines, removing nuclear weapons from the Cold War-era high alert status. At the same time, the states that have nuclear-power programs would pledge to terminate all elements of those programs that could have military use.

The participants in the dialogue should report its progress and the results achieved to the United Nations Security Council, which must be given a key coordinating role in this process.

Over the past 15 years, the goal of the elimination of nuclear weapons has been so much on the back burner that it will take a true political breakthrough and a major intellectual effort to achieve success in this endeavor. It will be a challenge to the current generation of leaders, a test of their maturity and ability to act that they must not fail. It is our duty to help them to meet this challenge.

Mr. Gorbachev was the leader of the Soviet Union from 1985 to 1991.

A Dirty Case (WP)

The Washington Post, January 31, 2007

WHEN THE former Russian KGB agent Alexander Litvinenko died of polonium poisoning in November, many people assumed that his murder, like those of numerous other opponents of Russian President Vladimir Putin, would never be solved. But Mr. Litvinenko was killed in London, not in Moscow, and Scotland Yard believes it has cracked the case. According to reports in several of Britain's leading newspapers, the police have concluded that two former KGB agents who met Mr. Litvinenko at a hotel on Nov. 1 are prime suspects in his death.

The two men are Andrei Lugovoy, a former KGB bodyguard to top Communist apparatchiks, and Dmitry Kovtun, a former army officer in Czechoslovakia and East Germany. They allegedly left traces of polonium-210, the rare substance that killed Mr.

DOJ_NMG_0124870

Litvinenko, nearly everywhere they went on their journey from Moscow to London and back. The teapot used at their meeting with Mr. Litvinenko was found to be heavily contaminated, according to the newspaper reports. In fact, the assassins apparently delivered something like a "dirty bomb" of radiation to London: According to Britain's Health Protection Agency, contamination was found at 20 sites around the city, and 129 people appear to have been exposed.

Given the seriousness of the crime, a vigorous prosecution of the Russians might be expected. Only, they have a powerful protector: Mr. Putin's own government, which, while denying any culpability in Mr. Litvinenko's killing, is nevertheless blocking British access to Mr. Lugovoy and Mr. Kovtun. During a visit to Moscow in December, British detectives were not allowed to directly question the two men, who were then staying in hospitals. Russian officials then opened their own "investigation" and drew up a long list of Putin enemies in London -- from Chechen rebels to former executives of the Yukos oil company. No evidence connects anyone on the Russian list to the murder, but Moscow is saying it will not allow Scotland Yard access to the real suspects unless it can interrogate its targets in Britain.

There's no proof yet that Mr. Putin ordered or approved the London dirty bomb, but the questions for him keep multiplying: Why, if the Russian authorities are innocent, do they deny access to Mr. Lugovoy and Mr. Kovtun? Why do they continue to blame enemies of Mr. Putin without offering any evidence? What explains the leakage of a dangerous quantity of polonium, which is produced and held almost exclusively in Russia? And why, as a Polish newspaper documented last week, were pictures of Mr. Litvinenko being employed for target practice last November at a training center used by elite Russian special forces? The director of the center, a founder of a special operations unit, was accused by Mr. Litvinenko of being a KGB agent whose facility prepared contract killers. Mr. Putin is holding his annual international news conference tomorrow; we hope he'll be prompted for some answers.

DOJ_NMG_0124871

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 31, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Test Of Bush's Terror-fighting Authority Heads To Higher Court (CSM) ... 5
Anti-terror Program Subject Of Constitutional Arguments (AP) ... 6
Surveillance Case To Pit Strong Views (LAT) ... 7
Bush Is Not Above The Law (NYT) ... 8
Germany May Indict U.S. Agents In 2004 Abduction (LAT) ... 9
U.S. Judge Ends 20-Year Case To Deport 2 Tied To Terrorists (NYT) ... 11
U.S. Loses 20-year Attempt To Deport 2 Immigrants (LAT) ... 11
2 Accused Of Terror Ties To Stay In U.S. (AP) ... 13
Terror Inquiry Turns To Tax Law (WSJ) ... 13
A Key Padilla Charge Is Reinstated (WP/AP) ... 14
Terror Charge Is Reinstated (FLSUNSEN) ... 15
Letters To The Editor (PPG) ... 15
British Police Arrest 8 On Terror Charges (AP) ... 16
2 Plead Guilty In Arms Deal Case (AP) ... 16
2 Men Plead Guilty In Arms Deal (BSUN) ... 16
US Judge OKs Lawsuit By Foreign Nationals Saying Bank Helped Palestinian Suicide Bombers (FINDLAW/AP) ... 17
U.S. Eyes Software Touted By Islamists (WT) ... 17

Homeland Response:

FBI Turns To Broad New Wiretap Method (CNET) ... 18
Justice Department Takes Issue With Net-wiretapping Report (CNET) ... 19
New York Lawmakers Obtain $25 Million For Ill 9/11 Workers (NYT) ... 19
Bush's Budget Proposes Adding 9/11 Health Funds (AP) ... 20
Border Security Chief Must Walk A Fine Line (WT) ... 21
Legislators Tell Coast Guard To Revamp Rebuilding Plan (NYT) 22
Contractors Defend Ship Modernization (AP) ... 23
Montana Moves To Reject Real ID Law (USAT) ... 23
Black Caucus Requests Katrina Committee (AP) ... 24
All Areas Open In New Blueprint For New Orleans (NYT) ... 25
Safety Is Our Priority (USAT) ... 25
Levee List Dribbles Out (USAT) ... 26
Congress Scrutinizes Los Alamos Security (AP) ... 26

War News:

In Senate, Allies Of Bush Work To Halt Iraq Vote (NYT) ... 27
Senate GOP Looks At Alternative To Democrats On Iraq Vote (POL) ... 29
For GOP, Discord In Dissent On Iraq (WP) ... 30
Many House Republicans Mum On Troop Resolutions (HILL) ... 31
Islam Divided; Psychic Reality Check; Battle Under The Border (CNN) ... 32
Senate Seeking Expanded Say In Iraq (CHIT) ... 43
Specter: Bush Not Sole 'Decision-maker' (AP) ... 44
Judiciary Panel Mulls Presidential Authority (HILL) ... 45
Is Fidel Castro On The Mend?; Interview With Arlen Specter (CNN) ... 46
Advocates Of Troop Surge About-face In Congress (WT) ... 56
Florida Senator Criticizes Foreign Diplomacy Of Bush Administration (MCT) ... 57
Obama Pushes For Iraq Pullout Deadline (AP) ... 58
Obama Bill Sets Date For Troop Withdrawal (WP) ... 59
Interview With Wisconsin Senator Russ Feingold; Former 'New York Times' Reporter Testifies In CIA Leak Trial; Obama's Achilles' Heel? (CNN) ... 59
House Dems Want To Change Direction Of War Funds (USAT) 71
Why Would Congress Surrender? (WP) ... 72
Constitutional Warp (WSJ) ... 73
Left Out Of All This War Planning: The People (USAT) ... 74
'I Don't Know The Details' (WT) ... 75
Bush Nominee: New Goals Needed In Iraq (USAT) ... 76
Bush Nominee: New Actions Needed In Iraq (AP) ... 76
Peace In Iraq 'A Long Time Coming,' Fallon Says (LAT) ... 77
Nominee To Head Mideast Forces Warns On Iraq (FT) ... 79
Choice For No. 2 At State Dept. Defends Bush's Stance On Iran (NYT) ... 79
Senators Warn Against War With Iran (AP) ... 80
Iran Will Not Go Unchallenged In Iraq: US (AFP) ... 81
General Says U.S. Has Proof Iran Arming Iraqi Militias (USAT) . 82
Iran May Have Trained Attackers That Killed 5 American Soldiers, U.S. And Iraqis Say (NYT) ... 82
Centcom Pick Warns Of Iran Influence In Gulf Region (WP) ... 83
Air Force's Role In Iraq Could Grow (LAT) ... 85
Pentagon Halts Sale Of F-14 Parts (AP) ... 86
US Takes New Steps To Isolate Iran (AFP) ... 87
Not-So-Strange Bedfellow (NYT) ... 88
Democrats Agree To Iraq Panel (WP) ... 89
Rice: Iraq Missed Political Deadlines (AP) ... 89
Baghdad Grasps Role, Official Says (WT) ... 90
Progress In Baghdad (WSJ) ... 91

Suicide Bombers 'entering Iraq From Syria' (FT) 91
Baker: Syria Talks May Help Israel (AP) 92
Dozens Killed In Iraq Bombings (USAT/AP)..... 92
50 Iraqis Die As Holiday Brings Spasm Of Sectarian Killing (NYT) 93
More Than 60 Killed Amid As Shiite Festival Ends (LAT) 94
Violence Targeted At Shiites On Holy Day Kills 60 In Iraq (WP). 95
Attacks Kill 58 During Holy Day (WT/AP) 96
Analysis: Najaf Battle Raises Questions (AP) 97
Remnants Show Cult Was Prepared, Organized (LAT) 98
Reports Fault Oversight Of Iraq Police Program (WP)..... 99
Iraq's Refugees (NYT) 100
Pentagon's Covert Activities Come Under Senate Scrutiny (WSJ) 100
With Gratitude In Every Stitch (WP) 101

DOJ:

Whistleblower Complaint Filed Against DOJ Civil Rights Division (LAW)..... 103
Arizona's U.S. Attorney Joining Mass Exodus (AZREP)..... 103

Corporate Scandals:

Is The DOJ's New Policy On Prosecuting Corporations Real Reform Or Business As Usual? (LAW) 104
WIDENING SCANDAL At Siemens, Witnesses Cite Pattern Of Bribery (WSJ)..... 105
Ex-Cendant Finance Chief Gets Three Years Probation (WSJ/AP) 109

Criminal Law:

Libby Wants To Know Miller's Sources (NSDY/AP)..... 109
Reporter's Testimony Contradicts Libby's Timeline (USAT)..... 110
Reporter's Account Hurts Libby Defense (WP) 111
Journalist Forced To Reveal Her Methods (WP)..... 112
Libby Reportedly Said 'I Didn't Do It' (AP)..... 113
Ex-Reporter For Times Testifies For Prosecutor Who Jailed Her (NYT) 114
Reporter Takes Stand Against Source (LAT) 115
Libby Trial Puts Reporters' Recall To A Severe Test (WSJ) 117
Bears Fans Put Money On—everything (CHIT) 119
Why The Local Bookie Could Be A Big Winner In 2007 Super Bowl (WSJ) 120
EU Mulls Legal Challenge To US Internet Gaming Clampdown (UKIND) 121
A Former Shelby County Official Admits To Buying Cars For Drug Dealers. (WPTY)..... 122
Joe Cooper Pleads Guilty To Money Laundering (WHBQ)..... 122
Joe Cooper Enters Guilty Plea On Money Laundering Charge (WMC)..... 122
Laundered $43,500 For Drug Dealers; Pledges Continued Help In Federal Case Against Ford, Peete (MCA)..... 123
Another Former Laborers Local 91 President Pleads Guilty (WIVB) 124
FBI:13 Members Of NYC Crime Families Charged (WABC) 124
NYC Mobsters Allegedly Said They Had Bazookas, Chainsaws (WNBC)..... 125
FBI Arrests A Dozen Alleged Mobsters (NY1)..... 125
LAST OF THE GOTTI GANG (NYPOST) 126
Friend Contradicts Coke Defendant (WXIA)..... 126
Friend Denies He Gave $4,000 To Coke Trade Secrets Theft Suspect (SDUT/AP)..... 127
Infomercial Fraud Nets Year In Jail (PHI) 128
Schafer Won't Be Charged In UNT Case (DRC)..... 129
Crime-plagued Regions Vie For New Grants (AP) 130
Man Receives Rare Death Sentence In New York For Slayings Of Two Police Officers (FINDLAW/AP) 130
Cop Killer Sentenced To Death (NSDY)..... 130
Killer Of Detectives Gets Death Sentence (NYT) 131
Prison Time Sought For Ex-official In 'Egregious' Scam (WT) .. 133
Former PR Executive Is Sentenced In Fraud Case (LAT) 134
Deadline For Responses To Justice Subpoenas Extended (HILL) 134
Consumers Warned Of Loan Scams (USAT)..... 135
Federal Judge Asks NY Times Reporter To Appear In Case Of Zyprexa Document Disclosures (FINDLAW/AP)..... 135
CVS Execs Plead Not Guilty To Corruption (AP) 136
2 CVS Execs Plead Not Guilty To Bribery (PROJO)..... 137
Bismarck Library Clerk Held For Federal Sex Offense (BISTRIB)137
Bill To Track Sex Predators On Web Offered (LAT)..... 138

Civil Rights:

Noxubee Official: Races Divided (JCL)..... 139
Lawsuit Accuses Black Officials Of Violating Whites' Voting Rights (WT)..... 140
Can Blacks Discriminate Against White Voting Rights? (JCL) .. 141
FBI To Interview Student In Greenwood School Confrontation (AP) 142
Ex-jailers' Sentences On Hold Until After Teel Trial (BSH) 142
Seattle Violated Constitutional Rights Of 1999 World Trade Organization Protesters, Jury Says (FINDLAW/AP) 143
Chief Denies Police Were Told To Retreat (WT)..... 143
Prison's Hidden Threat (LAT)..... 144
Woman Jailed After Reporting Rape (AP) 145

Antitrust:

Wall Street Firms Bank On Independent Delta (AJC) 145
US Airways May Be Ready To Abandon Offer For Delta (USAT)147
Firms Go Private In Search Of Deeper Pockets (WP) 147
U.S Senate To Look Into Mergers In Pharmacy Benefit Industry (BLOOM)..... 149
AMD Lawyer Sees Easing Of Antitrust Enforcement (MERCN) 149
NY Teen In Piracy Lawsuit Accuses Record Companies Of Collusion (AP) 150
Tobacco's Stigma Aside, Wall Street Finds A Lot To Like (NYT)150
Change Of Control Or Out Of Control? (WP) 152

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Scientists: White House Pressured Us To Downplay Global Warming (USAT/AP) 153
Waxman, White House Are At Loggerheads On Climate Papers (LAT) 154

DOJ_NMG_0124873

Has The White House Interfered On Global Warming Reports? (CSM) ... 154
Scientists Criticize White House Stance On Climate Change Findings (NYT) ... 156
Bush 'distorted' Climate Change Reports (FT) ... 157
Panel Hears Climate 'Spin' Allegations (AP) ... 157
Senator Boxer Calls For Action On Global Warming (MCT) ... 158
Lawmakers On Hill Seek Consensus On Warming (WP) ... 159
Senators Sound Alarm On Climate (WT) ... 161
Global Warming Is Hot Topic In Congress (LAT) ... 162
Fossil Fuels Are To Blame, World Scientists Conclude (USAT) 163
Scientists To Advise EPA To Cut Smog Limit (USAT) ... 165
In Brief EPA Staff To Suggest Cuts In Allowable Smog Levels (WSJ) ... 166
Mixed News For Wolves (NYT) ... 166

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Hiring Freeze Could Deplete FBI Staffs (FEDTIMES) ... 167
Democrats Move Leftover Spending Measure (WP) ... 167
Democrats Offer Fiscal 2007 Joint Funding Bill (GCN) ... 169
Democrats' Spending Plan Would Raise Some Budgets (BLOOM) ... 169
Couple Await Extradition In Meth Case (AZREP) ... 170
Scottish Couple Arrested On U.S. Smuggling Indictment (FINDLAW/AP) ... 170
Attention: Drug Dealers (BNNJ) ... 170
Safety Kiel Cited For Relieving Himself In Public In San Diego (AP) ... 171
Kiel Cited For Urinating Outside Downtown Club (SDUT) ... 172
California Man To Be Jailed For Mailing Cocaine, Meth (NOTP) 172
4 More Colombian Politicians Face Probe (WP/AP) ... 173
New Details On Sintia Mesa Murder (WUSA) ... 173

Immigration:

Citing Persecution, Judge Grants Gay Mexican Immigrant Asylum In U.S. (LAT) ... 174
US Visa Policy To Come Under Attack (FT) ... 174
U.S. Is Urged To Step Up Plan To Attract More Visitors (NYT) 175
Immigrant Groups Want 'Legalization For Everyone' (CHIT) ... 176

Tax:

The Barrett Report (WT) ... 176
IRS Calculators Offer Guidance Web Site Can Help Figure Out AMT, Sales Tax Deduction (WSJ) ... 178

Congress-Administration:

Bush Lauds Caterpillar's Teamwork (JSO) ... 179
Bush In Illinois To Tout Policies (CHIT) ... 180
Bush Pushes For More Free-trade Deals In Cat Speech (PG) . 181
Bush Pushes Free Trade At Tractor Plant (LAT) ... 181
Bush Pushes For More Free-trade Deals (AP) ... 183
Citi Will Buy Egg To Raise U.K. Presence (WSJ) ... 183
Bush Promotes His Free Trade Initiatives (NYT) ... 184
In Peoria, President Plays Up Economy (WP) ... 185
Dems Want Trade Talks To Include Protections (USAT) ... 186
Levin Fires A Salvo On Fast Track (HILL) ... 186
Democrats Give Bush The Business On Trade (WP) ... 187
Ex-Clinton Aide Urges Free Trade Deal (FT) ... 188
Consumer Confidence Looks Robust (USAT) ... 189
U.S. Consumer Confidence Level Is Flat Amid A Softer Outlook (WSJ) ... 189
Stocks Shrug Off Concerns Over Oil Prices, Interest Rates (WSJ) ... 190
Senate Clears Way For Minimum Wage Vote (AP) ... 191
Senate Debate Ends On Wage Bill (WT/AP) ... 192
Senate Adds Tax Breaks As It Passes A Wage Bill (NYT) ... 192
Workers Held Hostage (WP) ... 193
Who's That Senior Administration Official? (POL) ... 193
Democrats Unveil $463.5B Spending Bill (AP) ... 195
Oregon Senator Threatens Filibuster (LAT/AP) ... 195
Pentagon Is Stunned By $3 Billion Cut (HILL) ... 196
Some Lawmakers Worried CR Could Affect Reelection Prospects (HILL) ... 197
Accord On Increasing Pell Grants (NYT) ... 198
Letter Exposes Dingell (HILL) ... 198
FBI Probing Rep. Miller's Land Sales (LAT) ... 200
FBI Examining Video In Miller Land Probe (SGVT) ... 201
Rep. Gary Miller, In Senior Perch, Is Part Of FBI Probe (HILL) 202
White House Order Tightens Grip On Policy, Stirs Debate On Control (WSJ) ... 203
Lawmakers Unveil Election Financing Bill (SFC) ... 204
Honesty In Elections (NYT) ... 204
FDA Plans To Boost Safety With Newsletters, Drug Profiles (USAT) ... 205
F.D.A. Widens Safety Reviews On New Drugs (NYT) ... 206
Changes Will Ensure Drug Safety, FDA Says (LAT) ... 207
FDA Proposes Report Cards On New Drugs (NYT/AP) ... 208
FDA Revamps Process For Safety Of Drugs After Approval (WP) ... 209
FDA Plans Drug-Safety Moves (WSJ) ... 210
Hastert Recovering From Surgery (CHIT) ... 211
Senate Defies Cheney (RC) ... 211
Liberalism's Energetic Architect (WP) ... 212
Homeland Security Employees Feeling The Blues (Column) (WP) ... 213
Reid's Whitewater (NYS) ... 214

Other News:

Tax-cut Efforts Target Firms (USAT) ... 215
Deal Struck On Claims Of Nazi Era (NYT) ... 215
A Changing Battle On AIDS Is Reflected In A Quilt (NYT) ... 217
McCain Taps House Team (RC) ... 218
Romney, ABM And McCain (HILL) ... 219
Romney Faces Questions About His Faith (AP) ... 220
Romney's Veto Could Hurt Him With Jewish Voters (POL) ... 221
One Uninsured Group Can Now Exhale (WP) ... 222
Mama Hugs Iowa (NYT) ... 223
The Clintonian Candidate (WP) ... 224
Biden Set To Kick Off Presidential Bid (WP/AP) ... 225
Biden Plans To Formally Launch Campaign For Presidency (KCS) ... 226
Biden To Make It Official On Comedy Central (DNJ) ... 227

DOJ_NMG_0124874

The Pelosi Primary: Who Will Be Her Presidential Pick? (POL) 228
Md. Pushes Expansive Medical Coverage (WP)..... 229
Spiritual State Of Union Found Strong (WT) 231
A Health-Care Bargain (WSJ)..... 231
Bush Unveils Security Aid For Palestinians (AFP) 232
Fighting Eases On First Day Of A Cease-Fire By Gaza Factions (NYT) 233
Gaza's Warring Factions Holding Fire (AP)..... 233
Israeli Arab Official Favors Pragmatism (WT) 234
Muslim Nations Move To Prevent Violence (WT)..... 235
Saudi Arabia FM Says Iran Cooperating (AP)..... 236
Hizbollah Blames Bush For Unrest (FT)..... 237
In Legacy Of A Revered Martyr, Saudi Shiites Find Sustenance (WP)..... 237
Talks To Resume On North Korea And Weapons (NYT)..... 238
N. Korea May Accept Deal In Nuclear Talks (WP)..... 239
N. Korea Nuclear Talks To Resume (WT)..... 240
Frozen Funds In Macau Could Thaw N. Korea Impasse (USAT)241
Seoul Wants Written Accord From NKorea Nuclear Talks (AFP)242
'Radical Populism' On Negroponte's List (WT)..... 242
Venezuela Poised To Hand ChÃ¡vez Wide-Ranging Powers (WP)..... 243
Cuba TV Shows Castro Meeting With Chavez (AP) 245
Incoming Rice Deputy Seeks US 'Engagement' With China (AFP)..... 245
Members, Manufacturers Push President On China Trade Policy (HILL) 246
CHURCH AND STATE As China's Bishops Die Off, Clash Looms With Vatican (WSJ)..... 247
Bond In Beijing (WSJ)..... 249
Will The African Union Help Somalia? (CSM) 250
Early Accolades For UN's New Chief – With Caveats (CSM) ... 251
Lord Levy Arrested For Second Time (FT)..... 252
Blair Ally Arrested In Corruption Probe (WP)..... 253
The Blair He Could Have Been (WP) 254
Self-rule Gets A Second Chance In Northern Ireland (USAT) .. 255
Merkel To Fight Vehicle Emissions Plan (FT)..... 255
The Nuclear Threat (WSJ)..... 256
A Dirty Case (WP)..... 257

DOJ_NMG_0124875

TERRORISM NEWS:

Test Of Bush's Terror-fighting Authority Heads To Higher Court (CSM)

By Warren Richey

The Christian Science Monitor, January 31, 2007

The open-ended detention of an Arab student suspected of being an Al Qaeda sleeper agent is setting the stage for the next major showdown over the scope of President Bush's authority to fight terrorism on American soil.

Ali Saleh Kahlah al-Marri has been held in government custody for more than five years and has spent the last three and a half years in a South Carolina military prison under interrogation as a presidentially designated enemy combatant.

For 17 months of that time he was held incommunicado, with no ability to consult a lawyer, appear before a neutral judge to test the legality of his detention, or even tell his wife and five children he was alive.

Mr. Marri's lawyers say his confinement by military authorities rather than in the civilian justice system violates both US law and the Constitution.

Lawyers for the government disagree. They say the president is acting within his powers to protect the country from a second wave of terror attacks following 9/11.

Thursday, Marri's case goes to a three-judge panel of the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals. Analysts say the dispute may ultimately wind up in the US Supreme Court with a potential landmark ruling on a key question: What rights does a noncitizen legal resident have when the government names him an enemy combatant?

The Fourth Circuit in Richmond, Va., is the same appeals court that upheld the detention as enemy combatants of US citizens Yaser Hamdi and Jose Padilla.

But the Marri case is different, his lawyers say. Mr. Hamdi was taken into custody in Afghanistan and Mr. Padilla was detained while attempting to reenter the US at Chicago's O'Hare International Airport. Both were said to have taken up arms against the US while overseas. In contrast, Marri was arrested in Peoria, Ill., where he was attending graduate school on a valid student visa.

Unlike other designated enemy combatants, Marri never directly participated in hostilities against the US, his lawyers say. Since he was never a combatant on a battlefield, he – as a civilian lawfully present in the US – cannot be detained by the military as an enemy combatant, they say.

Instead, he must be extended all the constitutional and other protections of the civilian court system, his lawyers say.

"The government's position in this case is stunning," says Jonathan Hafetz, a Marri lawyer at the Brennan Center for Justice at New York University. "If they are right, they can pick up any immigrant tomorrow in this country, lock them in a military jail, and the government would hold the keys to the courthouse." Mr. Hafetz adds, "The government could effectively disappear people."

The administration says in a global war on terror the battlefield can be anywhere, including Peoria. US Solicitor General Paul Clement says Marri associated with the military arm of Al Qaeda, a US enemy, and thus qualifies as an enemy combatant.

"He is a Qatari citizen who allied himself with Al-Qaeda, received funding and training from Al-Qaeda, and traveled to the United States on orders from Al-Qaeda to serve as a sleeper agent and facilitate further terrorist attacks against the United States from within," Mr. Clement writes in his brief to the court. He adds, "Enemy combatants do not earn immunity by crossing our borders to do us harm."

Before the three-judge panel considers such arguments, government lawyers will suggest that the appeals court lacks jurisdiction to take up Marri's case.

The Military Commissions Act of 2006 says in part that "No court, justice, or judge shall have jurisdiction to hear or consider any [legal] action against the United States ... related to any aspect of the detention, transfer, treatment, trial, or conditions of confinement" of a noncitizen properly deemed an enemy combatant.

Marri's lawyers say the provision only applies to noncitizen enemy combatants detained outside US borders like those being held at the Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, naval base. If the court rules that the Military Commissions Act does apply to detainees held in the US, it would amount to an unconstitutional suspension of the writ of habeas corpus, they say.

The Bush administration argues that the new law divests jurisdiction in "all cases, without exception" in which a noncitizen enemy combatant is being held by the US. It applies regardless of the location of the detention, government lawyers say.

DOJ_NMG_0124876

Hafetz says that approach threatens to blur the distinction between military and civilian jurisdiction established in a Civil War-era ruling by the Supreme Court.

Soldiers and combatants fall within the military sphere of courts martial, tribunals, and commissions, while civilians are governed by the civilian court system. "It is the essence of our society where civilian rule and civilian institutions are supreme and the military doesn't have the power to go in and arrest people in their homes and lock them in military jails," Hafetz says. "That is what separates a country that is democratic and committed to the rule of law from a country that is a police state."

In his brief, Solicitor General Clement says that after the 9/11 attacks, Congress authorized Mr. Bush to use all "necessary and appropriate force," including detention of enemy combatants, to "protect United States citizens both at home and abroad." The government reads the provision as authorizing detentions both at home and abroad.

In determining Marri is an enemy combatant, Bush concluded in part: "Mr. Marri represents a continuing, present, and grave danger to the national security of the United States."

A declassified affidavit prepared by a US intelligence official says that Marri attended an Al Qaeda training camp between 1996 and 1998. "Marri met personally with Osama Bin Laden and volunteered for a martyr mission or to do anything else that Al-Qaeda requested," the affidavit says.

Marri worked with two senior Al Qaeda leaders prior to his arrival in the US, Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, the alleged mastermind of the 9/11 attacks, and Mustafa Ahmed al-Hawsawi, the key moneyman of the 9/11 attacks, the affidavit says. In addition, Marri's younger brother is a detainee at Guantánamo Bay.

Al Qaeda asked Marri to enroll as a student and quietly explore ways to hack into bank records to disrupt the US financial system, the document says. He had also been trained in the use of poisons and was researching poisons similar to the hydrogen cyanide weapon used in a terror attack on the Japanese subway system by the group Aum Shinrikyo, the affidavit says.

Marri arrived in the US with his wife and five children one day before the 9/11 attacks. He had been given at least $13,000 by Al Qaeda, the affidavit says.

Marri's lawyers say much of the information in the affidavit is hearsay. They are asking for an opportunity to challenge the veracity of the allegations in court by investigating whether the intelligence information was obtained from Khalid Sheikh Mohammed and others through coercive interrogations or torture.

Hafetz says that even if everything the government says about Marri is true (and he stresses that he does not concede that it is true), the central point of his case is that Marri should be charged with a crime and prosecuted, not merely held indefinitely by the military based on an affidavit that has never endured the careful scrutiny of cross-examination in open court.

Earlier, a federal judge in South Carolina agreed with the government that Marri could be held as an enemy combatant based on hearsay evidence contained in an intelligence affidavit. The court said Marri was given an opportunity to present a case that he was wrongly accused, but that he "squandered" that opportunity. Short of making a stronger initial showing that he was innocent, Marri has no right to cross-examine government officials or more deeply investigate the government's allegations against him, the court ruled.

Marri is appealing that decision.

Anti-terror Program Subject Of Constitutional Arguments (AP)

By Dan Sewell

AP, January 31, 2007

CINCINNATI - President Bush's program of secretly monitoring communications without a court warrant faces legal assaults on its constitutionality in arguments Wednesday in a federal appeals court.

The government is appealing the ruling of a federal district judge in Detroit who said the warrantless surveillance violated rights of privacy and free speech as well as separation of powers. The Justice Department last week urged the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals to throw out the case, saying it was no longer at issue.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said this month that the secret panel of judges who oversee the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, passed by Congress in 1978, is now reviewing and approving applications to monitor people believed to have terrorist links. The Justice Department said in a court brief that means there's "no longer any live genuine controversy to adjudicate."

The American Civil Liberties Union, which sued over the warrantless surveillance a year ago, countered that there's no guarantee that the president won't resume what the government calls the Terrorist Surveillance Program outside the court. The ACLU also is challenging government secrecy in the case, saying it can't determine whether current actions are following the law.

"For all the drama around the case, we see the ultimate legal issue to be a very narrow, noncontroversial one - that is, when Congress passes a law, the president has to follow it," said Ann Beeson, the ACLU's lead attorney on the case. "If they were really committed to following the FISA law in the future, they should have no objection to being bound by the district court order."

DOJ_NMG_0124877

The Justice Department said in brief filed Tuesday that the court shouldn't be asked to rule on a hypothetical question about the future. U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor had ordered the government to halt the warrantless surveillance.

The National Security Agency program monitors international phone calls and e-mails to or from the United States when one party is believed to be a terrorist or to have terrorist ties. The government had said it sometimes needed to act without waiting for the secret court. The administration also has said the program has helped prevent terrorist attacks.

"If al-Qaida is calling in to the United States, we want to know why they're calling," the president said while defending the program last year.

A three-judge panel will hear the arguments in Cincinnati. The same panel in October ruled that the government could continue the monitoring while it appealed.

Legal scholars and attorneys who have argued before the 6th Circuit say it's difficult to characterize the court's leanings on such issues.

"It's been pretty sharply divided on a number of issues, such as the death penalty," said Carl Tobias, a law professor at the University of Richmond (Va.) who has been following this case.

Of 14 judges in the circuit, eight were appointed by Republican presidents. On this panel, Judge Julia Smith Gibbons was appointed by President Bush, Judge Alice M. Batchelder by his father, and Judge Ronald Lee Gilman by President Clinton.

The panel probably will not rule immediately, and its ruling could result in appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court or a review by the full 6th Circuit. The 6th Circuit includes Ohio, Kentucky, Michigan and Tennessee.

The ACLU filed its lawsuit on behalf of journalists, scholars and lawyers claiming the program has made it difficult for them to do their jobs because they believe many of their overseas contacts are likely targets. Other groups have also filed challenges to the program in other courts; this case has proceeded the furthest.

ON THE NET

U.S. 6th Circuit Court of Appeals: http://www.ca6.uscourts.gov

Surveillance Case To Pit Strong Views (LAT)

By Henry Weinstein, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 31, 2007

The U.S. argues that the ACLU challenge of Bush's domestic wiretap program is moot.

CINCINNATI — One of the Bush administration's most controversial initiatives in the war on terrorism is set for its first hearing in a federal appeals court in Cincinnati today, but if government lawyers have their way, the case will quickly be dismissed.

Justice Department attorneys contend that the challenge by the American Civil Liberties Union to the government's warrantless domestic surveillance program is moot because the program is now being monitored by a special court. They are asking that the ruling saying the program is unconstitutional be thrown out.

But ACLU lawyers say the case is still viable and are calling on the U.S. 6th Circuit Court of Appeals to affirm U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor's ruling in August that the Terrorist Surveillance Program violated the 1st and 4th amendments to the Constitution and ran afoul of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act.

Each side has described the case in stark terms.

The government lawyers, led by Solicitor General Paul D. Clement, say in their brief that "this case presents issues of the gravest order to the nation." If the appeals court construed FISA to prohibit the surveillance program, "it would be an unconstitutional encroachment on the executive's constitutional authority (and duty) to gather foreign intelligence, defend the nation against attack, and command the armed forces during wartime," the brief says.

The ACLU says in its brief that the case raises the fundamental questions of "whether the president has the authority to violate statutory law and the Constitution by engaging in warrantless wiretapping inside the United States. The district court correctly held that he does not."

The case stems from a program the Bush administration started after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. National Security Agency personnel listen in on phone calls and obtain e-mails into and out of the U.S. involving individuals suspected of being affiliated with terrorists.

Until very recently, the program bypassed the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court, which was created by Congress in 1978 after revelations of government abuses.

DOJ_NMG_0124878

From 1978 through 2004, this court, made up of judges from around the country, rejected only four out of nearly 19,000 surveillance requests. The Bush administration nevertheless concluded that getting the court's approval limited its flexibility in looking for terrorists.

On Jan. 17, just two weeks before the government's appeal was to be heard in Cincinnati, Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales disclosed that the panel of judges overseeing the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act had started reviewing and approving government requests to spy on people thought to have ties to Al Qaeda.

Consequently, the government said the court challenge "no longer has any live significance."

At the same time, Justice Department lawyers said they were not backing away from their fundamental position: that the president has the "inherent authority" as the nation's commander in chief to conduct such surveillance activities.

ACLU attorney Ann Beeson countered that the government's failure to concede that point means that the case is still very much alive. "The government cannot have it both ways," Beeson wrote in a brief filed Friday. "It cannot argue that the case is moot because the government is currently in compliance with FISA, and at the same time expressly retain the authority to violate FISA tomorrow."

Before Gonzales' announcement, friend-of-the-court briefs had been filed supporting both positions.

Leading constitutional scholars, the Los Angeles County Bar Assn., the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press and several other organizations lodged papers in support of the ACLU. The Center for Security Policy, the Committee on the Present Danger, Judicial Watch and several other groups submitted briefs in support of the administration.

"Article II of the Constitution commands the president to respond to attacks against the nation from foreign aggressors…. This plenary authority to wage war includes the authority to gather intelligence concerning enemy activity," wrote attorney Andrew G. McBride in one of the pro-government friend-of-the-court briefs.

But a brief written by Stanford constitutional law professor Kathleen M. Sullivan says the government had gone much too far. "Whatever inherent powers the president might have under Article II [of the Constitution], they do not include the power to conduct a warrantless domestic surveillance campaign, of indefinite duration and unlimited scope, where a duly enacted statute expressly prohibits such conduct," Sullivan wrote.

A panel of three federal appellate judges — one appointed by a Democratic president and two by Republican presidents — are to hear the case.

Legal scholars are divided in predicting how the panel will approach the case, but some say the government appears to be facing more sympathetic jurists in Cincinnati than it did in Detroit before Judge Taylor, a liberal who came out of the civil rights movement.

In fact, the government has been unusually critical of Taylor in its briefs, saying she handled the case in a "heavy-handed" and "blunderbuss" fashion.

As is the custom, Taylor, an appointee of President Carter, has not commented on those characterizations. In her opinion in August, she specifically rejected the contention that the president had inherent authority to create a surveillance program that would not be subject to judicial scrutiny. "There are no hereditary kings in America and no powers not created by the Constitution," Taylor said in her 44-page decision.

*

henry.weinstein@latimes.com

Bush Is Not Above The Law (NYT)

By James Bamford

The New York Times, January 31, 2007

Washington

LAST August, a federal judge found that the president of the United States broke the law, committed a serious felony and violated the Constitution. Had the president been an ordinary citizen — someone charged with bank robbery or income tax evasion — the wheels of justice would have immediately begun to turn. The F.B.I. would have conducted an investigation, a United States attorney's office would have impaneled a grand jury and charges would have been brought.

But under the Bush Justice Department, no F.B.I. agents were ever dispatched to padlock White House files or knock on doors and no federal prosecutors ever opened a case.

The ruling was the result of a suit, in which I am one of the plaintiffs, brought against the National Security Agency by the American Civil Liberties Union. It was a response to revelations by this newspaper in December 2005 that the agency had been monitoring the phone calls and e-mail messages of Americans for more than four years without first obtaining warrants from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court, as required by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act.

DOJ_NMG_0124879

In the past, even presidents were not above the law. When the F.B.I. turned up evidence during Watergate that Richard Nixon had obstructed justice by trying to cover up his involvement, a special prosecutor was named and a House committee recommended that the president be impeached.

And when an independent counsel found evidence that President Bill Clinton had committed perjury in the Monica Lewinsky case, the impeachment machinery again cranked into gear, with the spectacle of a Senate trial (which ended in acquittal).

Laws are broken, the federal government investigates, and the individuals involved — even if they're presidents — are tried and, if found guilty, punished. That is the way it is supposed to work under our system of government. But not this time.

Last Aug. 17, Judge Anna Diggs Taylor of the United States District Court in Detroit issued her ruling in the A.C.L.U. case. The president, she wrote, had "undisputedly violated" not only the First and Fourth Amendments of the Constitution, but also statutory law, the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. Enacted by a bipartisan Congress in 1978, the FISA statute was a response to revelations that the National Security Agency had conducted warrantless eavesdropping on Americans. To deter future administrations from similar actions, the law made a violation a felony punishable by a $10,000 fine and five years in prison.

Yet despite this ruling, the Bush Justice Department never opened an F.B.I. investigation, no special prosecutor was named, and there was no talk of impeachment in the Republican-controlled Congress.

Justice Department lawyers argued last June that warrants were not required for what they called the administration's "terrorist surveillance program" because of the president's "inherent powers" to order eavesdropping and because of the Congressional authorization to use military force against those responsible for 9/11. But Judge Taylor rejected both arguments, ruling that even presidents must obey statutory law and the Constitution.

On Jan. 17, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales unexpectedly declared that President Bush had ended the program, deciding to again seek warrants in all cases. Exactly what kind of warrants — individual, as is required by the law, or broad-based, which would probably still be illegal — is as yet unknown.

The action may have been designed to forestall a potentially adverse ruling by the federal appeals court in Cincinnati, which had scheduled oral arguments on the case for today. At that hearing, the administration is now expected to argue that the case is moot and should be thrown out — while reserving the right to restart the program at any time.

But that's a bit like a bank robber coming into court and arguing that, although he has been sticking up banks for the past half-decade, he has agreed to a temporary halt and therefore he shouldn't be prosecuted. Independent of the A.C.L.U. case, a criminal investigation by the F.B.I. and a special prosecutor should begin immediately. The question that must finally be answered is whether the president is guilty of committing a felony by continuously reauthorizing the warrantless eavesdropping program for the past five years. And if so, what action must be taken?

The issue is not original. Among the charges approved by the House Judiciary Committee when it recommended its articles of impeachment against President Nixon was "illegal wiretaps." President Nixon, the bill charged, "caused wiretaps to be placed on the telephones of 17 persons without having obtained a court order authorizing the tap, as required by federal law; in violation of Sections 241, 371 and 2510-11 of the Criminal Code."

Under his program, President Bush could probably be charged with wiretapping not 17 but thousands of people without having obtained a court order authorizing the taps as required by federal law, in violation of FISA.

It is not only the federal court but also many in Congress who believe that a violation of law has taken place. In a hearing on Jan. 18, the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, Patrick Leahy of Vermont, said, "For years, this administration has engaged in warrantless wiretapping of Americans contrary to the law."

His view was shared by the Senate Intelligence Committee chairman, Jay Rockefeller of West Virginia, who said of Mr. Bush, "For five years he has been operating an illegal program."

And Senator Arlen Specter, the Pennsylvania Republican who is the ranking member on the Judiciary Committee, noted that much of the public was opposed to the program and that it both hurt the country at home and damaged its image abroad. "The heavy criticism which the president took on the program," he said, "I think was very harmful in the political process and for the reputation of the country."

To allow a president to break the law and commit a felony for more than five years without even a formal independent investigation would be the ultimate subversion of the Constitution and the rule of law. As Judge Taylor warned in her decision, "There are no hereditary kings in America."

Germany May Indict U.S. Agents In 2004 Abduction (LAT)

By Jeffrey Fleishman And John Goetz, Special To The Times

The Los Angeles Times, January 31, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0124880

The 13 operatives are said to have taken part in a Muslim's kidnapping.

BERLIN — German investigators have recommended that prosecutors issue arrest warrants for 13 U.S. intelligence operatives in connection with the kidnapping, beating and secret detention of a German citizen suspected of having links to terrorist networks.

The operatives are said to have been part of a CIA-sponsored team that transported alleged terrorists to interrogation camps around the world. Investigators say the group forced a handcuffed and blindfolded Khaled Masri, a German citizen of Lebanese descent, onto a Boeing 737 in Macedonia and flew him to Afghanistan in January 2004. Masri was never charged with a crime, and was released after five months.

German law enforcement officials said indictments could be filed as early as this week against the suspects, including four pilots, a medic and members of an operations unit. The most serious charge is expected to be kidnapping, according to an official who asked not to be named. None of the suspects, who include CIA contract employees, have been named publicly.

The Masri case has strained U.S.-German relations and led to a parliamentary investigation of allegations that German intelligence agents were involved in the abduction. Investigators also have examined discrepancies about when high-ranking government officials were informed of Masri's fate.

The prospect of criminal charges in the Masri ordeal comes as an Italian court is deliberating whether to order the trial of 26 Americans and nine Italians implicated in the February 2003 abduction of a radical Egyptian cleric known as Abu Omar. The Italian government may demand the extradition of the accused Americans, including the former CIA station chief in Milan, where Omar was snatched from a sidewalk.

The CIA has not commented on the Masri case, although White House, Justice Department and agency officials have argued that U.S. laws authorized such covert operations, and that they have been assured that no suspects have been tortured.

Legal experts say it is extremely unlikely the U.S. government would turn over suspects for legal proceedings in either Germany or Italy.

Both cases have outraged lawmakers across the Continent and underscored the legal and human rights questions dividing the U.S. and Europe on countering terrorism. But they also have indicated that some European governments may have been complicit in the CIA program, known as "extraordinary renditions," to capture and transport suspected militants to secret prisons for interrogations that sometimes included torture.

Legal documents, credit card receipts and hotel records show that those allegedly involved in the Masri abduction stayed at a luxury resort on the Spanish island of Majorca before flying to Skopje, Macedonia, on Jan. 23, 2004. When checking into the hotel, some of the operatives gave aliases, such as Kirk James Bird and James Fairing. The covert team's charges in Majorca included a food bill of $1,625 and an $81 charge for a massage.

Masri's odyssey began weeks earlier, when he was pulled off a bus on New Year's Eve 2003 while crossing the Serbian border into Macedonia. The car salesman and father of four told the Los Angeles Times in 2005 that he had left Germany for a holiday. He said Macedonian security officials seized him and drove him from the border to a hotel in Skopje, the capital, where he was interrogated for days and accused of being an extremist.

Masri said he was threatened at gunpoint and was denied repeated requests to contact German authorities. One night, he said, he was blindfolded and taken to an airport.

"I was led into a room. The door closed behind me and I was beaten from all sides for about one minute," he said. "They bent my arms to my back and cut off my clothes…. I saw seven to eight men all dressed in black and wearing masks. I tried to keep my underpants on but they ripped them off. They put me in diapers and a dark blue sweatsuit with the legs and sleeves cut out."

Aviation records viewed by The Times show that a jet registered to a company with links to the CIA landed at Skopje airport at 8:51 p.m. on Jan. 23, 2004. The plane left Skopje hours later, at 2:30 a.m., flying to Baghdad, then to Afghanistan.

Masri said he was drugged for the flight and remembers waking up in "a small, dirty cell." He said he was interrogated in cycles by Americans and a man he referred to as Sam, who spoke fluent German. Much of the questioning, Masri said, dealt with his attendance at a mosque frequented by radicals in his hometown of Ulm, Germany.

Masri said he went on a hunger strike for 37 days until he was force-fed. He was released in the mountains of Albania five months after he disappeared.

Around the time Masri was freed, the American ambassador to Germany, Daniel R. Coats, informed the German Interior Ministry that the U.S. had detained a German citizen and was preparing to release him. The Germans, however, say they weren't told about Masri until after he was released. The question of when the German officials knew, and why they kept quiet about the incident, is part of the parliamentary investigation.

One theory to explain the kidnapping, according to officials who asked not to be identified, may be that the captors mistook Masri for a man by the same name who is suspected of terrorist links to Al Qaeda. There also have been suggestions that U.S.

intelligence wanted to learn more about the mosque in Ulm, where several known militants who fought in the separatist Russian republic of Chechnya were known to worship.

German prosecutors said they were convinced early on that Masri's tale of abduction and imprisonment was true. They have repeatedly blamed the U.S. for not cooperating with the investigation. In December 2005, Masri filed suit against the CIA in a U.S. district court. A judge dismissed the lawsuit last year, saying that a trial would "present a grave risk of injury to national security." The decision is being appealed.

U.S. Judge Ends 20-Year Case To Deport 2 Tied To Terrorists (NYT)

By Randal C. Archibold

The New York Times, January 31, 2007

LOS ANGELES, Jan. 30 — Chastising the government with poetry and blunt language, an immigration judge on Tuesday ended 20-year-old deportation proceedings against two of eight men who had been accused of ties to a Palestinian organization classified as a terrorist group.

The judge, Bruce J. Einhorn, of Immigration Court here, faulted the government for repeated delays in producing evidence that the two, who with the others became known as the L.A. Eight, should be deported as a threat to the United States.

The case has been monitored by civil libertarians, who see it as an example of overreaching in terror cases.

Officials had accused the men, seven Palestinians and a Kenyan, of supporting the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, a branch of the Palestinian Liberation Organization that the government classifies as a terrorist group.

The eight denied being members and accused the government, which never filed criminal charges against them, of political persecution.

The two men, Khader Musa Hamide and Michel Ibrahim Shehadeh, are the sole remaining defendants and the only ones who were legal permanent residents when the case began.

One of the others returned to the Palestinian areas. The other five, who had been charged with violating temporary visas, were given legal permanent residency. One became a United States citizen during the proceedings, which included appeals to the Supreme Court.

“I certainly hope it is the end of the road,” said David Cole, a lawyer with the Center for Constitutional Rights in New York, which represented the two men along with the American Civil Liberties Union of Southern California and the National Lawyers Guild.

Mr. Hamide, 52, a coffee and tea wholesaler who has lived in the country for 35 years, said the ruling relieved him.

“This is a dark cloud that has hung over our lives for 20 years,” he said. “This was over expression of political views that may not be popular but we have a right to make.”

Virginia Kice, a spokeswoman for Immigrations and Customs Enforcement, said, “I.C.E. finds the judge’s decision troubling as a matter of fact and law, and the agency is considering its legal options.”

Judge Einhorn began his ruling with a quotation from the poet William Knox’s “Songs of Israel,” a paean to mortality that begins, “On why the spirit of mortal be proud?”

“Since time began to tick,” he continued, “human beings have contemplated their mortality with the certainty that they face a worldly end. Such certainty must come to cases as well.”

At another point the judge criticized the government’s nine-month delay in responding to an order due on June 27, 2005. “One could conceive, carry and deliver a child during the course of the government’s delay,” he wrote.

In the end, he said, the government failed to prove that the men were deportable.

U.S. Loses 20-year Attempt To Deport 2 Immigrants (LAT)

By Henry Weinstein, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 31, 2007

An immigration judge criticizes federal conduct in the case against the pair, both legal residents, accused of terrorist ties.

A federal immigration judge has dismissed the government's attempt to deport two men who were arrested along with six other U.S. residents because of their alleged ties to Palestinian terrorists and who fought relentless efforts to force them to leave the country for 20 years.

Judge Bruce E. Einhorn of Los Angeles, in a ruling made public Tuesday, said the government had violated the constitutional rights of Khader M. Hamide and Michel I. Shehadeh by its "gross failure" to comply with his instructions to produce "potentially exculpatory and other relevant information."

In a scathing decision, Einhorn said the government's conduct in the case was "an embarrassment to the rule of law" that left "a festering wound on" Hamide and Shehadeh, who have been in legal and personal limbo for two decades.

DOJ_NMG_0124882

The two men, both longtime legal residents of the United States, are part of a group that was dubbed "the L.A. 8" after the government launched attempts to deport them in January 1987. All eight denied that they were members of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, or PFLP, a radical offshoot of the Palestine Liberation Organization that has taken credit for airline hijackings and car bombings in the Middle East.

Hamide and Shehadeh, as well as the others, steadfastly maintained that they were being persecuted even though their political activities — distributing newspapers, participating in demonstrations, assisting Palestinians with human rights and medical needs, raising money for hospitals, youth clubs and day-care centers — were lawful.

Einhorn's ruling "is a great decision that really vindicates what we have said all along," a jubilant Hamide said in an interview Tuesday. "The government spent millions of dollars and thousands of hours trying to deport us, and the only things they ever accused us of were constitutionally protected activity.

"The government should drop this case and leave us alone to lead normal lives — if there is such a thing after a case like this — and pursue real terrorists," said Hamide, 52, who lives in Chino Hills and is in the coffee distribution business.

Shehadeh, 50, said he was "feeling very, very good about the decision. This might be the moment we have been waiting for, for the last 20 years, a moment of relief and vindication."

But Shehadeh, who lives in Oregon, where one of his sons is in college, quickly added, "Another side of me is still cautious. After 20 years it becomes ingrained in you…. This might not be the end of it."

And indeed it might not be. The government has not said whether it will appeal the decision. A Justice Department spokesman said the agency had no comment. The Department of Homeland Security declined to comment.

Prosecutors never filed criminal charges against any of the eight. Late last year, Aiad Barakat, another member of the L.A. 8, was sworn in as a U.S. citizen in Los Angeles. Three other members of the L.A. 8 have obtained permanent residency. One member of the group is still seeking that status, and the other has returned to the West Bank city of Bethlehem.

Over two decades, the immigrants won a number of key decisions, including one from the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals in 1998 that held that the Constitution does not permit "guilt by association." That court ruled that the deportation of Hamide and Shehadeh could not go forward unless the government showed that the men intended to support the "illegal group goals of the PFLP."

But government lawyers twice persuaded Congress to change laws and make them retroactive in an effort to be able to deport the two men, said San Francisco attorney Marc Van Der Hout of the National Lawyers Guild, who has represented them for 20 years.

The two sides stipulated to Einhorn that the PFLP "engaged in terrorist activities" from 1984 to 1986, but also provided day care, healthcare and Social Security services as well as cultural events.

This week's ruling was the second time Einhorn threw out the case. The judge said that the government missed the deadline for turning over exculpatory information by nine months and that even then its response was inadequate.

The judge said the government's conduct was particularly troubling given how long the case had taken and the nature of the charges.

"A reasonable argument could be made that if Hamide and Shehadeh have engaged in terrorist activity, particularly in the context of today's world, then the government would be prepared to move heaven and Earth — not to mention some mounds of paper — to complete the trial and deportation" of the duo.

In particular, Einhorn blasted John H. Clarkson III, assistant general counsel of the National Security Branch of the FBI, for responses to the court that were a "misuse of black-letter law," a reference to legal principles that are not disputable.

Einhorn said the government had broad but not unlimited powers in immigration matters.

"While this court may be one of limited jurisdiction, it is not an impotent institution," Einhorn wrote.

If there were no consequences for the government's failure to discharge its court-ordered responsibilities, it would mean that an immigration judge would be "reduced to the status of Blanche Dubois, who must rely on the kindness of strangers," he wrote, referring to the character in Tennessee Williams' play "A Streetcar Named Desire."

"Judge Einhorn's decision is important not only for Hamide and Shehadeh, but for all immigrants in this country who want to be able to express their political views," Van Der Hout said.

"The decision makes clear that the government cannot blatantly refuse to comply with an immigration judge's orders and that the government cannot continue to try to deport these permanent residents who did nothing but try to advocate for Palestinians' right to a homeland — hardly a revolutionary belief in the 21st century."

Added Georgetown University law professor David Cole, who has been co-lead counsel for the L.A. 8, on behalf of the Center for Constitutional Rights, since the case began: "For 20 years the government has been attempting to deport these individuals for political activities that would clearly be protected if they were U.S. citizens. We hope that the government will now move on and focus its efforts on real terrorists and not political activists."

DOJ_NMG_0124883

*

henry.weinstein@latimes.com

2 Accused Of Terror Ties To Stay In U.S. (AP)

By Associated Press

AP, January 31, 2007

Judge Bruce J. Einhorn ruled the government had denied Khader Hamide and Michel Shehadeh, members of the so-called "L.A. Eight," due process by keeping them in legal limbo for so many years and being unprepared to prosecute the case.

In his 11-page opinion, Einhorn described the proceedings as "a festering wound on the body of respondents and an embarrassment to the rule of law." He scolded the government for failing to release evidence favorable to the men after he had ordered it.

The two men, five other Palestinians and a Kenyan faced deportation since 1987. They were arrested on suspicion of association with the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, a radical offshoot of the Palestine Liberation Organization, which has opposed peace negotiations between the PLO and Israel. The U.S. government considers it a terrorist organization.

The eight have denied being members, and immigrant rights groups have called the case politically motivated.

Attorney Marc Van Der Hout, who represents the "L.A. Eight," said the judge's order will make it safer for immigrants to express political views.

U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement "finds the judge's decision troubling as a matter of fact and law, and the agency is considering its legal options," according to an agency statement.

Four of the eight, including Hamide and Shehadeh, have legal residency, according to immigration officials. Two remain in immigration proceedings, while the status of the final two was not immediately known.

Terror Inquiry Turns To Tax Law (WSJ)

By Glenn R. Simpson

The Wall Street Journal, January 31, 2007

The Justice Department is investigating possible criminal tax-law violations by a Boston private-equity firm that manages hundreds of millions of dollars for Muslim investors in Europe and the Middle East and is affiliated with a Swiss investment group U.S. authorities suspect of financing Islamic extremists.

Federal prosecutors disclosed a grand-jury probe of Overland Capital Group Inc. in filings last week with U.S. District Court in Boston. While the Boston grand jury is examining suspected tax evasion related to complex investment structures, the case is being handled by a prosecutor from the Justice Department's counterterrorism division, the filing states.

In the years since the Sept. 11 attacks, U.S. counterterrorism agencies have been stymied in several attempts to bring terrorism cases against wealthy individuals from the Middle East. Some prosecutors have pushed the government to use tax laws as a more effective approach, a method famously employed against gangster Al Capone in 1931.

Overland, which doesn't disclose its ownership, says on its Web site that it has made more than $1.5 billion in U.S. investments for its clients, largely in real estate, since its founding in October 2001.

Legal records say Overland is controlled by a Geneva-based financial group known as Dar Al-Maal Al-Islami Trust, which was founded by a senior member of the royal family of Saudi Arabia. The U.S. government is treating the companies as related: The Justice Department is examining "acts and practices" of Overland and a DMI subsidiary "that implicate potential violation of the Internal Revenue Code," the filing states.

DMI is the hub of a network of banks and investment funds across Europe and the Middle East that cater to Muslims interested in strictly following Quranic principles, such as a ban on collecting interest. Some DMI affiliates came under scrutiny by U.S. counterterrorism agencies in the mid-1990s for suspected connections to extremists, government records show.

In general, the U.S. and other Western governments are investigating whether terrorist groups are able to move money with help from sympathizers in the Islamic-banking movement. Intelligence and law-enforcement officials say they are concerned the industry's often-opaque practices lend themselves to money laundering and other financial crimes.

DMI officials have said the company has no involvement with terrorists or extremists. "We have never had any relationship with these kinds of people," said Mouaouia Mokhtari, DMI's director of corporate affairs. None of DMI's officials have ever been charged with terror-related offenses.

Overland Chief Executive James Godec didn't respond to requests for comment. An Overland spokesman had no comment.

While Mr. Mokhtari said there is no relationship between DMI and Overland, he said, "DMI has sister companies, and those sister companies have retained Overland occasionally as investment advisers."

DOJ_NMG_0124884

DMI and Overland are partners in a joint venture in Bahrain, and numerous corporate filings in the U.S. name DMI's chief executive as the president of various Overland-backed investment ventures.

Corporate and bank records show Overland has borrowed large sums from a DMI subsidiary, the Bahamas-registered Islamic Investment Co. of the Gulf Ltd. Legal records also describe DMI as an indirect 60% shareholder in Overland. Two former Overland employees also claim in a civil lawsuit that Overland is owned or controlled by DMI.

Overland identifies potential real-estate investments in the U.S., such as luxury condominiums and apartments, according to its Web site. Its investments include a stake in 30 rental units atop the Four Seasons Hotel in Houston. It then arranges for its clients to participate in these deals.

The nature of the tax inquiry isn't explained in the government's filings. But Overland's foreign backers have structured many of their U.S. investments through a network of shell companies in offshore tax havens such as the Cayman Islands, according to corporate and legal records.

Using such offshore companies, investors can structure their U.S. investments as loans instead of equity. That offers potential tax benefits because interest income to foreign investors is taxed far more lightly than profits from an equity investment. Such arrangements are legal, but only if they aren't primarily intended to circumvent Internal Revenue Service rules.

Dar Al-Maal Al-Islami (Arabic for "Islamic House of Finance") was founded in the early 1980s by Saudi Prince Mohammed Al-Faisal Al-Saud, a pioneer in so-called Islamic banking. Senior members of the Muslim Brotherhood, an international fundamentalist group, have held positions at various DMI affiliates, according to corporate records.

The Brotherhood, founded in Egypt in the 1920s, is the ideological inspiration for the terrorist groups al Qaeda and Hamas, but it now says it has renounced violence.

A DMI affiliate called Faisal Private Bank (Switzerland) SA, formerly known as Faisal Finance, has been named in two major terrorism probes. In one of these, the Justice Department alleges that Faisal Finance wired $665,000 to the account of a top Hamas leader, Mousa Abu Marzouk. (The source of those funds hasn't been disclosed.)

In the same prosecution, the Justice Department alleges that in 1993, a Saudi businessman used Faisal Finance to transfer $30,000 to an alleged Hamas leader in Chicago named Muhammad Salah, who is currently on trial in Chicago on terrorism-related conspiracy charges. The same Saudi businessman, Yassin Qadi, also used Faisal Finance for a $1.25 million transfer to an alleged al Qaeda front company in 1998, according to legal and bank records.

Faisal Finance hasn't been charged with any crimes, but shortly after the Sept. 11 attacks, Mr. Qadi was named a "Specially Designated Terrorist" by the Treasury Department for alleged support of al Qaeda. Mr. Qadi has denied financing terrorists. Another Faisal Finance client, al Qaeda leader Mamduh Mahmud Salim, was convicted of conspiring to kill American citizens and is now in federal prison.

DMI and Faisal Finance are defendants in civil litigation in the southern district of New York brought by families of victims of the Sept. 11 attacks, who claim they funded al Qaeda. The firms have denied any involvement with terrorism.

A copy of the Justice Department filing was made available to The Wall Street Journal by Geoffrey Harper, a lawyer for a former Overland employee, Laird Fairchild. Mr. Harper said his client has provided information to the grand jury. Mr. Fairchild and another former Overland employee are in a legal dispute with Overland and DMI, claiming wrongful dismissal.

A Key Padilla Charge Is Reinstated (WP/AP)

By Curt Anderson

The Washington Post, January 31, 2007

MIAMI, Jan. 30 -- A federal appeals court on Tuesday reinstated a key terrorism charge, the only one carrying a potential sentence of life in prison, against suspected al-Qaeda operative Jose Padilla.

A three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 11th Circuit agreed with federal prosecutors that the charge that Padilla and his two co-defendants conspired to "murder, kidnap and maim" people overseas did not duplicate other counts in the indictment.

The Atlanta-based court reversed a decision last summer by U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke, who said the three charges in the indictment contained nearly identical elements and could subject the defendants to extra punishment for the same act, violating protections against double jeopardy.

Padilla was arrested in May 2002 at Chicago's O'Hare International Airport, and the government alleged that he was plotting to detonate a radioactive "dirty bomb" in a major U.S. city. President Bush declared Padilla an enemy combatant, and he was held without criminal charges for 3 1/2 years until he was indicted in late 2005 in Miami. The "dirty bomb" allegations are not part of the Miami case.

DOJ_NMG_0124885

Although defense attorneys may file a challenge, Tuesday's ruling brings the case a step closer to trial as scheduled April 16. The appeals court had agreed to hear the case on an expedited basis after Cooke said she would not begin jury selection until the issue was settled.

"We are gratified by the 11th Circuit's swift decision and look forward to presenting the evidence at trial," U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta said in Miami.

Defense lawyers have 21 days to ask the panel to rehear the case or request that the full appeals court take it up. Attorneys for Padilla and his co-defendants did not immediately return messages seeking comment.

The two other main terrorism-support charges against Padilla and his co-defendants each carry maximum prison terms of 15 years.

Padilla, 36, is charged with being part of a North American terrorism support cell that provided personnel, materiel and money to extremist Islamic causes. He and his co-defendants -- Adham Amin Hassoun, 44, and Kifah Wael Jayyousi, 45 -- have pleaded not guilty.

Terror Charge Is Reinstated (FLSUNSEN)

By Vanessa Blum, South Florida Sun-sentinel

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, January 31, 2007

A federal appeals court Tuesday reinstated the most serious terror charge against accused al-Qaida operative Jose Padilla, overturning a Miami court's determination that the charge duplicated allegations in the indictment's other two counts.

Ruling with unusual speed, a three-judge panel of the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals unanimously held that the counts were "interrelated" but not the same because a suspect could hypothetically commit each crime without committing the others.

"Although they may appear to be nested within one another, each charge stands alone from the others and requires proof of independent elements," U.S. Circuit Judge Gerald Tjoflat wrote for the panel.

The decision reverses a major pre-trial victory for Padilla and his two co-defendants and means the men will face a possible life sentence if convicted. The case is set for trial April 16.

Defense lawyers have 21 days to ask for a review by the full appeals court. Padilla's lawyers could not be reached for comment.

Attorney Kenneth Swartz, who represents co-defendant Adham Amin Hassoun, said defense lawyers are reviewing their options.

Padilla, 36; Hassoun, 44; and Kifah Wael Jayyousi, 45, are charged with taking part in a North American terror cell that sent money, supplies and recruits to radical Islamic groups fighting overseas.

Hassoun, a former computer programmer in Sunrise, recruited Padilla to travel to the Middle East as a religious fighter after the two met through a South Florida mosque, according to prosecutors. Jayyousi, a former public school official in Detroit and Washington, D.C., is charged with running various organizations that paid for and promoted violent jihad. The men have pleaded not guilty.

The count dismissed by U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke in August -- a charge of conspiracy to commit murder, maiming and kidnapping overseas -- carries a possible life sentence. The indictment's other counts, accusing the men of providing material support to a terrorist plot, carry a total possible sentence of 20 years.

Letters To The Editor (PPG)

Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, January 31, 2007

We are using lawful tools to fight terrorism

Because your Jan. 19 editorial ("Spy Reversal") on the Terrorist Surveillance Program (TSP) and the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court (FISC) may have left readers with some inaccurate impressions, I offer the following response:

First, the TSP falls well within the president's constitutional authority, recognized and supplemented by Congress in the aftermath of Sept. 11, 2001, to protect Americans by intercepting the international communications of a lethal enemy.

Second, the Justice Department began exploring options for FISC approval for the collection of international al-Qaida communications into and out of the United States in the spring of 2005, well before the first press accounts disclosing the existence of the TSP. It took considerable time and effort, however, for the government to develop this new approach, which has the speed and agility offered by the TSP, and for a judge of the FISC to consider and approve these orders. The new FISC orders are innovative and complex, but the result is that any electronic surveillance that may have occurred previously under the TSP will now be subject to the approval of the FISC. Accordingly, under these circumstances, the president has determined not to reauthorize the TSP when the current authorization expires.

DOJ_NMG_0124886

Third, the attorney general directed department officials to brief the Senate and House Intelligence committees, as well as other key members of Congress, on the new orders. Although the existence of these orders has been made public, the contents of the orders remain highly classified. The disclosure of such information could reveal to our enemies aspects of our intelligence capabilities and allow them to evade detection.

The intelligence community has confirmed the value of the TSP in providing us information we would not otherwise have had and that these new orders will fulfill that critical function. The attorney general and the Justice Department are committed to fighting terrorism and using all lawful tools to protect our nation in a manner that respects and preserves the civil liberties of all Americans.

TASIA SCOLINOS
Director of Public Affairs
U.S. Department of Justice
Washington, D.C.

British Police Arrest 8 On Terror Charges (AP)

AP, January 31, 2007

BIRMINGHAM, England -- Police arrested eight people on Wednesday in Birmingham on suspicion of committing, preparing or instigating terrorism, West Midlands Police said.

Police gave no details of the allegations against the suspects.

Police raided several addresses beginning at 4 a.m., police said.

The operation was led by the Midlands Counterterrorism unit, supported by West Midlands Police and London's Metropolitan Police.

Last week, police arrested five people in terrorism investigations in the English cities of Manchester and Halifax.

Rizwan Ditta, 29, and Mohammed Dilal, 26, of Halifax were later charged with possession of information of use to terrorists.

Three men arrested by Greater Manchester Police remain in custody but have not been charged.

2 Plead Guilty In Arms Deal Case (AP)

AP, January 31, 2007

BALTIMORE -- Two Indonesian men arrested with four others in an international arms buying sting last fall pleaded guilty Tuesday to trying to illegally export arms to Indonesia's military.

Reinhard Rusli, 33, and Helmi Soedirdja, 34, contacted Maryland-based undercover agents to acquire night-vision goggles and a holographic weapons sight without the proper licenses, prosecutors said.

Rusli and Soedirdja, who also pleaded guilty to money laundering, were arrested in September in Guam along with suspected international arms dealer Haji Subandi and three suspected arms brokers for the Tamil Tigers terrorist group.

The other four men have pleaded not guilty and remain in federal custody. A joint trial has been scheduled for May 14 in federal court in Baltimore.

The Tamil Tigers began fighting in 1983 for a separate state in Sri Lanka. The U.S. considers it a terrorist organization.

Rusli and Soedirdja face a maximum sentence of 20 years in prison for money laundering and 10 years in prison for attempted exportation of arms.

2 Men Plead Guilty In Arms Deal (BSUN)

By Matthew Dolan, Sun Reporter

The Baltimore Sun, January 31, 2007

Indonesians among 6 accused of seeking high-tech weapons

Two of the half-dozen men charged with paying undercover customs agents in Maryland to export restricted high-tech weapons to rebels in Sri Lanka and the Indonesian army pleaded guilty in a federal courtroom in Baltimore Tuesday.

Dressed in prison clothing, Reinhard Rusli, 34, and Helmi Soedirdja, 33, both citizens of Indonesia, entered guilty pleas to attempting to illegally export arms and money laundering.

Prosecutors accused Rusli and Soedirdja of contacting undercover agents to buy monocular night vision and holographic weapons sight devices, which they indicated would be used by the Indonesian military.

On Aug. 31, court papers say, the defendants wired $2,950 from Indonesia to the United States to obtain a monocular night vision device and holographic weapons sight. The restricted military technology cannot be exported with out a license or written authorization from the U.S. State Department.

DOJ_NMG_0124887

The pair arrived in Guam from Indonesia on Sept. 21, court papers show. Shortly after, they met with undercover agents to examine the night vision devices, according to prosecutors. Authorities said that the Indonesian men also discussed the future acquisition of additional military gear.

They were arrested in Guam by U.S. immigration agents.

Rusli and Soedirdja could face a maximum sentence of 20 years in prison on the money laundering charge and 10 years in prison for attempted exportation of arms.

But according to the terms of their plea agreement and comments from the presiding judge Tuesday, the likely prison term for Rusli and Soedirdja will be about four to five years in prison when they are sentenced April 27.

The elaborate sting operation unfolded in Baltimore last summer when federal agents put up a Singapore arms broker at a four-star Inner Harbor hotel, arranged for him to attend religious services at a mosque in Laurel and took him to a shooting range in Harford County so he could test-fire machine guns they said he was interested in buying.

The ruse, authorities said, led representatives for the Tamil Tigers insurgents in Sri Lanka to deposit $700,000 with undercover agents as a down payment for millions of dollars in sniper rifles, submachine guns and grenade launchers. The arms dealers also inquired about unmanned air vehicles and buying surface-to-air missiles to shoot down Israeli-built aircraft in Sri Lanka, according to federal court papers.

The four remaining defendants, who have pleaded not guilty, remain in federal custody pending their joint trial scheduled for May.

matthew.dolan@baltsun.com

US Judge OKs Lawsuit By Foreign Nationals Saying Bank Helped Palestinian Suicide Bombers (FINDLAW/AP)

By Tom Hays, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 31, 2007

(AP) - NEW YORK-Israelis and other foreign nationals can pursue claims in U.S. courts accusing the Jordan-based Arab Bank of promoting Palestinian suicide attacks by funneling Saudi money to bombers' families, a judge ruled.

In a written decision in federal court in Brooklyn, U.S. District Judge Nina Gershon upheld a lawsuit Monday filed under U.S. law that gives non-U.S. citizens access to courts in order to challenge violations of international laws or treaties.

Lawyers for Arab Bank had asked Gershon to toss out the suit, arguing that U.S. courts lacked proper jurisdiction.

Though the judge dismissed portions of the suit, her ruling still allows thousands of suicide bombing victims and their families to seek unspecified damages, said a plaintiff lawyer, Michael Elsner.

"Today was an incredible victory for victims of suicide bombing attacks and other acts of violence in Israel and an important lesson to banks and private individuals that aid and abet acts of terrorism," he said. "They may be held civilly liable in the United States, even if those acts occur outside the United States."

Arab Bank spokeswoman Phyllis Cuttino called the ruling "disappointing, because it is at odds" with a series of appeals court decisions dismissing similar claims.

The suit, filed in 2004, claims that Arab Bank aided terrorism by acting as the administrator of an "insurance plan" by the Saudi Committee in Support of the Intifada Al Quds, which paid $5,300 (â‚¬4,100) to the families of Palestinian bombers killed in attacks by Hamas, Islamic Jihad and Al Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades.

Arab Bank has insisted it had no intention of promoting terrorism and argued the plaintiffs could not link the bank's actions to their injuries or their relatives' deaths.

The bank "abhors terrorism" and "remains confident it will prevail at trial," its spokeswoman said.

In 2005, Gershon upheld other related suits brought by American citizens under U.S. anti-terrorism laws.

U.S. Eyes Software Touted By Islamists (WT)

By Shaun Waterman

The Washington Times, January 31, 2007

U.S. cyber-security specialists have been examining an encryption software package released earlier this month by the Global Islamic Media Front, a Web forum for supporters of Islamic terrorists.

The software package, dubbed "Mujahideen Secrets," can be used on computers in libraries and other public places to encrypt e-mail or other files being sent over the Internet, according to IDefense, a security consultant firm analyzing the program.

"The program's 'portability' as an application will become an increasingly desirable feature, especially considering the high use of Internet cafes worldwide by pro-terrorist Islamic extremists," said IDefense Middle East analyst Andretta Summerville.

DOJ_NMG_0124888

Although the package does not offer any capabilities not available in commercial encryption programs, IDefense Director of Threat Intelligence Jim Melnick said it was being promoted on forums and other Web sites used by supporters of Islamic terrorist groups.

The program "will make it easier and more comfortable for those Arabic speakers who may have been wary of using English-based encryption programs to use a program developed by their own people," Mr. Melnick said. It is "likely to reach a broad audience of pro-terrorist supporters online and Arabic-speaking hackers."

"Mujahideen Secrets," which can be downloaded for free, offers "the five best encryption algorithms, with symmetrical encryption keys, asymmetrical encryption keys and data compression," according to a translation of a Global Islamic Media Front's Jan. 1 announcement about the software, provided by Middle East Media Research Institute.

Mr. Melnick added that "Mujahideen Secrets" included a PDF file of instructions in Arabic, which noted that the developers of the package had been working on the code "for years." Mr. Melnick said another unusual, though not unique feature of the software, was that it did not supply so-called "public keys."

Keys are the code that allows encryption users to talk to each other. Possessing a key does not allow anyone to decrypt messages sent using it but does mean the user can set up a secure session with anyone else using the same key.

"Most encryption packages are designed to be interoperable," he said, but this program is not. As a result, users "must get the key to decrypt e-mail [or other files] from the person who sent it or through other private means."

Encryption capabilities are not new in the world of cyber-jihadis, said Ben Venzke of IntelCenter, a consultant group that provides counterterrorism-intelligence support to the U.S. government.

"This is consistent with the ongoing efforts of jihadist sympathizers online," he told UPI. "Encryption is used by some [Islamic terrorists]. ... Some al Qaeda manuals have addressed the question. ... It is a standard part of the operational security practiced [online] by those [Islamic terrorists] who take the time to use it."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

FBI Turns To Broad New Wiretap Method (CNET)

By Declan McCullagh, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News.com, January 30, 2007

FBI's Internet wiretaps after retiring "Carnivore" appear to involve compiling massive databases of information on thousands of users at a time.

The FBI appears to have adopted an invasive Internet surveillance technique that collects far more data on innocent Americans than previously has been disclosed.

Instead of recording only what a particular suspect is doing, agents conducting investigations appear to be assembling the activities of thousands of Internet users at a time into massive databases, according to current and former officials. That database can subsequently be queried for names, e-mail addresses or keywords.

High ImpactWhat's new:

The FBI's use of Internet wiretapping appears to involve collecting data on thousands of innocent users, with that information being loaded into a searchable database.Bottom line:

It is unclear whether such a "wiretap first, filter later" policy is legal or constitutional.

More stories on this topic

Such a technique is broader and potentially more intrusive than the FBI's Carnivore surveillance system, later renamed DCS1000. It raises concerns similar to those stirred by widespread Internet monitoring that the National Security Agency is said to have done, according to documents that have surfaced in one federal lawsuit, and may stretch the bounds of what's legally permissible.

Call it the vacuum-cleaner approach. It's employed when police have obtained a court order and an Internet service provider can't "isolate the particular person or IP address" because of technical constraints, says Paul Ohm, a former trial attorney at the Justice Department's Computer Crime and Intellectual Property Section. (An Internet Protocol address is a series of digits that can identify an individual computer.)

That kind of full-pipe surveillance can record all Internet traffic, including Web browsing--or, optionally, only certain subsets such as all e-mail messages flowing through the network. Interception typically takes place inside an Internet provider's network at the junction point of a router or network switch.

DOJ_NMG_0124889

The technique came to light at the Search & Seizure in the Digital Age symposium held at Stanford University's law school on Friday. Ohm, who is now a law professor at the University of Colorado at Boulder, and Richard Downing, a CCIPS assistant deputy chief, discussed it during the symposium.

In a telephone conversation afterward, Ohm said that full-pipe recording has become federal agents' default method for Internet surveillance. "You collect wherever you can on the (network) segment," he said. "If it happens to be the segment that has a lot of IP addresses, you don't throw away the other IP addresses. You do that after the fact."

Justice Department Takes Issue With Net-wiretapping Report (CNET)

By Declan McCullagh

CNET News.com, January 31, 2007

The U.S. Department of Justice is taking issue with an article we published Tuesday that describes how the FBI appears to be using a controversial wiretapping technique.

Our article quoted a former Justice Department attorney in the Computer Crime and Intellectual Property Section and Richard Downing, a CCIPS assistant deputy chief, who discussed this at a Stanford Law School event last week.

The wiretapping technique is used in certain cases where specific targeting is infeasible and instead all communications on a pipe are recorded for later perusal and data-mining. It raises questions about compliance with both the Wiretap Act and the Fourth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

We told the Justice Department our deadline was late Monday, but they didn't reply until late in the day Tuesday. Here's what Dean Boyd, a Justice Department spokesman, sent to us in e-mail, unedited:

Your article is inaccurate. Nothing has changed from our long-standing practice in implementing court-authorized law enforcement interception orders. The FBI records and retains only that data which it is authorized under law to record and retain -- namely, the communications associated with court-approved targets.

For your information, what law enforcement does is isolate the communications associated with the target facility and record only those communications. After law enforcement collects the targeted communications, as specified in the court order, we "minimize" the captured information by sorting it into relevant and non-relevant material (i.e., depending on whether the contents relate to the criminal activity specified in the court's order).

Such after-the-fact minimization is done with explicit authorization from the court, and no further use may be made of minimized (non-relevant) communications.

On rare occasions involving technical obstacles, we perform real-time filtering on large data connections carrying the traffic of multiple unrelated facilities, but only using automated filters that isolate and retain only the communications associated with the facility identified in the order. All data not relating to the targeted facility is instantly and irreversibly deleted. This data is therefore never read or comprehended by anyone in law enforcement.

The bottom line: Nothing has changed. We believe that Professor Ohm, quoted in the article, either was misquoted or misspoke.

We had sent Boyd a list of questions, including:

What legal authority is DOJ relying on for the "full-pipe" interception, and how long does DOJ believe 18 USC 2518(5) permits the "full-pipe" data to be retained?

Do you believe that "communications associated with court-approved targets" can in some cases include the full contents of the pipe that is associated with a target?

Does your interpretation of 2518(5) treat digital communications as a code or a foreign language?

Was your CCIPS official speaking at the conference incorrect? And, perhaps most importantly, what does the FBI do when the ISP technically is unable to minimize to capture the communications only court-appointed targets? (I presume the investigation doesn't abruptly end at that point.)

We also asked to do an actual in-person or telephone interview with a Justice Department official rather than relying on an e-mail exchange. But Boyd replied by saying:

This is all I have for you on this topic. You are free to use it or not. Thank you.

New York Lawmakers Obtain $25 Million For Ill 9/11 Workers (NYT)

By Sewell Chan

The New York Times, January 31, 2007

After impassioned pleas by members of New York's Congressional delegation, the White House agreed yesterday to spend $25 million for the care and treatment of 9/11 rescue workers who became ill after being exposed to toxic dust at ground zero.

DOJ_NMG_0124890

A preliminary federal estimate has put the total cost of treating all workers who need medical care at more than $250 million, but lawmakers said the $25 million would provide a reprieve through the end of the year for two treatment programs that last month warned they were running out of money.

"I think it's a big breakthrough," said Representative Vito J. Fossella, who met yesterday morning with Rob Portman, the director of the White House Office of Management and Budget, and with Dr. John O. Agwunobi, the assistant secretary for health at the Department of Health and Human Services.

Mr. Fossella, who represents Staten Island and part of Brooklyn and is the only Republican House member from New York City, joined other lawmakers agitating for federal aid.

Also in the group are Senators Charles E. Schumer and Hillary Rodham Clinton; Representative Carolyn B. Maloney, who represents parts of Manhattan and Queens; and Representative Jerrold L. Nadler, who represents parts of Manhattan and Brooklyn. All are Democrats.

The group obtained $75 million from Congress last year , but that money is running out. Mrs. Clinton has called for a $1.9 billion program to help the workers.

Ms. Maloney said, "I would have hoped that we would not have had to wait five years and a number of visible deaths before we got the administration to react, but it is an important step forward."

Mr. Nadler called the $25 million "a milestone" but added that it was "grossly inadequate."

Dr. Agwunobi and Dr. John Howard, director of the National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health, are co-chairmen of a task force examining the needs of 9/11 workers.

Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg issued a statement thanking President Bush "for taking this important step." The mayor said the treatment programs — one run by the Mount Sinai Medical Center and the other by the Fire Department — were "working well, but will need vastly more support from Washington."

Ms. Maloney and Mr. Fossella both said they were told by Mr. Portman that the $25 million was only a starting sum and the findings of the task force could be the basis for additional aid.

Sean Kevelighan, press secretary for the White House Office of Management and Budget, called the $25 million "a good starting point," and said: "We'll be paying close attention to the recommendations of the task force. We would be willing to reconsider the '08 budget level should the facts suggest that a different amount be appropriate."

Bush's Budget Proposes Adding 9/11 Health Funds (AP)

By Devlin Barrett

AP, January 30, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The Bush administration plans to keep funding health programs for sick ground zero workers, enough to keep the effort alive at least through 2007, the White House said Tuesday.

The administration next week will propose spending at least $25 million more to fund a Sept. 11-related health care program at Mount Sinai Medical Center in Manhattan and a related effort for New York firefighters.

White House officials said they would consider providing more money, depending on the findings of a separate government task force that is examining Sept. 11-related health issues.

"We consider this a good starting point," said White House budget spokesman Sean Kevelighan.

Rep. Vito Fossella, R-Staten Island, called the news "a breakthrough" after years of seeking more help from the government.

"For the first time in the federal budget there will be a down payment to provide for funding for continued treatment and monitoring for Sept. 11 responders who need our help," Fossella said.

Word of the new money came a day before the president was to speak in New York about the economy, and sick Sept. 11 workers planned a rally timed to the visit. It was also a week before Bush offers his budget proposal to Congress.

The issue gained new attention just last week when a former New York City police officer died of lung problems, more than five years after he worked at ground zero.

Cesar Borja, 52, died awaiting a lung transplant. His son, Ceasar Borja, Jr., 21, was tentatively scheduled to meet with the president in New York on Wednesday to discuss Sept. 11 health issues, but no specific time was given.

The son, a college student, attended Bush's annual State of the Union address to Congress last week -- hours after his father's death -- to call attention to the issue.

Fossella said he learned of the additional funding in a Tuesday morning meeting with the head of the White House budget office, Rob Portman. Two other New York Republicans, Peter King, of Long Island, and James Walsh, of Syracuse, also attended the meeting.

DOJ_NMG_0124891

The White House often gives lawmakers advance notice of good news contained in the budget proposal, which must still be approved by Congress.

Fossella and Democratic Rep. Carolyn Maloney of Manhattan have spent years lobbying for Sept. 11 health funding. Maloney, D-N.Y., called the move "long overdue," adding that the health programs should treat "all those exposed and affected," including lower Manhattan residents.

The $25 million figure would probably change after the administration gets more details from the hospital and New York City about their patients, and Fossella said the goal was not to hit a specific dollar target but to continue treating those patients.

The government delivered $75 million for the programs last year, but health advocates had warned that money was due to run out by the summer.

Rep. Jerrold Nadler, a Democrat whose district includes ground zero, said the $25 million was a "first step forward" in getting the government to respond to the health needs but argued the dollar figure was grossly inadequate.

Under the new White House proposal, those programs would remain funded through the end of the year -- and their inclusion in the president's budget suggests it may be easier to continue funding through future years.

"Obviously, it's going to cost more than $25 million," said King. "But in the course of the last year, they've seen the health problems arising from 9/11, so now the only question is what is the extent of it and how to meet those needs."

The death last week of Officer Borja is one of several fatalities that have generated increasing public pressure for the government to do more for those who are still sick years after working on the toxic debris pile at the World Trade Center site.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., has called for a $1.9 billion federal effort to provide years of treatment to those sick workers.

Mount Sinai, which has screened some 19,000 such workers, released a report last year finding nearly seven out of every 10 ground zero responders suffered lung problems.

One of the doctors who authored that study, Dr. Robin Herbert, has said thousands will likely need long-term health care.

Border Security Chief Must Walk A Fine Line (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, January 31, 2007

It's one of the toughest assignments in America: Keep terrorists from sneaking into the United States while ensuring the border is open to legitimate trade and travel.

But Assistant Commissioner Jay Ahern, who heads the Office of Field Operations at U.S. Customs and Border Protection (CBP), says the agency is up to the task.

"Knowing the destruction that can happen, there is a sense of urgency that drives all of us," Mr. Ahern said during an interview at his headquarters in Washington. "Every day I have a sick feeling in my stomach worrying whether I have addressed every problem, done everything I could to prevent another attack. And I know I'm not alone.

"The terrorists continue to plot against us; the threat is not over," he said. "While I am confident we have a much higher level of security today than we did on September 11, a lot more needs to be done. But we are getting there."

CBP officers are assigned along 7,000 miles of land border with Canada and Mexico and perform daily inspections of more than 1.2 million passengers and pedestrians at the nation's 326 land-, air- and seaports.

Carrying out the mission, Mr. Ahern said, entails security improvements at and between the nation's ports of entry and extending a "zone of security" beyond the country's physical borders, "so that American borders are the last line of defense, not the first line."

By partnering with other countries through the Container Security Initiative, Mr. Ahern said, CBP has improved its targeting systems and increased the amount of information it has on people and goods bound for the United States.

Mr. Ahern said the initiative addresses the threat posed by the potential for terrorist use of maritime containers to deliver a weapon. He said it enables CBP, working with host countries, to examine high-risk maritime containerized cargo at foreign seaports before they are loaded onto ships bound for the United States.

Teams of officers from CBP and U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement work with their foreign counterparts in North America, Europe, Asia, Africa, the Middle East, Latin America and Central America.

Mr. Ahern, a veteran U.S. Customs Service agent with 31 years in federal law enforcement, said 50 foreign ports are covered by the program -- about 87 percent of the trans-Atlantic and trans-Pacific containerized cargo shipped to the United States -- and the number of ports will grow to 58 by the end of this fiscal year.

Mr. Ahern described as "unrealistic" efforts by some members of Congress to require the scanning of 100 percent of the containers entering the U.S. through its seaports. He noted that many of the 700 ports that now send cargo to the United States have neither the means, the methods nor the inclination to participate in the program.

DOJ_NMG_0124892

"I think we need a better sense of both the cost and the potential effectiveness of such a program before we put billions of dollars into it," he said.

Mr. Ahern also called the standardization of travel documents "a critical step" in supporting CBP efforts to better secure the border and nation's ports, where about 90,000 people a year, or about 250 a day, are apprehended with fraudulent documents, including criminal aliens attempting to enter the country.

Legislators Tell Coast Guard To Revamp Rebuilding Plan (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, January 31, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 30 — Frustrated by reports of ships with cracking hulls, design flaws, cost overruns and construction delays, lawmakers demanded Tuesday that the Coast Guard's leadership overhaul its $24 billion effort to rebuild its fleet or risk the program's cancellation.

At a hearing of the House Subcommittee on Coast Guard and Maritime Transportation, committee members delivered a bipartisan lashing to the Coast Guard, which has spent several billion dollars for a new fleet but now has fewer ships available for patrols than it did in 2001.

"Our subcommittee will not allow taxpayer money to continue to be wasted for failing projects," Representative Elijah E. Cummings, Democrat of Maryland and chairman of the subcommittee, told the Coast Guard commandant, Adm. Thad W. Allen. "We must stop the waste."

Lawmakers were perhaps most disturbed over reports that the Coast Guard's first National Security Cutter, the 425-foot flagship of the new fleet, had more than doubled in cost and had design flaws that could cause cracks in its hull or deck within a few years.

Richard L. Skinner, the inspector general of the Homeland Security Department, in a report issued Monday blamed the Coast Guard for poor oversight of the design and construction of its vessels.

Already, eight smaller patrol boats rebuilt under the Coast Guard overhaul program, known as Deepwater, have been pulled from service as unseaworthy, even though the government paid $100 million for them to the Coast Guard's contractors, led by Lockheed Martin and Northrop Grumman.

"Now you have eight pieces of junk sitting at the yard," Representative Gene Taylor, Democrat of Mississippi, said at the hearing, his voice cracking with anger.

Admiral Allen, who took over the Coast Guard last May, did not dispute that Deepwater, which is intended to replace or modernize 90 ships and 200 aircraft over the next 15 years, was off to a disappointing start. "Deepwater is essential to the Coast Guard's future," he said. "We have to get it right."

To deliver on that promise, Admiral Allen said the Coast Guard would be more assertive in monitoring Lockheed and Northrop, which were hired in 2002 not just to build the ships and the planes, but also to manage the program.

The Coast Guard's chief engineer now has the power to review all aspects of the program and demand changes, Admiral Allen said. If serious disagreements occur, he added, the Coast Guard's senior managers and lawmakers are to be informed.

Members of the subcommittee expressed confidence in Admiral Allen, who replaced Michael D. Brown, the much-criticized director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, in leading the federal response to Hurricane Katrina in New Orleans.

But they made it clear that they had no tolerance for more mistakes, and that they wanted the Coast Guard to demand payments from Lockheed and Northrop if it could be documented that they had been responsible for some of the problems.

"We never had much of a margin of error," said Representative Frank A. LoBiondo, Republican of New Jersey. "We have none left at all. We can't sustain any more bad news."

Philip A. Teel, president of Northrop Grumman Ship Systems, and Leo S. Mackay Jr., president of the partnership that Northrop and Lockheed created to manage the Deepwater program, defended their performance. Mr. Teel and Dr. Mackay disputed assertions that the National Security Cutter was flawed, saying that the first ship they built, at a cost of nearly $500 million, would last 30 years as required.

But the Coast Guard, at a still undetermined cost, is planning to make major structural enhancements in the first and second ships, and then to change the design for the remaining six.

Lockheed and Northrop have been told that their contract will be extended until at least 2011, but Admiral Allen said the Coast Guard was still negotiating the terms of that deal.

Committee members asked Admiral Allen to return in four months to document that the promised improvements had been made.

"The Deepwater program seems to be in, well, deep water," said Representative Rick Larsen, Democrat of Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0124893

Contractors Defend Ship Modernization (AP)

By Dan Caterinicchia, The Associated Press

The AP, January 30, 2007

WASHINGTON — Executives from Lockheed Martin Corp. and Northrop Grumman Corp. on Tuesday fended off congressional criticism of their roles in running the Coast Guard's multibillion-dollar fleet modernization program, while the agency's top officer promised more effective oversight.

The modernization program, dubbed Deepwater, "is essential to the Coast Guard's future," Commandant Adm. Thad Allen told a House subcommittee. "In many ways it is the Coast Guard's future. We have to get it right."

Allen responded to sometimes harsh questioning from lawmakers the day after the Department of Homeland Security's inspector general released a report concluding that design flaws in the first two 421-foot, 4,000-ton cutters already have led to spiraling costs and must be addressed to ensure the 30-year life of the new ships.

Elijah Cummings, D-Md., who chairs the House Subcommittee on Coast Guard and Maritime Transportation, asked the company executives if they could guarantee the cutters could go 30 years without a crack.

"Sir, I don't know about whether they can," said Philip Teel, president of Northrop Grumman Ship Systems. Teel quickly added that he did believe the vessels would last 30 years, though he could not predict if a crack would occur.

Since shortly after the Deepwater contract was awarded in June 2002 to Integrated Coast Guard Systems, a joint venture of Lockheed Martin and Northrop Grumman, Coast Guard technical experts have repeatedly voiced design concerns and lawmakers repeatedly asked why changes were not made at that time.

Allen said the decision was made to move forward with construction of the first two of eight massive cutters despite questions about their strength because not doing so would have caused "irrevocable" delays and cost overruns. He acknowledged running afoul of the inspector general because that decision-making process had no traceable path.

Rep. Gene Taylor, D-Miss., asked Teel if, in general, fixes can be made cheaper at the time they're discovered.

"Clearly it's cheaper to fix it early, not later," Teel said.

Allen and his predecessors always have preached "prepare for the worst and you're not doing that, you're sugarcoating it," Taylor said.

The combined cost of the first two cutters has increased from $517 million to about $775 million primarily due to design changes needed to meet post-9/11 mission requirements and other government specifications not included in the original contract, according to the inspector general's report. Further changes being suggested by the contractors could add an additional $300 million, the report estimated.

Late last year, the Coast Guard removed from service eight 123-foot cutters that were among the first to be lengthened and outfitted with new computer and navigation systems. Allen said less than $100 million had been lost on those boats, which had been used to patrol Florida's waters. He would not comment on the possibility of recouping any of those costs from the contractors citing litigation concerns.

Deepwater, a $24 billion, 25-year program, is the largest acquisition project in Coast Guard history. Allen conceded that the agency lacked competency in dealing with such a massive deal, the likes of which are more common within the Defense Department.

But he said greater oversight of the program was on the way. A new office is being established where one chief acquisition officer will oversee all procurement projects, he said.

Allen promised to return to brief the committee on Deepwater's progress within 120 days.

Shares of Bethesda, Md.-based Lockheed Martin added 18 cents to close at $96.24, while Los Angeles-based Northrop Grumman gained 23 cents to end at $70.97, both on the New York Stock Exchange.

Montana Moves To Reject Real ID Law (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, January 31, 2007

Several state legislatures are considering measures opposing a federal law aimed at fighting terrorism by making driver's licenses harder to get.

The Montana House of Representatives expects to vote today on a bill that would make Montana the first state to ignore the Real ID law, which requires states to demand a minimum standard of proof of residency from people seeking driver's licenses.

The bill passed a Montana House committee 17-0 last week and needs Senate approval.

DOJ_NMG_0124894

The Maine State Legislature last week became the first to approve a resolution urging Congress to overturn the law before it takes effect in May 2008. Only four of 186 Maine lawmakers voted no.

"You're going to see a lot more states getting on board," said Montana state Rep. Brady Wiseman, a Democrat who wrote the bill.

Other states with bills: Hawaii, Georgia, Massachusetts, New Mexico, Oklahoma, Vermont and Washington.

State Rep. Jim Guest of Missouri, a Republican leading a national coalition against Real ID, said 30 states could pass measures opposing the law.

Residents of states that don't comply will be barred from using their licenses or state IDs to board airplanes, open bank accounts or enter federal buildings.

Wiseman and other opponents hope enough states protest or defy the law that Congress will be forced to revise or repeal it.

"If one state says no, or another state follows Maine, the whole house of cards collapses," said Barry Steinhardt of the American Civil Liberties Union.

Democratic control of Congress makes repeal more likely than before, Steinhardt said. When Real ID passed the House, 219 Republicans supported it and 152 Democrats opposed.

Rep. Lamar Smith, R-Texas, who co-sponsored the law, said Congress is "very unlikely" to repeal a law that deters terrorists "who could use a driver's license ID as cover."

The law sets the first federal standards for getting licenses, which the 9/11 Commission recommended after finding the Sept. 11 hijackers got 34 licenses and government ID cards. Seven hijackers lied on residency statements.

Everyone would have to renew licenses and state IDs in person by 2013 with documents showing their Social Security number and home address, and that they are in the USA legally. New applicants face the same standards.

Bills to comply with the law are pending in six state legislatures. Indiana state Sen. Vic Heinold, a Republican, said the law helps "control the immigration situation" by allowing visitors to get licenses only for as long as their visas are valid.

Critics fear that requiring all licenses to use identical technology for machine reading would lead places that check IDs, such as bars, office buildings and retailers, to increase their use of such scanning machines and create digital records every time a card is swiped.

"They could remain and be pieced together to create footprints about where we've been and what we've done," said Jim Harper of the Cato Institute, a libertarian think tank in Washington, D.C.

State lawmakers also protest the cost. The National Governors Association says it will cost more than $11 billion over five years. Congress, estimating a $100 million cost, provided $40 million.

Black Caucus Requests Katrina Committee (AP)

By Ben Evans

AP, January 31, 2007

The Congressional Black Caucus has asked House Speaker Nancy Pelosi to form a new committee on Hurricane Katrina to focus more urgently on rebuilding the Gulf Coast, particularly New Orleans.

"The Bush administration has turned its back on our fellow Americans, the victims of the greatest disaster on American soil in our generation," caucus Chairwoman Carolyn Cheeks Kilpatrick, D-Mich., wrote in a letter to Pelosi. "How can we talk about reconstruction abroad when we cannot help our fellow Americans at home?"

Kilpatrick criticized President Bush for not mentioning Katrina in his State of the Union address last week and said that forming a select House committee on the issue "offers the best hope for development."

A Pelosi spokesman, Drew Hammill, said Tuesday the Democratic leader would look closely at the request. But he noted that several congressional committees are overseeing the recovery and that Democrats already have a Katrina task force.

Coincidentally, Hammill said, Pelosi had scheduled a meeting for Wednesday with the relevant committee heads and Gulf Coast lawmakers to discuss solutions.

In an interview with NPR on Monday, Bush defended the administration's handling of the rebuilding, saying the federal government has sent some $110 billion to Mississippi and Louisiana, some of it still waiting to be spent.

"Obviously there is more work to be done," he said, according to a transcript of the interview. "But no, our response to the Katrina recovery has been very robust. And I appreciate the taxpayers of the United States helping the folks down there."

At a Senate hearing in New Orleans on Monday, Mayor Ray Nagin said that 17 months after the storm hit, he doesn't see evidence of "the will to really fix New Orleans." He said the slow progress can be partly attributed to class and racial discrimination.

Nagin said he is not asking for more money, just that the money allocated get to the city faster.

DOJ_NMG_0124895

As of Jan. 18, the Federal Emergency Management Agency had agreed to pay $334 million for infrastructure repairs in New Orleans, but Louisiana had forwarded only $145 million to the city. State officials have said city leaders failed to provide required documentation, which Nagin called cumbersome.

Also, eight months after it was hired, a Virginia-based consulting company in charge of dispensing billions in federal aid to people whose homes were damaged by hurricanes Katrina and Rita has received 101,000 applications but handed out fewer than 300 grants.

The CBC declined to release the full text of its letter to Pelosi but provided excerpts.

Kilpatrick said CBC members met last week to discuss a specific agenda for addressing the situation. The proposals include forgiving debt for the city of New Orleans and the state of Louisiana, providing more money for transitional housing and public safety, and repealing liability immunity for the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, which has acknowledged design failures in the levees that were supposed to protect New Orleans.

All Areas Open In New Blueprint For New Orleans (NYT)

By Adam Nossiter

The New York Times, January 31, 2007

NEW ORLEANS, Jan. 30 — No neighborhoods would be off limits for development in a new $14 billion plan for this city's recovery introduced Tuesday, the latest foray in a process that has been going on since shortly after Hurricane Katrina flooded New Orleans 17 months ago.

The Unified New Orleans Plan, as it is called, 556 pages long, was developed by consultants and planners for the city after months of meetings with citizens here, and is intended to be used by city planners as a guide to redevelopment.

The plan calls for spending millions on libraries, recreation, utilities, schools, transportation, flood protection, health care and other areas. The projected source of financing is unclear, however, as one of the consultants suggested Tuesday that much of the money might come from the $110 billion already appropriated by the federal government, while another appeared to suggest it might not.

Planners said that as part of a strategy to encourage people to return to depopulated areas like the Lower Ninth Ward, they would recommend temporary structures — schools or libraries in trailers, for instance.

"We don't want to put permanent investment in capital facilities until the resettlement patterns are more clearly defined," said Bobbie Hill, a planner. "Temporary facilities will be a catalyst."

The document was given to the city's Planning Commission on Tuesday, and more meetings will be held to discuss it.

The plan avoids the recommendation that caused the downfall of an earlier recovery blueprint: that potentially dangerous areas, those most vulnerable to flooding, be turned into "green space" or left undeveloped.

That idea was rejected a year ago by the city's mayor, C. Ray Nagin, after some citizens criticized it as racist and its genesis by outside planning experts as elitist. The new document, more populist both in ideas and in conception, appears carefully designed not to anger citizens here. Already given informal sanction by officials, it calls for giving incentives to homeowners, for instance, to raise their homes or to resettle in "clusters," but it contains no mandates that they do so.

Unlike the earlier document, the plan rejects reducing the size of New Orleans, "shrinking the footprint," a phrase that became a red flag to outraged citizen groups here.

"From this plan's standpoint, there's no likelihood it will have a smaller footprint," Troy Henry, one of the consultants who worked on the plan, said at a news conference Tuesday. "We have not green-spaced any neighborhoods."

Darren Diamond, another consultant, said, "We are giving incentives in all areas."

Individual neighborhoods have also developed their own recovery plans, and consultants on Tuesday were careful to say that the Unified New Orleans Plan did not supersede these efforts.

Much of the language of the new planning document is nonspecific and expresses generalized hopes for New Orleans rather than mandates. But it also appears to reflect the city's current patchy repopulation, in which some of the fears of the earlier, rejected team of planners are being realized.

Some neighborhoods, for instance, are already showing what was referred to by the earlier planners as the "jack-o'-lantern" effect: individual houses that have been reoccupied but are surrounded by a sea of blight, or abandonment.

One part of the new plan, much insisted on by the consultants Tuesday, appears to address that phenomenon by calling for incentives for homeowners and small businesses to encourage the creation of "sustainable clusters within their neighborhoods."

Safety Is Our Priority (USAT)

By Don Riley

DOJ_NMG_0124896

USA Today, January 31, 2007

The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers' most recent investigations into nationwide levee system performance have revealed the need for a consistent, comprehensive and risk-informed approach to improve public safety.

Our goal is an informed public, empowered to take responsibility for its safety; a clear, national levee safety policy and standards; and sustainable flood damage reduction systems.

Last year, Congress appropriated funds for the corps to initiate a national levee inventory and assessment program to determine the status and condition of our nation's levees. The corps began entering inventory data for the nearly 2,000 projects in the federal levee system. The data is entered as levee inspections are reviewed with local levee boards, which are responsible for operating and maintaining levees.

The corps inspects levees eligible for federal rehabilitation assistance. To ensure eligibility, levees must meet acceptable maintenance standards.

The corps is informing levee owners of maintenance status changes and ensuring maintenance requirements are met. In addition, the corps agreed to a one-year maintenance deficiency grace period, which will allow for corrections before a levee is removed from the program.

The list of levees will be released Thursday after the corps completes notification of local officials.

Finally, the corps is working closely with federal, state and local partners toward improving the safety and reliability of our national levees. Our intent is to inform the public so people understand the risks they face and can act to improve their safety.

Maj. General Don T. Riley is director of civil works for the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers.

Levee List Dribbles Out (USAT)

USA Today, January 31, 2007

Army Corps finds dangerous levees, then hides the list.

After Hurricane Katrina overwhelmed weak levees and destroyed much of New Orleans 18 months ago, the federal government finally got aggressive about inspecting thousands of miles of levees that are supposed to protect cities from Sacramento to Hartford.

It quickly found deficiencies. On Monday, USA TODAY's Peter Eisler reported that the Army Corps of Engineers had identified 146 levees in 28 states, the District of Columbia and Puerto Rico that pose an unacceptable risk of failing in a major flood, inundating people who live behind them.

There was just one hitch. The corps wouldn't say where those levees are. That's right. A public agency, using tax dollars to inspect levees, refused to share with the public critical information it discovered. The corps hasn't put the information on its website, and it refused to release a list to USA TODAY — both easy routes to get the message out. The corps would only reveal the number of faulty levees in each state, including 42 in California, 14 in Oregon, 13 in Arkansas and 6 in Louisiana, where the pain inflicted by failed levees is still palpable.

Has the agency learned anything from the New Orleans catastrophe? Hundreds of people died because government agencies, from local levee boards to the Army Corps of Engineers, had failed to do their jobs properly. The corps made errors in the basic design and construction of the New Orleans levees, according to an independent report last year by a panel led by engineers from the University of California, Berkeley. Residents of New Orleans relied on those levees for protection.

The corps' rationale for its silence? A spokesman said the agency wouldn't reveal the locations until all communities with faulty levees are notified. But by late Tuesday, after being bombarded with demands for the locations and asked to write an opposing view to this editorial, the corps relented, promising to release a list on Thursday.

Good. But the corps' first response, and its method of communicating with local officials, point to serious flaws in this new attempt to ensure better flood control.

Hartford officials say they were informed verbally at a meeting Nov. 8, that the city's levees were deficient and they risked serious consequences if repairs weren't completed by year's end — less than eight weeks later. A similar ultimatum was issued to three other Connecticut communities, state officials say. Hartford had already begun a $5 million repair project and met the corps' deadline. After the governor intervened, other communities got a one-year reprieve, and the corps says it will give all localities a year for repairs.

The corps' findings carry serious consequences. If levees aren't fixed, the federal government could determine that property owners behind them must buy flood insurance, costing hundreds of dollars a year. More important, they could be in harm's way. Residents have a right to know how safe or unsafe they are, information their government should be eager to provide.

Congress Scrutinizes Los Alamos Security (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0124897

AP, January 31, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Lawmakers threatened Tuesday to strip the Los Alamos National Laboratory of classified operations or even shut it down after a decade of security lapses.

Rep. John Dingell, D-Mich., said he had sat through nearly a decade of hearings in which the Energy Department and the northern New Mexico nuclear weapons lab had promised to fix security problems.

"I've been hearing these promises for a long time, and they've become somewhat tedious," he said.

The lawmakers blistered the lab for its most recent security breach in which a contract worker walked out with hundreds of pages of classified documents. The documents turned up during a drug raid last October involving a man who rented a room at the worker's home.

Rep. Joe Barton, R-Texas, said that if problems cannot be solved this time, he will ask that Los Alamos lab, the birthplace of the atomic bomb, be shut down.

"There is an absolute inability and unwillingness to address the most routine security issues at this laboratory," Barton said.

Barton, Dingell and others on the House Energy and Commerce Committee introduced a measure Tuesday to strip the National Nuclear Security Administration of its primary security responsibilities and turn them back to the Energy Department. They expressed concerns that NNSA has not fixed security problems at Los Alamos despite tens of millions of dollars spent on improvements.

"NNSA was a management experiment gone wrong," Barton said.

Rep. Bart Stupak, D-Mich., also called for a comprehensive audit of all services performed at Los Alamos. He wants to evaluate whether its size and mission are too large and whether many of the classified operations should be moved to another lab.

"I will not tolerate continued security lapses and a thumbing of their noses at Congress," Stupak said.

A new management team was installed at Los Alamos less than a year ago, in part to reverse years of security and safety problems.

The embarrassing October incident involving the classified documents resulted in a shake-up in the agency that oversees the lab. Linton Brooks, already reprimanded for an earlier incident, resigned this month as NNSA chief.

Lab officials have said none of the material found during the drug raid was top secret. A lawyer for the employee, a 22-year-old archivist, has said she had taken it home to catch up on work.

Security problems at the lab date back to the late 1990s. They include the disappearance of two hard drives containing classified material that later were found behind a copying machine, and the disappearance of two computer disks that forced a virtual shutdown of Los Alamos. It later was learned those two disks never existed.

Throughout Tuesday's four-hour hearing, lawmakers asked repeatedly why the lab needs to exist and whether it simply has too much responsibility for too many secret materials.

Administration officials urged lawmakers to give the new management team more time to turn things around.

Deputy energy secretary Clay Sell said Los Alamos probably could not be replaced or duplicated. It is the only place where plutonium pits for weapons can be made. Virtually everything that happens at Los Alamos is secret because the lab is responsible for the bulk of the strategic nuclear weapons stockpile, he said.

Sell promised stronger security there is possible.

"It appears to me the tail's wagging the dog," said a skeptical Rep. Charlie Melancon, D-La.

"It has been suggested that we shoot the dog," Sell responded. "I have to reject that suggestion in the strongest possible way. It is my view we have to have Los Alamos."

WAR NEWS:

In Senate, Allies Of Bush Work To Halt Iraq Vote (NYT)

By Carl Hulse And Thom Shanker

The New York Times, January 31, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 30 — The Bush administration's allies in the Senate began a major effort on Tuesday to prevent a potentially embarrassing rejection of the president's plan to push 20,000 more troops into Iraq.

With the Senate expected to reach votes on possible resolutions sometime next week, the signs of the new campaign seeped out after a weekly closed-door lunch in which Republican senators engaged in what participants described as a heated debate over how to approach the issue.

DOJ_NMG_0124898

The new effort by President Bush's allies, including Senators John McCain of Arizona and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, is aimed at blocking two nonbinding resolutions directly critical of the White House that had appeared to be gaining broad support among Democrats and even some Republicans.

Republicans skeptical of the troop buildup said some of their colleagues had begun to suggest that opponents of the White House plan ran the risk of undermining Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, the new military commander in Iraq, as well as Mr. Bush.

"There is a lot of pressure on people who could be with us not to be with us," said Senator Susan Collins, Republican of Maine, the co-author of one resolution along with Senators John W. Warner, Republican of Virginia, and Ben Nelson, Democrat of Nebraska.

As an alternative to that measure and another broadly backed by Democrats, Mr. McCain and Mr. Graham, along with Senator Joseph I. Lieberman, the independent Democrat from Connecticut, are trying to enlist support for a resolution that would set benchmarks for the Iraqi government and describe the troop increase as a final chance for the United States to restore security in Baghdad.

The senators have been joined in their effort by the Republican leader, Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, Senator John Cornyn of Texas and Senator David Vitter of Louisiana.

The debate over Iraq also resounded elsewhere on Capitol Hill, as senators attending the confirmation hearing for Adm. William J. Fallon, nominated to command American forces in the Middle East, heard his blunt assessment of the path ahead. He said "time is running out" for positive action by the government of Nuri Kamal al-Maliki to show it can quell sectarian violence.

At another Senate hearing, the leaders of the Iraq Study Group, the bipartisan panel that reported to Mr. Bush and Congress last month, disputed the White House's contention that most of their recommendations had been incorporated into Mr. Bush's troop increase plan.

"The diplomatic effort has not been full enough," said Lee H. Hamilton, co-chairman of the study group with James A. Baker III. In testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Mr. Hamilton described the initiatives begun by the administration in the Middle East as modest and slow, and added, "We don't have the time to wait."

On the Senate Judiciary Committee, Democrats began laying the constitutional groundwork for an effort to block the president's plan to send more troops to Iraq and place new limits on the conduct of the war there, perhaps forcing a withdrawal of American forces from Iraq.

In advance of a possible Senate vote on the resolutions, Republican senators now appear widely divided over how to proceed. In trying to head off the resolution supported by Senators Warner and Collins, allies of the White House appear to be trying to muster at least the 41 votes they would need to prevent a vote on the measure under Senate rules. Mr. McCain is sponsoring the competing resolution that would establish benchmarks for the Iraqi government. He said the proposal also could be fashioned to give Congress more oversight.

Republicans were viewing Mr. McCain's plan as a way to deter Republicans from joining in the resolutions more critical of Mr. Bush, and many Republicans said that would be preferable to one criticizing the troop buildup outright. Senators also said they were beginning to realize that the vote, while nonbinding, would be an important statement on Congressional sentiment regarding the war.

"We all know the world is watching," said Senator Saxby Chambliss, Republican of Georgia.

The more sharply worded of the two measures critical of the White House is one approved last week by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, and backed by the Democratic Senators Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware and Carl Levin of Michigan, as well as Senator Chuck Hagel, the Nebraska Republican. The second of the two measures is one backed by Senator Warner.

As those debates flared mostly in private, the confirmation hearing for Admiral Fallon as the new head of the military's Central Command became a proxy debate not only over the president's new strategy but also for the competing resolutions supported by senators of both parties.

But Admiral Fallon, currently in charge of American forces across Asia and the Pacific, declined to answer directly politically fraught questions about whether certain proposed resolutions would harm the military effort in Iraq or undermine the troops' morale.

The admiral, who if confirmed as expected would be the first Navy officer to head the Central Command, said that he would always offer unvarnished military advice, but that he would avoid commenting on partisan political issues.

In his testimony, Admiral Fallon told members of the Senate Armed Services Committee that the United States might have erred in its assessments of how effectively the new Iraqi government could manage the nation's affairs.

"Maybe we ought to redefine the goals here a bit and do something that's more realistic in terms of getting some progress and then maybe take on the other things later," Admiral Fallon said, adding, "What we've been doing is not working and we have got to be doing, it seems to me, something different."

DOJ_NMG_0124899

"Time is running out," he concluded.

Senator Levin submitted a letter he co-authored with Senator McCain demanding that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice make public the administration's requirements for actions to be taken by the government in Baghdad to earn continued American support.

Late Tuesday, Senator Levin's office released a reply from Ms. Rice that stated assurances that the Bush administration supports Mr. Maliki but also listed deadlines already missed by his government. Among them were laws to guarantee an equitable distribution of the country's oil wealth, to establish provincial elections and to reintegrate disenfranchised Sunnis into Iraqi political life.

In the Senate Judiciary Committee, Senator Arlen Specter, the Pennsylvania Republican who led the panel for the last two years, joined Democrats who asserted that Mr. Bush cannot simply ignore Congressional opposition to his plan to send 21,500 additional troops to Iraq.

"I would respectfully suggest to the president that he is not the sole decider," Mr. Specter said. "The decider is a joint and shared responsibility."

Senator Russell Feingold, Democrat who acted as chairman for the hearing, said he would soon introduce a resolution that would go much further. It would end all financing for the deployment of American military forces in Iraq after six months, other than a limited number working on counterterrorism operations or training the Iraqi Army and police force. In effect, it would call for all other American forces to be withdrawn by the six-month deadline.

Senate GOP Looks At Alternative To Democrats On Iraq Vote (POL)

By Daniel W. Reilly And John Bresnahan

The Politico, January 31, 2007

Scrambling to cobble together a resolution supporting President Bush's plan for more troops in Iraq, Republican Sens. John McCain and Lindsey Graham are crafting an alternative that sets benchmarks for Iraqi progress.

And other Republicans senators, hoping to bridge internal party divisions on the issue, appear eager for some sort of compromise.

"I am talking with them, and I am encouraging others to talk with them," said Senate Minority Whip Trent Lott, R-Miss., of the McCain-Graham effort.

Lott declined to say whether Senate GOP leaders, who are expected to meet with Bush at the White House on Friday, would sign onto the McCain-Graham resolution.

"This is a case where, when you herd the cats, sometimes you have to let them stray," Lott said Tuesday.

McCain of Arizona and Graham of South Carolina, one of his closest political allies, have drafted a resolution that supports the president's plan to deploy 21,500 more troops in Iraq, while at the same time laying out a number of "benchmarks" to measure the progress the Iraqi government is making in achieving political stability and cracking down on sectarian violence.

The McCain-Graham resolution is one of a handful of Republican and Democratic non-binding proposals on Iraq that are likely to be debated.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., and Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., have not hammered out ground rules for the debate. McConnell and other GOP leaders are likely to insist that any resolution called up for a vote receive at least 60 votes to be considered formally approved, according to Republican senators and leadership aides.

Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr., D-Del., Chuck Hagel, R-Neb., and Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., have a resolution opposing the troop "surge" while Sens. John Warner, R-Va., Ben Nelson, D-Neb., and Susan Collins, R-Maine, have a different resolution that is critical of Bush's handling of the war, but does not go as far as the Biden-Hagel-Kennedy proposal in opposing the surge.

Additional proposals call for a cap on troop levels. And Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., is preparing legislation to cut funding for the U.S. military campaign in Iraq by late this year.

McCain's decision to back Bush on the Iraq troop surge has cost him in the polls. But the senator has refused to back away from the plan, arguing that the president should be given sufficient time to let his new strategy work.

"It has two goals," Graham said of the McCain-Graham resolution. "Number one, let General (David) Petraeus and the troops know we support them ... not let them go off to war with any sense of disapproval or undermining their efforts. Number two ... make the statement that we realize you cannot win in Iraq just through a military surge. I think it is a middle ground."

Democratic insiders said they had not thought through the rules of the debate yet, but noted that even having senators engaged in an open fight over the war is a setback for Bush and the GOP.

"They've already lost this fight before we even move to the resolutions," said a senior Democratic leadership aide, speaking on the condition of anonymity. "This is not going to do anything but hurt Bush."

DOJ_NMG_0124900

A fierce critic of the Iraq war, Feingold fired the opening salvo in what could be a constitutional fight over Congress' s ability to end U.S. involvement in the conflict.

Speaking at a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing Tuesday, he offered some strong words for his fellow lawmakers.

"The Constitution makes Congress a co-equal branch of government. It's time we start acting like it," Feingold said. "If Congress doesn't stop this war, it's not because it doesn't have the power. It's because it doesn't have the will."

For GOP, Discord In Dissent On Iraq (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, January 31, 2007

Republican misgivings over President Bush's new war strategy are increasingly dividing the GOP as the Senate moves toward a showdown over the deployment of 21,500 additional troops to Iraq.

Republican strategy had envisioned a single resolution that would allow the party's senators to express doubts about the plan without stating their outright opposition. Instead, Republicans appear to be balkanizing, with at least five GOP drafts now in play and more Republicans stating their reservations.

"We're all looking for a plan that will work," said Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.). "The current plan is not working, and 21,500 additional troops -- it's a snowball in July. It's not going to work."

Vice President Cheney and senior military officials attended a Republican policy lunch yesterday, which turned into a raucous debate about the various resolutions, according to a party leadership aide. Bush will meet with GOP senators on Friday as the White House continues to try to tamp down opposition.

But Republican misgivings are not subsiding. "This war has been mishandled. No one doubts that mistakes have been made in Iraq," Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), long a supporter of Bush's war policy, told Adm. William J. Fallon at Fallon's confirmation hearing to become the top U.S. commander for the Middle East. "I have to tell you, this committee did not get candid assessments in the past, and I view that with deep regret."

Having chastised Democrats for not showing unity on Iraq, Republican leaders have decided they need a resolution of their own when the Senate begins debate on nonbinding resolutions of opposition next week.

Specter, the ranking Republican on the Senate Judiciary Committee, pushed back against Bush's claim he is the "decision maker," saying the White House needs to accept Congress's role in shaping war policy.

"I would suggest respectfully to the president that he is not the sole decider," Specter said during a hearing on Congress's war powers. "The decider is a shared and joint responsibility."

Republican leaders had hoped to divide Senate opinion largely along party lines, to allow Bush to argue that any outright statement opposing his plan was politically motivated partisanship. A resolution by McCain and Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) demanding tough benchmarks for progress in Iraq was supposed to garner overwhelming Republican support, being a more palatable alternative to language by Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.) that would state opposition to the troop buildup.

Instead, rival measures continue to proliferate. Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.) said he is circulating language that would forbid a cutoff of funding for troops in the field under any circumstance, similar to another proposal by Sen. Johnny Isakson (R-Ga.).

Sen. John Cornyn (R-Tex.) is shopping around a measure that would demand that the president's policies be given a chance to work while calling for the reversal of perceived war-related mistakes, such as the wholesale purging of Baath Party members from the Iraqi government and the failure to ensure equitable oil-revenue sharing among Iraqi groups.

"Resolutions are flying like snowflakes around here," Specter said.

Meanwhile, the two camps promoting competing resolutions of opposition -- one headed by Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) and Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.) and the other by Warner -- have not agreed on common language that could win a clear majority.

"This isn't about party loyalty. This isn't about presidential politics. It's about policy," said an exasperated Sen. Olympia J. Snowe (R-Maine), who has been urging Warner to negotiate an agreement to meld his language with the Democratic-driven resolution approved last week by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. "What America is desperately thirsting for is for the United States Senate and the United States House of Representatives to come to terms with where we are in Iraq."

One group of ruminating Republicans is made up of the 20 GOP senators who will face voters in 2008. Sen. Lisa Murkowski (Alaska) said she plans to support at least one of the measures -- but first "I've got to study them all." Sen. John E. Sununu (N.H.), whose state is strongly against the war, reiterated his concerns about a troop buildup even as he refused to commit to any resolution.

The Warner measure has attracted at least three potentially vulnerable Republicans -- Sens. Susan Collins (Maine), Norm Coleman (Minn.) and Gordon Smith (Ore.).

DOJ_NMG_0124901

Sen. Lamar Alexander (Tenn.), another Republican whose term will expire in two years, said he was speaking for many of his GOP colleagues in asserting, "I'm not persuaded that sending 21,500 troops into a civil war in Baghdad is a good idea, but I haven't found a resolution I can support."

Pressed on what he is looking for, Alexander replied: "I'd like to express my unhappiness with the way this war is being conducted, but also my support for the troops. I think that's what we all want."

Sen. Trent Lott (Miss.), the GOP whip, said most Republican senators believe they must support some statement about the war, given the public's growing concerns. But he noted: "I am actually reading all the different resolutions, and each one of them does have critical differences." He added that he is leaning toward the Cornyn measure, which offers the fewest objections to Bush's plan.

He said he will not try to rally Republicans around a single approach but, rather, will urge them to "vote their conscience."

The multiplying factions raise the prospect that no measure will garner substantially more than 50 votes next week. That would represent something of a victory for the White House, which has argued that even nonbinding action by the Senate would "embolden the enemy," as Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates told reporters last week.

"The worst thing would be for the Senate by 60 votes to express disapproval of a mission we are sending people to lay down their lives for," said Sen. Jon Kyl (Ariz.), a member of the Republican leadership.

Democrats, who are united in their desire to stop the escalation, are regarding the Republican divisions with some glee. "You cannot have a resolution that is both meaningless and undercuts the troops. That's impossible. Their position is totally inconsistent," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), a member of the House Democratic leadership.

The House is expected to embark on a similar debate in the coming weeks.

Many House Republicans Mum On Troop Resolutions (HILL)

By Aaron Blake And Sam Youngman

The Hill, January 31, 2007

Non-binding resolutions criticizing President Bush's troop increase in Iraq have proven a dicey political issue for vulnerable Republican senators, and few potentially vulnerable House Republicans are tipping their hands before the issue hits their chamber.

Most House GOPers who received less than 55 percent of the vote in November's election are not saying how they will vote on either of the main Senate resolutions expressing opposition to the troop-increase strategy, and not one committed to supporting either Sen. Joseph Biden's (D-Del.) and Sen. Chuck Hagel's (R-Neb.) resolution or Sen. John Warner's (R-Va.) milder alternative.

Biden's resolution, also cosponsored by Sen. Olympia Snowe (R-Maine), passed the Senate Foreign Relations Committee 12-9 last week but has failed to garner additional Republican support. Warner's resolution has the backing of vulnerable Sens. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.), Gordon Smith (R-Ore.), Susan Collins (R-Maine) and centrist Democrat Mary Landrieu (La.), who are all up in 2008.

Most House Republicans' offices declined to comment specifically on the resolutions because they aren't yet before the House, and about half didn't respond to several efforts to contact them on the issue.

But while some made it clear they opposed the resolutions, none said they supported them.

Rep. James Walsh (R-N.Y.), who was reelected with 51 percent of the vote in November, came out forcefully against the troop increase after the president announced it, saying it would not "force the Iraqi people to work out their differences."

But as far as the Senate resolutions, Walsh is still reviewing them and is "uncommitted, at this point, to anything that's on paper," spokesman Dan Gage said.

Rep. Ric Keller (R-Fla.) also came out strongly against the increase on the House floor. His spokesman, Bryan Malenius, said Keller will look at anything but is "not going to get into the weeds on these different resolutions when we're not sure what language we'd ultimately be voting on anyways."

Rep. Jean Schmidt's (R-Ohio) spokesman said the resolution is "like a moving target right now," and she will wait for the Senate to finish debate before commenting on the resolutions.

Some House Republicans who have offered varying degrees of support for the increase dismissed the resolutions outright as political posturing that isn't helpful to the Iraq debate.

Rep. Thaddeus McCotter (R-Mich.), a member of leadership who took 54 percent in 2006, has offered his support for the troop increase, conditional on the troops' being used for combat, as opposed to police or social work. But regardless of his view of the increase, he said, he opposes any non-binding resolutions.

DOJ_NMG_0124902

"The reality is if you believe this is a mistake that is going to unnecessarily lead to the deaths of American troops and Iraqi citizens, then you have a moral obligation to do more than pass a non-binding resolution to try to prevent it," McCotter said, adding that the bills are trying "to acquire a political advantage without any accompanying moral high ground."

A spokesman for Rep. Brian Bilbray (R-Calif.), also a troop-increase supporter, echoed those sentiments.

"We need to stop the political posturing, get the politics out of the issue and focus on the goals and objectives that will help us achieve a realistic solution to Iraq and help us get out of Iraq in a timely fashion," spokesman Kurt Bardella said.

Reps. Bill Sali (R-Idaho) and Jon Porter (R-Nev.) are also supporting the troop increase and will not support the resolutions.

But some other increase supporters, such as Rep. Michele Bachmann (R-Minn.), nonetheless decline to say that they would oppose the resolutions at this point.

Rep. Joe Knollenberg (R-Mich.) is supporting the plan but wants to see near-immediate progress. Spokesman Trent Wisecup said Knollenberg would "take a close look at" resolutions when they come to the House.

Some declined to say how they would vote but tried to distance themselves from one or both of the Biden and Warner resolutions.

A spokesman for Rep. Randy Kuhl (R-N.Y.) had no comment on the specific resolutions but said Kuhl "is a little bit skeptical of how this is going to work or if it will work," before adding that the congressman will not "second-guess" the president.

Charles Isom, spokesman for Rep. Adrian Smith (R-Neb.), would say only that the congressman "feels the [Biden-Hagel] resolution is long on criticism but short on substance."

And Jen Rae Hein, spokeswoman for Rep. Lee Terry (R-Neb.), said, "Sen. Hagel and Congressman Terry have different views of the war and the resolution."

Terry received 55 percent in 2006 and is also mentioned as a potential Senate candidate. (Hagel, who is eyeing a presidential run, denied a recent news report that he will definitely run to retain his Senate seat next year.)

Other potential Senate candidates took similar tacks.

A spokesman for Rep. Chip Pickering (R-Miss.) said Pickering would wait until the debate reached the House floor before making any decisions.

House Republican leaders say they will not be whipping the vote on Iraq.

"We didn't make a whipping effort on the initial Iraq resolution and while we will be talking to our members, explaining our views to our members we're going to let our members vote they way they want to [vote]," House Minority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) said yesterday.

"They vote their conscience everyday, trust me," said House Minority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio).

Even centrist House Democrats are steering clear of taking sides on the resolutions at this point.

Centrist Democratic Rep. Henry Cuellar (Texas), thought by some to be a potential challenger to Sen. John Cornyn (R) in 2008, said while he would wait to see what specific language came up in the House, he could support a non-binding resolution giving the president a sense of Congress opposed to a troop increase.

Some other Democrats in conservative districts likewise refused to commit to the resolutions.

Rep. Jim Marshall's (D-Ga.) office said the congressman would not make up his mind until he had looked at specific legislation in the House, while Rep. Heath Shuler's (D-N.C.) spokesman said Shuler is opposed to any troop increase. Both figure to be top GOP targets in 2008.

Despite the many no-comments, a few were willing to discuss the troop increase in general, though often using their own definitions.

More than a few House Republicans said their intention was to stand behind the president.

Reps. Barbara Cubin's (R-Wyo.) and Tom Reynolds's (R-N.Y.) offices both said their members were backing the commander in chief, and Reynolds's office said the congressman viewed the additional troops as "reinforcements" that should be funded and supported like those troops already on the ground.

Rep. Tim Walberg (R-Mich.) said he supports the president's "determination for victory and [feels] it is imperative we provide American men and women in combat with resources that will enable them to come home safe and victorious."

Islam Divided; Psychic Reality Check; Battle Under The Border (CNN)

CNN ANDERSON COOPER 360 DEGREES, January 31, 2007

New developments tonight in two disappearances: a beloved missing daughter and an alleged Ivy League con artist. Thanks to your help, police are chasing new leads.

Also tonight: The world famous self-proclaimed psychic who got it wrong about Shawn Hornbeck, she told us to check her record. We did. We will tell you the surprises we found.

First, though, a real eye-opener on Iraq: The man chosen by President Bush to oversee the war telling senators today he does not know whether he supports the president's plan to send more troops. Not only that -- Admiral William Fallon says he's not even sure he would send reinforcements, if requested by General David Petraeus, the new commander on the ground.

Listen.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

SEN. LINDSEY GRAHAM (R), SOUTH CAROLINA: And you would support sending more troops to accomplish that goal?

ADMIRAL WILLIAM FALLON, U.S. NAVY: I don't know how many troops are going to be necessary to effect the outcome that we want. But General Petraeus, in my conversations with him, indicated that he believes he needs these troops now, to get moving...

GRAHAM: And, if he said he needed more, you would support him?

FALLON: I don't know, sir. I haven't been there yet, and I'm not in a position to make that judgment.

GRAHAM: Well, it's his judgment about 21,500, does it make sense to you?

FALLON: I will better be able to give you an informed answer when I understand the situation better.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

COOPER: Admiral Fallon also warned members of the Armed Services Committee that it may be time to redefine the goals in Iraq, and that time is running short to turn things around -- not exactly a ringing endorsement from the man chosen to run Central Command.

John Roberts is in Washington tonight.

John, some surprising testimony today from Admiral Fallon.

JOHN ROBERTS, CNN SENIOR NATIONAL CORRESPONDENT: It was a little bit surprising, Anderson, especially from a commander. But perhaps it's something that should be expected, a bit of a trend in recent confirmation hearings.

Remember, Robert Gates, the new secretary of defense, when asked, said he didn't think that the U.S. was winning the war in Iraq. In one way, it's refreshingly candid. Here's a guy who hasn't yet signed off on the president's policy, said: Look, I have spent the last few years in the Pacific. I don't really know too much about this plan.

And he is saying: I'm not going to make a decision about it until I get over there, get my eyes on the ground, and can make my own informed decision.

A retired general that I talked to tonight, Anderson, who -- who is critical of the way that the war is going, believes that Fallon is being very honest, that this is a high-risk strategy, with an uncertain outcome, and he's not about to put his imprimatur on it at face value. He wants to get over there and get a look for himself.

COOPER: And Carl Levin was certainly surprised.

What does this mean for the White House?

ROBERTS: Well, what it means is, it puts a definite speed bump in the White House's ability to sell its message on Iraq.

Here's the president, who went through these weeks of meetings and -- quote -- "consultations," which is an interesting buzz word that the White House has used, and suddenly comes along his handpicked general -- or admiral, to run CENTCOM, and he's saying that he can't sign off on this policy -- so, definitely a little bit of a bump in the message coming from the White House tonight, Anderson.

COOPER: Obviously, Democrats are probably going to be talking a lot about this in the coming days.

ROBERTS: Not only Democrats, but Republicans as well who oppose this strategy.

What it does is, it gives them another piece of ammunition against the so-called surge. They can now say, you know, why should we support the president's idea of putting more troops in there, when the guy that he has picked to -- to run CENTCOM can't even sign off on the whole thing?

COOPER: And not -- as you said, it was Republicans. I think Arlen Specter also had some comments.

ROBERTS: Yes.

There was some real news that was made today in the Senate Judiciary Committee. Arlen Specter, who used to chair that committee, until Democrats took control, was reflecting back on what the president said back on April 18 of last year, when he was defending Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld, when President Bush said: I'm the decider. I'm going to decide what's best.

Well, here's what Arlen Specter had to say about that today, in regard to the Iraq war.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

SEN. ARLEN SPECTER (R), PENNSYLVANIA: The president repeatedly makes reference to the fact that he is the decider. I would suggest, and suggest respectfully, to the president that he is not the sole decider, that the decider is a shared and joint responsibility.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

COOPER: Legally, where does Bush stand?

ROBERTS: For the moment, Anderson, he is the decider. All Congress can do at this point is curtail funding for the Iraq war or the war in Afghanistan. And there's no appetite on Capitol Hill for that.

But what you see here is an interesting dynamic at play, that you have not only Democrats, but also Republicans in Congress, try to get back some of that authority that they believe they have in order for this country to wage war.

And it's really beginning to permeate the entire party as well. There was a luncheon today where the -- the Republicans got together with Vice President Cheney, Arlen Specter saying there was so much emotion in that charged room, and even Senator Lindsey Graham saying that the White House has lost a lot of credibility on this issue, that their ability to apply pressure at the moment is about zero -- so, the president in real trouble on this issue, not only among Democrats, who are in control, but among members of his own country -- Anderson.

COOPER: John, thanks for the update.

Fueling some of the doubts and the hesitation to send more troops is the ongoing Sunni-Shia violence, which took at least more 50 lives today in Iraq. And many of the attacks were targeting Shia pilgrims marking the holiest period on the Shia calender.

CNN's Michael Holmes now with a view of the proceedings that outsiders rarely get. Take a look.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

MICHAEL HOLMES, CNN INTERNATIONAL CORRESPONDENT (voice-over): Up close, at the religious ritual of Ashoura in Baghdad's Kadhimiya district, men, young and old, beating their heads with swords and knives, sharing the pain of the grandson of the Prophet Mohammed, the Imam Hussein, killed in a battle 1,400 years ago, a battle that divided Muslims and created the Shia sect of Islam. "For Hussein, for Hussein," the man yells at us.

To walk these streets is to feel the fervor of Shiites at the third most important shrine in Shia Islam. This was, for us, both a rare opportunity and a statement on security in Baghdad. It's been a long time since we have been able to walk freely on a Baghdad street, just five U.S. soldiers with us, and, more importantly, the protection of a respected local sheik.

Usually, video like this is shot by Iraqis, not Westerners. But, this day, we walked within a quarter-mile of the revered shrine, in an area controlled by Shiite militiamen. Children approach us. Adults look on. And the observance continued.

(on camera): There were some rockets and mortars fired earlier today, none of them landing here in Kadhimiya -- no injuries. And the celebrations here have been going off largely without a hitch amid very tight security.

(voice over): An hour or so later, however, a mortar did land in this area, likely fired by Sunni militants, and wounding nine pilgrims. But security efforts were considered successful here -- multiple checkpoints keeping vehicles out, even children patted down before proceeding.

There was devotion, not tension, on these streets -- huge vats of rice and meat cooked and handed out to hungry pilgrims who traveled from far and wide, mushrooming the local population from 100,000 to more than a million.

U.S. troops based here say walkabouts like this are the way forward, where possible.

LIEUTENANT COLONEL STEVE MISKA, U.S. ARMY: You have got to engage with the people. That's the only way you can find out what their issues are.

HOLMES (on camera): And, yet, a couple miles across the river, if you walk down the street like this?

MISKA: You would use different techniques.

(LAUGHTER)

HOLMES (voice over): The respect afforded Sheikh Mohammed Baca (ph) certainly helped with our security this day. He's a man who speaks of moderation, favors dialogue with Sunnis, and says extremists on both sides are the problem. He also supports the U.S. presence.

"If the Americans weren't here," he says, "the Shia will win the war in four hours."

But, in a place where religion so often sparks violence, it was religion alone that ruled the day.

(END VIDEOTAPE) COOPER: Michael Holmes joins us live now in Baghdad.

Michael, what if, a week from now, you were walking down that same street with -- without the sheik, without the soldiers, just you and your crew?

HOLMES: Yes, it's a good point.

The chances are, we wouldn't get very far, or, if we did, it would be amid a lot of protest and mistrust. You know, there's different shades, as you know, of the Mahdi militia. Now, the Mahdi militia is ubiquitous in Kadhimiya. But they're a more moderate, if I can use that term, version of the Mahdi. It's not like going into Sadr City.

Still, without that sheik with us, it probably would be a very different scenario, and we would not be nearly as welcomed or left alone as we were on this day. It was an extraordinary experience, to be able to walk at that level -- this particular sheik very powerful in that area. And this whole issue of tribal power, that has always been a criticism, that the U.S. hasn't fully understood it. In this area, the U.S. commanders do. And they're working with him -- Anderson.

COOPER: A fascinating look.

Michael, thanks very much -- Michael Holmes in Baghdad.

In Iraq, Sunnis and Shia have had to flee the fighting. Here's the "Raw Data" on that.

Last year alone, nearly 250,000 men, women and children were driven from their homes and moved to other regions in Iraq. That includes more than 41,000 Iraqi families; 28 percent were Sunni; 64 percent of the displaced were Shia.

Now, the elephant in the room, Iran -- tonight, sources are telling CNN that military investigators are now looking into the possibility that Iranians or Iranian-trained operatives carried out that sneak attack on American forces 10 days ago in Karbala. Five soldiers, you will remember, were killed in that raid, four of them abducted and later shot by English-speaking fighters dressed in American-style uniforms.

At the very least, this jacks up the tension one more notch between Washington and Tehran.

And that's where you find CNN's chief international correspondent, Christiane Amanpour, in Tehran.

Christiane, as we just heard, military investigators are looking into this possibility that Iranians could have been responsible for the Karbala attacks. If that's confirmed, how significant would it be, how surprising?

CHRISTIANE AMANPOUR, CNN CHIEF INTERNATIONAL CORRESPONDENT: Well, I think surprising, it would be, because Karbala is not just the holiest place -- or one of them -- for the Iraqi Shiites, but also for Iranian Shiites.

It is where Imam Hussein was martyred 1,400 years ago, as you have just been describing, but it would also, more pertinently, be a direct and overt act of war. And there is no indication that the Iranians, up until now, no matter what they have been doing in Iraq -- no matter what the accusations have been, there has been no indication up until now that they are -- have engaged in any direct acts of war against the American forces there.

But, in addition, there have been so many of these attacks in the past, and none of those have been blamed on -- on Iranians up until now. And, from what I can tell from the sources that are saying about this about the potential investigations, they're saying it's a very early stage; they have no firm evidence to -- to support their investigations; they're just doing early questioning, which, presumably, is logical when five of your soldiers have been tricked, kidnapped, abducted, and murdered.

I think that, certainly, we have had no response here to that, and nor to the allegations.

COOPER: Christiane, the rhetoric...

AMANPOUR: Anderson.

COOPER: The rhetoric between President Bush and Iranian President Ahmadinejad, it's really -- it's becoming more heated. You're in Tehran. How are the Iranian people reacting? How does that -- that rhetoric play?

AMANPOUR: Well, with concern, very, very much concern, because people here, like perhaps people in America, perhaps people around the world, recognize a pattern of rhetoric that they saw back before 2003 in the invasion of Iraq. And they're very concerned about that.

People, you know, when you ask them, they don't really think there is going to be a full-scale invasion of Iran, but they're very concerned that there might be some attack on Iran, and that all this rhetoric is preparation or an excuse or looking for ways in which to come in here.

Certainly, it hasn't been helped by the provocative and confrontational rhetoric of the Iranian president, whether it be about the nuclear program, whether it be about many, many other things. And, so, this has caused a general sense of unease here, and particularly since the president of Iran has basically been chastised by two very prominent newspapers, one of which allied with the supreme leader here, the religious leadership here, which have basically told him, indicated that that rhetoric needs to be toned down.

COOPER: Christiane Amanpour live from Tehran -- Christiane, thank you.

Straight ahead: why the war in Iraq is actually four wars, not one.

And later: the battle on the U.S.-Mexican border and beneath it.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

COOPER (voice-over): Think the border is secure? Just dig a little.

UNIDENTIFIED MALE: And they would be moving cocaine, marijuana. It just so happens that, when we got in here, we found a load of marijuana.

COOPER: Tunnels from Mexico -- you demanded action. Billions in the budget, yet, they can't find a few million to get it done. We're "Keeping Them Honest."

A self-proclaimed psychic with something to prove.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP, "LARRY KING LIVE")

SYLVIA BROWNE, SELF-PROCLAIMED PSYCHIC: There's a lot of cases I have solved right on Montel's show. I also cracked the ski mask rapist case.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

DOJ_NMG_0124906

COOPER: Sylvia Browne, wrong about Shawn Hornbeck, she gave us a list of success stories. We checked it out. But she might like what we found -- the psychic, the skeptics, and the facts, when 360 continues.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

COOPER: CNN's Michael Ware has been reporting from Iraq since the war began in 2003. And, over the last four years, he's watched one war multiply into four separate battles.

There is no single insurgency, he says, and there hasn't been for years. It's a crucial fact that often gets lost in the telling. And, yes, it is as complicated as it sounds.

Michael was in New York last week, a rare visit back to our newsroom, and a chance for him to explain who's fighting whom in Iraq and why it matters. Iran's role in all of this may seem like the most recent development in Iraq, but its roots are actually very deep.

And that's where we begin.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

COOPER: The fourth war that's going on in Iraq, the proxy war against Iran, how did Iran get involved?

MICHAEL WARE, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Iran has been involved from the very, very beginning.

Don't forget, you know, Iran and Iraq share a land border. There's many tribes and families that -- that live on both sides of this border. In the '80s, Saddam launched a vicious eight-year war against Iran. So, Iran very much has legitimate national security interests in terms of Iraq. And we have seen Iran aggressively pursue those interests.

What happened during the invasion, as U.S. and British forces advanced from Kuwait to the north, clearing Saddam's forces as they went, we saw, essentially, an Iranian-backed invasion at the same time that filled the vacuum that was left behind.

It was extremely well-organized and coordinated. And, in fact, the irony is, we saw Iran use the -- the very same successful tactic that the American Green Berets used in Afghanistan to win against the Taliban and al Qaeda, against U.S. interests in Iraq.

COOPER: You mean covert forces...

WARE: Very much.

COOPER: ... small numbers.

WARE: During Saddam's regime, hundreds of thousands of Iraqi Shia fled to Iran. Iran saw many of these people, not only as brethren and -- and refugees to be protected, but as an asset.

Hundreds, thousands, tens of thousands of these Iraqi Shia who were in Iran were mobilized and used by the Iranians within its armed forces.

COOPER: What would they do? They went in with money? They went in with arms?

WARE: With everything.

What they did is, in the chaos and the vacuum of power that was left behind the advancing coalition forces, they took power. They took the governor's office, the police chief's office, the Baath Party headquarters. And they never really left.

And, indeed, what the British found, as we learned from the British army report into the execution killing of six of its military police in 2003 by Iranian-backed Iraqi militias, is that, when they arrived in one of these major border provinces here, they found that the militias were already so strong that the report said the British had a choice to either confront them or to accommodate them.

And the report says that, for the sake of stability and security, they felt they had no other choice but to accommodate these militias. So, that entrenched the militias in power.

COOPER: And they have given the militias of, like, for instance, Muqtada al-Sadr, they have given them training; they have given them arms and money? WARE: Yes.

What we saw with many of these networks and these organizations that were in Iran is that they were kept in place, and they moved into Iraq. And with them came what's essentially Iranian Green Beret advisers.

You had Iranian form of CIA advisers all come in with them to guide, direct, to channel them. And even elements within Iraq, like Muqtada al-Sadr, the rebel anti-American cleric, and his Mahdi army militia, Muqtada and his militia were very different to these others.

They never fled Iraq. They didn't go into Iran. They remained in Iraq. Now, in the beginning, that was a great rallying cry for Muqtada. He was able to represent himself as a true nationalist: I stayed, while these people left. I suffered with you.

That was very persuasive. That drew a lot of people to his cause. But, over time, we have seen Iran not only court Muqtada, but, then, militarily, support him. We have seen a flow of money, a flow of arms, and a flow of training back and forth.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

COOPER: We will have much more from my interview with Michael coming up in the next hour of 360, a special edition called "Iraq: The Hidden Wars," how one battle became four, and what that means for turning things around in Iraq, if that's even possible -- also, Michael's chilling encounter with al Qaeda insurgents. They nearly executed him. He will tell us how he got away -- all that and more, as I said, starting at 11:00 p.m. Eastern time tonight.

DOJ_NMG_0124907

First, seer or deceiver? Self-proclaimed psychic Sylvia Browne says she has proof she's helped people. We know she has got it dead wrong about Shawn Hornbeck, telling his frantic parents he was dead, but what about her success stories? We will compare the results -- the facts, coming up.

Also tonight: underground and open for business -- the border tunnels the government knows about, but says can't find the money to close -- next on 360.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

COOPER: Well, we cover a lot of stories about illegal immigration. And we have done a lot of reporting at the border. Each time, we always find something new.

Tonight, you may be surprised by what we have uncovered. Back in October, President Bush signed a bill that authorized $5 billion to better secure the U.S. border. Well, today, we learned that several gaping holes still exist, quite literally.

Dan Simon is "Keeping Them Honest" tonight. He joins us near San Diego, where the largest tunnel to ferry drugs and aliens across hasn't yet been filled. Dan, what's going on?

DAN SIMON, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Well, Anderson, I know you have been here.

We're in Otay Mesa, California. Tijuana, Mexico, is just a few hundred yards that way. This is a very industrial area, a lot of warehouses, a lot of well-traveled streets here.

And, just below us -- it's hard to believe, but, just below us, there's a half-mile tunnel that extends all the way from the Tijuana side to this warehouse, inside this warehouse, which I am standing in front of. You're talking about a tremendous distance here.

Now, this tunnel was discovered last year. It was capped off. But it wasn't filled up entirely with concrete, which means the tunnel is still intact. Now, there are six other tunnels like this throughout the Southwest that also have not been filled up with concrete.

Now, authorities tell us they're confident these tunnels are not being used. They say that they're under constant surveillance. But critics say (AUDIO GAP) need to be (AUDIO GAP) why (AUDIO GAP) well, they're (AUDIO GAP) and, right now, they're...

COOPER: Obviously, we're having a little technical problem hearing the end of Dan's report.

He couldn't get inside the El Grande tunnel tonight. It's been capped on either end. But, last year, we did. And, remember, despite all the talk in Washington about securing out borders, smugglers and illegal immigrants may still be using tunnels like this to get across.

Here's what it looked like when we went below.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

COOPER (voice-over): The exit doesn't look like much, a three- by-three-foot hole in the floor of a San Diego warehouse. Climb down this ladder, however, and what you discover is stunning.

(on camera): ICE agents will tell you, this is one of the most sophisticated tunnels that they have ever discovered underneath the U.S.-Mexican border. It likely took years to build. You can see some of the -- the pick marks used. And this is -- this is stone, so, digging through this would take a long time to do.

It's also got electricity. They have wired the entire tunnel with these cables that have light bulbs on them. There's even a pipe that brings in fresh oxygen that was pumped in from Mexico.

MICHAEL UNZUETA, IMMIGRATION AND CUSTOMS ENFORCEMENT: We came in and removed all the bulbs and took those to the lab for fingerprint evidence.

COOPER: Oh really? You... (CROSSTALK)

UNZUETA: And, then, we replaced them with our own light bulbs.

COOPER (voice-over): Well, Mike Unzueta is the special agent in charge of Immigration and Customs Enforcement in San Diego.

UNZUETA: Yes, I mean, you can see right here there's a junction box for electricity. They probably used these junction boxes in the construction, if they had some sort of electrical tools that were assisting them in the drilling.

COOPER: This tunnel is just one of several that have been discovered by San Diego's Tunnel Task Force.

UNZUETA: And here's where it really starts getting kind of wet.

COOPER (on camera): When you're walking in the tunnel, it's -- it's easy to get disoriented. It's hard to get a sense really, just how big it is. They say the tunnel is about seven football fields in length underneath the United States and about one football field in Mexico. It's a total, they say, of about 2,400 feet.

(voice-over): It's the largest tunnel ICE has ever found under the U.S.-Mexican border.

(on camera): I mean, it goes -- it's as far as the eye can see, just a straight shot all the way down.

UNZUETA: Exactly. It's as far as you can see.

COOPER: And it looks like there's water all the way through.

UNZUETA: Yes. And, actually, this is one of the shallower parts.

COOPER: This -- basically, there's a -- this is like a T- intersection in the tunnel?

UNZUETA: Right.

COOPER: What does it tell you? Do you think they made a mistake? You think they kept tunneling that way?

UNZUETA: Well, we don't know if they were headed for some other intended exit, or if they made a mistake and got lost in the digging, and then had to make a course correction, and then dug this portion that's right behind me. And, then, of course, the straight shot is over into Mexico.

COOPER: There's no way to tell how long this tunnel was in operation. The ropes are still all around. These were probably used to actually carry the bails of marijuana by the -- the people who were bringing the drugs into the United States.

And, gradually, as the -- the tunnel rises up toward the -- the exit point in San Diego, they have actually poured concrete here to build steps to make it easier for people to walk on.

How would the drug operation work? Do -- do you know?

UNZUETA: Well, we think it would be kind of like a series of ants. There would be a number of people that would be starting in Mexico, either carrying boxes or bundles across, or maybe backpacks, making their way, all the way across the tunnel, to this side, probably depositing them at the entrance, and then backtracking again.

From a Department of Homeland Security perspective, I mean, we're looking at this as a vulnerability to our nation's security. So, whether it was drugs or aliens or who knows what else, you know, tunnels are of paramount importance.

COOPER: In Mexico, the entrance to the tunnel drops about 90 feet, but, here on the San Diego side, the exit is just (INAUDIBLE) below the surface to the ground.

And you would emerge from the tunnel, and you're in an industrial warehouse in San Diego.

UNZUETA: This is the exit. It's not really elaborate, but it gets the job done. It's certainly more sophisticated down below.

COOPER: For me, what -- what makes this so surreal is you're come out of the tunnel and you're in this industrial warehouse in San Diego.

UNZUETA: Right, I mean, you're in a warehouse that really you would see in any industrial park anywhere. It's pretty nondescript once you're in it.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

COOPER: So as we said, the tunnel has capped at either end. You might be asking, why haven't -- why hasn't the whole tunnel been filled in? We're told by Customs and Border Patrol that they are still studying how best to do that. In some cases, they are environmental concerns. In other cases, the tunnels are below private property, and then there's also the money.

At this point, there's no funding mechanism to pay for it. It would cost them $2.5 million to fill it all in.

Our "Shot" today is something we haven't seen in more than four months. New video of Cuban leader Fidel Castro. Today, Cuban television broadcast what it says is the ailing leader's meeting with Venezuelan president, Hugo Chavez, yesterday. Castro was dressed in a track suit again, and he looked heavier, perhaps, and healthier.

Chavez said the two leaders spent two hours discussing various topics, including the, quote, "threats of the empire", a reference to the United States.

Castro ceded power to his brother Raul in late July before undergoing intestinal surgery. The Cuban government has kept the specific details of his condition and recovery a secret.

Maybe a psychic could get some answers. Maybe not. We're going to put one to the test.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

COOPER (voice-over): A self-proclaimed psychic with something to prove.

SYLVIA BROWNE, PSYCHIC: There's a lot of cases I've solved right on the "Montel" show. I also cracked the ski mask rapist case.

COOPER: Sylvia Browne, wrong about Shawn Hornbeck. She gave us a list of success stories. We checked it out, but she might not like what we found.

Witness to a mystery woman.

UNIDENTIFIED MALE: The woman over there, take a good look at her, and I'll tell you why later.

COOPER: An alleged con artist on the run, a beloved daughter. Two women, one mystery that you're helping to solve. New leads, new insight into a troubled young life, only on 360.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

DOJ_NMG_0124909

COOPER: As we mentioned earlier, several attacks today in Iraq, at least 50 people killed, most of it Sunni versus Shia violence. In our next hour, in the 11 p.m. hour of 360, we're going to take a look inside the insurgency through the eyes of CNN's Michael Ware. You saw a bit of the interview a few moments ago. So many gripping stories, including this one.

One day, as Michael tells it, he decided to meet face-to-face with some insurgents, and it almost cost him his life.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

MICHAEL WARE, CNN CORRESPONDENT: What happened is Al Qaeda said, "Well, we now own this." So I went in there to document this, to see if it was true, and to try and show this.

COOPER: Are you nuts?

WARE: Well...

COOPER: Do you ever ask yourself that?

WARE: Yes, often, actually. In the end, these men intercepted my vehicle and, with grenades with the pins pulled, so that they were live, hauled me from the car, and with my own video camera, now preparing to film my execution.

(END VIDEO CLIP) COOPER: How Michael got away, what's really happening on the ground in Iraq, it's all part of a 360 special, starting at 11, "Iraq: The Hidden Wars".

But first, the story of Shawn Hornbeck's homecoming captured the attention of the country. Several days after Shawn was found alive, we reported that while he was missing, his parents had turned to self- proclaimed psychic, Sylvia Browne, for help.

Browne told Shawn's parents he was dead and even told them where they could found his body. She was wrong, of course. After our report, we spoke to Sylvia Browne's business manager and the psychic herself, who insisted that Browne has helped thousands of people.

We asked for some proof, and they sent it to us. Tonight here's what we found when we checked out their claims for ourselves.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

COOPER (voice-over): In the months after Shawn Hornbeck disappeared, his parents were desperate.

CRAIG AKERS, SHAWN HORNBECK'S STEPFATHER: You would think that eventually you would find some evidence or find someone that saw something happen or some little clue to give you some kind of an indication as to what really happened. And right now we have nothing.

COOPER: They turned to the "Montel Williams" show, and self- professed psychic Sylvia Browne for help. That's when they got the worst possible news.

PAM AKERS, SHAWN HORNBECK'S MOTHER: Is he still with us?

BROWNE: No.

COOPER: Browne told them their son's body could be found about 20 miles southwest of their home in a wooded area near two jagged boulders, but Shawn Hornbeck was found alive in Michael Devlin's apartment, about 50 miles northeast of their home. His parents say they'll never forget the pain they say Sylvia Browne caused them.

C. AKERS: Hearing that was one of the hardest things we ever had -- had to hear.

COOPER: Browne makes no promises about being right all the time, but by her count, she's solved hundreds of cases.

LARRY KING, HOST, "LARRY KING LIVE": Do you ever work with, like, police?

BROWNE: Yes, I have 250 cases, in fact, right on my -- there's a lot of cases I've solved right on the "Montel" show. I also cracked the ski mask rapist case.

COOPER: The ski mask rapist terrorized the San Francisco Bay area during the late 1980s. Browne writes about the case in her book "Insight", claiming she told police the suspect's last name began with the letter "S" and, quote, "He works for the city, something to do with the streets, actually under the streets."

George Anthony Sanchez was arrested and convicted of raping 26 women. He was a sewer repairman for the city.

The Los Altos police confirmed Browne was involved with the case but could not tell CNN what extent, because the case happened so long ago.

Browne maintains she never chases after missing person cases, but she'll help if she's asked. While police were searching Rock Creek Park for Chandra Levy in the summer of 2001, Sylvia Browne was asked about the case during a television appearance. She said the intern was dead and her body was in that park, which it was.

In the wake of the 1993 World Trade Center bombings, Sylvia Browne was interviewed by the FBI. She says she described one of the suspects.

BROWNE: Short build, wiry, black hair, black eyebrows. There's an "M" on there, and I'm not exactly -- but it's S-A-L-Z-E-M- something". Saleman. Salzeman. M-O-N. OK, Salzemon.

DOJ_NMG_0124910

COOPER: That conversation, according to Browne, took place on March 16, 1993, and she claims she was talking about Mohammed Salama, who was convicted in the terrorist attack. But he was arrested on March 4, 1993, 12 days before Sylvia Browne talked with the FBI.

Browne says she's done thousands upon thousands of reading during her 50-year career and that she has thousands of letters and affidavits from people she's helped. Browne's office sent us two of those as examples of her successes.

One of the letters was impossible to verify. The other was from Sharon James, who did a telephone reading with Browne in 2003, two years after her 35-year-old son disappeared.

SHARON JAMES, HELPED BY SYLVIA BROWN: She told me that my son was in Tennessee and that he was alive.

COOPER: Two months later Sharon James received a letter in the mail. The return address was from Tennessee.

JAMES: And I thought she was absolutely right, he was in Tennessee. Why else would I have gotten the letter?

COOPER: But the letter turned out to be from an insurance company in Tennessee that was looking for her son.

(on camera) Had he been living in Tennessee?

JAMES: No, he had never lived in Tennessee.

Sharon James.

COOPER (voice-over): Sylvia Browne had made one more prediction about Sharon James' son.

JAMES: He had been prone to occasionally take off and come back and take off and come back, so I asked her if she thought maybe he was bipolar, and she said no, he was schizophrenic.

COOPER: James says her son has not been diagnosed with schizophrenia or any other mental illness, and the suggestion that her son was schizophrenic caused her anxiety.

JAMES: I had this vision in my mind that he was living on the streets and schizophrenic, like you see schizophrenics in movies or something, and so it became very stressful.

COOPER: James has since reunited with her son in November of 2005, about a year later than Browne predicted. She paid $700 for her half-hour phone reading, and when she first talked to Sylvia Browne, James found some comfort, but now she says she wouldn't do it again.

JAMES: I was in such a different frame of mind at the time. I was emotional, I was grieving, I was worried, I was stressed, and I was looking for answers anywhere I could find them.

COOPER: And that, her critics say, is the problem with Sylvia Browne.

ROBERT LANCASTER, FOUNDER, STOPSYLVIABROWNE.COM: People come to her with their problems. They're desperate, and she preys on that. She takes advantage of that. She takes their money. She makes believe that she's psychic, and that's reprehensible. It's evil, is what it is.

COOPER: Browne responded to critics on her web site saying, quote, "Those who choose to believe in our philosophy will continue to do so because of their own convictions. Those who negate if after one human error never truly embraced our philosophy anyway, and that's OK."

(END VIDEOTAPE)

COOPER: Well, Sylvia Browne's business manager is standing by live, along with one of Browne's biggest critics, psychic debunker James Randi. I'll talk to both of them next.

Plus, the high school dropout who allegedly stole another woman's identity and conned her way into the Ivy Leagues. Tonight, she's on the run, and thanks to a 360 viewer, police may be closer to tracking her down. Stay tuned.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

COOPER: Well, before the break, you heard of self-proclaimed psychic Sylvia Browne's predictions, predictions her own people gave us as examples of success stories. Whether or not the predictions were actually correct may be a matter of interpretation.

Joining us now, two people with drastically different opinions on the subject, Sylvia Browne's business manager Linda Rossi, and psychic debunker James Randi.

Linda, thanks for being on the program. We asked you and Sylvia Browne for some examples of success stories. You said Sharon James was a success, and Sylvia Browne claims she all but named one of the World Trade Center bombers. It turns out that was almost two weeks after he'd already been arrested.

Do you still consider those success stories?

LINDA ROSSI, SYLVIA BROWNE'S BUSINESS MANAGER: Yes, because at the time that she spoke about that, she didn't know that they had been named. And not only that, but she also worked on the Chandra Levy case, which she talked to the parents after they requested her to do so, and I might add, free of charge. She never charges anyone to do that.

COOPER: But you said on the World Trade Center case, though, that it was before those people had been named. We did a Google search. That guy's name was all over Nexis, all over newspapers multiple times.

DOJ_NMG_0124911

ROSSI: Well, I don't know about the exact date of that, but I do know when Sylvia put forth that prediction, when it was publicized might be a different matter, but when she put forth that prediction, that name was not known.

COOPER: Well, the FBI video which you sent us, which is her FBI testimony, that, according to you guys, that was at least some two weeks after this guy had already been arrested and after his name was already out there.

In the Chandra Levy case, they were already searching in the park. Isn't that correct?

ROSSI: They were searching in the park during the time, but not -- not during the time when she talked to the family and told them where they were, only when they did the interview.

COOPER: And Sharon James, do you feel she's still a success story?

ROSSI: I talked with, yes, Sharon James myself personally. She testified to the fact that during the time when she got the notice that she received from Tennessee, that she felt that that was a validation from the standpoint that he was in Las Vegas and had never in fact been in Tennessee. And she felt he must have had some type of insurance connection in Tennessee.

The point being that he was found alive and well. Granted, it was after the time that Sylvia thought that he would, but nonetheless that he was found alive and well.

COOPER: But Sylvia was saying...

ROSSI: And Anderson, wait a minute. I would like to add here, first and foremost, that Sylvia is a teacher, a spiritual teacher and a humanitarian, and her...

COOPER: But actually, first and foremost on her web site it says psychic.

ROSSI: First and foremost she is a spiritual teacher.

COOPER: OK, that's actually second on her web site.

ROSSI: Part of that -- the psychic part is a part of that, but her major thrust in the world...

COOPER: Just so we're accurate, on her web site, when you Google her, and I just went to your web site. It says, "Sylvia Browne, psychic and spiritual teacher," so first and foremost she's a psychic.

ROSSI: OK. Well, first, she has -- you can't separate the psychic part from her spirituality.

COOPER: But she makes her money from being a psychic.

ROSSI: She supports her religious organization and her corporation from being a psychic. Yes, that's a fact.

COOPER: OK.

ROSSI: All of which is returned back to her spiritual organization and her corporation. Sylvia gets no money at all from her psychic readings personally.

COOPER: OK, I want to bring in James Randi. James, you've actually called Sylvia Browne a villain.

We spoke to Ted Gunderson, who's a retired senior special agent in charge of the FBI in Los Angeles. He's worked with Sylvia Browne, and he says -- he says he's worked with her quite a bit. And he said this about her. He says, quote, "I've worked with numerous psychics in the past and very few are really on target, but Sylvia Browne is probably one of the most accurate psychics in the country."

Now, that's from a former senior FBI official. Are you saying he's wrong?

JAMES RANDI, PSYCHIC DEBUNKER: I think that perhaps he doesn't know enough about his subjects. I'm not talking about law enforcement now. I'm talking about detective work.

But he has to judge these things much more carefully, I would think, Anderson. He has to look at the total reading, everything that she says about any one fact, and evaluate that.

What you've done here, and what has been done here, I should say, is that cases that were successful or apparently successful have been selective. Now this is very much like the race track devotee who goes to the races, loses his money...

ROSSI: I can... COOPER: Let him finish his point. Just finish your point, Jim.

RANDI: The point is that the fellow at the racetrack keeps on very proudly telling you about the number of horses that he bet on that have come right up front and made money and such. But he's in tatters, because he doesn't win in the long run.

COOPER: Linda...

RANDI: If he selects the evidence, it always comes out the way you want it to.

COOPER: Got your point.

Linda, Sylvia maintains that she'd not 100 percent accurate and she never claims to be.

ROSSI: Absolutely.

COOPER: But when she told Shawn Hornbeck's frantic parents that he was dead and where to find his body, she sounded pretty certain. She didn't say, "I think he's dead, but I could be wrong." She said, "He's no longer with us, and here's where his body is."

ROSSI: Because we still don't have the body of this case. We don't know...

COOPER: Shawn, you think he may be dead?

ROSSI: No, not Shawn Hornbeck. But we -- you know, she could have seen another person that was -- that was also...

COOPER: She didn't say maybe it's another person. She said he's dead, and here's where his body is.

ROSSI: I understand that. This is what she said, but she has also claimed she is not 100 percent. She is a vessel by which the energy comes through or information comes through. She's just merely a vessel from God. You can't separate the two.

And for Randi, as a professed atheist, to judge anyone of spirituality is a joke. He has now negated -- now wait a minute. Everything she does is through God, with God. She gives God credit for everything.

Randi is a professed atheist who claims that anyone who believes in a religion is weak-minded and superstitious. He's negated Christianity. He's negated Islam. He's negated every religion...

COOPER: So -- OK. That's like a high school debating tactic, to attack the guy who's asking the question, as opposed to answering the actual question.

ROSSI: No, but that's -- you can't separate -- wait a minute, Anderson. You cannot separate the psychic ability from the spirituality. It comes from God. COOPER: Wait. But so by me asking questions, am I godless, too?

ROSSI: No, of course not.

COOPER: OK, so you're not attacking my religious beliefs?

ROSSI: But you're doing a fair-minded reporting. What he's doing is he's judging, and as a magician, he doesn't have the credentials to judge anyone. On psychic ability of any type.

COOPER: OK. We're going to take a short break, and I want to continue the discussion. Again, I appreciate both of you being on the program. We'll be right back.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

COOPER: And we're continuing our discussion of Sylvia Browne. Joining me is Sylvia Browne's business manager, Linda Rossi, and psychic debunker James Randi.

Linda, I want to ask you something, because earlier Shawn Hornbeck's parents had stated that on the "Montel Williams" show, after they were told that Shawn was dead, they wanted to speak to Sylvia more outside of the parameters of the show and were told that they'd have to pay her rate of $700 for a half hour. Is that true?

ROSSI: I will stand with my life on this, that that is not true. Now, somebody might have told her that that wasn't connected with our office. That I can't attest to, but Sylvia has never, ever charged any individual who has come in with a missing person case or a law enforcement agency. That...

COOPER: I want to be clear. They didn't say -- they were unclear on who told them that, so I want to point that out, as well.

ROSSI: Exactly. It could have been somebody -- thank you. It could have been somebody from the show who didn't know anything. But our staff, the shortest term that any member of our staff has been with Sylvia is 20 years. I myself have been there 35. I have never, ever -- and I've seen people from all walks of life, religious, whatever...

COOPER: But she does make $700 for a half-hour read?

ROSSI: She does make $700 -- she doesn't make $700. The $700 that she charges, unsolicited. She never asks for anyone to do that. The same with, you know -- the same with our religious beliefs. People come to us seeking our help.

What I really want to question, James Randi, before we go into him, is this from now has been bordering on a malicious persecution of Sylvia. Why doesn't she go after the charlatans, the true charlatans that are out there, bilking people thousands of dollars?

COOPER: Let me ask James. What is so bad about Sylvia Browne? What's so bad about Sylvia Browne? RANDI: There's nothing intrinsically bad about Sylvia Browne that isn't bad about all of the people who pretend to the grieving people out there who need them or believe they need them that they can speak to the dead.

No, I have gone after Sylvia Browne...

ROSSI: The same can be true of religion.

RANDI: ... because she's a big figure -- would you mind? I go after Sylvia Browne because she is a major figure in the field. And she gets a lot of publicity, a lot of exposures on shows all over the world. She is one of the major figures that I go after, yes.

COOPER: James, you challenged Sylvia Browne to take a test of her psychic ability. What would exactly that test be, very quickly?

RANDI: Very quickly? Well, she would do readings for ten people, ten people that would be chosen because they believe Sylvia Browne and they believe she has powers, and they believe in psychic powers of that sort.

She would do ten readings. We would then shuffle those ten readings and give them all to the people who had the readings done for them and ask them to sort them out, which one is your reading? It should be pretty evident that you could take the reading that was made for you, and you could single that out.

COOPER: Linda -- Linda, would Sylvia Browne take that test?

ROSSI: Absolutely not, because she has nothing -- it's loaded. He's coming from a...

RANDI: She already agreed to do it.
ROSSI: Wait a minute, Randi. I let you talk. Now let me...
COOPER: No shouting. No shouting. Let's just be calm.
ROSSI: First of all, she has nothing to prove to Randi.
RANDI: That's true.
ROSSI: You have somebody who's an atheist, who's already coming...
RANDI: Oh, come on. Get off the atheist thing.
ROSSI: Get off the psychic thing.
COOPER: All right. So you're -- so Linda -- I know arguing is popular on cable news, but we just don't like it on this show. So Linda, you're saying Sylvia will not take the test, bottom line?
ROSSI: No, because she has nothing to prove to James Randi.
COOPER: So she...
ROSSI: She has nothing to prove to James Randi. Her spiritual work speaks for itself. Over 50-plus years of work.
RANDI: Take the test.
COOPER: We'll let the audience be the judge on that.
James Randi, appreciate you both being on the program, Linda, as well. Thank you very much.
ROSSI: Thank you.
COOPER: You can decide for yourselves.
Before we go to break, a quick programming note. We had planned to bring you Gary Tuchman's report here on the alleged Ivy League con artist missing, along with the woman whose identity she allegedly stole. The conversation we just saw just ran kind of long. We're going to bring you Gary's report tomorrow.
Just ahead, why the war in Iraq has turned into four separate wars, none of them easy to fight. Some unparalleled firsthand reporting from CNN's Michael Ware on the fighting, in depth. You won't find it anywhere else.
Also, talk about Iran's growing influence and how Michael almost became a hostage. All that and more when 360 continues.

Senate Seeking Expanded Say In Iraq (CHIT)

By Aamer Madhani
Chicago Tribune, January 31, 2007
WASHINGTON -- In an intensifying debate on the war in Iraq, Democratic senators began probing Tuesday how Congress could halt President Bush's plan to send more troops to Iraq or even use its powers to halt the war altogether.
Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) introduced legislation that would immediately place a cap on the number of troops in Iraq—now at about 132,000—and remove all combat brigades in the war zone by March 31, 2008. Perhaps the boldest—and most quixotic—challenge to the president's authority came from Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.), who said he would introduce legislation Wednesday that would end all funding for the deployment of troops within six months after it is implemented, forcing an end to the war.
Even a leading Republican senator expressed doubts about Bush moving forward on Iraq without sharing decision-making with Congress.
Obama, who first voiced support for a phased withdrawal in a speech before the Chicago Council on Global Affairs in November, said he felt compelled to try to halt Bush's "reckless escalation" plan to send 21,500 more U.S. troops to Iraq.
"But no amount of American soldiers can solve the political differences at the heart of somebody else's civil war, nor settle the grievances in the hearts of the combatants," Obama said. "The time for waiting in Iraq is over. The days of our open-ended commitment must come to a close. And the need to bring this war to an end is here."
He said he adopted the March 31, 2008, end date from recommendations made last year by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group. Troop levels would be capped at the military's strength on Jan. 10, the day Bush announced he would send more troops to Iraq, and the phased withdrawal would begin as early as May 1, according to Obama's proposal.
The proposal would allow for the U.S. troop redeployment to pause, with congressional approval, if the Iraqis meet political and security benchmarks laid out by the Bush administration in its plan for a surge of troops. Obama and others argue that American forces can be of little help now because the Iraqi government is unwilling to make the difficult decisions that would make the most of the U.S. presence. The growing complaints about the war crossed party lines as the Senate neared debate on two non-binding resolutions disapproving of Bush's plan to send more troops to Iraq. Sens. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) and Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.) sent a letter to Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzales asking for the administration's views on Congress' war powers.

DOJ_NMG_0124914

Specter told reporters following a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing that a clash is imminent between the White House and Congress over what war powers the Constitution guarantees the executive and legislative branches.

"I would respectfully suggest to the president that he is not the sole decider," Specter said during the hearing. "The decider is a shared and joint responsibility."

In the Senate panel's hearing on war powers, four of five constitutional law experts agreed that Congress effectively has the right to end the war, particularly by cutting off funding. The president, as commander in chief, is solely responsible for strategy and tactics, the experts concluded.

Bradford Berenson, who was a White House lawyer from 2001 to 2003 and advised on executive authority, said, "In my judgment, a statute that says as of six months of the date of enactment, the U.S. shall no longer be engaged in hostilities in Iraq is presumptively constitutional. That would be if it could be passed presumably over the president's veto, it would be a constitutional statute and proper exercise of Congress' broad authority."

Robert Turner, of the Center for National Security Law at the University of Virginia, warned that Congress should proceed with caution before cutting off funding, as suggested by Feingold.

He said that Congress was partly responsible for the deaths of 1.7 million Cambodians believed to have been killed by the Khmer Rouge, after it denied funds in the early 1970s to support President Richard Nixon's war plans in Cambodia. Turner also suggested that Congress was in part responsible for the 1983 suicide bombing that left 241 Marines dead in Lebanon. He contended some lawmakers, in calling then for a U.S. troop withdrawal from Lebanon, had emboldened the enemy by questioning America's willingness to stay in the country.

Sen. Orrin Hatch (R-Utah) echoed the sentiment and said that talking about cutting off funding in Iraq could be demoralizing to U.S. forces.

"The message to our troops is that we no longer support them," Hatch said.

Sen. Dick Durbin (D-Ill.), who voted against the 2002 Iraq war resolution, countered that two of the main reasons cited by the administration for going to war—the need to depose Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein and rid Iraq of weapons of mass destruction—are no longer pertinent. Durbin also cited news reports that the U.S. military is unable to properly equip the extra troops it is deploying and said that is another reason for finding a quick endgame.

"Under what authority do we continue to do what we are doing in Iraq?" Durbin asked.

At least one of the non-binding resolutions disapproving of the troop increase was expected to be debated this week, but several senators said Tuesday that it was unlikely to reach the floor until next week. While the resolutions are still in the pipeline, some Democrats appear to have thrown their energies toward taking stronger action to stopping the war.

Feingold said the non-binding resolutions are worthwhile attempts to denounce the president's policy, but added that Congress is obligated to voters to take action that has more teeth.

"Since the president is adamant about pursuing his failed policy in Iraq, Congress has a duty to stand up and prevent him," Feingold said.

Some senators said they hope that the sponsors of the two non-binding resolutions would work together to reach a compromise proposal. But Sen. Joe Biden, (D-Del.), a sponsor of the more strongly worded resolution, said he has been unable to get the main sponsor of the other resolution, Sen. John Warner (R-Va.), to discuss merging the proposals.

Specter: Bush Not Sole 'Decision-maker' (AP)

By Laurie Kellman

AP, January 31, 2007

A Senate Republican on Tuesday directly challenged President Bush's declaration that "I am the decision-maker" on issues of war.

"I would suggest respectfully to the president that he is not the sole decider," Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., said during a hearing on Congress' war powers amid an increasingly harsh debate over Iraq war policy. "The decider is a shared and joint responsibility," Specter said.

The question of whether to use its power over the government's purse strings to force an end to the war in Iraq, and under what conditions, is among the issues faced by the newly empowered Democratic majority in Congress, and even some of the president's political allies as well.

No one challenges the notion that Congress can stop a war by canceling its funding. In fact, Vice President Dick Cheney challenged Congress to back up its objections to Bush's plan to put 21,500 more troops in Iraq by zeroing out the war budget.

Underlying Cheney's gambit is the consensus understanding that such a drastic move is doubtful because it would be fraught with political peril.

DOJ_NMG_0124915

But there are other legislative options to force the war's end, say majority Democrats and some of Bush's traditional Republican allies.

The alternatives range from capping the number of troops permitted in Iraq to cutting off funding for troop deployments beyond a certain date or setting an end date for the war.

"The Constitution makes Congress a coequal branch of government. It's time we start acting like it," said Sen. Russell Feingold, D-Wis., who presided over a hearing Tuesday on Congress' war powers. He also is pushing legislation to end the war by eventually prohibiting funding for the deployment of troops to Iraq.

His proposal, like many others designed to force an end to U.S. involvement in the bloody conflict, is far from having enough support even to come up for a vote on the Senate floor.

Closer to that threshold is a nonbinding resolution declaring that Bush's proposal to send 21,500 more troops to Baghdad and Anbar province is "not in the national interest." The Senate could take up that measure early next month.

But some senators, complaining that the resolution is symbolic, are forwarding tougher bills.

Democratic Sen. Barbara Boxer of California, for example, is a sponsor of a bill that would call for troops to come home in 180 days and allow for a minimum number of forces to be left behind to hunt down terrorists and train Iraqi security forces.

"Read the Constitution," Boxer told her colleagues last week. "The Congress has the power to declare war. And on multiple occasions, we used our power to end conflicts."

Congress used its war powers to cut off or put conditions on funding for the Vietnam war and conflicts in Cambodia, Somalia and Bosnia.

Under the Constitution, lawmakers have the ability to declare war and fund military operations, while the president has control of military forces.

But presidents also can veto legislation and Bush likely has enough support in Congress on Iraq to withstand any veto override attempts.

Seeking input, Senate Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., and Specter, asked Attorney General Alberto Gonzales for the White House's views on Congress' war powers.

Boxer and Feingold are in effect proposing putting conditions on troop funding and deployment in an effort to end the war in some way other than zeroing out the budget. But some lawmakers and scholars insist war management is the president's job.

"In an ongoing operation, you've got to defer to the commander in chief," said Sen. John Warner, R-Va., ranking Republican on the Senate Armed Services Committee. But the veteran senator and former Navy secretary said he understands the debate over Congress' ability to check the executive branch.

"Once Congress raises an army, it's his to command," said Robert Turner, a law professor at the University of Virginia who was to testify Tuesday before the Senate Judiciary Committee.

In recent decades, presidents have routinely bypassed Congress when deploying troops to fight. Not since World War II has Congress issued an official declaration of war, despite lengthy wars fought in Vietnam and Korea.

Congress does not have to approve military maneuvers.

John Yoo, who as a Justice Department lawyer helped write the 2002 resolution authorizing the Iraq invasion, called that document a political one designed only to bring Democrats on board and spread accountability for the conflict.

The resolution passed by a 296-133 vote in the then-GOP-run House and 77-23 in the Democratic-led Senate, but it was not considered a declaration of war.

Judiciary Panel Mulls Presidential Authority (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, January 31, 2007

Most members of Congress relish the chance to rebuke stone-faced witnesses at a hotly anticipated hearing. But Senate Judiciary Committee members wanted something different yesterday from five constitutional-law experts: a little encouragement.

“I think you’ve got the impression that there’s nothing Congress can’t do,” Sen. Orrin Hatch (R-Utah) told Louis Fisher, a former Congressional Research Service scholar. “I don’t know if I agree with that.”

Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), calling his party’s electoral defeats in 2006 “a repudiation” of President Bush’s handling of the war in Iraq, asked Duke University professor Walter Dellinger whether widespread public opposition to the war placed a higher burden on Bush to answer to Congress.

“There has to be a discussion” about whether to place binding limitations on White House war policy, Dellinger said. “If you couldn’t have that discussion, it would be a system set up for perpetual war, because you could never discuss how to end it.”

On cue, the public reasserted its opposition. “Perpetual war is what [Vice President Dick] Cheney wants!” a protester called from the back of the room.

DOJ_NMG_0124916

The Judiciary panel gathered under the gavel of constitutional subcommittee Chairman Russ Feingold (D-Wis.), who gave a friendly push to his leadership by promising to introduce a measure formally today halting funding for new deployments in Iraq after six months. Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) continues to parry GOP attempts to slow progress on a far milder non-binding resolution that objects to Bush's plan to add 21,500 more troops.

No senator doubted Congress's power to force an end to the war by closing the federal purse. In fact, several Republicans, concerned that a non-binding resolution would send a negative message to the military, praised Feingold yesterday for pursuing a clear goal.

"Feingold's hit the nail on the head," Sen. John Cornyn (Texas), GOP conference vice chairman, said. "Those who offer non-binding resolutions suffer from excessive timidity. If you really believe that what we're doing in Iraq is a failure, it's pretty clear what Congress can do, and that's cut off funds."

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), who has circulated an alternative resolution laying out benchmarks for Iraqi leaders to show their commitment to self-government, agreed. Feingold's approach, "in my mind, is more intellectually honest," he said.

McCain said he received a list of proposed war benchmarks from the White House yesterday, although Republican leadership is still discussing its preferred menu of alternatives to the Democratic-backed resolution that likely will come to the floor next week. Efforts to mingle language approved in the Foreign Relations Committee last week with a competing approach backed by Sens. John Warner (R-Va.), Ben Nelson (D-Neb.), Susan Collins (R-Maine) and others have yet to bear fruit.

Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), eyeing the presidency, released his own plan to go a step beyond Democratic leadership and begin withdrawing troops by May. Obama would also add an immediate troop cap and set a series of benchmarks to gauge the Iraq government's performance.

In the meantime, Judiciary members got a history lesson from their five scholarly witnesses, who cited previous conflicts cut short by Congress using funding and authorization limits. Some constitutional experts warned senators of the perils of leaving a violent region to keep order without U.S. military support.

Robert F. Turner, a national-security law professor at the University of Virginia, attributed the rise of brutal Cambodian dictator Pol Pot to lawmakers' 1970 funding restriction on ground troops in that nation. McCain, a decorated Vietnam veteran and former prisoner-of-war, echoed Turner's assessment.

Turner also contended that Congress's public assertion in 1983 that more casualties in Lebanon would lead to war-spending limits helped inspire that year's deadly bombing of Marine barracks. During the hearing, he had a difference of opinion with Specter, who remarked that Bush is not the "sole decider" in the Iraq conflict.

"In the conduct of war and foreign affairs, the president is, in fact, the decider," Turner quipped.

Yet the executive branch had a limited presence in yesterday's hearing, which built momentum for Feingold's resolution and foreshadowed a contentious debate this spring on the administration's next supplemental war-spending request. Feingold ended the discussion convinced "that Congress has the power to stop a war, if it wants to," as he put it, earning a standing ovation from an audience peppered with anti-war protestors.

Among them was a mother who had a tender exchange with Hatch after interrupting his opening statement, pleading with senators to bring her Marine son home for good. Hatch told the woman he empathized with her plight, remembering a brother lost in World War II.

Another protester, Wade Fullmer of Military Families Speak Out, served as a South Carolina county chairman for McCain's 2000 presidential bid but said he hardly recognizes the Arizonan now as he readies a 2008 run built on support for Bush's war policy.

Now Fullmer, like many other protestors in attendance, is left to dream that Feingold reconsider his decision not to run in 2008.

"I'd like to see him on the Democratic side, and [Sen. Chuck] Hagel (R-Neb.) on the Republican side," Fullmer said.

Is Fidel Castro On The Mend?; Interview With Arlen Specter (CNN)

CNN THE SITUATION ROOM, January 31, 2007

THIS IS A RUSH TRANSCRIPT. THIS COPY MAY NOT BE IN ITS FINAL FORM AND MAY BE UPDATED.

WOLF BLITZER, CNN ANCHOR: Thanks very much, Lou. And to our viewers, you're in THE SITUATION ROOM and it's happening right now.

Breaking news, he's been seen only once in the past six months, until now, at least, new pictures of Cuba's Fidel Castro. Is he on the mend? We're going to go to Havana in a moment.

A tug of war over war powers -- who should put U.S. troops in harm's way? Who should bring them home? We're going to hear from a top Republican who warns the president that he's not the only decider. And we'll also hear from a leading Democrat who will try to cut off funds for the war.

DOJ_NMG_0124917

From drought to flooding, the world's scientists offer an ominous new warning on global warming.

I'm Wolf Blitzer. You're in THE SITUATION ROOM.

But we begin with breaking news from Havana. Cuba's ailing president, Fidel Castro, who hasn't been seen in months, has just shown up on television in Cuba. He appears with his ally, the Venezuelan president, Hugo Chavez. After dire reports on his medical condition, is Castro now on the mend?

Let's go straight to CNN's Morgan Neill. He's joining us from Havana. Morgan, tell our viewers what Cuban television has just aired.

MORGAN NEILL, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Well that's right, Wolf. What we have just seen is the latest video since October showing the Cuban president. We see him in this video, which is said to have been shot yesterday, a meeting with Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez. Now Castro in the video is seen wearing a track suit. He's seen standing up.

He's not walking in the video and we see him only from the waist up. Now he does talk some in the video, but Chavez does do most of the talking here. Now, the Cuban leader looks obviously frail, does, as I say, a little bit of talking. As far as date references in the video, what we do see is in the hands of Chavez, we see a newspaper dated January 7.

Chavez goes on to say that the video was shot on yesterday, that is, the 29th. He says Fidel appeared to be in good spirits, appears to be recovering and goes on to say that the two leaders talked for some two hours about topics including an agreement between Venezuela and Cuba and what he called threats from the empire, that is to say the United States, these words from Chavez.

But of course, the big news, the latest video we have seen of Fidel Castro, this is the first since October and coming just a day before, tomorrow marks six months since he handed over power to his brother, Raul -- Wolf.

BLITZER: Morgan Neill, stand by. We're going to be getting back to you. I want to get some analysis now on what we have just seen on Carlos Lopez of CNN Espanol is here in THE SITUATION ROOM with us. I watched the Cuban broadcast. We saw the plane of Venezuelan leader Hugo Chavez arriving. And then the next scene, we saw the Cuban president actually meeting with Chavez.

Let's talk a little bit about these two pictures. Look behind you over there. You see the most recent January 27 picture, supposedly. And now October 28 -- the differences, obviously, you can tell some differences.

JUAN CARLOS LOPEZ, CNN ESPANOL: Of course, the sweatshirt is different. That's one of the big differences. We don't see Fidel walking, as he did last time, but in this shot we see today they're together. Now Chavez is the only leader who has direct access to Fidel Castro. And the video that was presented by Cuban TV follows the same script as it did before.

We have some very light music underneath the airplane when Chavez's airplane was arriving. They talk about global warming and they show an article from an Argentinean newspaper from Saturday, January 27. They discuss global warming. Fidel talks about the issue how Chavez remember when he came to the U.N. he criticized the U.S.

BLITZER: When you put up January 27, that's when the article appeared, but we're told this video actually occurred yesterday, the 30th.

LOPEZ: Yes, a two-hour meeting, and obviously...

BLITZER: The 29th, excuse me.

LOPEZ: Obviously with modern technology, anything is possible, but it does look legitimate and it does seem that Fidel Castro is alive...

BLITZER: And if you listen closely to what Castro was saying his voice, his appearance clearly frail, but you could make out what he was saying.

LOPEZ: In one part I think they were making a specific point of having him read. And you could tell that he's reading the headline in the article and then he's talking about the whole issue of global warming and the impact of the use of gasoline in the environment.

BLITZER: So they were shown to be having a substantive discussion. And clearly he's wearing a different sweat suit yesterday than he was wearing last October. LOPEZ: And he was drinking -- you see him with a glass in his hand. And he drinks the juice. He didn't do that before. There was a lot of speculation about the sweatshirt and what he had under. Obviously he looks better now. And this conversation -- what we're hearing right now the -- he's saying you're the first one to tell people about the excessive use of gas. They're talking about that issue in the article.

BLITZER: Let's listen to it a little bit in Spanish and then we'll translate.

UNIDENTIFIED MALE: (SPEAKING FOREIGN LANGUAGE)

UNIDENTIFIED MALE: (SPEAKING FOREIGN LANGUAGE)

UNIDENTIFIED MALE: (SPEAKING FOREIGN LANGUAGE)

UNIDENTIFIED MALE: (SPEAKING FOREIGN LANGUAGE)

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: It appears that Hugo Chavez is doing most of the talking in that conversation, but his voice sounded somewhat robust.

LOPEZ: He sounded better than we heard him last time and one thing the Cuban sources have told us is that they do consider Fidel Castro's health a state secret and they treat it as a state secret, but they say they will not lie about his health. They will not hide if he has something different than have been seen, so this is consistent with what they have said and what we have seen in the past and it seems Fidel Castro isn't as frail as we thought he was.

BLITZER: And it's interesting that they decide to release this video with Chavez, Hugo Chavez coming to Havana to meet the Cuban president as opposed to some other event, which clearly the Cuban government could have staged.

LOPEZ: And they have done it in the past. This is the way the world has seen Fidel in the last six months, has been with Hugo Chavez, and Hugo Chavez has been the one giving information about Fidel Castro's health.

BLITZER: And just to remind our viewers, that was back in October when the last video we saw of Castro. This is video that was taken yesterday, but just aired moments ago on Cuban television. Juan Carlos...

LOPEZ: And edited by the Cuban... BLITZER: And edited, obviously, but by all indications, it does seem -- based on what you saw, it does seem to be authentic.

LOPEZ: Yes, it does.

BLITZER: All right. Juan Carlos Lopez of CNN Espanol -- thanks very much for joining us.

(CROSSTALK)

BLITZER: We're going to continue to follow this story. Enormous ramifications, what is going on in Havana right now with Fidel Castro's health?

Other news we're following tonight, President Bush's claim that he's the decider under fire.

And a holy ritual in Iraq stained with blood. More than 50 people were killed in tit-for-tat sectarian attacks across Iraq today. Most were Shiite pilgrims targeted on this, the final day of the religious ceremony of mourning called Ashura. Against that deadly background, a Republican senator here in Washington is disputing President Bush's go it alone approach to the war.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

SEN. ARLEN SPECTER (R), PENNSYLVANIA: The president repeatedly makes reference to the fact that he is the decider. I would suggest, suggest respectfully to the president that he is not the sole decider -- that the decider is a shared and joint responsibility.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Let's bring in our congressional correspondent, Dana Bash -- a tough statement from Arlen Specter, a fellow Republican.

DANA BASH, CNN CONGRESSIONAL CORRESPONDENT: A tough statement indeed, and as Senator Specter made clear there, he was responding to something that the president said a few days ago, where he said that he is the decision maker when it comes Iraq, regardless of what Congress does in terms of resolution that they may pass, opposing his plan to send more troops to Iraq. And Specter made that statement at one of many, many hearings today, Wolf, on Iraq.

At that particular one, Democrat Russ Feingold said he is going to introduce legislation to stop the war by pulling back funds to Iraq. Now Senator Specter said to us, sure, that is possible. That is the constitutional prerogative of Congress if it so chooses, but he doesn't think it should go that far right now.

He said what he was simply trying do is get the president's attention and make it clear to him that it's not just exasperating Democrats here on Capitol Hill. It's what he calls friendly voices who don't necessarily agree with him, but want him to recognize that public opinion is opposed to what he is doing and sending more troops to Iraq and that it's time for him to listen to and engage with Congress -- Wolf.

BLITZER: And we're going to be hearing directly from Senators Feingold and Specter here in THE SITUATION ROOM this hour. Dana thanks.

Let's check in with Jack in New York for "The Cafferty File" -- Jack.

JACK CAFFERTY, CNN ANCHOR: Well we all remember George Allen. That was the Virginia senator of macaca fame who lost in a very close race to Democrat Jim Webb. Analysts say he lost because of those comments that wound up circling the country courtesy of YouTube. Well Political.com reports Republican consultants are now trying to figure out ways for future candidates to avoid the same fate as Allen.

They're even using his name as a verb as in they don't want to be George Allen-ed. The chairman of the National Republican Senatorial Committee says he tells people you have to assume there's a recording devise of some kind on you at all times, especially now in the age of cell phones that can record embarrassing moments and the Internet that can disperse them faster than ever before.

DOJ_NMG_0124919

Of course, it's potentially a long list of no-no's making jokes, falling asleep in public, scolding aides, ambushing an opponent at a news conference. You can think of your own list. Here's the question though.

Is it possible to train politicians not to say stupid things ever? E-mail us at CaffertyFile@CNN.com or go to CNN.com/CaffertyFile -- Wolf.

It's a tall order, Wolf.

BLITZER: Ever is a long time, Jack.

(CROSSTALK)

BLITZER: It's a very, very long time. Thanks very much, Jack.

Coming up, talk or fight -- we're going to take a closer look at American military options on Iran and global warming -- and a global warming as well in dire predictions. Some scientists say changes are happening faster than expected.

And is it time for Democrats to start cutting the funding for the war in Iraq? One Senate Democrat thinks it is and says his party leaders are timid on this question.

Stay with us. You're in THE SITUATION ROOM.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

ANNOUNCER: This is CNN Breaking News.

BLITZER: We're getting breaking news, potentially a very, very significant story about that sneak attack on a military compound -- a U.S. military compound in the Iraqi town of Karbala that led to the deaths of five American soldiers in recent days. Could agents from Iran, Iran have been responsible?

Our Pentagon correspondent Barbara Starr has the story -- Barbara.

BARBARA STARR, CNN PENTAGON CORRESPONDENT: Wolf, CNN has learned that military investigators are looking into the possibility that an attack on a Karbala compound January 20 that killed five U.S. troops may, may have been carried out by either Iranians or Iranian trained operatives -- this word coming from officials in more than one government agency.

One official saying quote, "people are looking at this seriously" -- officials emphasize this is only a preliminary look. That they have no final conclusion, but why are they looking out down this road? Why are they saying it is possible that Iranians were behind it? Officials saying it is the level of sophistication and coordination and how this attack was carried out that it is far beyond the capabilities, they say, of the foreign fighters or the Shia militia groups that they have seen operate in the past.

Some of the indicators they're looking at, the attackers appear to have spoken English fairly well. That helped them get past some of the checkpoints. How they got maybe U.S. style military uniforms, how they came into possession of vehicles similar to those used by U.S. troops. Five U.S. soldiers were killed in the attack, one at the site.

Four of them, however, of course, were taken away, two of them found handcuffed together in the back of one of the vehicles, shot dead. Another soldier found shot dead on the road, and another soldier found barely alive, but died on the way to the hospital -- Wolf.

BLITZER: Barbara Starr, very, very disturbing information. The ramifications potentially enormous if the U.S. government concludes that Iranian agents killed those five American soldiers, a lot of people believe all bets would be off. But this is a preliminary investigation, as Barbara has just mentioned.

A member of the president's war team, not just any member, the former director of national intelligence was in the hot seat today on Capitol Hill, on the question of Iraq and Iran. Let's turn to our State Department correspondent, Zain Verjee -- Zain.

ZAIN VERJEE, CNN STATE DEPARTMENT CORRESPONDENT: Wolf, John Negroponte's confirmation hearing for the number two post at the State Department essentially turned into a debate on the administration's policy toward Iran.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

UNIDENTIFIED MALE: Is it the position of this administration that is possesses the authority to take unilateral action against Iran... VERJEE (voice-over): Grilled on Capitol Hill. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's new deputy jumped right into the line of fire on Iran. At his Senate confirmation hearing, John Negroponte says it's time for the U.S. to confront Iran.

JOHN NEGROPONTE, DEPUTY SECY. OF STATE NOMINEE: We don't believe that their behavior, such as supporting Shia extremists in Iraq, should go unchallenged.

(SOUNDS)

VERJEE: Negroponte says Iran is making trouble throughout the region, not just in Iraq.

(SOUNDS)

VERJEE: But in Lebanon and with Israeli/Palestinian peace efforts. The administration, he says, is in no mood to talk.

NEGROPONTE: We're reluctant to initiate a high level diplomatic dialogue with Iran until there's been some progress on this nuclear issue.

UNIDENTIFIED MALE: Other distinguished members of the committee...

VERJEE: In the same hall hours later, that approach was slammed. Lee Hamilton, the co-chair of the Iraq Study Group says the U.S. needs to talk to Iran. He called the U.S. policy of isolation a failure.

LEE HAMILTON, IRAQ STUDY GROUP CO-CHAIRMAN: What has happened? Iran has become the most powerful country in the region. It continues to support terrorist organizations. It's continuing to develop its nuclear potential. How can anyone say today that our policy towards Iran is working? It is not.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

VERJEE: Negroponte's confirmation is likely to be a quick one, but Senator Joseph Biden, the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, warned Negroponte that his confirmation should in no way be considered an endorsement of U.S. foreign policy -- Wolf.

BLITZER: Zain thank you for that.

So if the United States were to offer proof to back up its recent rhetoric on Iran's activities in Iraq, how should it punish Iran?

Brian Todd is standing by. He's looking at possible scenarios -- Brian.

BRIAN TODD, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Wolf, one scenario that many are talking about, the possibility of a U.S. military strike against Iran. We spoke with a prominent expert about how that might unfold.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE) TODD (voice-over): The U.S. has recently deployed more firepower to the Gulf, including a second aircraft carrier, but finding the right targets in Iran, where aid to Iraqi militants could be coming from, might be a challenge. One alternative, according to war game expert Colonel Sam Gardiner, target Iran's nuclear facilities instead.

COL. SAM GARDINER, U.S. AIR FORCE (RET.): If the United States were to do that, that would probably be about a three-day air campaign with aircraft like to be two cruise missiles fired from ships and aircraft, and we would go after the facilities we know about.

TODD: Gardiner says attacking nuclear sites would be a two-for, punishing Iran for meddling in Iraq and setting back their nuclear program for a few years. But Gardiner and other military analysts we spoke to believe a full-scale conventional attack using U.S. ground forces is unlikely given the U.S. commitments elsewhere. But would Iran retaliate? Gardiner and other experts say Iran could step up their aid to militants attacking American forces in Iraq or even respond militarily themselves.

GARDINER: Iran has a relatively sophisticated chemical and biological warfare program. And they really do have the missiles to deliver them. Chemical weapons could go down on American forces on Iraq.

TODD: And there's another option.

GARDINER: They could use military force to restrict the flow of oil inside and outside of the Gulf. That's a big deal.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

TODD: How big a deal? Analysts say by disrupting the global supply of oil, Iran could drive prices up to about $100 a barrel or more, a potentially devastating blow -- Wolf.

BLITZER: Brian thank you very much, very disturbing developments on Iran. Just want to reiterate the breaking news we showed you at the top of this hour, Fidel Castro only moments ago he was seen on Cuban television with the Cuban -- with the Venezuelan president, Hugo Chavez. This is video that Cuban television says was taken yesterday, and it shows Fidel Castro appearing to be a little bit healthier than he was six months ago in the last video we saw of the Cuban president.

Still ahead tonight here in THE SITUATION ROOM, the growing showdown between President Bush and Congress over the war in Iraq. I'll talk about it with Democratic Senator Russ Feingold and Republican Senator Arlen Specter. He, by the way, is now saying the president is not -- is not the sole decider.

Plus, protesters storm Ecuador's Congress, sending lawmakers fleeing. We're going to show you the pictures.

Stay with us. You're in THE SITUATION ROOM.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK) BLITZER: Carol Costello is in New York, monitoring stories coming into THE SITUATION ROOM. What is crossing the wires right now, Carol?

CAROL COSTELLO, CNN ANCHOR: Incredible pictures to show you, Wolf. Take a look at this. Ecuadorian lawmakers forced to flee as demonstrators storm the country's Congress building in Kito, rocks and bottles thrown, tear gas used. These were violent clashes with police. The protesters demanding a referendum on changing Ecuador's constitution. They support leftist President Rafael Correa, who issued a decree, calling for a March vote, but the country's electoral count -- court decided lawmakers should have a say. This is a developing situation. Of course, we'll keep following it for you.

Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez is poised to gain sweeping new powers. The country's Congress set to give him decree authority, which he'll use to nationalize Venezuela's oil and utility industries. The vote was supposed to take place today, but it's being postponed until tomorrow so that in an unusual move, it can be held in the capital's main square, which would increase public exposure.

DOJ_NMG_0124921

A paramedic and a firefighter called out to investigate a gas leak were among at least four people killed in an explosion that leveled a gas station at a convenience store in Ghent, West Virginia. Five people seriously hurt here. The explosion so strong, it knocked out power to buildings three miles away.

And remember this scene?

(SHOUTING)

COSTELLO: Maybe you do. These protests almost derailed the 1999 meeting of the World Trade Organization in Seattle. Today, a federal jury decided the city violated the constitutional rights of some 200 protesters, specifically their Fourth Amendment right against unreasonable search and seizure. Now this could cost Seattle millions and millions of dollars. City attorneys say they will appeal today's verdict.

That's a look at the headlines right now, Wolf.

BLITZER: Thanks, Carol, very much.

And just ahead, should Congress block a build-up in Iraq by cutting off cash? I'll ask Democratic Senator Russ Feingold about charges that his plan will hurt the troops now in the trenches.

Plus, Fidel Castro shows he's alive, at least as of yesterday. We're following this breaking news. We're going to go back to Havana.

Stay with us. You're in THE SITUATION ROOM.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: To our viewers, you're in THE SITUATION ROOM where new pictures and information are arriving all the time. Happening now, breaking news we're following. We're seeing images of the Cuban president, Hugo -- Fidel Castro that is, for the first time in three months -- the Cuban president seen on Cuban television only in the past hour or so. The video shows Castro and his main ally in the region. That would be the Venezuelan president, Hugo Chavez. The video was reportedly taped yesterday. We're going to go to Havana in a moment.

In Iraq, are Iranians partly responsible for a recent sneak attack that left five American troops dead? Right now military investigators are looking into that possibility, that, according to U.S. officials who have spoken to our Pentagon correspondent Barbara Starr. It concerns the attack on a compound in Karbala on January 20. The officials tell CNN the attack may, may have been carried out either by Iranians or by Iranian trained operatives. We're watching that story.

Also a claim that some scientists were pressured to discount the effect of global warming -- that's what some said today at a congressional hearing on the issue here in Washington. Among the allegations, that the White House has watched and censored what federal scientists can tell the public about climate change.

I'm Wolf Blitzer. You're in THE SITUATION ROOM.

Back now to the breaking news we're following from Havana. The Cuban President Fidel Castro ailing, has now shown up within the past hour in new video images shown on Cuban television after months without being seen in public. And there's a lot of speculation about his health. Castro appears with his close ally the Venezuelan leader Hugo Chavez.

Let's go live to CNN's Morgan Neill. He's in Havana.

Update our viewers, Morgan, on what Cuban television has shown.

NEILL: Wolf, this video came out just about an hour ago now on a show called "Mesa Rondo" (ph), or "Round Table".

And what we've seen in this video -- it's the first that we've seen since October. And it comes just one day before the six-month mark since Castro handed over power to his brother, Raul.

Now, what we see specifically in the video, we see the Cuban leader wearing a track suit, a different track suit from that he wore in past videos. We see him from the waist up. He is standing at various points in the video but we don't see him walking. And he's talking to Venezuelan leader Hugo Chavez. Castro and Chavez talk about various topics -- climate change. Castro at one point reads what appears to be a press summary prepared for him. It includes an article from an Argentine paper on the 27th, just a couple of days ago.

But Chavez says this video was shot yesterday, yesterday afternoon during Chavez's visit. Castro also talks at one point in a weak voice about the fall that he took in 2004, saying to Chavez that the things seemed to have come one after the other. But, as I said before, this is the first new video we've seen since October -- Wolf.

BLITZER: Morgan, thanks very much.

Morgan, our man in Havana, is going to stay on top of the story for us.

Other important news that we're following. Let's get some more on the raging battle over Iraq and a serious question that many critics are asking: should Congress simply take the ultimate step and cut off funding for the war?

Democratic Senator Russ Feingold of Wisconsin thinks so.

Just a short while ago, I asked Senator Feingold what he thinks of criticisms that doing so would hurt U.S. troops in Iraq.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

SEN. RUSS FEINGOLD, (D) WISCONSIN: Well, that's just another one of these red herring, false argument that's put out. Nobody's talking about taking anything away from the troops. What we're saying is there should be a timeframe to redeploy the troops. In other words, we don't say to somebody, "Hey, give us your rifle and give us your helmet. You're going to say here in Baghdad."

The fact is, our bill that I'm putting in tomorrow would say the troops have to be out within six months after the bill is passed. That's the safest thing for the troops, is to not be in Iraq.

BLITZER: In an interview with "Politico.com", this new website, you told Roger Simon that you were upset about what you called the timidity of several of your fellow Democrats who refused to join you in using the constitutional power of the purse to stop the war.

FEINGOLD: Well, my concern has been in the past that sometimes Democrats have been too timid on this issue. There's a little bit of old habits dying slowly going on here in the Senate. But I'm optimistic. The non-binding resolutions that are coming up, Wolf, are ones that I can support as long as they are only the first small steps. What has to follow and what I hope Democrats and Republicans will follow with is a binding resolution that says, "This thing has to end, we have to get out of Iraq."

And I feel on the Senate floor just a few minutes that many Democrats as well as Republicans are realizing that we have to have a real strategy, not just resolutions.

BLITZER: In other words, you think that Harry Reid, your Democratic leader, the majority leader in the Senate, Nancy Pelosi on the House side, Hillary Clinton, among others, they're not doing what they should be doing right now, namely using the power of the purse?

FEINGOLD: Well, I think the proof will be in the pudding. What's being done now, the idea of having a resolution that says, "Look, this policy doesn't make sense and we shouldn't have the escalation."

That's good. And what they're doing is positive. It's just that it's a very small step. It's almost like a sideshow compared to what has to be the real step, what the American people asked for in November, which is we need to redeploy the troops from Iraq, not just stop the surge. The troops have to come out. This is hurting our national security. It's hurting our military. And I think the leaders of the Democratic Party in both the House and the Senate will come around on this.

BLITZER: Here's what Senator Clinton said in Iowa this weekend on this specific issue. Listen.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

SEN. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON, (D) NEW YORK: This president can veto whatever we pass and given his track record, can ignore what we do. So unless we get a very strong political consensus that includes Republicans as well as Democrats, we are not likely to change this president's policy.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: In other words, to paraphrase, she seems to think that what you're suggesting, at least right now, given the lack of votes, would be a waste of time.

FEINGOLD: Well, that's just wrong. I mean, the fact is that if we are able to cut off the funding for the war, the president will not be able to conduct a war. And so what Senator Clinton's marks relate to are other issues like non-binding resolutions. It does not apply to the kind of bill I'm offering. And let's remember, these are some of the same people that told us we ought to go into Iraq in the first place. These are people that said, "You simply can't oppose a war like Iraq."

They were wrong on that and they're also wrong about this. We need to get out of here.

BLITZER: What they say, your critics, administration supporters, is that as bad as the situation in Iraq is right now, Senator, it could be a whole lot worse, the civil war could simply explode into not only ethnic cleansing, but genocide and infect the entire region. You've got a bad hand that you're dealt right now. What do you do in this kind of an environment?

FEINGOLD: Well, what they miss there and what they choose to ignore is the reality on the ground. The situation is already very much like what you just described. And I happen to think that the fact that our troops are there and in harm's way actually encourages this violence, not through any act of our own troops, because it's an environment that actually encourages people to act the way they are. The fact is, if we got out of there, it might get worse for a while for the Iraqis, but I also think it gives them a chance to try to figure out their own future without us standing there with a military force. But in the end what's most important is the security of the American people. As important as Iraq is, what really matters is that our people be safe. And Iraq is bleeding us of our strength. That has to end.

BLITZER: Here's what you said. I want to bring it back and put it up on the screen. You told the "Milwaukee Journal-Sentinel" back in November, November 10th, "Those who were there and came to the judgment the Iraq war was a good idea have to answer for some concerns I have about their judgment. That was a really bad judgment."

You voted against the resolution authorizing the president to go to war like Senator Kennedy. But Hillary Clinton voted for it, John Edwards when he was in the Senate for it, Chris Dodd did, Joe Biden. That's a pretty strong criticism of your Democratic colleagues.

DOJ_NMG_0124923

FEINGOLD: Well, look, it's a criticism of anybody that bought into these arguments that somehow the Iraq war made sense after 9/11. To me, it was obviously foolish and didn't make sense. And so those who voted for it made a mistake, as most of them have admitted. That doesn't mean they can't do the job in the future, but I think it's an important test of judgment whether somebody realized that Iraq clearly was not the right move in the fight against those that attacked us on 9/11. And that has to be factored in when you consider somebody for the office of president of the United States.

BLITZER: Senator Russ Feingold, Democrat of Wisconsin.

Senator, thanks very much for coming in.

FEINGOLD: Good to be on your show.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: And who should weigh in when it comes to committing troops abroad? Republican Senator Arlen Specter today offered a sharp response to the president's claim that he's the decider.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

SEN. ARLEN SPECTER, (R) PENNSYLVANIA: I would suggest respectfully to the president that he is not the sole decider.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: I spoke with Senator Specter just a little while ago about his strong rebuttal.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: You did it respectfully, but you gave him a little slap, the president of the United States.

What made you decide that this was the time to speak up on this sensitive issue, the war powers between the legislative and the executive branch. SPECTER: Well, I didn't give him a slap. What I did was articulate the principle of the Constitution, very basic, and that is separation of power and checks and balances, and the way the Constitution is written, the president is not the sole decider. The Congress has a very loud voice. And I made the statements today in a Judiciary Committee hearing where we're examining the constitutional issues.

Look here, Wolf, I want the president and the Congress to come together. I think there can be an accommodation. There are other plans which are possible to have a much better chance of victory.

BLITZER: But you know the administration top officials are saying it doesn't make any difference what you guys in Congress do. They're moving forward with their strategy, they're moving forward with their plan.

SPECTER: Well, Wolf, the president has yielded. A few months ago, he said he wanted no additional troops. Now he's changed his mind.

He said he was opposed to a commission for 9/11. Changed his mind.

Didn't want a commission for weapons of mass destruction. Came around.

Wasn't going to put the terrorist surveillance program under the FISA accord. He came around.

The president called a group -- bipartisan group in. I met with him, met with a group of Republicans, with National Security Council, Hadley. The president's calling all of the Republicans in to have a meeting on Friday.

BLITZER: So what do you see him doing? Where is he changing his mind as far as this troop increase in Iraq is concerned?

SPECTER: Well, I think the president reads the election returns. I think the president sees the feeling of so many members of Congress.

And listen, these are friendly voices. I think the Democrats are friends, too. But there is an element of partisanship. But when Republicans speak out -- and I'm a -- I'm a friendly voice. I want to -- I want to work it out with the president.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: Arlen Specter speaking with me just a little while ago right here in THE SITUATION ROOM.

Still ahead tonight, the violence in Iraq is stealing hope as well as claiming lives. A reporter's first-hand and very dramatic account of how so many of the best and brightest in Iraq have simply fled the country, putting democracy in greater peril. You're going to want to hear her report. And is climate change reaching the crisis point? Leading scientists from around the globe are about to sound the alarm. Stay with us here in THE SITUATION ROOM.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: This just coming into THE SITUATION ROOM. President Bush and apparently Democratic congressional leaders reaching some sort of agreement on Iraq. Let's go to our White House correspondent Ed Henry. What are you learning, Ed?

ED HENRY, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Well, Wolf, what CNN has learned is that the president and Speaker Pelosi, as well as Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, this evening agreed to create some sort of a bipartisan working group that both sides are pledging will try to improve the dialogue on Iraq as well as the broader war on terror.

This came -- the breakthrough came, we understand, after a conference call late this afternoon between the president and those two Democratic leaders. Their first meeting is going to be next week. It's going to include those leaders here at the White House along with other Democratic and Republican lawmakers.

Separately, we've also learned tomorrow the president is going to meet with Speaker Pelosi and other lawmakers who, as you know, just came back from Iraq and Afghanistan, that fact-finding mission to figure out what's really going on on the ground.

What is the bottom line here? Both sides trying to show that amid all this partisan tension, they're trying to come together, trying to figure out the next steps in Iraq and beyond.

The bottom line is, is this is going to be another Beltway bipartisan panel that talks, but doesn't really affect any change, or is it going to be something with some real substance? That will be the $64,000 question, Wolf.

BLITZER: All right, Ed, thanks very much. We'll watch this meeting tomorrow at the White House.

She first went to Iraq in the immediate weeks after the U.S. invasion and all -- and spent many, many months there. Sabrina Tavernise of "The New York Times" wrote a very gripping personal account this Sunday of how Iraq has simply unraveled, in large part because of the ruthless and relentless violence we see every, every day.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: What an article you wrote Sunday in "The Times," Sabrina. Thanks very much, first of all, for writing it. But give our viewers a sense of how you began to realize that the hope is gone and despair has come about.

SABRINA TAVERNISE, "NEW YORK TIMES": Well, I guess it was -- kind of goes back to spring of last year, when a lot of the families I used to go visit and just spend time with and have lunch with in the afternoons started to ask me not to come and started to make plans to leave. And I think that, you know, as the months went by and the violence became worse and the death counts became worse, people just saw fewer chances for their children, they saw fewer chances for their lives and their futures, and middle class people, like teachers and doctors, people who would be building the democracy that we want, we wanted to have happen in Iraq, basically just chose -- chose to leave.

They didn't really see that they had very many options for their futures.

BLITZER: Because that's what -- you know, I keep hearing from so many reporters and others who spent quite a bit of time in Iraq that immediately after Saddam was overthrown, so many idealistic, well- intentioned Iraqis started coming back -- scientists from academia. They really had such high hopes, and so many of them now are either dead or they have become refugees. They're living in Syria or Jordan or elsewhere.

TAVERNISE: Yes, so many people had returned. And, in fact, you know, aid agencies prepared for a huge mass exodus. But, in fact, it was the opposite, a lot of people were coming back.

And, you know, I had -- one of the elements of my piece was my own cell phone, which has been the same for the most of the time I've been there. And I had so many families, so many middle class people, so many people I would go and talk to and understand what was happening in the country. And at a certain point some time last year, I realized so many of them were gone.

They were either dead, they were missing, or they had left because they couldn't -- they couldn't -- they just didn't see a future for themselves in the country anymore.

BLITZER: This is such a heartbreaking story for so many Iraqis, especially the Iraqi Sunnis, because so many of them think they have no future in Iraq.

TAVERNISE: Yes, it's hard -- I mean, it's hard for the middle class across the sects, definitely. But the Sunnis who even are lower or poorer classes really are -- they're obviously the minority, and the neighborhoods are slowly being squeezed and pushed by the Shiite militias. And the Shiites are obviously the ones in power, the ones in the government, the ones that ultimately will probably be really kind of running things in the city.

The neighborhoods have very few services. Sunnis can't go to the hospital. If your kid gets sick, you can't bring your kid to get his broken leg fixed in the hospital in the middle of the night. The ambulance won't come to your neighborhood to pick your kid up.

You know, you can't get the police to come to bring the bodies away that are dumped in your backyard. So it's a very different feeling for Sunnis families than it is for families in Shiite areas.

(END VIDEOTAPE) BLITZER: Sabrina Tavernise of "The New York Times," speaking with me just a little while ago here in THE SITUATION ROOM.

Still ahead, it's expected to be an eye-opening report on global warming. Scientists the world over ready to unveil a major report on climate change. Might it be happening even faster than some thought? Mary Snow standing by with a live report.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: A warning about global warming. It's expecting this week as scientists from around the world release a report based on the latest climate change research.

Let's go to CNN's Mary Snow. She's watching this from New York -- Mary.

MARY SNOW, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Well, Wolf, 2,500-plus scientists worked on the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change. It's touted as the most comprehensive report on global warming. Some who previewed it paint a sobering picture.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

SNOW (voice over): The signs are there, but climate changes like melting ice sheets may be happening faster than expected. That is according to leading scientists from around the world who are about to detail the effects of global warming in a major report later this week.

KENNETH DENMAN, AUTHOR, IIPCC REPORT: We're hoping that it will convince people that it's -- you know, that climate change is real and that we have a responsibility for much of it

SNOW: The report is expected to conclude that scientists are more convinced than ever humans are causing the increase in global temperatures. And they're worried.

CHRISTOPHER FIELD, CARNEGIE INSTITUTE: It's as if we're standing in swimming pool with the water up to our chest. When the temperature rises, now the water is up to our chin or our nose, and every little wave is going to mean that it's over our head.

SNOW: What will climate changes mean? Some scientists predict, for example, that sugar maple trees could vanish from New England by the year 2100 and coastal communities will feel the effects when melting ice leads to rising sea levels.

GAVIN SCHMIDT, NASA GODDARD INST.: If those sea levels are rising faster than we anticipate, then people who are living near the coast or you who have low-lying land properties, they'll see -- they'll start to see things like increased storm surge damage and increased erosion.

SNOW: Climatologist Gavin Schmidt reviewed the U.N.-backed report and says it's not time to panic, but people need to rethink things like the cars they drive.

SCHMIDT: The planet is going to warm, it's going to continue to warm. And there will be potentially very serious consequences should that be allowed to get out of control.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

SNOW (on camera): Not all scientists remain convinced that global warming is being caused by humans. Some, although they are in the minority, claim global warming is part of a climate cycle -- Wolf.

BLITZER: All right. Mary will continue to watch this story for us later this week.

Mary, thanks very much.

Let's find out what's coming up right at the top of the hour. Paula is standing by.

Hi, Paula.

PAULA ZAHN, CNN ANCHOR: Hi, Wolf.

We're going to shine a light on America's hidden secrets, bringing intolerance out into the open. Tonight we have discovered a disturbing trend among America's white college students: racist parties. Tonight, we'll show you another one filled with racist stereotypes thrown over the Martin Luther King holiday.

Also, the surprising and shocking number of conspiracy theories that accuse Jews of having a hand in the 9/11 attacks. Anti-Semitism out in the open and a whole lot more coming at you at the top of the hour, Wolf.

BLITZER: All right.

Paula, thank you very much. We'll be watching.

And still ahead here in the SITUATION ROOM, foot in mouth. Jack Cafferty wants to know if it's possible to train politicians not to say stupid things. He's taking your e-mail.

Stay with us. We'll be right back.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: Here's a look at some of the "Hot Shots" coming in from our friends at the Associated Press, pictures likely to be in your hometown newspapers tomorrow.

In Havana, elderly women exercise under portraits of Fidel Castro and his brother Raul.

Iran, Shiite Muslims covered in mud beat themselves during a ritual for the holy day of Ashura. Iraqi soldiers celebrate the end of battle with a group called the Soldiers of Heaven. More than 200 militants were killed over the weekend in fierce fighting with U.S. and Iraqi forces.

And over at the Art Institute of Chicago, two workers try to fit an oversized Chicago Bears helmet over one of the decorative lions on the front steps. The piece of one of the helmets broke off.

And those are some of today's "Hot Shots", pictures often worth a thousand words.

Let's check back with Jack for the "Cafferty file" -- Jack.

DOJ_NMG_0124926

JACK CAFFERTY, CNN CORRESPONDENT: There are some strange people out there, aren't there, Wolf?

BLITZER: Yes, there are.

CAFFERTY: Very weird. The question this hour is, "Is it possible to train politicians not to say stupid things, ever?"

Frank in Durham, Maine writes: "Maybe it would be better instead of training the politicians not to say stupid things to elect politicians who aren't stupid."

Ed in Port Aransas, Texas: "Sure it is. They can get lions and tigers to jump through fire. Just give me a whip and some politicians and I'll try my best. It might now work, but it would sure make feel better."

Gene in Johnson City, Illinois: "Jack, these questions are getting to be more fun as time goes on. Never try to train a politician not to say stupid things. It's like trying to teach a pig to sing. You'll never get the job done and it annoys the pig."

Gretchen in Denver: "Can we train anyone not to say stupid things? If so, let's start with celebrities."

Mike in Arkansas writes: "Stupid is in the eye of the beholder. You say many stupid things and I am sure you think the you think they are wise and witty."

Yes, I do, Mike.

Tim in Studio City, California: "It is far more likely that I could train my cats to use a can opener."

D.L. in San Diego writes: "Jack Cafferty needs to be careful what he asks for. If the elected elite didn't say and do stupid things, he's have to go to work as a freelance reporter, find a new job, or retire. Thousands would be out of work -- "The Daily Show", "The Colbert Report", all the late-night hosts, the Sunday talk show hosts, the newspaper political sections. Jack, please, the middle class has lost enough jobs."

If you didn't see your e-mail here, you can go to CNN.com/caffertyfile and read more of them online.

BLITZER: He makes a good point. Where would you and I be if politicians didn't say stupid things?

CAFFERTY: We'd be in Havana with those old women exercising under pictures of Fidel and Raul Castro.

BLITZER: I love those pictures.

Jack, see you tomorrow here in the SITUATION ROOM.

I'm sure by then we'll here some more stupid things from some politicians.

Jack Cafferty with the "Cafferty File".

Tomorrow here in the "SITUATION ROOM", among our guests, the former Secretary of State Madeleine Allbright. We'll talk about Iraq, Iran and lots more. Madeleine Allbright, here in the SITUATION ROOM tomorrow.

Until then, thanks very much for watching.

I'm Wolf Blitzer in Washington.

Advocates Of Troop Surge About-face In Congress (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, January 31, 2007

For many in the Senate, they were for a surge of troops in Iraq before they were against it.

"We don't have enough troops in Iraq," Sen. John Kerry, Massachusetts Democrat, said in 2005.

In 2004, he told NBC's Tim Russert some things he believes "very deeply."

"Number one, we cannot fail," Mr. Kerry said. "I've said that many times. And if it requires more troops in order to create the stability that eliminates the chaos, that can provide the groundwork for other countries, that's what we have to do."

He no longer believes that now. He is among at least a dozen Democratic senators who in the past have called for more troops in Iraq but now support a resolution condemning President Bush's plan to do just that. Many Republicans who voted for the war now plan to support a no-confidence resolution, including Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, who in the past had warned that the war would be a long, tough slog and that Americans should "speak with one voice."

The Senate will begin debating that resolution -- or variations on it -- this week, perhaps as early as today.

Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph R. Biden Jr. has for years advocated increasing the number of troops on the ground in Iraq. But after Mr. Bush offered his proposal to do that earlier this month, the Delaware Democrat drafted a resolution rejecting the idea as not "in the national interest."

In June 2005, he said, "There's not enough force on the ground now to mount a real counterinsurgency."

"They're going to need a surge of forces," he said in another interview.

By last week, Mr. Biden had reversed his war strategy.

"The president and others who support the surge have it exactly backwards," he told reporters.

As late as last month, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid was still open to the idea of a surge.

DOJ_NMG_0124927

"If it is for a surge -- that is, two or three months and it's part of a program to get us out of there as indicated by this time next year -- then sure I'll go along with it," said the Nevada Democrat who voted for the war in 2002. "If the commanders on the ground said this was just for a short period of time, we'll go along with that."

After Mr. Bush laid out his plan to increase troops, the Democratic leader flatly rejected it.

"The surge is a bad idea," Mr. Reid said on CNN's "Late Edition."

Democrats say that the time for a surge has long passed and now that the war has become so bloody and so unpopular, it's time to pull the plug.

"The bottom line is that you cannot unscramble an omelet," House International Relations Committee Chairman Tom Lantos, California Democrat, said yesterday.

"The serial mistakes of the administration, with which we are all familiar -- inadequate number of troops, dismissing the Iraqi military, failure to crack down during the early looting -- are all issues that we cannot unwind with history," said Mr. Lantos, who visited Iraq over the weekend. "Things that should have been done 3½ years ago cannot now be done and expect positive results."

Finding examples of such evolution among Republicans isn't as easy, mainly because Republicans in Congress have been so uncritical of the administration for its handling of the war.

One stark exception is Mr. Hagel, who is considering a run for the presidency and has been one of the harshest critics of the war and the Bush administration's handling of it.

"There is no strategy," he said last week. "This is a pingpong game with American lives."

But he hasn't always opposed the war. He voted for it.

"There are no easy answers in Iraq," Mr. Hagel said on Oct. 9, 2002, before voting to authorize the war. "The decision to commit our troops to war is the most difficult decision members of Congress make. Each course of action we consider in Iraq leads us into imperfect, dangerous and unknown situations. But we cannot avoid decision on Iraq. The president cannot avoid decision on Iraq. The risks of inaction are too high. We are elected to solve problems, not just debate them. The time has come to chart a new course in Iraq and in the Middle East."

A veteran of the Vietnam War, he also warned his colleagues that an Iraq war would be a long, tough slog.

"This is just the beginning," he said. "The risks should not be understated, miscast or misunderstood. Ours is a path of both peril and opportunity with many detours and no shortcuts."

And Mr. Hagel warned them against sowing seeds of division with hot rhetoric.

"America -- including the Congress -- and the world, must speak with one voice about Iraqi disarmament, as it must continue to do so in the war on terrorism," he said. "Because the stakes are so high, America must be careful with her rhetoric and mindful of how others perceive her intentions."

Mr. Hagel co-authored the resolution with Mr. Biden rebuking Mr. Bush and his "escalation" plan.

Sen. John W. Warner, Virginia Republican, also has drafted with others a nonbinding resolution that condemns the plan but, he said, does so more gently.

Florida Senator Criticizes Foreign Diplomacy Of Bush Administration (MCT)

By Lesley Clark

McClatchy Newspapers, January 31, 2007

WASHINGTON - Sen. Bill Nelson, whom the White House criticized for meeting with Syrian President Bashar Assad, delivered a critique of his own Tuesday, saying the Bush administration resembles an "ostrich" when it comes to foreign diplomacy.

The Florida Democrat, who traveled to Iraq and eight other countries in the region in December, told the Council on Foreign Relations that he's convinced that President Bush's plan to send in more than 20,000 additional troops isn't enough to end the sectarian violence in Iraq. He called instead for an "aggressive diplomatic effort" with "all of Iraq's neighbors," including Syria and Iran.

"In short, the costs of failure in Iraq will be catastrophic - in growing threats to us and our allies, and in more American and Iraqi lives lost - if we do not awaken to the fact that an aggressive diplomatic effort, not military might, is what is needed to end the sectarian violence in Iraq," Nelson said.

His remarks came as the Senate prepares to counter Bush's proposal with a nonbinding resolution that says sending more troops into Baghdad and Anbar province is "not in the national interest."

Nelson voted for the war in Iraq, but he became increasingly critical of it as popular opinion turned against the war. Nelson, a centrist Democrat, voted last week in the Senate Foreign Relations Committee for the resolution opposing the troop surge, but said Tuesday that the vote to go to war wasn't a mistake.

DOJ_NMG_0124928

"The word is misrepresentation," Nelson said. "Over and over again we weren't told the truth. About weapons of mass destruction, about troop levels, about the cost of the war or about the sectarian violence."

Nelson said he believes that only a massive infusion of troops will quell the fighting.

"If we had 200,000 or 300,000 more soldiers in Iraq, maybe," he said. "It might make a difference in temporarily restoring order. But the global mandates on our military make that impossible."

Instead, he said, the United States must work with Iraq and its neighbors to find a political settlement between Iraq's warring factions.

He said the Iraqis must also take responsibility for their security and that the United States should appoint an "Iraqi reconstruction czar" to lead a "massive and effective international reconstruction program."

Nelson expressed little confidence in Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, saying he "either lacks the will, or he lacks the nerve, or he lacks the ability" to take on the Shiite militias.

"His rushed execution of Saddam Hussein - certainly justified but horribly carried out - spoke volumes about his insensitivity to the concerns of Sunnis," Nelson said.

The White House has expressed reluctance about diplomatic outreach to Syria because of the country's support for terrorist organizations. White House spokesman Tony Snow suggested that those who met with Assad were "lending a further specter of legitimacy to that government" and potentially undermining "the cause of democracy in the region."

But Nelson, who called Assad's government "not a particularly nice regime, either to its citizens or its neighbors," criticized the administration for adopting what he called the "approach of an ostrich."

"It's not working," he said.

Asked by several audience members why he thought the United States should negotiate with Assad and what the Syrian leader might demand in return, Nelson suggested he had no answers but was interested in seeing the two countries start to talk.

"I'm just a little country lawyer," he said, his diplomacy speech suddenly tinged with a folksy demeanor, "but the first thing it seems to me, you need a dialogue. You talk about the weather.

"Personal relationships are a big deal in that part of the world," he said, noting that CIA Director Michael Hayden had urged him to add Saudi Arabia to his itinerary because no congressional delegation had visited the country in two years.

"I don't know what door we come in," Nelson said. "But I found in politics if you can't get in the front door, go around and try the back door, and if that's locked, try the side window."

Obama Pushes For Iraq Pullout Deadline (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, January 31, 2007

Democratic presidential candidate Sen. Barack Obama said Tuesday U.S. combat forces should be out of Iraq by spring 2008 to end "a foreign policy disaster" but he stopped short of endorsing a cutoff in funds.

The Illinois senator introduced a bill to force the redeployment under law, but that's unlikely while Bush is president. Still, Obama said he's taking Bush up on his challenge to critics to offer alternatives.

"It is important at this point that Congress offer specific constructive approaches to what's proven to be a foreign policy disaster," Obama said in an interview with The Associated Press, "because we've got too much at stake to simply stand on the sidelines and criticize."

Obama's bill would cap troop levels in Iraq at the early January level of around 130,000, when Bush announced he would send 21,500 additional U.S. forces to Iraq. It would require that troops begin coming home on May 1 with the goal of removing all combat brigades by March 31, 2008.

Asked to respond to Obama's plan, White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said: "Any plan that sets arbitrary troop caps or begins to pull troops out of Baghdad before the city is secure will not lead to the political reconciliation we all agree is necessary for Iraq to be a stable democracy."

Some Democratic rivals such as John Edwards and Tom Vilsack have called on lawmakers to withhold funds for the additional troops.

"If we simply cut off funding without any structure for how a redeployment takes place, then you could genuinely have a Constitutional crisis or at least a crisis on the ground where the president continues to send troops there but now they're being shortchanged in terms of armaments and support," Obama said.

Some legal scholars question whether Congress has the authority to bring troops home because the president has control of military forces.

Obama noted that he taught constitutional law for 10 years and rejected the notion that the congressional authorization for war in 2002 gives Bush "carte blanche to proceed in any way."

DOJ_NMG_0124929

"The notion that as a consequence of that authorization, the president can continue down a failed path without any constraints from Congress whatsoever is wrong and is not warranted by our Constitution," Obama said in a 10-minute telephone call.

Obama said troops should be sent to three locations — home to the United States, in countries around Iraq to prevent regional conflict and to Afghanistan, which he said is in danger of falling back to the Taliban.

The bill also would place conditions on economic aid to Iraq and would allow for a temporary suspension of the redeployment if the Iraqis meet security, political and economic benchmarks.

Obama said he thinks his bill could get bipartisan support, but he doesn't have any co-sponsors yet.

Obama Bill Sets Date For Troop Withdrawal (WP)

By Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, January 31, 2007

Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois, one of the most prominent Democrats in the 2008 presidential field, proposed for the first time setting a deadline for withdrawing troops from Iraq, as part of a broader plan aimed at bolstering the freshman senator's foreign policy credentials.

Obama's legislation, offered on the Senate floor last night, would remove all combat brigades from Iraq by March 31, 2008. The date falls within the parameters offered by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, which recommended the removal of combat troops by the first quarter of next year.

"The days of our open-ended commitment must come to a close," Obama said in his speech. "It is time for us to fundamentally change our policy. It is time to give Iraqis their country back."

The senator offered his ideas in the midst of an intense congressional debate over President Bush's latest Iraq proposal, to deploy an additional 21,500 U.S. troops to curtail an increasingly virulent insurgency. It also coincides with the launch of the 2008 campaign, with Obama, as well as Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), former senator John Edwards (N.C.) and other Democrats forming exploratory committees.

Obama's timetable for completing a withdrawal puts him at odds with other leading rivals for the Democratic nomination. Clinton supports capping the number of troops at their levels of Jan. 1. Sen. Christopher J. Dodd (Conn.) has proposed a similar troop cap. But neither has embraced a timetable for a troop removal. Edwards has been outspoken in his opposition to Bush's new plan and has called for the immediate withdrawal of 40,000 to 50,000 troops. But he, too, has stopped short of setting firm date by which all would be removed.

New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson is the only other prominent Democrat in the field to set a withdrawal timetable, declaring that troops "can and should" be brought home by the end of 2007.

The Obama plan, called the Iraq War De-escalation Act of 2007, would begin a troop withdrawal no later than May 1, 2007, but it includes several caveats that could forestall a clean break:

It would leave a limited number of troops in place to conduct counterterrorism activities and train Iraqi forces. And the withdrawal could be temporarily suspended if the Iraqi government meets a series of benchmarks laid out by the Bush administration. That list includes a reduction in sectarian violence; the equitable distribution of oil revenue; government reforms; and democratic, Iraqi-driven reconstruction and economic development efforts. Obama's proposal also would reverse Bush's troop-increase plan.

The buildup is broadly opposed by Democrats, who believe that their constituents want to see the war end.

Obama described his proposal as a mainstream package of well-vetted ideas, consistent with the Iraq Study Group's recommendations and "with what the American people demanded in the November election," when they voted Republicans out of power in both the House and the Senate.

"When it comes to the war in Iraq, the time for promises and assurances, for waiting and for patience, is over. Too many lives have been lost and too many billions of dollars have been spent, for us to trust the president on another tired and failed policy," he said.

Interview With Wisconsin Senator Russ Feingold; Former 'New York Times' Reporter Testifies In CIA Leak Trial; Obama's Achilles' Heel? (CNN)

CNN THE SITUATION ROOM, January 31, 2007

THIS IS A RUSH TRANSCRIPT. THIS COPY MAY NOT BE IN ITS FINAL FORM AND MAY BE UPDATED.

WOLF BLITZER, CNN ANCHOR: And, to our viewers, you're in THE SITUATION ROOM, where new pictures and information are arriving all the time -- standing by, CNN reporters across the United States and around the world to bring you today's top stories.

DOJ_NMG_0124930

Happening now: Congress vs. the decider on Iraq. A leading Republican reminds President Bush he's not the only one who can make choices about the war. But, at the same time, there's a surprising new show of support today for Mr. Bush's plan for a troop buildup.

Also this hour: How much does experience count in the race for the White House? One candidate's admission sets off a new debate about who has got the best resume and whether star power matters more.

Plus: the presidential campaign 2.0. It's a new high-speed version of the political process for a fast-paced, plugged-in era.

I'm Wolf Blitzer. You're in THE SITUATION ROOM.

All that coming up -- first this hour, a holy ritual of mourning in Iraq turns into a shooting gallery for insurgents. More than 50 people, Shiites and Sunnis, were killed in tit-for-tat sectarian violence across Iraq today. Most of the dead were Shiite pilgrims turning out in droves for the final day of the Ashoura ceremony, the holiest day for Shiite Muslims.

They were targeted in the streets of Baghdad and Diyala Province while taking part in rituals that include beating their heads with knives and swords.

Against that bloody backdrop, the political debate over Iraq goes on here in Washington -- another Republican today calling on President Bush to reconsider, calling on him -- on the carpet, actually.

Senator Arlen Specter had some sharp words about Mr. Bush's claim that he is the decider. Listen.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

SEN. ARLEN SPECTER (R), PENNSYLVANIA: I would suggest, and suggest respectfully, to the president that he is not the sole decider.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Ed Henry is standing by over at the White House for some reaction to Senator Specter.

Let's go to Dana Bash on Capitol Hill.

A lot of activity happening today, Dana. What is the latest?

DANA BASH, CNN CONGRESSIONAL CORRESPONDENT: A lot of activity, indeed, Wolf.

Well, what you just heard from Senator Specter is a direct challenge to the president on something that we heard most recently Mr. Bush say on Friday, and, as you just heard, Senator Specter repeat, that he is the decider when it comes to military strategy and general -- general war strategy in Iraq.

What Senator Specter said, unsolicited, in -- today on Capitol Hill in a hearing about war powers is that, when President Bush makes statements like that, it is both unhelpful and wrong.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

SPECTER: The president repeatedly makes reference to the fact that he is the decider. I would suggest, and suggest respectfully, to the president that he is not the sole decider, that the decider is a shared and joint responsibility.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BASH: Now, Senator Specter, if you recall, back in the past year or so, when the Republicans still had control of Congress, he was one of the few Republicans chairmen who really fought hard against the president on a couple of issues, especially the issue of the wiretapping program, made clear that he did not think the president had executive power. This is a continuation of Mr. Specter's push.

I had a chance to talk to him briefly in his Capitol office. And he said that what he hopes is that the president listens to what he calls friendly voices, Republican voices,and that he does come to Congress and have a discussion, before, actually, continuing with his military strategy to send more troops to Iraq -- Wolf.

BLITZER: Senator Specter has been on record for a long time, for many months, that this is already a civil war in Iraq. We are going to be speaking with him in our next hour as well.

Dana, we also heard from the two co-chairmen of the Iraq Study Group. They were testifying up on Capitol Hill today. What is their bottom-line message?

BASH: Well, it's interesting. As you hear Senator Specter and other Republicans say that they don't support sending more troops to Iraq, the president did get some qualified support from a very important couple of people. And that is the chairmen, the co- chairmen, of the Iraq Study Group.

What they essentially said is: Give this -- this troop increase a chance, but -- and there was a -- a big but there -- they also were very frustrated with the concept of not -- of the administration not pursuing enough diplomacy when it comes to Iraq, and also not putting the screws, as -- as Lee Hamilton put it, on -- on the Iraqi government.

Let's listen.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

DOJ_NMG_0124931

JAMES BAKER, CO-CHAIRMAN, IRAQ STUDY GROUP: My bottom line on the -- on the surge is, look, the president's plan ought to be given a chance. Give it a chance, because we heard all of this. The general that you confirmed 81-0 day before yesterday, this is his idea. He's the supporter of it. He's now the commander on the ground in Iraq. Give it a chance.

LEE HAMILTON, CO-CHAIRMAN, IRAQ STUDY GROUP: I think you're at a point now where you have to bear down on the Maliki government, because of their non-performance over a period of time. And, if they don't perform, and if they don't perform pretty quickly, then, we will lose it.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BASH: Now, there, you heard it, as I said, some qualified support from the co-chairmen of the Iraq Study Group, but also some frustration, especially with the fact that the administration has not engaged enough in diplomacy and with those countries that the administration refuses to deal with, Iran and Syria -- Wolf.

BLITZER: All right, Dana, on the Hill.

And there's a lot of other activity on the Hill as well. Just a short while ago, the speaker, Nancy Pelosi, and other House Democrats briefed reporters about their just completed trip to Iraq.

Congressman John Murtha took aim at plans for a troop buildup and had questions about contractors working in Iraq.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

REP. JOHN MURTHA (D), PENNSYLVANIA: Well, we're going to have extensive hearings to find out exactly what's going on with contractors. I hear estimates of 100,000.

But the worst thing is, we don't know. They don't have a clear mission. And they're falling all over each other.

I saw nothing in Iraq, I heard nothing and found nothing that led me to believe that redeployment is right -- not the right strategy.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: We are going to have much more on the debate over contractors in Iraq. That's coming up in our next hour, right here in THE SITUATION ROOM.

President Bush is talking up the economy today, hoping not to talk about the growing Republican criticism of his Iraq strategy.

Let's go to the White House.

Ed Henry standing by with more -- Ed.

ED HENRY, CNN WHITE HOUSE CORRESPONDENT: Wolf, that's right.

White House aides really seem unfazed by Senator Specter's comments there about the president not being the only decider. They are basically saying, look, the president engaged, in their eyes, in unprecedented outreach to allies and critics alike on Capitol Hill. They say, he listened. He made his decision to send more troops to Iraq. He is now sticking with it -- White House spokeswoman Dana Perino telling CNN a short while ago -- quote -- "Congress controls the money. The president controls military forces. The president is not the only decision-maker, but he is the only commander in chief."

That reference, of course, to money is what you heard in vice -- in your interview with Vice President Cheney, where he was basically daring Congress to cut off funding. That is what the White House is basically saying, if you read between the lines, that they can give all the speeches they want, they can pass nonbinding resolutions, but it won't really matter unless they try to cut off funding. And the White House is fully aware that is politically perilous for Democrats -- Wolf.

BLITZER: You know, the president was out, as you well know, in -- in Peoria, Illinois, at a Caterpillar plant, today, Ed, talking about the economy, the global economy, if you will.

I want to point out some numbers in our latest CNN/Opinion Research Corporation poll. Sixty-three percent of Americans agree that the economic conditions in the country are good, but they aren't giving the president a lot of credit for that. More than half, 53 percent, disapprove of the way the president is handling the economy.

How worried is the White House, Ed, that the president's economic message is simply not getting through?

HENRY: Very concerned that, no matter what they do -- you probably just heard me trying to speak over the helicopters -- the president now back at the White House from Peoria.

And, as he tried to do just a week ago in the State of the Union, trying to shift the focus ever so slightly to the domestic agenda. As you point out in those poll numbers, he is not getting credit for a good economy. He sees most of his legislative agenda stalled on Capitol Hill, especially with Democrats running the show now.

Today, he was also stopping at a diner in Peoria. I couldn't help but notice that something on the menu written on the chalkboard said that they were serving fried mush. I -- I spoke to one of the waitresses a short while ago. She told me it's a very popular dish. It's corn meal fried up. You couldn't help but wonder if the president is trying to make sure that his agenda isn't fried mush on Capitol Hill. Right now, he can't seem to get any traction -- Wolf. BLITZER: And that's largely because of the problems in Iraq -- Ed at the White House.

Let's go over to the legal drama that's taking place only a few blocks away, the secret conversations that the White House hoped would never be made public. But they are being made public today in the CIA leak trial.

Earlier, it entered a new phase with the testimony of a former "New York Times" reporter.

Brian Todd is over at the courthouse with the latest -- Brian.

BRIAN TODD, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Wolf, the woman who spent 85 days in jail for refusing to disclose to investigators her conversations with Lewis Scooter Libby is now testifying against Scooter Libby. And she is doing that as we speak.

She is Judith Miller, former "The New York Times" correspondent. She has told the court about two conversations that she had with Scooter Libby about former Ambassador Joe Wilson, a critic of the Bush administration's rationale for going to war with Iraq, and about Joe Wilson's wife, former CIA officer Valerie Plame, a very critical two meetings that she said she had with Scooter Libby on June 23, 2003, and on July 8, 2003, in which Libby told her that Joe Wilson's wife worked for the CIA.

These were two conversations that took place before Libby told investigators he heard about Valerie Plame for the first time. Libby said he didn't hear about Valerie Plame until July 10 in a conversation with Tim Russert of NBC News. Judith Miller just told the court about two conversations that she had with Scooter Libby days and even weeks before Scooter Libby's claim to hear Valerie Plame's name for the first time.

So, that testimony is ongoing. The defense is now cross- examining her. We're told by our producer, Kevin Bohn (ph), who's just in the -- he's in the courtroom, where I just was. He buzzed us just a moment ago, saying that this defense cross-examination is very contentious -- Wolf.

BLITZER: Brian, it looks like this is at least the third or fourth prosecution witness who has now said that Scooter Libby told them about Valerie Plame long before he insists he heard about it from -- from a reporter, Tim Russert.

TODD: That is correct.

Judith Wilson -- I mean -- excuse me -- Judith Miller just said that she had the two conversations with on him on June 23 of 2003 and on July 8, 2003. Scooter Libby says that he first heard about Valerie Plame Wilson on July 10, 2003, from Tim Russert. Now, Tim Russert is going to take the stand later this week.

But the defense is already punching holes in Judith Miller's memory here. A defense attorney came up and cross-examined her while I was in the court. And -- and he said, essentially: Didn't you testify to the grand jury? When you did testify to the grand jury, you didn't even mention the June 23 conversation. You didn't remember it.

And she said, that is correct. She did not. She had to go back to her notes and consult that.

So, the defense is right now, very contentious cross-examination, trying to punch holes in Judith Miller's memory.

BLITZER: As they did Ari Fleischer, Cathie Martin, and several of the other witnesses who have already testified.

Brian will stay on top of this trial for us.

From trial exhibits posted online to colorful insight from the bloggers credentialed for this trial, the Internet is giving us a fly-on-the-wall view of the Libby trial.

Let's bring in our Internet reporter, Abbi Tatton. She is following this part of the sorry -- Abbi.

ABBI TATTON, CNN INTERNET REPORTER: Wolf, no cameras inside this court -- this court -- courtroom, but these Web sites are taking people, readers, right inside.

From the liberal Firedoglake, writing this morning, special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald in a seersuckery-type suit, and writing just a few minutes ago about Judith Miller, saying, "seated, staring forward, shifts in chair," this site saying, looking uncomfortable today.

And the bloggers aren't just looking at what the witnesses are saying, what is happening inside the courtroom. They are also listening in to what the reporters are saying to each other, reporters that are now finding themselves at the very center of this trial.

Other Web sites giving you an eye inside the courtroom -- this is the Web site of the special prosecutor, where, each day, trial exhibits are being uploaded, like this one, a record of the call from Scooter Libby to the CIA days after the -- the Joe Wilson column came out. There are records of e-mails of talking points from a Cheney aide to then White House Press Secretary Ari Fleischer, and a schedule of Fleischer's from July 7, 2003.

Fleischer has testified yesterday that it was at this lunch that Libby told him about Wilson's wife, that coming just a couple of hours after that haircut there.

And we're checking on this site of the -- from the office of the special prosecutor, Wolf, because we're expecting another batch of these documents to be uploaded in the next couple of hours -- Wolf.

BLITZER: All right, thanks.

I didn't know that Ari Fleischer's name is Lawrence A. Fleischer. I just learned something from that memo. Thanks very much.

Jack Cafferty, you -- you didn't know his name was Lawrence A. Fleischer, did you?

BLITZER: Yes.

(CROSSTALK)

CAFFERTY: Have you ever had fried mush?

BLITZER: No.

(LAUGHTER)

BLITZER: Yes, I hear it all the time.

(LAUGHTER)

CAFFERTY: No. I know, we hear it all the -- I will tell you, you haven't...

(LAUGHTER)

BLITZER: I have never -- I have never -- I have never eaten fried mush.

CAFFERTY: You have not lived until you have had fried mush. You get this cornmeal, and you -- and you -- and you fry it in a little oil, and you put some butter and even some maple syrup on it. And, I'm telling you, it's fine dining...

BLITZER: All right.

CAFFERTY: ... great cuisine, very popular in other parts of the country. They don't eat a lot of it in New York and Washington.

Some of the harshest criticism, Wolf, of President Bush's plan to escalate the war in Iraq is coming from an unlikely source, a Republican Senator, Chuck Hagel of Nebraska. He's a Vietnam veteran. And he's a co-sponsor of a resolution to oppose the president's plan for escalation of the war.

He's accusing the administration of playing a ping-pong game with American lives. And he's described the war as -- quote -- "the worst foreign policy blunder since Vietnam" -- unquote. There's a -- a great interview with Hagel in "GQ" magazine, in which the potential White House hopeful says the administration was -- quote -- "hell-bent on going to war in Iraq."

Hagel thinks Congress has abdicated its responsibilities when it comes to checking the power of the president, and needs to exercise oversight of the war's funding. When asked what it would take to secure Baghdad, Hagel says -- quote -- "It's not ours to secure. We have never understood that. We have framed this in a way that never made sense: 'Win or lose in Iraq.' Wait a minute. There is no win or lose for us. The Iraqis will determine how this comes out."

Some are questioning Hagel's motives for speaking out now, in light of the fact that he might run for president, and the war, of course, is a very unpopular issue.

Anyway, here is the question: What does it mean if Republican Senator Chuck Hagel is a tougher critic of the Bush administration than many Democrats in Washington?

E-mail your thoughts to CaffertyFile@CNN.com or go to CNN.com/CaffertyFile -- Wolf.

BLITZER: I'm going to try that mush one of these days when I get to Iowa.

CAFFERTY: It's terrific.

BLITZER: All right, Jack, thank you.

Coming up: Mitt Romney on the campaign trail explaining his conversion, some of the social issues. But can he connect with crucial conservative voters? John King standing by for that.

Plus: To get to the White House, you probably have to win Ohio. We're going to take a closer look at which candidates have the early lead in the Buckeye State.

And later: Should Congress cut the funding for an increase of U.S. troops in Iraq? Senator Russ Feingold of Wisconsin, he is standing by to join us live, right here in THE SITUATION ROOM.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: Presidential hopefuls out on the campaign trail topping our "Political Radar" today.

Mitt Romney is wrapping up two days of campaigning in the crucial early primary state of South Carolina. The former Massachusetts governor is meeting with conservative voters and defending his evolution on key social issues like abortion, gay marriage and stem cell research.

Sam Brownback is back in Iowa, which holds the nation's first presidential caucus.

But the senator from Kansas isn't the only Republican White House hopeful campaigning in Iowa today. Mike Huckabee is also there. The former Arkansas governor is making his first stop on the campaign trail since officially starting up his presidential campaign yesterday.

Former Iowa Governor and White House hopeful Tom Vilsack reports, his campaign raised $1.1 million during the last seven weeks of 2006. That's more than he aimed for, but far behind such Democratic rivals as Hillary Clinton, Barack Obama, and John Edwards. A new survey finds Senator Clinton beating out potential -- potential -- Republican rivals in Ohio. A new Quinnipiac University poll shows Clinton topping John McCain, Mitt Romney and Rudy Giuliani in separate head-to-head matchups. McCain beats Barack Obama, but loses out to John Edwards in the new poll. Ohio, of course, was the state that decided it all back in 2004, putting President Bush over the top.

And, remember, CNN is a partner in the very first presidential debates of the campaign season. We are going to bring them to you from New Hampshire on April 4 and 5 of this year.

We will talk a little bit more now about Republican Mitt Romney's swing through South Carolina and the explaining he has had to do along the way on some of the social issues.

Our John King is here with us.

This is a delicate dance he's got to go through to recruit some of these social conservatives.

JOHN KING, CNN CHIEF NATIONAL CORRESPONDENT: It is.

And, traditionally, Wolf, South Carolina has been the firewall, if you will. Candidates who stumble early on -- George W. Bush, Bob Dole back in 1996, a bit of a shakeup -- that's where they recover and try to prove that they have the conservative base of the party in their camp to go on and be the nominee.

Governor Romney, Former Governor Romney, now, the great advantage he has in this race is that he doesn't work in Washington, like all the senators running for president. So, he's out on the campaign trail all the time. And he has spent a lot of time in South Carolina, at the public events, which you just showed the pictures of, but, also, very smartly and very importantly, one on one, in small groups, with these evangelical, social conservative pastors and activists on the ground, because he does have a problem.

Two or three years ago, he was pro-choice, favored abortion rights. Now he says he is pro-life, against abortion rights. He's had an evolution on gay rights as well. You mentioned stem cell research.

His point is, many candidates over the years have done this -- Ronald Reagan did it; George H.W. Bush did it -- that this is who he is now, and he's surrounding himself with people who might not be known to you or me or people around the country, but are very well known in those communities, to say: I mean it.

But that is one of his biggest challenges, proving that, when he says he will be anti-abortion, defend the Republican platform, that he won't change his mind again. He is, so far, getting pretty good reviews, but there's still some skepticism.

BLITZER: Is there a conservative candidate out there right now who is simply captivating the conservative base, the real conservative base of the party?

KING: There was -- if you will go back six months ago, there was a big Romney buzz, a lot of people out there saying, this was the guy emerging as the early -- quote, unquote -- "conservative alternative" to John McCain, who would say: You know, I'm pretty conservative. Why do you need an alternative to me?

But Romney had the buzz early on. But, because of the skepticism, because of people asking questions, and, frankly, just because people are starting to choose sides, and it gets a little more difficult, even this far out, that's why you have Huckabee, Brownback, even former Wisconsin Governor and HHS Secretary Tommy Thompson, people who have longstanding, very conservative records on those social issues, saying, "I think I'm going to run, too," or "I am going to run, too," they are sort of hovering, just to see, can Romney survive this credibility test right now about his positions?

How does McCain fare early out? Will Rudy Giuliani keep support, or will the Republican base say, no way; we are not taking a guy who supports gay rights and abortion rights?

So, you do have what we call second-tier candidates, hovering, if you will, waiting to see if somebody in the top tier falls out.

BLITZER: They want to have a breakout moment as well. We will watch it with you.

KING: Long way to go.

BLITZER: Yes. Thanks very much, John, for that.

Coming up: How old is too old for airline pilots? We are going to tell you about some new rules that could be affecting all of us who fly.

Plus: Which party has got the upper hand in the political battle over the war in Iraq? Find out in today's "Strategy Session."

Stick around. You're in THE SITUATION ROOM.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: Our Carol Costello is monitoring the wires, keeping an eye on all the video feeds coming into THE SITUATION ROOM.

She is joining us from New York with a closer look at some other important stories making news.

Hi, Carol.

CAROL COSTELLO, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Hi, Wolf.

Hello to all of you.

DOJ_NMG_0124935

How old is too old for a pilot to fly an airplane? That is the issue the Federal Aviation Administration is weighing in on. New rules proposed by the FAA would allow pilots to fly until they turn 65 years old. That's five years older than the mandatory retirement age for pilots now.

There is a twist to the FAA proposal, however. At least one person in the cockpit would have to be under 60 years old.

New developments in the case against terror suspect Jose Padilla -- a federal appeals today court reinstated a key count against him and two co-defendants. The reinstated count concerns alleged terror-- related acts inside and outside of the United States. If convicted, Padilla could get life.

Lawyers for Padilla and the other defendants have 21 days to appeal. Their trial is expected to start in April. They face charges of conspiracy and providing material support to Islamic extremist groups. Padilla has pleaded not guilty.

In West Virginia, what would cause a gas station to simply blow up? That is what officials are trying to find out. The Flat Top Little General Store is a pile of twisted debris right now. The unexpected explosion there knocked out power to buildings three miles away, and killed at least four people. One official says as many as seven could be dead. Authorities think a propane tank may have exploded.

And, in politics, payback can be -- well, payback can cost thousands. It looks like members of Congress will not be getting a pay raise this year. Republicans are angry that Democrats used the issue of congressional pay in last year's campaign. So, Republicans will not allow Democrats to reinstate an annual pay hike that lawmakers had agreed to. They were supposed to get an extra $2,700 this year. But they will just have to get by on their salary of $165,200 -- Wolf.

BLITZER: That's life in the fast lane.

(LAUGHTER)

BLITZER: Thanks very much, Carol, for that.

And, to our viewers, you're in THE SITUATION ROOM, where new pictures and information are arriving all the time.

Happening right now: The speaker of the House says the situation in Iraq, in her word -- quote -- "catastrophic." Nancy Pelosi, just back from visiting Iraq with a congressional delegation, she says, in her estimation, there was no evidence of badly needed political and diplomatic initiatives.

Meanwhile, Iraq's situation can be turned around, but time is short -- that's the word from U.S. Admiral William Fallon. He is poised to become the next commander of U.S. forces in the Middle East. At his confirmation hearing earlier today before the Senate Armed Services Committee, Fallon also said, it may be time, in his words, to redefine the goals in Iraq. And how to handle Iran -- if the Bush administration were to find out Iran is supplying militants in Iraq, what options might the U.S. government have to prevent it?

Our Brian Todd standing by to take a closer look at some scenarios.

I'm Wolf Blitzer. You're in THE SITUATION ROOM.

Let's get back to the presidential campaign and what some people see as Senator Barack Obama's Achilles' heel. That would be experience. It's now a topic of debate and a thinly veiled dig by a fellow Democrat.

Let's turn to our senior political analyst, Bill Schneider -- Bill.

WILLIAM SCHNEIDER, CNN SENIOR POLITICAL ANALYST: Wolf, yesterday, we saw the first defining issue emerge in the race for the Democratic nomination.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

SCHNEIDER (voice-over): Recently, someone asked John Edwards about his decision to run for president in 2004, after just one term in the Senate.

UNIDENTIFIED MALE: Some people say that it was too soon for you to do that, that you needed more time and more experience in Washington. How would you respond to that?

JOHN EDWARDS (D), PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATE: They may have been right.

SCHNEIDER: What has changed this time?

EDWARDS: You learn from going through a national election the intensity of the spotlight is extraordinary. It exposes everything good about you and everything bad about you.

SCHNEIDER: Asked why he was a better candidate than Barack Obama, Edwards responded, according to the Associated Press: "Experience. I have been through a presidential campaign."

Here's Obama's response to the criticism that he lacks experience.

SEN. BARACK OBAMA (D), ILLINOIS: The important thing is not experience, per se. Donald Rumsfeld and Dick Cheney had the best resumes in Washington, and initiated a fiasco in Iraq.

SCHNEIDER: Hillary Clinton showcases her experience -- and not just in government.

SEN. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D), NEW YORK: I am going to be asking people to vote for me based on my entire life and experience. The fact that I'm a woman, the fact that I'm a mom is part of who I am.

SCHNEIDER: A CBS News poll asked whether Hillary Rodham Clinton has the right experience to be president. Fifty-nine percent said yes. And Barack Obama? Twenty-seven percent said yes. Forty-three percent didn't know.

Some Democrats worry that Clinton has too much political baggage, and that Obama doesn't have enough. That could open the way for Edwards, or another Democrat, especially one with experience in world affairs.

GOV. BILL RICHARDSON (D), NEW MEXICO: I believe these serious times demand serious people who have real-world experience in solving the challenges we face.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

SCHNEIDER: How important is experience to the voters? It varies from one election to the next. In the turbulent year 1968, voters were looking for a president with a lot of experience, Richard Nixon. In 1976, after Watergate, voters wanted someone untainted by Washington experience, Jimmy Carter. Obama is betting that 2008 will be another year when experience is not a high priority -- Wolf.

BLITZER: All right, Bill, we will watch this part of the story together with you.

Coming up in our "Strategy Session": Speaker Pelosi, the delegation of House Democrats have returned from Iraq more convinced than ever, they say, that President Bush's policy in Iraq is doomed to fail.

And a chorus from Congress over the war in Iraq. Will the Democratic-led Congress move to actually start cutting off funds? Senator Russ Feingold, standing by to join us live, he believes the Congress should do exactly that.

Stay with us. You're in THE SITUATION ROOM.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: Many of us who cover presidential politics can't help but sit back and sometimes marvel that so much is actually going on in the 2008 race, and it's only January 2007. Some are likening it to a campaign on steroids.

But our senior analyst, Jeff Greenfield, is looking at it from a somewhat different angle -- Jeff.

JEFF GREENFIELD, CNN SENIOR ANALYST: Wolf, since the rest of our colleagues are torn between wringing their hands about how soon the presidential campaign is starting and plunging full-scale into over- covering it, let's take a bold step toward the next thing to worry about: how soon this will all end.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE) GREENFIELD (voice-over): For a spectacular example of double- think, check out yesterday's "New York Times." While the editorial page bemoans the 23-month campaign, two stories splashed across the front page, and lots more inside, help fuel the very focus the editorial page deplores.

GREENFIELD: Well, maybe it's just that times it is, and they are, a'changing.

RUDOLPH GIULIANI (R), FORMER MAYOR OF NEW YORK: Welcome to Iowa.

GREENFIELD: The press corps is showing up in the early states like Iowa and New Hampshire in numbers that suggest it is 2008 already.

And now a gaggle of big states, tired of being overshadowed by the smaller states, are seriously thinking of moving their contests into February, which could well mean that the nomination contests will be effectively over around Groundhog Day.

If so, it would be a part of a continuing trend. Not that long ago, the primaries were marathons, not sprints. George McGovern didn't wrap up his 1972 nomination until the convention. Ronald Reagan almost beat Jerry Ford at the convention in 1976. Ted Kennedy and President Carter battled into the summer in 1980, as did Gary Hart and Walter Mondale in '84.

But, in the more recent battles, the nominees clinched victory before spring. And, this time out, it will likely be even earlier.

And here is the real issue. No, it's not the need for early massive money or the shortchanging of a thoughtful political argument. No, no, the real issue is much more important.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP, "THE VIEW")

JOY BEHAR, CO-HOST: There was a "Newsweek" poll that...

(END VIDEO CLIP)

GREENFIELD: What is everybody going to talk and write about?

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP, NBC)

UNIDENTIFIED FEMALE: The latest NBC News/"Wall Street Journal" polls shows...

(END VIDEO CLIP)

GREENFIELD: All this year, we can cite meaningless irrelevant poll numbers, since most normal Americans have, sensibly, not begun thinking about a vote they won't have to cast for a year.

If the victors are crowned early in 2008, what then? Can the republic really take six or seven months of talk about who the vice presidential nominee will be or what the acceptance speeches will sound like?

(END VIDEOTAPE)

GREENFIELD: Friends, I don't care if you watch C-SPAN2 for erotic arousal. Nobody can take half-a-year of that kind of gasbaggery. It's entirely possible that, by the time the conventions arrive, 90 percent of the country will think the election happened already, and, come November, you will be able to shoot a cannon into a polling precinct and not hit a living soul -- Wolf.

BLITZER: You think, in other words, we're just going to be bored to death by the time this is all said and done?

GREENFIELD: I figure, by November 2008, we will be talking about 2012, or maybe 2016.

BLITZER: Some people -- I'm not kidding -- already looking ahead, in case the Democrats do lose this time. Then, what happens the next time?

GREENFIELD: We need a rehab center for people like us, them, whatever.

BLITZER: That would be -- us is the correct way of saying it.

(LAUGHTER)

BLITZER: Jeff Greenfield, thanks very much.

GREENFIELD: Thank you.

BLITZER: And up next: our "Strategy Session" -- a Republican senator taking on President Bush over who is the decider.

Plus: Should Congress cut funds to make sure President Bush doesn't send more troops to Iraq? Senator Russ Feingold standing by. The Democratic senator from Wisconsin will be here in THE SITUATION ROOM.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: A Republican senator effective -- effectively telling President Bush he is not the only decider.

We want to talk about that and more in our "Strategy Session" today. Joining us, Democratic strategist Peter Fenn and CNN political analyst Bay Buchanan, president of American Cause.

Here is a really little clip from what Senator Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania, said earlier today.

Listen to this.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

SEN. ARLEN SPECTER (R), PENNSYLVANIA: I would suggest -- suggest, respectfully, to the president that he is not the sole decider.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Now, he said that, you know, on his own. Nobody prompted him to say that.

What do you make of this latest development?

PETER FENN, DEMOCRATIC STRATEGIST: I will tell you, Wolf, two- thirds of the country thinks that the Congress should be calling the shots on -- on Iraq and on foreign policy, let alone domestic policy.

This president, I think, has got himself in such trouble when he uses words like "I'm the decider." If he is going to do anything, he ought to take a page out of Arnold Schwarzenegger's book and work with the Democrats to get stuff done.

BLITZER: What do you think, Bay?

BAY BUCHANAN, CNN POLITICAL ANALYST: Well, there's no question Arlen Specter is speaking for a lot of other individuals in this town. They think they're president.

(LAUGHTER)

BUCHANAN: I mean, the people in this town, there are so many who think they are so important that they can actually suggest that they should have a say in how this war is being run.

If the Senate and the House want to have a say, they only have one say. They gave him authority to run this war. He runs the war. He is the decider, as the commander in chief. If he doesn't want to -- if they want to step in, then, cut the funds. That's all their choice is. That's period. That's all they can do.

FENN: You know, there is another issue here, too. And you have got a lot of Republicans up in the Senate next time, 21 Republicans, for 12 Democrats. These folks are nervous. They're scared about getting reelected. They want to see something done. They are afraid this president is going to bring them down. And they're looking two years...

(CROSSTALK)

BLITZER: Peter makes a fair point. Several of those Republicans, normally loyal foot soldiers in the president's battles of -- are speaking out against the president. Norm Coleman, for example, of...

BUCHANAN: Sure.

BLITZER: ... of Minnesota jumps to mind.

BUCHANAN: There's no question there are -- they may -- they're distancing themselves. And they have every right to. This is a key issue. The American people are very concerned. They want this battle to end. They want us to come home from Iraq.

So, our leaders should express themselves. But, before they say they should be the ones deciding on what is going on in Iraq, they either take their responsibility and authority that they have and make a difference, or they just come on your show and talk about it, and let people know that they differ.

But they cannot be the person making the calls in Iraq, or we're going to have a repeat...

BLITZER: Do you see, Bay, evidence, as some critics are suggesting, that the White House already is in a state of panic?

BUCHANAN: Well, you know, there is good reason, if they are. I do not see a state of panic. I -- I see a president who is very deliberate about what he is doing in Iraq. He's given the generals certainly responsibility. They are moving ahead.

They are very, very deliberate in their efforts. And they have told the American people what they're going to do.

There -- is there panic in this sense? You cannot maintain a war in this country without the American people's support. You just can't do it. And, so, the American -- so, the president has. He's tried to reach out to the American people. He will continue to do so. And that is the only way he is going to be able to keep a force over there.

BLITZER: What do you think, Peter?

FENN: I will tell you, they're in quicksand up to their necks right now, Wolf. And I think they're really worried about this latest strategy.

They know that, unless they make progress in Iraq in the next six weeks, they're toast.

BLITZER: Six weeks? That's -- you know, they need six...

FENN: That would be -- that would be an eternity.

(CROSSTALK)

BLITZER: They said they need at least six months.

(CROSSTALK)

BUCHANAN: I think they have six months.

(CROSSTALK)

FENN: But, politically, I don't think they have got six months, to be honest with you.

I think -- look, I think you have got generals over there, you have got military people who are going to come out and speak out against this war.

And I will tell you, I -- I -- I just think that they have got to move fast, if they're going to -- if they're going to recover.

BUCHANAN: Well, I think they have six months, for this reason.

I don't see Congress moving to cut anything. And, so, if they don't do that, the president can continue. And, then, if, in six months, the president is now saying, we're now pulling back, we're turning this area over to such and such, and we're going to do this, then, the American people are going to relax.

BLITZER: Let me -- let me -- let me ask Peter, because you know the Republicans -- the Democrats quite well. Russ Feingold is going to be here in THE SITUATION ROOM. He is among those Democrats -- not many -- saying cut the funds, use the power of the purse.

Nancy Pelosi isn't saying that. Joe Biden is not saying that. Chris Dodd is not saying that.

What do you -- what -- do -- do...

FENN: Well...

BLITZER: ... you think that there is momentum moving towards that among Democrats?

FENN: On cutting off funds, probably not, Wolf.

I think what they want to do is, they want to get a vote, a majority, even get Republicans involved. Look, John Warner has got a good resolution. They get 60 to 70 votes on that one, that -- that will send a message to this president.

But my old boss, Frank Church, went in with -- with John Sherman Cooper in Vietnam and cut off funds for Cambodia. Now, that took a lot of guts. A lot of folks were against them. But I will tell you, it may come to that down the road. And that may be the six-month plan.

BLITZER: All right. Guys...

BUCHANAN: Down the road. Down the road.

(CROSSTALK)

BLITZER: ... we have got -- we have got to leave it there. A lot of us remember Frank Church, a decent, very decent, guy, indeed.

(CROSSTALK)

BLITZER: Thanks very much for coming in, Peter and Bay.

Up next: Has the time actually come for Democrats to put up or shut up when it comes to the war? We will talk with Senator Russ Feingold. He's standing by to join us live. And in our next hour: Gone are the moderates. Chaos in Iraq has chased away the reformers. Has Iraq's last chance for peace gone with them? We will speak with Sabrina Tavernise of "The New York Times." She is just back from a long tour of duty there.

Stay with us.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: Welcome back.

Should Congress simply cut off funding for the war in Iraq?

My next guest thinks so. Democratic Senator Russ Feingold is joining us now from Capitol Hill.

Senator, thanks very much for coming in.

SEN. RUSS FEINGOLD (D), WISCONSIN: Good afternoon, Wolf.

BLITZER: Some of the critics say, if do you that, it would undermine, it would hurt the U.S. troops in Iraq.

What do you say?

FEINGOLD: Well, that's just another one of these red herrings, false argument that is put out. Nobody is talking about taking anything away from the troops.

What we're saying is, there should be a time frame to redeploy the troops. In other words, we don't say to somebody: Hey, give us your rifle and give us your helmet. You are going to stay here in Baghdad.

The fact is, our bill that I'm putting in tomorrow would say, the troops have to be out within six months after the bill is passed. That's the safest thing for the troops, is to not be in Iraq.

BLITZER: In an interview with Politico.com, this new Web site, you told Roger Simon that you were upset about what you called the timidity of several of your fellow Democrats who refuse to join you in using the constitutional power of the purse to stop the war.

FEINGOLD: Well, my concern has been in the past that, sometimes, Democrats have been too timid on this issue.

There is a little bit of old habits dying slowly going on here in the Senate. But I'm optimistic. The nonbinding resolutions that are coming up, Wolf, are ones that I can support, as long as they are only the first small steps.

What has to follow -- and what I hope Democrats and Republicans will follow with -- is a binding resolution that says, this thing has to end. We have to get out of Iraq.

And I feel, on the Senate floor, just a few minutes ago, that many Democrats, as well as Republicans, are realizing that we have to have a real strategy, not just resolutions.

BLITZER: In other words, you -- you think that Harry Reid, your Democratic leader, the majority leader in the Senate, Nancy Pelosi in the -- on the House side, Hillary Clinton, among others, they're -- they're not doing what they should be doing right now, namely, using the power of the purse?

FEINGOLD: Well, I think the proof will be in the pudding.

What is being done right now, the idea of having a resolution that says, look, this policy doesn't make sense, and we shouldn't have the escalation, that is good. And what they are doing is positive. It's just that it's a very small step. It's almost like a sideshow, compared to what has to be the real step, what the American people asked for in -- in November, which is, we need to redeploy the troops from Iraq, not just stop the surge. The troops have to come out.

This is hurting our national security. It's hurting our military. And I think the leaders of the Democratic Party in both the House and the Senate will come around on this.

BLITZER: Here is what Senator Clinton said in Iowa this weekend on this specific issue. Listen.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

CLINTON: This president can veto whatever we pass, and, given his track record, can ignore what we do.

So, unless we get a very strong political consensus that includes Republicans, as well as Democrats, we are not likely to change this president's policy.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: In other words, to paraphrase, she seems to think that what you're suggesting, at least right now, given the lack of votes, would be a waste of time.

FEINGOLD: Well, that's just wrong.

I mean, the fact is that, if we are able to cut off the funding for the war, the president will not be able to conduct the war. And, so, what Senator Clinton's remarks relate to are other things, like nonbinding resolutions.

It does not apply to the kind of bill I'm offering. And, let's remember, these are some of the same people that told us we ought to go into Iraq in the first place. These are people that said you simply can't oppose a war like Iraq.

They were wrong on that. And they're also wrong about this. We need to get out of there.

BLITZER: What -- what they say, your critics, administration supporters, is that, as bad as the situation in Iraq is right now, Senator, it could be a whole lot worse. The civil war could simply explode into not only ethnic cleansing, but genocide, and infect the entire region.

You have got a bad hand that you're dealt right now. What do you do in this kind of an environment?

FEINGOLD: Well, what they miss there and what they choose to ignore is the reality on the ground, is that the situation is already very much like what you just described.

And I happen to think that the fact that our troops are there and in harm's way actually encourages some of this violence, not through any act of our own troops, because it's an environment that actually encourages people to act the way they are.

The fact is, if we got out of there, it might get worse for a while for the Iraqis. But I also think it gives them a chance to try to figure out their own future, without us standing there with a military force.

But, in the end, what is most important is the security of the American people. As important as Iraq is, what really matters is that our people be safe. And Iraq is bleeding us of our strength. That has to end.

BLITZER: Here's what you said. I want to bring it back and put it up on the screen.

You told "The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel" back in November, November 10: "Those who were there and came to the judgment the Iraq war was a good idea have to answer for some concerns I have about their judgment. That was a really bad judgment."

You voted against the resolution authorizing the president to go to war, like Senator Kennedy. But Hillary Clinton voted for it. John Edwards, when he was in the Senate, voted for it. Chris Dodd did, Joe Biden.

That's a pretty strong criticism of your Democratic colleagues.

FEINGOLD: Well, look, it's a criticism of anybody that bought into these arguments that, somehow, the Iraq war made sense after 9/11.

To me, it was obviously foolish and didn't make sense. And, so, those who voted for it made a mistake, as most of them have admitted. That doesn't mean they can't do the job in the future.

But I think it's an important test of judgment, whether somebody realized that Iraq clearly was not the right move in the fight against those that attacked us on 9/11. And that has to be factored in when you consider somebody for the office of president of the United States.

BLITZER: You announced a few months ago you were not going to seek the presidency. You regret that decision? FEINGOLD: Not at all. It's great. I can do an interview like this, and somebody doesn't say that I'm not doing this just because I'm running for president. You can just say what you think.

(LAUGHTER)

FEINGOLD: And I'm enjoying my work, and, obviously, today, being able to chair a committee about the constitutionality of ending this war. This is just the work I was hoping to do. I want to bring an end to this war.

And, here in the Senate, I have a chance to help make that happen.

BLITZER: Senator Russ Feingold, Democrat of Wisconsin.

FEINGOLD: Thank you.

BLITZER: Hey, Senator, thanks very much for coming in.

FEINGOLD: Good to be on the show.

BLITZER: All right. We will have you back soon -- always outspoken.

Still to come in the next hour: Senator Arlen Specter, he is always outspoken as well. He has a very blunt message for President Bush today: Guess what? You're not the only one who has a say on what happens in Iraq.

Senator Specter will join us here in THE SITUATION ROOM in the next hour.

But up next: Jack Cafferty. What does it mean if Republican Senator Chuck Hagel is a tougher critic of the Bush administration than many Democrats? That is Jack's question -- Jack with your e-mail when we come back.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: Check in with Jack Cafferty for "The Cafferty File" -- Jack.

JACK CAFFERTY, CNN ANCHOR: The question this hour is: What does it mean if Republican Senator Chuck Hagel is a tougher critic of the Bush administration's plans to escalate the war in Iraq than many Democrats?

A lot of mail.

Blanche (ph) in Los Angeles: "Maybe Senator Hagel remembers Vietnam better than those that didn't serve, including a great many Republicans. Even John McCain doesn't seem to remember what happened."

Curtis (ph) in Philadelphia: "Jack, it means Hagel is an old- school Republican who is sick and tired of his beloved party being dragged through the mud by quite possibly the very worst presidential administration this great country has ever had. Oh, and he is also contemplating a run for the White House."

Mary in Dover Plains, New York: "The fact that Chuck Hagel has shown more backbone than most Democrats makes him my favorite senator, and the only Republican I would consider supporting for the presidency. He may very well be the only politician with both a brain and a moral compass in all of Washington."

Jim in Houston: "Hagel's comments would warm my heart if I were an insurgent in Iraq. As such, I would vote for him. I hope enough folks wake up to the tone this has for our enemies. Again, I'm tired of hearing in the media these weak-kneed politicians playing to the stage, instead of proposing anything concrete."

And Dan in Cincinnati: "Hi, Jack. Senator Hagel has real backbone. And, instead of a backbone, the Democrats have fried mush" -- Wolf.

BLITZER: Jack, thank you for that.

And, to our viewers, you're in THE SITUATION ROOM.

Happening right now: It's 5:00 p.m. here in Washington, where there's a battle over war powers. Who is the decider when it comes to sending American troops abroad? A key Republican arguing, President Bush must share that responsibility -- I will speak live this hour with Senator Arlen Specter.

And it's 1:00 a.m. in Iraq, where millions brave bombs and bullets to gather in the streets. We're going to bring you a rare firsthand look at the shocking Shiite ritual dating back more than 1,300 years.

And from flooding to drought to disappearing species, scientists are pooling their knowledge about global warming. And they're worried. A grim new report tells us why.

I'm Wolf Blitzer. You're in the THE SITUATION ROOM.

House Dems Want To Change Direction Of War Funds (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

USA Today, January 31, 2007

WASHINGTON — Democratic leaders in Congress plan to make extensive changes to the Bush administration's anticipated $100 billion request for new war funds. They want to redirect money from Iraq to military readiness at home and say Iraq, Afghanistan and other NATO countries must carry more of the financial burden.

The administration is to formally seek the new money Monday. The funds would be added to more than $500 billion appropriated for the global war on terrorism and are needed by spring. It is not clear whether Democrats can block any part of President Bush's plan to increase the troop level in Iraq by 21,500.

MORE: Researchers weigh war's other costs

House Democrats hope to use a series of hearings on the new spending request to show that the Iraq war hurts troop readiness at home and elsewhere, particularly in the National Guard and Reserves.

"We've got problems in our own country," said Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., who chairs the House subcommittee with control over the defense budget. "We're going to check every cent that's spent by the United States government" in the war on terrorism, particularly the billions more being sought by Iraq and Afghanistan to equip their forces.

Murtha, a Vietnam War veteran, has become one of Congress' leading critics of the Iraq war. He returned Monday from a five-day trip to the war zone with House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and other members of Congress.

Rep. Dave Hobson of Ohio, the lone Republican on the trip, said Iraq, Afghanistan and other NATO countries must carry more of the financial burden.

"They've let us do it up to this point, and we're not going to take it anymore," Murtha said. Armed Services Committee Chairman Ike Skelton, D-Mo, said, "We in Congress have the power of the purse. We can cut off funds."

The administration says the requested funds are needed to protect troops. "The troops need to know … that their elected officials stand behind them," said Sean Kevelighan, a spokesman for the White House budget office.

Murtha wants to bolster equipment inventories that have left the Guard and Reserves at their lowest state of readiness. He also wants to reduce requested funding for detention facilities at Guantanamo Bay; bulldoze the former Abu Ghraib prison outside Baghdad where U.S. troops abused Iraqi detainees; and add language to the spending bill barring torture under any circumstances. He said he plans 25 to 30 hearings.

The war on terrorism is dominated by the conflict in Iraq, which costs $8.5 billion a month. The new request would bring 2007 funding to about $170 billion, up from about $120 billion in 2006. The war on terrorism consumes nearly 30% of the nation's total defense budget, a figure that could grow as equipment is upgraded and veterans seek medical care and disability benefits.

"There will be considerable costs to 'reset,' to fix and replace worn-out Army and Marine Corps equipment," said House Budget Committee Chairman John Spratt, D-S.C. "Last year, the Army and Marine Corps estimated a need for $15 billion to $20 billion a year to repair, replace and refurbish equipment at the current rate, and for two to three years" after the war ends.

The administration will estimate how much the war will cost in 2008 and include a partial request for 2009 in its proposed 2008 budget, to be delivered to Congress the same day. "There will be significant war costs shown," White House budget director Rob Portman said.

The Pentagon estimates the cost of the additional troops at $5.6 billion; the Congressional Research Service says it will cost $7.6 billion, at $3,600 per person. Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon England told lawmakers this month that the new funding will be needed in Iraq by May or June, but White House spokesman Tony Snow has said the administration has enough money to increase troops.

DOJ_NMG_0124942

At an Armed Services Committee hearing last week, Army Chief of Staff Peter Schoomaker and Marine Corps Commandant James Conway expressed concern about the military's ability to respond to other conflicts. "We feel there is a risk," Conway said.

Why Would Congress Surrender? (WP)

By Fred Barbash

The Washington Post, January 31, 2007

In a matter of days the Senate is likely to begin debating several nonbinding resolutions on the president's plan for a troop buildup in Iraq. As the battle is joined, both houses of Congress need to be reminded that the stakes go well beyond this particular buildup, this particular war and even this particular presidency.

At issue is the constitutional law governing the war power of the executive branch, specifically the vastness of the "battlefield" over which President Bush claims inherent authority as commander in chief. Also at issue are all the comparable claims yet to be made by presidents yet unborn, armed with the precedents being set right now.

In these matters, there is no such thing as inaction. In a contest between two branches over separation of powers, silence speaks as powerfully as words.

That's because the Supreme Court rarely involves itself in disputes between Congress and the executive, expressly making it a two-way conversation -- a "shared elaboration" or "shared dialogue" in the words of scholars -- between the elected branches. When one branch drops out by failing to respond, the other branch effectively sets the precedent, which is passed along to the next generation and the generation after that.

Inaction, indeed, strengthens that precedent. Over time, inaction is taken as acquiescence, a form of approval, and the precedent becomes entrenched until it's as good as law.

This is precisely what has occurred over the years. Successive decades of congressional acquiescence in the face of executive claims of war power have allowed the law to be settled exclusively by the executive branch.

Now, people who know better show no surprise at the notion that Congress's only war-related authority is the power of the purse. Timid requests for legislative involvement are ridiculed and caricatured as "micromanagement" or, worse, as comforting the enemy.

It's as if there is nothing left to argue about -- except, of course, there is, though it seems so elementary.

Article II does indeed make the president commander in chief.

But Article I gives Congress not merely the power of the purse. It vests in the House and Senate the authority to "declare war," to "make rules concerning captures on land and water," to "provide for the common defense," to "raise and support Armies," and to "make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces." In addition, the Senate advises and consents on important military appointments, which is why Lt. Gen. David Petraeus was on Capitol Hill last week for confirmation as the general in command of U.S. forces in Iraq.

War is a shared responsibility. The records of the 1787 convention at which the Constitution was drafted unquestionably demonstrate that. An early version of Article I, for example, gave Congress the power to "make war."

The delegates changed the wording to "declare war," not to remove Congress from the process but to leave the commander in chief the "power to repel sudden attacks," as James Madison put it. "The executive should be able to repel and not to commence war," agreed Roger Sherman. In the eyes of some delegates, this limited authority was safe in the hands of a president because "no executive would ever make war but when the nation will support it," said delegate Pierce Butler.

One can argue about this view, of course, but Congress generally chooses not to, despite occasional prodding from Supreme Court justices such as Antonin Scalia. In a dissent in Hamdi v. Rumsfeld, the 2004 decision requiring the administration to give detainees some neutral forum in which to make their case, Scalia noted that the Founders mistrusted military power "permanently at the executive's disposal."

"Many safeguards in the Constitution reflect these concerns," he said, including expressly involving Congress in the war-making function. Indeed, wrote Scalia, "except for the actual command of military forces, all authorization for their maintenance and all explicit authorization for their use is placed in the control of Congress under Article I, rather than the President under Article II."

Scalia also chided Congress for its "lassitude" on the topic. "Many think it not only inevitable but entirely proper that liberty give way to security in times of national crisis -- that, at the extremes of military exigency, inter arma silent leges," he wrote. "Whatever the general merits of the view that war silences law or modulates its voice, that view has no place in the interpretation and application of a Constitution designed precisely to confront war and, in a manner that accords with democratic principles, to accommodate it."

DOJ_NMG_0124943

The equilibrium of government, in the view of the Constitution's Framers, rested on a stated assumption that each branch would fight fiercely to expand its authority but just as fiercely resist encroachment from another branch.

That Congress would refuse to fight seemed unimaginable.

The writer, who covered the Supreme Court for The Post, teaches at Northwestern University's Medill School of Journalism. He has written widely about constitutional history.

Constitutional Warp (WSJ)

By David B. Rivkin, Jr. and Lee A. Casey

The Wall Street Journal, January 31, 2007

The Constitution gives the president primary responsibility for defending national interests on the world stage. He is the nation's chief executive and commander in chief of its armed forces. Congressional efforts to limit the exercise of these powers in Iraq by, for example, purporting to limit the number of American troops there (or, for that matter, to increase the U.S. contingent in Afghanistan) would be unconstitutional, even if linked to an exercise of Congress's own appropriations power.

The Iraqi resolutions Congress is most likely to adopt -- particularly Sen. Joseph Biden's objection to surging additional troops to Iraq -- are non-binding. Still, the writing is on the wall. If the president ignores this resolution, as he is constitutionally entitled to do, then additional provisions seeking to tie his hands will follow. However, unless Congress withdraws funding for the Iraqi war as a whole, the president would similarly be justified in refusing to comply.

The Framers of the Constitution deliberately created a system under which the three branches of government could exert their powers in disparate and conflicting ways. Over time, this has resulted in multiple inefficiencies, particularly as successive Congresses and presidents have struggled over foreign and defense policies. However, while the Constitution anticipates a certain ebb and flow of authority between president and Congress, it does not envision a situation where one branch can entirely vitiate the power of another. As James Madison noted in the Federalist Papers, "the great security against a gradual concentration of the several powers in the same department, consists in giving to those who administer each department, the necessary constitutional means, and personal motives, to resist encroachments of the others." The separation of powers is an indispensable guarantee of liberty.

The Constitution vests Congress with formidable authority to affect how the president fights wars. Congress has the power to declare war (formally rupturing the international legal relations between the U.S. and a belligerent enemy nation), and to prescribe rules governing military discipline and regulating the capture of enemy property. Ultimately, Congress determines the size of the federal military establishment and what weapons it can buy. If it determines to withhold funding for an ongoing conflict, it can compel the president to withdraw U.S. forces.

What Congress cannot do, however, is direct how a president prosecutes a particular war -- including decisions about how many of the available forces to introduce into a theater of conflict. The Framers briefly considered vesting Congress with the power to "make war" but quickly thought better of it, limiting Congress instead to the power to "declare war." This, according to Constitutional Convention delegate Rufus King, was because "'make' war might be understood to 'conduct' it which was an Executive function."

The president is, in short, responsible for all tactical, operational and strategic decisions involved in war fighting. As the Supreme Court explained in a Mexican War case, Fleming v. Page (1851): "as commander in chief, he is authorized to direct the movements of the naval and military forces placed by law at his command, and to employ them in the manner he may deem most effectual to harass and conquer and subdue the enemy." Fifteen years later, concurring in the landmark case of Ex parte Milligan (1866), Chief Justice Salmon P. Chase put it more crisply still: "Congress cannot direct the conduct of campaigns."

The unconstitutionality of a congressional effort to direct the course of hostilities in Iraq and Afghanistan, when taken to its logical conclusion, is so clear that even supporters of limiting the president's war-fighting powers concede that Congress cannot go so far as to prescribe the number of troops that may be deployed to Anbar province, or dictate which units should operate in Kandahar as opposed to Baghdad. This, however, is a distinction without a difference. Fundamental decisions about wartime strategy are the most important part of the president's commander in chief portfolio, with battlefield tactics usually determined by his military commanders.

Fundamental disagreements between the president and Congress over strategic decisions are not unique to this war and have occurred in the past; doubtless many congressmen believed that Lincoln's early determination to destroy Lee's army in Virginia was counterproductive when more could be gained along the Mississippi River in the West, just as some congressional Republicans felt that Roosevelt was overinvesting in the European theater during World War II while "starving" the Pacific theater, where, to borrow today's favorite Democratic mantra, the enemy that actually attacked this country resided. There also have been efforts to direct presidential wartime decision making, and at least one instance -- after the major U.S. involvement in the Vietnam War had ended -- where Congress sought to establish particular troop levels. However, this occurred late in the conflict, and its constitutionality was never accepted by the executive branch.

DOJ_NMG_0124944

There are nevertheless clear limits to the president's power as commander in chief. In Fleming, the court noted, "He [the president] may invade the hostile country, and subject it to the sovereignty and authority of the United States. But his conquests do not enlarge the boundaries of this Union, nor extend the operation of our institutions and laws beyond the limits before assigned to them by the legislative power."

Similarly, the president cannot take over control of the nation's economy on the pretext that this is necessary to the successful prosecution of a war. That is the clear teaching of the Supreme Court's decision in Youngstown Sheet & Tube v. Sawyer (1952), which declared unconstitutional Truman's seizure of U.S. steel mills (on account of a strike) during the Korean War. In this respect, Congress's paramount authority to regulate foreign and domestic commercial activity, including labor relations and capital markets, remains undiminished in wartime.

Thus Congress could cripple the president's ability to fight a war (accepting the political consequences), but it cannot supervise his own constitutional authority as commander in chief, effectively transferring those functions to Congress. This balancing exercise, rooted in the Framers' political philosophy and appreciation for the Newtonian physics of motion and countermotion, permeates our constitutional system. For example, the president plays a critical part in the legislative process, by proposing legislation, having executive branch officials testify in hearings, negotiating with members of Congress and, ultimately, by exercising his veto power. But Congress retains the primary legislative role.

When Congress augmented executive power in the 1990s with a "line item veto," the Supreme Court struck down the measure: Allowing the president to void particular portions in an overall spending bill, it said, would upset the Constitution's "finely wrought and exhaustively considered" legislative procedure.

The district court, which first invalidated the scheme, went further by noting that "[b]y ceding inherently legislative authority to the President, the Line Item Veto Act violates [the] constitutional framework." Permitting Congress to direct the war in Iraq would similarly warp our constitutional framework.

Messrs. Rivkin and Casey served in the Justice Department under Ronald Reagan and George H.W. Bush.

Left Out Of All This War Planning: The People (USAT)

By Kathy Roth-Douquet

USA Today, January 31, 2007

Our Decider-in-Chief plans to send more troops to Iraq whether Congress likes it or not, saying, "I've made my decision." President Bush hints that in times of war, paying too much attention to the niceties of democracy hurts military success.

But he's taking the wrong tack, even if his plan to surge troops in Baghdad is exactly what's needed. His doggedness ignores the makeup of military success: Goals and strategy are only part of what's needed for a hard victory. In cleaving all these years to the business-school model of leadership, Bush has read perhaps too much Ten-Minute Manager, and not enough Clausewitz.

The classic theorist Baron Carl von Clausewitz's trenchant truisms are part of the war college curriculum; he wrote that martial success requires the "remarkable trinity" of government, military and the people. Government comes up with the reason to fight, and the armed forces bring the capability, he explained, but the nation's willpower must come from the people. Neither political power nor war power is enough without willpower.

These days on the home front, we are so distracted by the excellent questions of whether we have either an achievable purpose or enough military capacity in Iraq that we forget about popular will. Yet for a long hard engagement, we need it. And that means the government must engage and convince people and their representatives in Congress. They must buy in or we need to get out.

Every long fight in U.S. history has required the people's support or it has failed — and the longer the war, the more true it is. Retired Army colonel Ken Allard, author of Warheads: Cable News and the Fog of War, makes this point: "There's no such thing as a war that's too serious for debate. If we've got a problem big enough for us to go to war, then it's serious enough for debate and compromise."

America simply can't afford the "leave-it-to-us" approach to governing that the Bush administration promotes in an effort to get a free hand, because, as we have seen, it ends without a popular belief in our military operations when the going gets tough.

The Bush administration waves off congressional Democrats because they have no plan of their own. Yet what we need from the majority party is not a Democratic plan, but a democratic one — that is, a plan that seeks to engage the will of the people. The leadership the Democrats can give us in the Senate and House is to talk to the Republicans one office over. Congress can and should be what a past Supreme Court called the "great representative body of the people." This is its proper role, especially in wartime.

DOJ_NMG_0124945

Both the House and Senate received a mandate in this last election to take a more muscular stand in the conduct of the war in Iraq. They can best do this by representing and leading the people the old-fashioned way. They can, and should, be the emissaries to the country and to their constituencies, to foster discussion, debate and determination from the people, then in turn debate and compromise with each other. Something like what we're trying to teach the Iraqis to do.

What we need now, and what the military needs above all else, is a unity of intent in government and from the nation.

Imagine being in a desperate part of the world, with a number of squabbling bosses unable to tell you what they want you to do. We here at home are those squabbling bosses — it's time for us to get our act together. Those who stand in harm's way deserve not only our best strategic thinking, they also deserve a strategy the American people are willing to support.

If the president won't do it, then Congress must act now to give America — and her military — both the plan and the unity.

Kathy Roth-Douquet is co-author of AWOL: The Unexcused Absence of America's Upper Classes from Military Service — and How It Hurts Our Country.

'I Don't Know The Details' (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough And Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, January 31, 2007

The admiral picked by President Bush to oversee his new strategy for Iraq testified yesterday that he does not know much about the plan that the administration says will determine whether the U.S. wins the war.

"I have not gotten into the detail of these plans," Adm. William J. Fallon told the Senate Armed Services Committee, adding that he has been concentrating on his current job as head of the U.S. Pacific Command.

Adm. Fallon specifically declined to endorse Mr. Bush's plan, saying he first has to get to the region and assess matters.

The admiral's lack of knowledge startled some senators.

"I'm surprised that you don't have that understanding going in, frankly," said Sen. Carl Levin, Michigan Democrat and panel chairman. He had asked whether the flow of new troops could be slowed based on battlefield conditions.

The admiral, whose expertise centers on sea power and diplomacy in dealing with China, said he will leave the Iraq battle decisions to Army Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, who leaves for Baghdad this week as the top U.S. commander in Iraq. The admiral appeared before the panel for confirmation hearings on his appointment to lead the U.S. Central Command.

"I do not know the details of how he plans to use" the new troops, Adm. Fallon said. "I'm sure he's going to have to consult with his generals on the ground once he gets into position and then figure it out."

As senators kept up their assault on Mr. Bush's Iraq policy, so did Democrats in the House. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, led a delegation to Iraq over the weekend and told reporters yesterday that she saw "no evidence" of military or diplomatic progress in Iraq.

"It has been nearly four years since we went to war in Iraq, and four years later, there is still no end in sight," she said.

"The escalation instituted by President Bush has been tried before and failed," said the San Francisco lawmaker who voted against the war in 2002. "Although we heard varying judgments about prospects for success this time, everyone we spoke to said that this was the one last chance and it might not work."

Sen. Russ Feingold, Wisconsin Democrat, held hearings yesterday on whether Congress has the constitutional authority to end a war. Mr. Feingold said he will introduce legislation that would give the administration six months to wrap up operations in Iraq and pull troops out.

"We can't stand idly by and tell ourselves that it's the president's job to fix the mess he made," he said. "It's our job to fix the mess. And if we don't do so, we are abdicating our responsibilities."

Sen. Barack Obama, the first-term Illinois Democrat who is running for president, offered his own legislation yesterday to end the war.

Sen. Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican, took issue with Mr. Bush's past comments that he is the "decider" when it comes to the war in Iraq.

"I would suggest respectfully that he is not the sole decider," Mr. Specter said. "It is a shared and joint responsibility."

Adm. Fallon testified that he would view his post at the U.S. Central Command as responsible for regional issues, not just Iraq.

He often mentioned Iran as a threat to the struggling democracy in Iraq. His testimony underscored a scenario in which his main task will be to contain and pressure Iran and its bellicose leaders, leaving the newly confirmed Gen. Petraeus to focus on day-to-day operations in Iraq as the multinational commander.

"I view my responsibilities as much wider than that," Adm. Fallon said. "It seems to be that there's an expectation that I'd be working outside the borders of Iraq to try to get the neighborhood, for example, to help us."

DOJ_NMG_0124946

The administration has beefed up naval power in the region, positioning two aircraft carriers instead of the typical one. Officials say the show of force puts pressure on Iran, which is accused of aiding the insurgency in Iraq, and soothes Persian Gulf allies anxious about threats of war by Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

Mr. Bush has acknowledged that the war is not going well. He announced earlier this month a new strategy whose centerpiece is a surge of more than 21,000 troops, principally to quell violence in Baghdad.

Gen. Petraeus is replacing Gen. George Casey, who is slated to be the next Army chief of staff. But Gen. Casey may run into a tough confirmation hearing. Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, has accused the military of mismanaging the war.

Yesterday, he leveled a new charge. "Too often administration officials came before this committee and the American people and painted a rosy scenario when it was not there," Mr. McCain said, without naming names.

"I believe the situation in Iraq can be turned around, but time is short," Adm. Fallon said. "It seems pretty obvious to me that what we have been doing has not been working."

Adm. Fallon would be replacing Army Gen. John Abizaid, an Arabic speaker who devoted himself to Iraq planning. He acknowledged last year that the U.S. did not have sufficient troops when it invaded Iraq in March 2003.

Bush Nominee: New Goals Needed In Iraq (USAT)

USA Today, January 31, 2007

WASHINGTON — Some developments Tuesday on Iraq:

·Navy Adm. William Fallon, President Bush's pick to lead U.S. forces in the Middle East, told Congress it may be time to "redefine the goals" for Iraq. The nominee to head the U.S. Central Command told his Senate confirmation hearing: "We have got to be doing, it seems to me, something different." He did not say what might change under his command.

·James Baker and Lee Hamilton, co-chairmen of the Iraq Study Group, offered conditional support for Bush's plan to increase troop levels in Iraq, but said it should be accompanied by stepped-up diplomatic and political efforts. "The president's plan ought to be given a chance," Baker told a Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearing. Hamilton said he could support a buildup "in the context of doing a lot of other things at the same time."

·Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., and Sen. Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, the ranking Republican, wrote to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales asking for the administration to deliver a formal opinion on congressional power to wind down the war. "I would suggest respectfully to the president that he is not the sole decider," Specter said.

Bush Nominee: New Actions Needed In Iraq (AP)

By Robert Burns

AP, January 31, 2007

It may be time to "redefine the goals" for Iraq, the admiral President Bush picked to lead U.S. forces in the Middle East told Congress on Tuesday as lawmakers of both parties maneuvered for leverage against Bush's proposed troop buildup.

Navy Adm. William Fallon, Bush's nominee to head the U.S. Central Command, told his Senate confirmation hearing the time for finding solutions in Iraq was running out.

"What we have been doing has not been working," he said. "We have got to be doing, it seems to me, something different." He did not say what might change under his command.

Meanwhile, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, just returned from a trip to Iraq and Afghanistan, told a news conference on Capitol Hill that her delegation saw no sign that U.S. efforts in Iraq were moving ahead with urgency.

"We went with the hope and expectation that what we would see in Iraq was some coordinated effort to have political solutions, to relieve the civil strife and violence there, and diplomatic efforts to bring stability to the region," she said. "We saw no evidence of either, sadly."

The California Democrat praised the U.S. military's efforts but said more must be done on the economic and political fronts.

Rejecting Bush's troop buildup, Pelosi called for refocusing the U.S. military mission from combat to a combination of training Iraqi forces, protecting Iraq's borders and fighting terrorists.

Bush's declaration last week that "I am the decision-maker" on issues of war also ran into resistance, this time from a prominent Republican. Bush has said he intends to push ahead with his plan to send an additional 21,500 U.S. troops to Iraq, regardless of any resolution the Senate may pass.

"I would suggest respectfully to the president that he is not the sole decider," Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., said during a hearing on Congress' war powers. "The decider is a shared and joint responsibility."

There were about 132,000 U.S. troops in Iraq before the increase.

DOJ_NMG_0124947

The question of how to try forcing an end to the war in Iraq, and under what conditions, is among the issues faced by the newly empowered Democratic majority in Congress, and some of the president's political allies as well.

James A. Baker III, secretary of state during Bush's father's administration, told a congressional hearing Tuesday that the White House should find a way to negotiate with Congress on troop additions.

"A majority of Congress is ready to vote against a surge" in troops, Baker told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Baker was co-chairman of a bipartisan commission that recommended the administration pull out U.S. combat brigades by early 2008, launch new diplomatic initiatives with Iran and Syria and vastly increase the number of U.S. military advisers in Iraq.

Fallon, whom Bush nominated to replace Army Gen. John Abizaid as head of Central Command, told the Senate Armed Services Committee that he was not yet sure how he would go about changing the approach in Iraq.

"One of the things in the back of my mind that I'd like to get answered is to meet with the people that have been working this issue — particularly our ambassadors, our diplomats — to get an assessment of what's realistic and what's practical," Fallon said.

"And maybe we ought to redefine the goals here a bit and do something that's more realistic in terms of getting some progress and then maybe take on the other things later," he added without elaborating.

His spokesman, Capt. William Alderson, said later that Fallon preferred not to address the issue in more detail until after he had been confirmed by the full Senate.

Fallon told the senators, "I believe the situation in Iraq can be turned around, but time is short."

"I think that we would probably be wise to temper our expectations here, that the likelihood that Iraq is suddenly going to turn into something that looks close to what we enjoy here in this country is going to be a long time coming," he said.

One of the leading Republicans opposed to Bush's troop buildup, Sen. John Warner of Virginia, said Fallon appeared to be distancing himself from the Bush plan. He urged the admiral to consider other approaches in Iraq as he takes over for Abizaid, who is retiring.

Warner said he hoped Fallon would feel free "to point out those areas in this plan which you feel need flexibility, options that can be pursued, other than the rigidity of just 20,000 new troops right into the face of sectarian violence."

With a Senate showdown over the Iraq war apparently days away, No. 2 Senate GOP leader Trent Lott of Mississippi said he had concerns with each of the resolutions on the war introduced so far. If Republican leaders do not rally behind a single proposal, the party could avoid taking a clear, united stance on the widely unpopular Iraq war — a consequence Lott suggested he wouldn't mind.

"To herd the cat some times you have to let them stray," he said. "Think about that. Keeping them together by letting them stray."

Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., a presidential hopeful, introduced legislation to implement an Iraq plan that focuses on finding a political solution in Baghdad while beginning a withdrawal of U.S. troops and "bringing this war to a responsible end."

Fallon, 62, currently commander of U.S. forces in the Pacific, said he saw a need for a comprehensive approach to Iraq, including economic and political actions to resolve a problem that requires more than military force.

Separately, John Negroponte, the first director of national intelligence, said at his confirmation hearing for the post of deputy secretary of state that Iraq is still having trouble policing its long border with Syria.

Negroponte said Syria is letting 40 to 75 foreign fighters cross its border into Iraq each month, and he repeated the charge that Iran is providing lethal help to insurgents fighting U.S. forces in Iraq. He gave only mild endorsement to the administration's diplomatic hands-off policy toward Damascus and Tehran.

Several senators asked Fallon his views on Iran, which the Bush administration accuses of meddling in Iraq's internal affairs and supplying weapons for use by insurgents against American and Iraqi soldiers.

"They are posturing themselves with the capability to attempt to deny us the ability to operate in this vicinity," Fallon said, adding that there is room for diplomatic efforts with Iran because it has an economic stake in keeping open the Persian Gulf's commercial shipping lanes.

Meanwhile, Pelosi and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid informed Bush on Tuesday that they support his idea for a bipartisan group to advise him on the war on terror. Bush pitched the idea as a way to strengthen his relationship with Congress and gather regular input from lawmakers.

Pelosi and Reid jointly called Bush to take up the offer, said Dana Perino, deputy White House press secretary. The first meeting will be next week, probably at the White House, although the date and attendees have not been set, Perino said.

Peace In Iraq 'A Long Time Coming,' Fallon Says (LAT)

By Peter Spiegel

The Los Angeles Times, January 31, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0124948

WASHINGTON — President Bush's choice to be the new military commander in the Middle East warned Tuesday that the U.S. may have to lower its expectations for Iraq, saying the country's transition into a peaceful democracy may be "a long time coming."

Navy Adm. William J. Fallon, who was picked this month by Bush to replace retiring Army Gen. John P. Abizaid as head of U.S. Central Command, said security and stability must come first in Iraq — meaning many of the political reforms once viewed as essential to the administration's democratization goals may need to be postponed.

"Going back to 2003, we had hundreds of good ideas of things that we would like to see in Iraq that are more reflective of the kind of society and process that we enjoy here," Fallon said at his confirmation hearing before the Senate Armed Services Committee. "We probably erred in our assessment of the ability of these people to take on all these tasks at the same time."

Fallon's pessimistic view follows similar assessments by other administration and military leaders in recent months, a shift that has come as violence in Baghdad has raged for nearly a year. Fallon pointedly refused to answer questions on the administration's buildup of forces in Iraq, however, saying he could not assess the number of troops needed for the mission until he received more detailed information about the plan.

Instead, Fallon appeared to defer to Army Gen. David H. Petraeus — the new four-star commander in Iraq and an advocate of the troop increase — on much of the new war strategy. Such a stance would have him playing a much different role than his predecessor, Abizaid, who was intimately involved in the details of the Iraq campaign, since even before the 2003 invasion.

Fallon, who would become the first naval officer to command the headquarters responsible for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, told the committee he would seek more help from other countries in the region for securing and rebuilding Iraq.

"I see an awful lot of sitting and watching by [countries in] the neighborhood," Fallon said. "It's high time that changed."

In his previous job, head of U.S. Pacific Command, Fallon gained a reputation for pushing to engage with occasionally antagonistic governments in the region, particularly China, at times defying the Bush administration's heated rhetoric concerning Beijing.

His reputation prompted several senators to ask whether he advocated diplomatic engagement with Iran, a move already rejected by the White House. Although Fallon repeatedly said Iran was not being helpful in Iraq, he said the White House had not told him to avoid such talks and would not exclude the possibility of direct discussions.

"The extent that we can understand better the thoughts and actions of others reduces substantially, in my experience, the danger of miscalculation, and so I strongly endorse that approach," Fallon said, speaking generally of dialogue with Middle Eastern countries.

At another Senate confirmation hearing Tuesday, John D. Negroponte, nominee to be deputy secretary of State, said he did not believe the U.S. was drifting toward military confrontation with Iran.

"I think we would strongly prefer that the issues between us be resolved peacefully," he told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

He added, however, that the administration does not believe Iranian actions such as supporting Shiite extremists in Iraq "should go unchallenged."

Fallon's view that security must be the first priority in Iraq differs from some administration critics, who have argued that the Iraqi government must bring about a political reconciliation between opposing factions before stability is possible.

Former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.) and former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, co-chairmen of the Iraq Study Group, told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on Tuesday that making the security of Baghdad a precondition for other goals was a mistake.

"You've got to deal with these problems comprehensively, and if you're focused solely on the question of security, you're not going to get there," Hamilton said. "Because you cannot isolate that security from the other aspects."

"The study group believes the training mission should be the primary mission," Baker said.

Another critical assessment came Tuesday from the Washington-based Brookings Institution, which issued a bleak report suggesting it may be too late to stop Iraq's descent into civil war and instead called on policymakers to turn their attention to keeping the violence from spilling over into neighboring countries.

The 140-page report, based on a historical analysis of recent sectarian conflicts and issued this week, was co-authored by Middle East expert Kenneth Pollack, a former CIA analyst and National Security Council official. Pollack initially favored the invasion of Iraq, but has since criticized the Bush administration's handling of the war.

The Brookings report advocates policies aimed at containing an all-out civil war. Previous conflicts, the authors argue, have shown that failure to prevent "spillover" can lead to the growth of terrorist groups, radicalization of people in surrounding countries and pressures for foreign intervention.

DOJ_NMG_0124949

"The warnings of history suggest that we, too, are simply repeating the same mistakes of those caught up in past civil wars," the report states. "Not planning now for containing the Iraqi civil war could lead its devastation to become even greater, engulfing not only Iraq but also much of the surrounding region and gravely threatening U.S. interests."

Nominee To Head Mideast Forces Warns On Iraq (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo And Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, January 31, 2007

Admiral William Fallon, the White House choice to command US forces in the Middle East, on Tuesday warned that the US was running out of time to improve security in Iraq.

"I believe the situation in Iraq can be turned around, but time is short," Admiral Fallon told senators. "There are no guarantees."

President George W. Bush chose Admiral Fallon, head of US Pacific Command, to replace General John Abizaid, who reportedly disagreed with the White House decision to push ahead with a military "surge" in Iraq.

Separately, John Negroponte, the top US intelligence official nominated for deputy secretary of state, told senators that Iraq was at a "precarious juncture".

Mr Bush's decision to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq has found little support in Congress. But for the moment it remains unclear how tough a non-binding resolution of opposition dissident Republicans would support.

The president's plan received a boost from James Baker, former secretary of state, who urged the Senate foreign relations committee to "just give it a chance".

Mr Baker was co-author with Lee Hamilton, a former Democratic congressman, of November's Iraq Study Group report that set out 79 recommendations, many of which the president rejected. Mr Hamilton was scathing about US policy towards Iran and Syria, saying isolation was not working.

Admiral Fallon joined a line of senior military officers who have conceded since the departure of Donald Rumsfeld, former defence secretary, that the US made mistakes in Iraq.

"We probably erred in our assessment of the ability of these people to take on all of these tasks at the same time," he told the Senate armed services committee.

Carl Levin, the Democratic committee chairman, criticised the Bush administration for not giving Congress a list of the benchmarks that it wants Nouri al-Maliki, the Iraqi prime minister, to meet under the latest Baghdad security plan.

Admiral Fallon said it would not be "particularly constructive right now to tape an edict of a number of actions and give deadlines".

Senators pressed the admiral and Mr Negroponte on US intentions towards Iran following the president's adoption of a more aggressive military and rhetorical stance towards the country.

Barack Obama of Illinois told Mr Negroponte he was concerned that the US would "stumble into active hostilities with Iran without having aggressively pursued diplomatic approaches".

Virginia's Jim Webb asked again whether the White House believed it had the authority to take unilateral action against Iran, without approval from Congress, without a direct threat.

Both times, Mr Negroponte was non-committal. He repeated the administration's line that it sought a diplomatic solution to the crisis with Iran but would not enter into an unconditional dialogue with the Islamic republic.

David Satterfield, a senior State Department official, on Tuesday directly accused Iran of killing Americans in Iraq. His remarks, to the BBC, went beyond Mr Bush's accusation that Iran was "providing material support for attacks on American troops".

Choice For No. 2 At State Dept. Defends Bush's Stance On Iran (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, January 31, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 30 — John D. Negroponte, nominated as deputy secretary of state, defended the Bush administration's more confrontational policy with Iran in a Senate confirmation hearing that was peppered with demands from both sides of the aisle that the United States show restraint in dealing with Tehran.

In a sign that the debate over Iraq is increasingly becoming a debate over Iran, Mr. Negroponte, appearing before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, found himself answering the same questions, over and over again.

"Do you think we are drifting toward a military confrontation with Iran?" demanded Senator Chuck Hagel, Republican of Nebraska.

DOJ_NMG_0124950

"I don't think that has to be, Senator," Mr. Negroponte replied. "I think we would strongly prefer that the issues between us and Iran be resolved peacefully."

Mr. Negroponte maintained that an emboldened Iran could harm American interests in the region.

"We don't believe that their behavior, such as supporting Shia extremists in Iraq, should go unchallenged," said Mr. Negroponte, who is now the director of national intelligence.

In an interview with ABC News on Tuesday, President Bush said stern measures aimed at Iran should not be seen as a precursor to war. "Some are trying to take my words and say, 'Well, what he's really trying to do is go invade Iran,' " he said. "Nobody's talking about that."

The United States has refused to hold direct talks with Iran over the two major issues of contention: its nuclear programs and its stance toward Iraq. Instead, the Bush administration has increased pressure on Iran. The administration has seized Iranians in Iraq and is trying to starve Iran of international financing.

The Pentagon announced Tuesday that it had suspended the sale of spare parts for American-made F-14 fighter jets lest they end up in Iran, the only nation whose air force still flies the vintage plane. Many of the parts are common to other aircraft. The United States Navy retired its last squadrons in 2006.

Mr. Bush announced this month that the United States would send another aircraft carrier and its supporting ships to the Persian Gulf, a response to the growing concern that Iran is building up its own missile capacity and naval power to dominate the gulf militarily.

Meanwhile, the administration has continued to resist calls for it to initiate talks with Iran, and has said that it will do so only if Tehran suspends its enrichment of uranium.

"The view at the moment is that we are reluctant to initiate a high-level diplomatic dialogue with Iran until there has been some progress on this nuclear issue," Mr. Negroponte said.

Senator Barack Obama, Democrat of Illinois, warned him not to "stumble into active hostilities with Iran without having aggressively pursued diplomatic approaches, without the American people understanding exactly what's taking place."

"This committee is going to be paying attention," Mr. Obama said. "We do not want to see precipitous actions that have not been thought through, have not been discussed, have not been authorized."

If confirmed, Mr. Negroponte would become the second-highest-ranking diplomat behind Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. The deputy secretary of state job has been open since Robert B. Zoellick left to join Goldman Sachs in the summer.

Mr. Negroponte, who has spent 41 years in government service, speaks five languages fluently and has won Senate confirmation for eight posts, including five ambassadorships. He was ambassador to Iraq before President Bush chose him for the intelligence job in February 2005.

Several senators on the committee praised Mr. Negroponte as one of the most distinguished public servants of his generation, and there appeared to be no obstacle to his confirmation.

At a separate confirmation hearing on Tuesday, the admiral picked to lead American forces in the Middle East said Iran was increasing its military capabilities and seeking to curb American influence. "They are posturing themselves with the capability to attempt to deny us the ability to operate in this vicinity," Adm. William J. Fallon told the Senate Armed Services Committee.

Senators Warn Against War With Iran (AP)

By Anne Gearan, Ap Diplomatic Writer

AP, January 31, 2007

Republican and Democratic senators warned Tuesday against a drift toward war with an emboldened Iran and suggested the Bush administration was missing a chance to engage its longtime adversary in potentially helpful talks over next-door Iraq.

"What I think many of us are concerned about is that we stumble into active hostilities with Iran without having aggressively pursued diplomatic approaches, without the American people understanding exactly what's taking place," Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., told John Negroponte, who is in line to become the nation's No. 2 diplomat as Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's deputy.

Obama, a candidate for president in 2008, warned during the Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearing that senators of both parties will demand "clarity and transparency in terms of U.S. policy so that we don't repeat some of the mistakes that have been made in the past," a reference to the faulty intelligence underlying the U.S. invasion of Iraq.

Sen. Chuck Hagel, R-Neb., a possible presidential candidate, asked Negroponte if he thinks the United States is edging toward a military confrontation with Tehran. In response, Negroponte repeated President Bush's oft-stated preference for diplomacy, although he later added, "We don't rule out other possibilities."

Separately, the Navy admiral poised to lead American forces in the Middle East said Iran wants to limit America's influence in the region.

DOJ_NMG_0124951

"They have not been helpful in Iraq," Adm. William Fallon told the Senate Armed Services Committee. "It seems to me that in the region, as they grow their military capabilities, we're going to have to pay close attention to what they do and what they may bring to the table."

The Bush administration has increased rhetorical, diplomatic, military and economic pressure on Iran over the past few months, in response to Iran's alleged deadly help for extremists fighting U.S. troops in Iraq and the long-running dispute over Iran's nuclear program.

Bush said Tuesday the United States "will deal with it" if Iran escalates military action inside Iraq and endangers American forces. But, in an interview with ABC News, Bush emphasized this talk signals no intention of invading Iran itself.

A day earlier, the president acknowledged skepticism concerning U.S. intelligence about Iran, because Washington was wrong in accusing Iraq of harboring weapons of mass destruction before the U.S.-led invasion in 2003. "I'm like a lot of Americans that say, 'Well, if it wasn't right in Iraq, how do you know it's right in Iran,'" the president said.

Washington accuses Iran of arming and training Shiite Muslim extremists in Iraq. U.S. troops have responded by arresting Iranian diplomats in Iraq, and the White House has said Bush has authorized U.S. troops to kill or capture Iranians inside Iraq.

The United States also accuses Iran of secretly developing atomic weapons — an allegation Tehran denies. Iran's refusal to suspend uranium enrichment lead the U.N. Security Council to impose limited economic sanctions.

Senators including Hagel, George Voinovich, R-Ohio, and Joseph R. Biden Jr., D-Del., sounded frustrated with the administration's decision not to engage Iran and fellow outcast Syria in efforts to reduce sectarian violence in Iraq.

Negroponte, a career diplomat who is leaving a higher-ranked job as the nation's top intelligence official, gave only a mild endorsement of the administration's diplomatic hands-off policy toward Damascus and Tehran.

Negroponte would lead the department's Iraq policy if confirmed, as expected. He said Syria is letting 40 to 75 foreign fighters cross its border into Iraq each month and repeated the charge that Iran is providing lethal help to insurgents fighting U.S. forces in Iraq. Iran and Syria are not helping promote stability and peace in Iraq and understand what the United States and other nation expect of them.

"I would never want to say never with respect to initiating a high-level dialogue with either of these two countries, but that's the position, as I understand it, at this time," Negroponte said.

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee is expected to approve Negroponte quickly for a job vacant since July.

Iran Will Not Go Unchallenged In Iraq: US (AFP)

AFP, January 31, 2007

WASHINGTON (AFP) - The United States cannot allow Iran to back Shiite militants in Iraq with impunity, President George W. Bush's nominee to become the second-ranked US diplomat warned.

John Negroponte said at a confirmation hearing on his nomination as deputy secretary of state that the United States wanted to resolve its differences with Iran peacefully, but could not let it go unchallenged in Iraq.

His comments were the latest warning in an escalating US showdown with the Islamic Republic. On Monday, Bush said Iranians would suffer for their leaders' nuclear ambitions and warned Tehran not to sow discord in Iraq.

"I would characterize our policy as desirous of resolving any issues we have with Iran by peaceful means," Negroponte told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

"But at the same time, we don't believe that their behavior, such as supporting Shia extremists in Iraq, should go unchallenged.

"If they feel that they can continue with this kind of activity with impunity, that will be harmful to the security of Iraq and to our interests in that country."

Bush last week authorized US forces to capture or kill Iranian operatives in Iraq, amid charges from Washington and denied by Tehran that the Islamic republic had been helping insurgents target US troops.

And in his annual State of the Union speech on January 23, the US president vowed to crack down on any Iranian and Syrian networks suspected of funneling weapons and fighters to the insurgency in Iraq.

Iran and Syria, said Negroponte, "know what they need to do" to improve relations with Washington. The Bush administration has refused calls for a dialogue with Syria and Iran.

But US Senator Bill Nelson said in a speech to the Council on Foreign Relations on Tuesday that the Bush administration was adopting an "ostrich"-like policy, by ignoring the need to talk to Syria.

The Democratic lawmaker said Syrian President Bashar al-Assad had opened the door slightly to helping the United States or the Iraqi government check the flow of extremists into the country, when he met him last month.

DOJ_NMG_0124952

Negroponte, a veteran US diplomat who has served as ambassador to Iraq and to the United Nations as well as US intelligence czar also said Washington was reluctant to hold direct talks with Tehran absent progress on the dispute over its nuclear program.

The United States accused Iran of trying to produce a nuclear bomb through its uranium enrichment activities, a claim Tehran denies.

"The view at the moment is that we are reluctant to initiate a high-level diplomatic dialogue with Iran until there has been some progress on this nuclear issue," Negroponte said.

Negroponte, who would become Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's deputy, noted Washington has had indirect dialogue with Iran through talks with European countries also concerned about Tehran's nuclear ambitions.

"We have been discussing the Iran issue with our European friends and the UN Security Council. And in the context of the nuclear issue there has been a dialogue with Iran, albeit indirectly," he said.

Washington was not warm to the idea of holding a regional conference on Iran, but did not rule out the possibility.

"I would not say that, as a matter of priority, one would have to go right to a regional-type conference or regional-type diplomatic scenario, although I don't think that that should be ruled out," he said.

A UN Security Council resolution passed on December 23 imposed sanctions on Iran until it suspends uranium enrichment, which makes fuel for civilian nuclear reactors but also produces material for atomic bombs.

But Iran continues to defy the international community and has vowed to increase its enrichment capacity by installing 3,000 centrifuges, arguing that its nuclear program is strictly for civilian energy purposes.

General Says U.S. Has Proof Iran Arming Iraqi Militias (USAT)

By Jim Michaels

USA Today, January 31, 2007

BAGHDAD — Iran is supplying Iraqi militias with a variety of powerful weapons including Katyusha rockets, the No. 2 U.S. general in Iraq said Tuesday.

"We have weapons that we know through serial numbers … that trace back to Iran," Lt. Gen. Raymond Odierno said in an interview with USA TODAY.

His comments came as the Bush administration has been taking an increasingly tough stance against what it alleges is Iranian meddling in sectarian violence in Iraq. Last week, the White House confirmed that the president had authorized U.S. troops to take action against Iranian agents in Iraq who present threats.

On Tuesday, President Bush vowed to crack down on those who supply Iraqi insurgents with arms, though he denied any plans to invade Iran.

"We'll deal with it by finding their supply chains and their agents and … arresting them. … In other words, we're going to protect our troops," Bush told ABC News.

Odierno did not provide further details on how weapons were linked to Iran. The Iranian government has denied providing weapons to Iraqi militias.

Most weapons supplied by Iran end up in the hands of Shiite extremists, Odierno said.

He said the weapons include:

·The RPG-29, a rocket-propelled grenade that can fire armor-piercing rounds. It is larger and more sophisticated than the RPG-7 more commonly found in Iraq.

·Katyusha rockets, so large they are generally fired from trucks.

·Powerful roadside bombs, known as explosively formed projectiles, which can pierce armor. The technological know-how and "some of the elements to make them are coming out of Iran," Odierno said.

Several Iranians have been detained in raids inside Iraq, and some remain in custody. The arrests have provided clues about Iranian operations, Odierno said.

"Every time you pick up individuals you learn about how they facilitate themselves within a country," he said.

He did not specify whether the Iranians in custody are cooperating, or whether evidence was seized during the arrest.

Iran's ambassador to Iraq told The New York Times this week that Iran was taking steps to expand military and economic ties with Iraq.

Iran May Have Trained Attackers That Killed 5 American Soldiers, U.S. And Iraqis Say (NYT)

By James Glanz And Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, January 31, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0124953

BAGHDAD, Jan. 30 — Investigators say they believe that attackers who used American-style uniforms and weapons to infiltrate a secure compound and kill five American soldiers in Karbala on Jan. 20 may have been trained and financed by Iranian agents, according to American and Iraqi officials knowledgeable about the inquiry.

The officials said the sophistication of the attack astonished investigators, who doubt that Iraqis could have carried it out on their own — one reason a connection to Iran is being closely examined. Officials cautioned that no firm conclusions had been drawn and did not reveal any direct evidence of a connection.

A senior Iraqi official said the attackers had carried forged American identity cards and American-style M-4 rifles and had thrown stun grenades of a kind used only by American forces here.

Tying Iran to the deadly attack could be helpful to the Bush administration, which has been engaged in an escalating war of words with Iran.

One American soldier was killed during the initial attack and four more were abducted and killed shortly afterward as the police pursued the sport utility vehicles used in the attack.

The attack was focused on a meeting at a joint security station, where American and Iraqi forces mesh their efforts in the new security plan.

An Iraqi knowledgeable about the investigation said four suspects had been detained and questioned. Based on those interviews, investigators have concluded that as they fled Karbala with the abducted Americans, the attackers used advanced devices to monitor police communications and avoid the roads where the police were searching.

The suspects have also told investigators that "a religious group in Najaf" was involved in the operation, the Iraqi said, in a clear reference to the Mahdi Army, the militia controlled by the breakaway Shiite cleric, Moktada al-Sadr. If that information holds up, it would dovetail with assertions by several Iraqi officials that Iran is financing and training a small number of splinter groups from the Mahdi Army to carry out special operations and assassinations.

"I hear that there are a number of commando and assassination squads that are disconnected and controlled directly by Iran," the senior Iraqi official said, citing information directly from the prime minister's office. "They have supplied JAM and others with significant weaponry and training," he said using shorthand for the group, from its name in Arabic, Jaish al Mahdi.

Confirmation of a Mahdi Army connection to the deadly incident would also support the argument by Bush administration officials that the group has a direct role in attacks on American troops.

Another senior Iraqi official said that military actions by the United States against JAM essentially pushed it toward Iran.

"During the conflicts between the Mahdi Army and the United States, Iran was the only side that supported JAM," the official said. "And they told them, 'Hey, we are here to help you and we are here to support you, and we will not let you down.' "

The Karbala operation involved 9 to 12 armed militants and at least five sport utility vehicles, the American military has said. The initial attack on the compound killed one American soldier and damaged three Humvees, the military said.

But what has caught the attention of investigators is the way the convoy of S.U.V.'s was able to give the impression that it was American and slip through Iraqi checkpoints unchallenged. An American military official said all possibilities were being explored, with the focus on whom the United States can trust, even among senior Iraqi officials, in the Karbala area.

"We've got to be very careful as to who we define as our allies, and who we trust and who we don't," the military official said. "Was the governor involved? Were the Iraqi police that were on guard complicit or just incompetent?"

The unusual nature of the attack has made it a major topic of discussion in the upper echelons of the Iraqi government. It has spawned bizarre theories including the idea that a Western mercenary group was somehow involved.

But the existence of what American commanders sometimes call "rogue JAM" — separate from the central, controlled militia — has put the Mahdi Army at the center of the investigation, officials say.

Two American officials in Washington confirmed that American military investigators were looking into the possibility of Iranian involvement in the Karbala attack. One of those officials said the working assumption by the investigators was that the operation had been carried out by a splinter group of the Mahdi Army.

The second official said the operation could be seen as retribution for three recent American raids in which Iranians suspected of carrying out attacks on American and Iraqi forces were detained. On Sunday, the Iranian ambassador to Iraq conceded that two Iranians detained in Baghdad last month were security officials, but said that they were making legitimate contacts with Iraqi government officials.

Centcom Pick Warns Of Iran Influence In Gulf Region (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson And Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, January 31, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0124954

Iran is positioning its military to deny U.S. access to the Persian Gulf while acting as a "destabilizing" influence in the region, President Bush's nominee to command U.S. forces in the Middle East told the Senate yesterday. Adm. William J. Fallon said he favors using what one senator called "battleship diplomacy" to deter Iran.

"Iranian support for terrorism and sectarian violence beyond its borders, and its pursuit of nuclear capability, is destabilizing and troubling," Fallon said in an opening statement at his confirmation hearing before the Senate Armed Services Committee.

He warned specifically that Iranian activity "has not been helpful" in Iraq, where he said "time is running out" for action to curb the escalation of violence.

Fallon, 62, is the first Navy admiral to be named to head Central Command (Centcom), which oversees U.S. military forces in the Middle East, Central Asia and the Horn of Africa. Military officials say he was chosen because of his diplomatic and strategic skills at a time when the United States has dispatched two aircraft carrier strike groups to the Gulf for the first time since 2003.

"The reality is, if you look at the Centcom area of responsibility, there's a lot of water there," Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates told reporters Friday, when asked why he recommended Fallon. "And as you look at the range of options available to the United States, the use of naval and air power, potentially, it made sense to me for all those reasons for Admiral Fallon to have the job."

Fallon said Iran's increasing military capabilities were focused on blocking U.S. military operations. "Based on my read of their military hardware acquisitions and development of tactics . . . they are posturing themselves with the capability to attempt to deny us the ability to operate in this vicinity," he said.

"As they grow their military capabilities, we're going to have to pay close attention to what they do and what they may bring to the table."

Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.), while calling the use of military force against Iran "the very last resort," suggested that the United States use its Navy to conduct "battleship diplomacy" and create a "ring of deterrence" around Iran. He also suggested that European nations "send a ship or two to also add to the strength of the signal we're trying to send to that country, that we're not going to permit them to go forward with nuclear power."

"Does that have any interest or appeal to you, that concept?" Warner asked Fallon.

"Senator, the whole idea is most appealing," Fallon replied, "because we've got plenty to do right now with active combat operations ongoing in Iraq and Afghanistan. And it's clear to me that to date, the Iranians have not been playing a constructive role in addressing any of these, and in fact are challenging us in other areas."

Still, donning his diplomatic hat, Fallon said Iran would stand to suffer from any interruption of commerce in the Gulf. "This is not a one-sided game or a one-sided situation," he said. "Iran is, I believe, critically dependent on its exports of petroleum products for its economic vitality, and those exports, of course, go through the same Strait of Hormuz that they would potentially seek to deny us access to."

John D. Negroponte, the outgoing national intelligence director, also remarked yesterday on Iran's rising assertiveness at his separate confirmation hearing to be deputy secretary of state.

"Iran has been emboldened in its behavior during the past couple of years and has played a more assertive role," Negroponte said. He said that although the United States seeks to resolve issues with Iran peacefully, "we don't believe that their behavior, such as supporting Shia extremists in Iraq, should go unchallenged. So it's a balance, if you will, but if they feel that they can continue with this kind of activity with impunity, that will be harmful to the security of Iraq and to our interests in that country."

Turning to Iraq, Fallon said he is "not a particularly patient man" and urged Iraq's government to demonstrate its commitment to reducing violence in the country, without which Fallon said U.S. military operations will not succeed.

"We've got to see some action. We've got to get some results," he said.

"If there's no progress, then I don't believe we're going to be successful in the military actions. There's got to be a commensurate movement forward in political background that's going to give these people the confidence that they can actually effectively move forward as a country," Fallon said.

But pressed by Sen. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.), the committee chairman, to hold the Iraqi leaders accountable to meeting benchmarks, Fallon said he believed that imposing "edicts" or "deadlines" would be unconstructive. He also suggested a need to lower American expectations for Iraq, indicating that U.S. goals for Iraq following the 2003 invasion were unrealistically ambitious.

"We probably erred in our assessment of the ability of these people to take on all of these tasks at the same time," he said. "Maybe we ought to redefine the goals here a bit and do something that's more realistic in terms of getting some progress and then maybe take on the other things later," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0124955

Democracy, for example, will not come quickly to Iraq, he said. "I think that we would probably be wise to temper our expectations here, that the likelihood that Iraq is suddenly going to turn into something that looks close to what we enjoy here in this country is going to be a long time coming."

Air Force's Role In Iraq Could Grow (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes,

The Los Angeles Times, January 31, 2007

More flights are likely along the Iranian border, sources say.

WASHINGTON — The Air Force is preparing for an expanded role in Iraq that could include aggressive new tactics designed to deter Iranian assistance to Iraqi militants, senior Pentagon officials said.

The efforts could include more forceful patrols by Air Force and Navy fighter planes along the Iran-Iraq border to counter the smuggling of bomb supplies from Iran, a senior Pentagon official said. He spoke on condition of anonymity because he was discussing future military plans.

Such missions also could position the Air Force to strike suspected bomb suppliers inside Iraq to deter Iranian agents that U.S. officials say are assisting Iraqi militias, outside military experts said.

The heightened role of U.S. air power in the volatile region is the latest sign of tension between President Bush and Iran's leaders.

Bush warned two weeks ago that U.S. forces would take a harder line against Iranians in Iraq, vowing to "seek out and destroy" weapons supply networks that endanger U.S. troops.

He expanded the warning Monday, saying in a National Public Radio interview that Iranian threats to the Iraqi people would be considered unacceptable.

The tough stance has been backed by military moves. Bush this month ordered a second aircraft carrier group, led by the John C. Stennis, to the Persian Gulf, a measure described as a warning to Iran.

The stepped-up presence and visibility of U.S. warplanes is seen as likely to reinforce that message.

"Air power plays major roles, and one of those is as a deterrent, whether it be in border control, air sovereignty or something more kinetic," said the senior Pentagon official, using a term that refers to offensive military action.

But the White House rhetoric on Iran is fueling concern about administration intentions.

Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) has demanded to know the administration's view of its authority to attack Iran. Bush and Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates have said they do not foresee military action crossing into Iran.

Within the Pentagon, many active-duty officers are wary of an aggressive military response to Iran, arguing that there is no need to risk starting another war.

Some Pentagon officials worry that an escalation of military pressure that included strikes on Iranian territory could prompt Iran to go after targets it could easily hit, such as oil tankers in the Persian Gulf.

"We need to be very careful about getting into one-to-one trades," the senior Pentagon official said. "That can very quickly get out of control."

Other military officers argue there may be no need for "kinetic" strikes. It is possible that stepped-up air operations over Iraq could provide a deterrent, they say.

The Air Force already is gearing up for just such a role in Iraq as part of Bush's planned troop increase, said a senior service official who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Moving additional forces to Kuwait and Iraq will require more flights of troops and supplies. And the increased number of ground forces will require more missions by fighter jets, bombers and intelligence-gathering planes to help protect the soldiers and Marines, particularly when they disperse from bigger bases to footholds in dense Baghdad neighborhoods.

"You will see the full spectrum of capabilities all the way from intelligence, surveillance and reconnaissance capability to kinetic effects," said Lt. Gen. Howie Chandler, the deputy Air Force chief of staff for operations, plans and requirements.

In Afghanistan, the United States has dramatically stepped up its airstrikes, from 157 in 2005 to 2,527 in the first 11 months of 2006. By contrast, the number of airstrikes in Iraq has fallen, from 306 in 2005 to 188 last year.

U.S. commanders have not spelled out a precise role for the Air Force under the new approach in Iraq, which will focus on counterinsurgency strategies.

Some Air Force officers are concerned that incoming commanders do not recognize the importance of the Air Force in the new effort.

DOJ_NMG_0124956

A counterinsurgency manual developed by Army Gen. David H. Petraeus, the new U.S. commander in Iraq, only briefly mentions air power in fighting the insurgency. And the commander of day-to-day operations, Army Lt. Gen. Raymond T. Odierno, comes from a background in heavy infantry units, traditionally less dependent on air power.

Some military officers have argued that dropping bombs in dense Baghdad neighborhoods would be counterproductive, and Petraeus has warned commanders against operations that might alienate the local population.

Chandler said the Air Force would do as it was asked. But he and other Air Force officials argue that smaller bombs and precision guidance systems can minimize civilian casualties and play a vital role in fighting the insurgency.

"I wouldn't automatically write off air power in an urban environment for fear of collateral damage," Chandler said. "We have the capability with precision targeting and the new weapons to operate in an urban environment."

Air Force officials say they also are preparing to increase flights of unmanned Predator and Global Hawk aircraft to provide constant surveillance of Baghdad neighborhoods when U.S. forces move in.

The Air Force has outfitted its fighter planes with intelligence pods capable of beaming an aerial picture of a neighborhood to a ground commander maneuvering his forces, Chandler said.

Chandler said it was not clear whether the new demands would require more planes. But a Pentagon official said that the increase in ground forces was likely to increase the demand for air support, straining the Air Force budget.

The growing presence of the Air Force in the region has stirred a debate among military experts over the U.S. approach toward Iran.

Thomas G. McInerney, a retired Air Force lieutenant general who advocates military strikes in Iran, said U.S. planes along the border could be better used to keep bomb-making materials out of Iraq.

"We know they are doing this. Why do we accept it?" McInerney said. "For every [improvised explosive device] that goes off in Iraq, a bomb should go off in Iran."

Loren Thompson, a military analyst at the Lexington Institute, said many military targets in Iran were susceptible to Air Force weapons.

"Iran is precisely the type of enemy they know how to deal with," Thompson said. "Having the ability to attack Iranian military targets and political targets is not just a deterrent. It may actually be used if we feel the Iranians are trying to subvert democracy in Iraq."

U.S. planes could be in the region for years. Although the U.S.-led war in Iraq began in 2003, Air Force officials note that American fighter planes have flown over Iraq for more than a decade.

When the 1991 Persian Gulf War ended, fighter planes remained in the region, enforcing no-fly zones and essentially conducting an air occupation.

Once the Iraq war starts to wind down, Air Force officials say, the service's presence will still be required to provide firepower and surveillance to Iraqi units.

"We do know we have been there for 16 years," Chandler said, "and we will be there as long as we can see into the future."

*

julian.barnes@latimes.com

Times staff writer Peter Spiegel in Washington contributed to this report.

Pentagon Halts Sale Of F-14 Parts (AP)

By Sharon Theimer

AP, January 31, 2007

The Pentagon said Tuesday it had stopped selling surplus F-14 parts, announcing the step after congressional criticism of security weaknesses that had given buyers for countries including Iran access to the aircraft parts and other valuable gear.

Sales of parts from the recently retired fleet were halted last Friday, Defense Logistics Agency spokesman Jack Hooper said, adding that marketing of the parts will remain suspended until a "comprehensive review" is completed. He did not immediately elaborate.

The decision comes as a Democratic senator moves to cut off all Pentagon sales of surplus F-14 parts, saying the military's marketing of the spares "defies common sense" in light of their importance to Iran.

Sen. Ron Wyden's bill came in response to an investigation by The Associated Press that found weaknesses in surplus-sale security that allowed buyers for countries including Iran and China to surreptitiously obtain sensitive U.S. military equipment including Tomcat parts.

DOJ_NMG_0124957

The Oregon Democrat's legislation would ban the Defense Department from selling surplus F-14 parts and prohibit buyers who have already acquired surplus Tomcat parts from exporting them. Wyden's bill, the Stop Arming Iran Act, is co-sponsored by the Senate's No. 2 lawmaker, Democratic Whip Richard Durbin of Illinois.

The surplus sales are one of the first national security issues to be addressed by the new Democratic-controlled Congress.

"It just defies common sense to be making this kind of equipment available to the Iranians with all that they have done that is against our interests," Wyden said Monday in an interview, adding that constituents brought up the surplus-sale security problems at his town-hall meetings over the past few days. "I just want to legislate this and cut it off permanently, once and for all."

The Tomcat is the fighter jet made famous in the 1986 Tom Cruise blockbuster movie, "Top Gun." The U.S. military retired its F-14s last fall. That leaves only Iran — which bought the fighter jet in the 1970s when it was a U.S. ally — flying the planes.

U.S. law enforcement officials believe Iran can produce only about 15 percent of the parts it needs for its Tomcats, making the Pentagon's surplus sales a valuable avenue for spares.

The Pentagon had planned to sell about 60 percent of the roughly 76,000 parts for the F-14, viewing them as general nuts-and-bolts-type aircraft hardware that could be sold safely without restrictions.

Some of those spares from the newly retired fleet probably have already been sold, the Defense Logistics Agency's Hooper said. The Defense Department plans to destroy about 10,000 other components it considers unique to the F-14.

The agency had been reviewing 23,000 other parts it believed it could sell under existing law but wanted to examine further in light of their potential value to Iran. It will now also review the thousands of nuts-and-bolts-type hardware.

Wyden said his bill would cut off the sale of all surplus F-14 parts. The legislation includes all parts to cut off all opportunities for Iranian "fishing expeditions," spokeswoman Jennifer Hoelzer said, adding that GAO investigations have found valuable surplus accidentally getting included in boxes of what are supposed to be nuts-and-bolts-type hardware.

Wyden is confident he can get the bill through the Senate in the next few months. Wyden, a senior member of the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, also pledged greater Senate oversight of the surplus program.

Hooper declined to comment on the legislation.

"We're certainly not going to attempt to interfere whatsoever in the legislative process," Hooper said. The Defense Department maintains it has followed all procedures in selling its surplus.

The AP reported the Pentagon's F-14 part sales plans earlier this month. Its investigation found that in several cases, buyers for countries that included Iran and China took advantage of security flaws to buy sensitive surplus, including aircraft parts and missile components.

Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., has asked the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to investigate the surplus security weaknesses.

US Takes New Steps To Isolate Iran (AFP)

By Jim Mannion

AFP, January 31, 2007

The United States took new steps to isolate Iran, announcing a freeze on the sale of all F-14 fighter parts and warning that an attempt by Tehran to block the flow of Gulf oil could be turned against it.

President George W. Bush reiterated in a television interview that the US had no plans to invade Iran, but will step up diplomatic pressure to convince it to abandon its nuclear program.

"And the best way to do so is to continue rallying other nations to join us and expressing ourselves very clear to the Iranians that 'You will be isolated, that you won't be able to achieve your greatness, that you'll hurt your people economically if you continue to insist upon a nuclear weapon,'" he told ABC News.

Countering Iran has emerged as a prime objective of US policy as Washington struggles to stabilize Iraq and regain its footing in a region rife with both anti-American and sectarian tensions.

Admiral William Fallon, Bush's nominee to replace General John Abizaid as commander of US forces in the Middle East, said Iran appeared to be developing military means to deny US forces access to the oil-rich Gulf.

"But I would note this is not a one-sided game, or a one-sided situation, in that Iran is, I believe, critically dependent on its export of petroleum products for its economic vitality," he told the Senate Armed Services Committee.

"And those exports go through the same Straits of Hormuz that they would potentially seek to deny us access to," he said.

About a quarter of the world's oil goes through the straits, which are bordered by Iran on one side and Oman and the United Arab Emirates on the other.

Experts say the closure of the straits would send oil prices soaring.

DOJ_NMG_0124958

Fallon's appointment, which the US Senate is expected to confirm, coincides with Bush's ordering a second aircraft carrier strike group to the Gulf.

The arrival of the aircraft carrier USS John Stennis would raise the US naval presence in the region to its highest level since the 2003 invasion of Iraq.

Fallon said Bush had not asked him to update war plans for Iran and said he was not aware of any such plans at the US Central Command, which is responsible for US forces in the Gulf.

"It seems to me in the entire approach to Iraq that we'll be looking for help from the region and ... at the full range of options that are open to us, diplomatically and every other way," he said.

In Iraq, Bush confirmed last week that he has authorized the US military to kill or capture Iranian agents plotting attacks on US forces.

"We'll deal with it by finding their supply chains and their agents and ... arresting them, getting them out of harm's way. In other words, we're going to protect our troops," Bush told ABC News.

"It's not tough talk to say that the commander-in-chief expects our troops to be protected," he said.

The Pentagon, meanwhile, froze the sales of all spare parts for F-14 fighter aircraft because of concerns they could be transferred to Iran, which bought F-14s from the United States before the 1979 Iranian revolution, a Defense Department spokeswoman said.

The Defense Logistics Agency ordered the freeze January 26 "given the current situation in Iran," said Dawn Dearden, the agency's spokesman.

The Pentagon had already suspended the sale of spare parts that either were specific to the F-14 or that could be used in other aircraft.

The DLA said the parts sales are now the subject of a comprehensive review.

Not-So-Strange Bedfellow (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, January 31, 2007

Here's a little foreign policy test. I am going to describe two countries — "Country A" and "Country B" — and you tell me which one is America's ally and which one is not.

Let's start: Country A actively helped the U.S. defeat the Taliban in Afghanistan and replace it with a pro-U.S. elected alliance of moderate Muslims. Country A regularly holds sort-of-free elections. Country A's women vote, hold office, are the majority of its university students and are fully integrated into the work force.

On 9/11, residents of Country A were among the very few in the Muslim world to hold spontaneous pro-U.S. demonstrations. Country A's radical president recently held a conference about why the Holocaust never happened — to try to gain popularity. A month later, Country A held nationwide elections for local councils, and that same president saw his candidates get wiped out by voters who preferred more moderate conservatives. Country A has a strategic interest in the success of the pro-U.S., Shiite-led, elected Iraqi government. Although it's a Muslim country right next to Iraq, Country A has never sent any suicide bombers to Iraq, and has long protected its Christians and Jews. Country A has more bloggers per capita than any country in the Muslim Middle East.

The brand of Islam practiced by Country A respects women, is open to reinterpretation in light of modernity and rejects Al Qaeda's nihilism.

Now Country B: Country B gave us 15 of the 19 hijackers on 9/11. Country B does not allow its women to drive, vote or run for office. It is illegal in Country B to build a church, synagogue or Hindu temple. Country B helped finance the Taliban.

Country B's private charities help sustain Al Qaeda. Young men from Country B's mosques have been regularly recruited to carry out suicide bombings in Iraq. Mosques and charities in Country B raise funds to support the insurgency in Iraq. Country B does not want the elected, Shiite-led government in Iraq to succeed. While Country B's leaders are pro-U.S., polls show many of its people are hostile to America — some of them celebrated on 9/11. The brand of Islam supported by Country B and exported by it to mosques around the world is the most hostile to modernity and other faiths.

Question: Which country is America's natural ally: A or B?

Country A is, of course. Country A is Iran. Country B is Saudi Arabia.

Don't worry. I know that Iran has also engaged in terrorism against the U.S. and that the Saudis have supported America at key times in some areas. The point I'm trying to make, though, is that the hostility between Iran and the U.S. since the overthrow of the shah in 1979 is not organic. By dint of culture, history and geography, we actually have a lot of interests in common with Iran's people. And I am not the only one to notice that.

DOJ_NMG_0124959

Because the U.S. has destroyed Iran's two biggest enemies — the Taliban and Saddam — "there is now a debate in Iran as to whether we should continue to act so harshly against the Americans," Mohammad Hossein Adeli, Iran's former ambassador to London, told me at Davos. "There is now more readiness for dialogue with the United States."

More important, when people say, "The most important thing America could do today to stabilize the Middle East is solve the Israel-Palestine conflict," they are wrong. It's second. The most important thing would be to resolve the Iran-U.S. conflict.

That would change the whole Middle East and open up the way to solving the Israel-Palestine conflict, because Iran is the key backer of Hamas, Islamic Jihad, Hezbollah and Syria. Iran's active help could also be critical for stabilizing Iraq.

This is why I oppose war with Iran. I favor negotiations. Isolating Iran like Castro's Cuba has produced only the same result as in Cuba: strengthening Iran's Castros. But for talks with Iran to bear fruit, we have to negotiate with Iran with leverage.

How do we get leverage? Make it clear that Iran can't push us out of the gulf militarily; bring down the price of oil, which is key to the cockiness of Iran's hard-line leadership; squeeze the hard-liners financially. But all this has to be accompanied with a clear declaration that the U.S. is not seeking regime change in Iran, but a change of behavior, that the U.S. wants to immediately restore its embassy in Tehran and that the first thing it will do is grant 50,000 student visas for young Iranians to study at U.S. universities.

Just do that — and then sit back and watch the most amazing debate explode inside Iran. You can bet the farm on it.

Democrats Agree To Iraq Panel (WP)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb

The Washington Post, January 31, 2007

Democratic leaders agreed yesterday to President Bush's idea for a new bipartisan panel to advise him on the fight against terrorism and the Iraq war, days after rejecting such a commission.

The president proposed the panel earlier this month when he announced his plan to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq.

"This group will meet regularly with me and my administration; it will help strengthen our relationship with Congress," Bush said Jan. 10 in a prime-time speech.

Democrats quickly opposed the plan. A Jan. 19 letter from House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) and Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.) said: "We believe that Congress already has bipartisan structures in place . . . that could produce the result you described in your speech."

A senior Democratic leadership aide said yesterday that Bush had wanted to dictate the terms of the panel and even select its Democratic members.

Yesterday, Bush spoke with Pelosi and Reid, and they agreed to create a panel to which Democrats could appoint their own members.

"They had a very good conversation today and it was a very promising start," said Brendan Daly, a Pelosi spokesman.

White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said in a statement: "The president had a good phone conversation with Senator Reid and Speaker Pelosi this afternoon."

The panel's initial meeting is set for next week, Perino said.

Today, Pelosi is to discuss with Bush her recent visit to Iraq during a White House visit. She said yesterday that her delegation saw no sign of U.S. efforts moving ahead with urgency.

Rice: Iraq Missed Political Deadlines (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, January 31, 2007

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, while assuring senators Tuesday that the Bush administration expects Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to make political reforms, provided a list showing deadlines already missed.

Iraq has passed target dates to make laws establishing provincial elections, regulating distribution of the country's oil wealth and reversing measures that have excluded many Sunnis from jobs and government positions because of Baath party membership, according to the list Rice provided.

The Iraq government had also agreed to approve a law governing political amnesty and the charged question of sectarian militias by Dec. 31 and to finish a review of the constitution, seen as unfair to minority Sunnis, by Wednesday.

The list was drafted by the al-Maliki government in September, Rice said in a letter to Sens. Carl Levin, D-Mich., and John McCain, R-Ariz.

Levin, chairman of the Armed Services Committee, and McCain, the panel's ranking member, said Rice's letter lacked details and ignored a goal previously suggested by U.S. officials: that the Iraqis should be able to assume control of their provinces by November 2007.

DOJ_NMG_0124960

"What Secretary Rice's letter makes abundantly clear is that the administration does not intend to attach meaningful consequences for the Iraqis' continuing to fail to meet their commitments," the senators wrote. "What has been said before is still true: 'America supplying more troops while Iraqi leaders simply supply more promises is not a recipe for success in Iraq.'"

President Bush and al-Maliki have outlined some of the pledges in public addresses, but Levin and other senators said they had pressed the State Department for months to provide a comprehensive list.

The benchmarks for Iraqi political reform are a central pillar of Bush's new strategy to turn around the unpopular war. He has said that he is relying on al-Maliki to reduce sectarian violence and make hard political choices, but has not spelled out the consequences if al-Maliki fails.

"The president has made clear to the prime minister and other Iraqi leaders that America's commitment is not open-ended," Rice wrote to Levin. "It is essential that the government of Iraq, with our help but its lead, set out measurable, achievable goals and objectives."

Many in Congress have become openly skeptical that al-Maliki, a Shiite, has the political will or desire to contain the spiral of tit-for-tat Sunni-Shiite sectarian killings that has left Iraq at the doorstep of civil war.

Although the Iraqi parliament and Cabinet have done intermittent work on some elements of the list, including the symbolic oil law, it appeared that none of the targets have been fully met. The list spans September 2006 through March 2007.

Last week al-Maliki called on lawmakers to pass several items on the list, including the oil and de-Baathification laws.

Levin and McCain had written to Rice asking for a clarification of Bush's Jan. 10 address on his new Iraq plan.

"America will hold the Iraqi government to the benchmarks it has announced," Bush said then. Levin has said it was not clear precisely which benchmarks Bush was referring to.

"It is essential that Congress have the information on those benchmarks to comprehensively consider as it addresses the way ahead in Iraq," Levin and McCain wrote.

Baghdad Grasps Role, Official Says (WT)

By John Zarocostas

The Washington Times, January 31, 2007

DAVOS, Switzerland -- Iraqi officials have received the message "loud and clear" that President Bush's new security plan offers them a last chance to gain control of their country, Iraqi Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari said.

The minister said the government also understood that the success or failure of the planned "surge" of 21,500 U.S. troops depended on the Iraqis' own performance.

"We have to rise to the occasion and take up each and every commitment," Mr. Zebari told The Washington Times on Monday as he prepared to go home from the five-day World Economic Forum in Davos. He said senior officials were "not shying away" from their responsibilities.

Mr. Bush announced the troop surge in Washington earlier this month, just days after Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki made his own announcement of coordinated plans to strengthen security in Baghdad.

"We think this new plan is different from previous plans because originally it is an Iraqi vision. ... And we strongly believe it has a strong chance of success," Mr. Zebari said.

Acknowledging that the credibility of his administration was on the line, the minister said, "I think the message is received loud and clear by all members of the government [that] this is the time, really, it's not business as usual.

"There is a lot of violence, of killing, of sectarian violence, and people will not respect you, the world will not respect you, if you don't have a handle on the security of your own country."

Mr. Zebari said a combination of external and internal elements were fueling the conflict but that Iraq could not simply blame its neighbors for the violence.

"There is a great deal of indigenous violence, and mainly by those groups who don't believe in democracy and dialogue, power sharing, and there are many misconceptions about the security situation in Iraq, unfortunately," he said.

"We have been at pain to reach out, to include [those opposing the new order], but they are not power sharers but power grabbers, and they are unable to come to accept the realities of Iraq that the political scene has changed."

The foreign minister expressed his appreciation for Mr. Bush's determination to defend the Iraqi government in spite of growing skepticism about the effort in the United States.

"The president is a believer, and a strong leader, and he has a lot of respect, OK, among many Iraqis, the majority of Iraqis. And the majority appreciate what the U.S. has done," he said.

Mr. Zebari said his government placed a premium on establishing better relations with neighbors Syria and Iran but would not tolerate outside meddling in Iraq's affairs.

DOJ_NMG_0124961

Fostering better relations with Iran will require Iraq to "engage them constructively," he said. But Baghdad "has to remind [Iran] that we will not accept, or tolerate, any diktat, or any intervention, in Iraq's internal affairs. It is a challenge for us; it's not easy.

"Again, I think we are destined to live with them by geography. We have many common interests with them. We have a long history; let's say of problems, of wars, of animosities and so on. But at the end of the day, we have to try to see some solutions."

Mr. Zebari said Iraq had already opened a dialogue with Syria. "The president was there a few days ago. We've restored our diplomatic relations with them. They have not been helpful in the past, but this time we will try to hold them to their commitment.

"Our message to [Iran and Syria] has been very straightforward and simple. You will not gain anything by meddling, by looking for short-term gains ... because failure in Iraq means chaos and will spill over to your societies, to your countries."

Progress In Baghdad (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 31, 2007

Capitol Hill has probably been too busy running for political cover to notice. But the last few days in Iraq have actually featured good news, as the government seems to be making some progress on key political and security issues.

One step forward is that Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has won parliamentary backing for his Baghdad security plan. This means the elected representatives of Iraq's Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds remain capable of compromise and are willing to give the new strategy a chance to work.

There's also evidence that the Baghdad plan is having an effect. Yes, al Qaeda bombs targeted the Shiite Ashoura holiday as expected. But there are also widespread reports of Sunni jihadists fleeing the capital in anticipation of a crackdown. Prime Minister Maliki has already started moving against Shiite militias, which might explain an apparent drop in sectarian violence. No one should get overconfident, but clearly the bad guys are taking the joint U.S.-Iraqi effort to pacify the capital seriously.

Meanwhile, the weekend saw an encouraging performance by the Iraqi security forces who took control of the Najaf area only about a month ago. Acting on their own intelligence, Iraqi police and a battalion from the Eighth Army Division confronted a radical Shiite sect calling themselves the Soldiers of Heaven who had reportedly planned to assassinate mainstream Shiite clerics, including the moderate Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani.

Some observers are trying to spin this battle as a defeat for the government, because the first Iraqi units on the scene had to call for reinforcements and for American air power. But the fact that Iraqi forces were able to pre-empt the attack on Najaf before it began, and that everyone involved was able to coordinate the operation and soundly defeat the enemy makes it sound like a success to us. Hundreds of the insurgents were killed, compared to a handful of Iraqi and U.S. troops. This may well be a model for how U.S. troops might play a supporting role down the road -- assuming Washington gives them a chance to get Baghdad under control first.

For the moment at least, Iraq seems to be inching in the right direction. After a week of Western lamentations about the gracelessness of the Saddam hanging, it became clear that the primary effect of the execution was to enhance Prime Minister Maliki's stature in Iraq. Mr. Maliki, in turn, is using that political capital. The last thing he needs is to have his efforts undermined by votes of no-confidence in Washington -- or meddling by Congressmen with "benchmarks" who pretend to know better than he does how to deal with the most difficult issues, such as how best to marginalize Moqtada al-Sadr.

The Bush Administration has itself made many mistakes trying to micromanage Iraq's political development, but it now seems to understand that it is fated to deal with the Shiite-led government it has. Congressmen who are sincere in wanting to take the Iraq issue off the table in 2008 could help by showing a similar combination of resolve and humility.

Suicide Bombers ‘entering Iraq From Syria’ (FT)

By Daniel Dombey

Financial Times, January 31, 2007

Dozens of al-Qaeda suicide bombers from countries such as Saudi Arabia and Sudan are crossing into Iraq from Syria every month, a senior US official said on Tuesday.

Speaking to the Financial Times in London, the official said that, while sectarian conflict now represented the biggest threat to the country, the violence was being stoked up from abroad.

“This is the most difficult challenge,” he said. “How do you bring down sectarian violence in the face of this al-Qaeda campaign to prompt sectarian violence?”

But he added that the US’s new strategy for Iraq also depended on much greater co-operation from the Iraqi government.

DOJ_NMG_0124962

The US says outside actors – chiefly Syria and Iran – are still one of the biggest factors determining the level of violence in Iraq. It also portrays its recent decision to pursue Iranian operatives in Iraq as an effort to "push back" against Tehran's increased influence in the region.

The official alleged that the vast majority of suicide bombers came across the border from Syria, and that they received training for their task within Syria as well as inside Iraq itself.

"We do not believe that there was an inevitability to the Shia-Sunni conflict on this scale," he said, arguing that the violence had been greatly increased by al-Qaeda acts such as the bombing of the Samarra mosque last February.

He said that 75-80 per cent of the estimated 75 suicide bombings a month were carried out by foreigners, and that Saudi Arabia and Sudan were the most common countries of origin. But he emphasised that the Saudi government was doing its utmost to take on al-Qaeda.

"We have been wholly unsuccessful in affecting Syrian behaviour with regard to the passage of these elements," the official said, adding that the countries of the region wanted to isolate Syria further.

The US is also greatly concerned by Iran, which it believes has become bolder and more confident in its activities in the region in the past few months. Washington maintains that Iran's activities within Iraq have reached an unacceptable level because of the use of Iranian-made explosive devices and the incursion of Iranian operatives into Iraqi territory. Tehran denies meddling in Iraq's affairs.

"We are attempting to re-establish a position of strength," the official said of the recent US decision to step up action against Iran, including the despatch of an aircraft carrier to the Gulf.

He added that the US plan for Iraq depended on improving security, convincing the Iraqi government to adopt a less sectarian agenda, and eliciting financial aid from states in the region that are suspicious of Baghdad.

This would involve the Iraqi government providing effective soldiers, halting sectarian meddling in military decisions and embracing a programme of reconciliation. "If these commitments are not met, then this plan cannot succeed," the official said.

Baker: Syria Talks May Help Israel (AP)

By Barry Schweid

AP, January 31, 2007

If the Bush administration opened a dialogue with Syria it could remove a major roadblock to Israeli-Palestinian peacemaking — Hamas' refusal to recognize the Jewish state — former Secretary of State James A. Baker III said Tuesday.

Testifying before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Baker said, "We could get them (Syria) to get Hamas to recognize Israel's right to exist. It would be a huge step in the right direction."

Hamas, which is designated a terrorist organization by the State Department and the European Union, dominates the Palestinian government through its election a year ago.

The Bush administration has been reluctant to talk to Syria, citing its support for groups like Hamas. Baker was secretary of State under Bush's father, the first President Bush.

Baker told the committee he had discussed the situation with senior Syrian officials on a trip to the country as co-chair of the Iraq Study Group, a bipartisan panel that recommended several changes in Bush's Iraq strategy. Most of the recommendations were ignored by the administration.

Baker said the United States in talks with Syria also "could get them to stop arming Hezbollah," a Lebanese militia backed by Iran that has a foothold in the Lebanese government and fought a war with Israel last summer.

The co-chair of the study group, former Rep. Lee Hamilton, D-Ind., said Syria has been "sending signals to us" that they want to talk to the United States.

The study group recommended the Bush administration hold talks with Iran as well as Syria and other countries in the region as part of a diplomatic effort to end the fighting in Iraq.

Sen. Bill Nelson, D-Fla., who held talks in Syria in December with President Bashar Assad and Foreign Minister Walid al-Moualem, said, "The administration has adopted the approach of an ostrich."

"And make no mistake. It is not working," he told the private Council on Foreign Relations.

Nelson said Assad had "indicated an interest" in discussing its border with Iraq. Nelson said jihadists make their way into Iraq to fight U.S. troops.

Dozens Killed In Iraq Bombings (USAT/AP)

USA Today, January 31, 2007

BAGHDAD — Bombers struck Shiite worshipers in two cities Tuesday as they jammed major shrines for ceremonies marking Ashoura, the holiest day of the Shiite calendar.

DOJ_NMG_0124963

A series of attacks, which included an ambush on a busload of pilgrims, killed at least 58 people in Iraq.

Extremists chose targets in smaller cities where safety measures were less stringent.

In the deadliest attack, a suicide bomber blew himself up among a crowd of worshipers entering a Shiite mosque in Mandali, near the Iranian border, killing 26 people and wounding 47, Iraqi police told the Associated Press.

At least 12 more died and 28 were wounded when a bomb exploded in a garbage can as Shiites were performing outdoor rituals in the largely Kurdish city of Khanaqin, said police Maj. Idriss Mohammed.

In Baghdad, gunmen in two cars opened fire on a bus carrying pilgrims to the capital's most prominent Shiite shrine, killing seven and wounding seven. Hours later, mortar shells rained down on two mostly Sunni neighborhoods, killing nine and wounding 30 in what may have been a reprisal attack.

One person was killed in a mortar attack on a Shiite neighborhood, and a Shiite man was shot dead in the capital. Police also found eight bodies Tuesday of people slain in Baghdad.

Two policemen were killed in a bombing in Mosul.

Intense security prevented major violence in the Shiite holy cities of Karbala and Najaf, venues for the biggest Ashoura commemorations.

More than 1.5 million pilgrims jammed the southern city of Karbala for the Ashoura commemorations, according to provincial Gov. Akeel al-Khazaali. Most were Iraqis, but some came from as far as India and Pakistan.

Hundreds of thousands more joined rituals in Najaf, Baghdad and other cities.

Ashoura ceremonies mark the death of Imam Hussein, grandson of Mohammed, in the seventh century.

In Karbala, all private transport was banned, including bicycles. Pilgrims had to submit to body searches at dozens of checkpoints before reaching the two golden-domed shrines of Imam Hussein and his half brother Imam Abbas.

U.S. unmanned surveillance aircraft flew over the city to look for signs of trouble, al-Khazaali said.

"Even if the terrorists tear us to pieces, we will not stop coming to visit Imam Hussein," said Abbas Karim, 27, a laborer from Nasiriyah.

50 Iraqis Die As Holiday Brings Spasm Of Sectarian Killing (NYT)

By Marc Santora

The New York Times, January 31, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 30 — Women dressed in black had just set out large caldrons to cook the traditional feast on the holy day of Ashura, a simple meal of rice and lamb in a tomato-based sauce. Children crowded around the pots as men wailed in a ritualistic mourning ceremony and guards scanned the crowd at the Shiite mosque near Baquba for would-be killers.

Then a bomb exploded.

“I saw a head land a few feet from me,” said Muhammad Saad, an 18-year-old student who was wounded in the blast. “Hands and legs were all around.”

At least 23 people were killed in the attack, the police said.

Only 35 miles to the southeast, in Baghdad, the Sunni residents of the Adhamiya neighborhood spent the day hiding in basements and under door frames, as explosions burst around them. At least 30 mortar shells rained down on the area, pulverizing homes and people.

By nightfall, police officials said that 10 were dead, while overwhelmed doctors at the local hospital said that at least 20 people had been killed and the number was likely to climb as bodies were dug out the next morning.

In all, more than 50 people died in scattered attacks across Iraq on Tuesday.

The day’s violence, much of it driven by sectarian rivalries, and most of it directed at Shiites, was by no means the worst Iraq has seen. But it was one more grim reminder of just how deeply this nation has been cleaved in the past year.

As millions of pilgrims flocked to Iraq’s holiest shrines, and tens of thousands of government security forces and Shiite militiamen fanned out to try to provide protection, ancient rituals transported worshipers back more than a thousand years, to the killing of the grandson of the Prophet Muhammad, Imam Hussein, by a Sunni army in the battle of Karbala in A.D. 680.

At Ashura, Shiites commemorate what is for them the most formative event of their faith, a celebration that had been banned under Saddam Hussein. In recent years, Sunni militants, caught up in a renewed sectarian split, have attacked worshipers on the holiday.

In 2005, at least 74 people were killed and in 2004, more than 180 people died. This year was, however, worse than last, when fewer than a dozen were killed.

Given the history of violence on Ashura, the Iraqi government deployed 10,000 policemen to guard Karbala, where many of the millions of pilgrims gather, according to the governor of Karbala Province, Aqil al-Khuzaie. He said American and British fighter jets and helicopters patrolled the skies, and a security perimeter was set up several miles from the city center, placing the crowds out of reach of mortar shells and short-range rockets.

DOJ_NMG_0124964

While the ceremonies in the holy cities of Karbala and Najaf proceeded without violence, militants still managed to kill large numbers of people.

The deadliest attack was at the Shiite shrine near Baquba, in Balad Ruz.

Mr. Saad, the 18-year-old student who witnessed the attack and was interviewed in the hospital where he was being treated for his wounds, described what he remembered.

"I headed to the mosque around 10 a.m. and saw hundreds of people gathering," he said. There was heavy security, he said, but the rituals played out as they always do.

Shortly after noon he heard the explosion.

"I fell on the ground and lost consciousness," he said. When he came to, he saw victims being loaded into vans because there were no ambulances, and he heard gunshots.

A Shiite neighborhood in Baghdad, Kadhimiya, was also hit by about 20 mortar shells on Tuesday, according to the police, an attack that was most likely timed to Ashura.

Kadhimiya has generally been quiet, so much so that most of the government services work and residents have felt safe enough to venture out in the evening for tea and ice cream. The security has largely been provided by militias, not the government.

Although police officials reported no casualties in the shelling on Tuesday, residents said at least three people were killed in one explosion.

Abu Ali, 37, was standing near the main street watching an Ashura procession when a mortar hit a nearby house, a few hundred yards from the main Shiite shrine in the neighborhood.

"People rushed to the house," he said. They found three people dead and two wounded. "The house was burned to the ground because of the explosion."

An American military official said later in the day that troops had been able to pinpoint the location of mortar fire and called in airstrikes to take out the guns. It was unclear if the mortars from that site had been directed at Kadhimiya or Adhamiya, which are near each other.

Elsewhere in the city, four Shiite pilgrims were killed and nine more wounded when gunmen open fired on two minibuses.

In Khanaqin, a small town northeast of Baghdad with a mixed Shiite-Sunni population, a roadside bomb exploded during a procession of Shiite worshipers, killing at least 12 people, including three women.

Aside from the sectarian violence, new details emerged about the fierce fighting over the weekend outside Najaf, which served as a reminder that internal power struggles among Shiite factions can also have bloody consequences. The battle pitted Iraqi and American security forces against a fringe Shiite group that the Iraqi government said was planning an attack on the city and its top clerics during Ashura.

A video released by the government showed hundreds of blindfolded prisoners being rounded up after the daylong fight and being taken away by Iraqi security forces. Another video showed stacks of dead bodies; the government said the bodies, many burned beyond recognition, were fighters killed in the battle.

After conflicting accounts of how many people were killed and captured in the battle, the Ministry of Defense said 263 people were killed, 210 wounded and 502 arrested on suspicion of being part of the renegade militia.

More Than 60 Killed Amid As Shiite Festival Ends (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, January 31, 2007

BAGHDAD — Sectarian warfare directed mostly at Shiite Muslim pilgrims and worshipers celebrating the climax of an important religious holiday left more than 60 Iraqis dead Tuesday.

In addition, details emerged about arrests in the wake of a bold Jan. 20 insurgent raid on a joint U.S.-Iraqi security compound in Karbala in which a U.S. soldier was killed and four other American soldiers were captured and shot to death miles away.

A police official in Hillah said four Saudi Arabians staying in a Karbala hotel were arrested in connection with the attack. The official, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said U.S. and Iraqi officials had seized maps and other documents.

The official also said U.S. officials were heading the investigation of the well-synchronized raid, in which gunmen posing as American soldiers or contractors stormed the compound, disabled U.S. vehicles and whisked away the soldiers.

Four others of undetermined nationality also were arrested near the site where the gunmen shot the soldiers, shed their equipment and fled.

DOJ_NMG_0124965

Aside from a news release issued Friday, U.S. officials have declined to comment on the raid.

Thousands of Shiite pilgrims from around the world, including Saudis, descend on Karbala for Ashura, the religious festival.

Tuesday's violence was concentrated in religiously mixed areas of the capital and a province to the northeast.

The day's deadliest incident took place in Diyala, a religiously and ethnically mixed province that borders Iran. In the Balad Ruz region, 40 miles east of the provincial capital, Baqubah, a suicide bomber detonated an explosives belt among worshipers engaged in Ashura street demonstrations, killing at least 23 Shiites and injuring 57.

In nearby Khanaqin, a town of Kurds, Sunnis and Shiites along the border, at least eight people were killed and 30 injured when a bomb planted along a roadway near a mosque exploded during an Ashura procession.

In southwest Baghdad, at least 18 pilgrims were killed and 18 wounded when gunmen opened fire on buses ferrying people home from Karbala, the shrine city where hundreds of thousands of Shiites commemorated the 7th century martyrdom of Imam Hussein, a grandson of the prophet Muhammad.

Mortar battles raged between Sunni and Shiite enclaves of the capital. At least a dozen mortar shells landed in Adhamiya, home to an important Sunni shrine, killing 10 people and injuring 16.

A mortar shell struck a building in the northern Baghdad district of Kadhimiya, home to a Shiite shrine, killing one and injuring nine. Another struck a house in the mostly Sunni neighborhood of Jihad, inflicting casualties on the family inside.

Gunmen in the Sunni-dominated Dora district shot to death a Shiite man helping his mother remove furniture from their home, which they had abandoned because of sectarian threats, police said. The mother was also killed and the man's wife wounded.

Iraqi authorities in the capital discovered the bodies of at least eight young men who had been fatally shot in apparent sectarian death-squad killings.

A U.S. soldier was killed Monday near the southern city of Nasiriya when his vehicle rolled over in an accident, the U.S. military said Tuesday. The death brought the number of U.S. troops killed in Iraq since the U.S.-led invasion to 3,081, according to icasualties.org.

The U.S. military also reported a weekend suicide bombing of a fire station that killed 16 people near Ramadi. A driver plowed a dump truck filled with explosives and a chlorine tank into the compound.

"There are no indications of any casualties caused by the release of chlorine gas," the military statement said.

Violence Targeted At Shiites On Holy Day Kills 60 In Iraq (WP)

By Ernesto Londoã±o And Saad Sarhan

The Washington Post, January 31, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 30 -- Attackers using bombs, rockets and guns killed at least 60 Shiite worshipers Tuesday as they observed their most sacred holiday, Iraqi officials said.

The day's deadliest incident occurred in the town of Baladruz, in Diyala province in eastern Iraq, when a suicide bomber walked through the main gate of the Ali al-Akbar mosque and detonated his explosives, killing 17 people and injuring at least 57, according to Ali al-Khaiyam, a police spokesman.

The worshipers were marking Ashura, which commemorates the death of the prophet Muhammad's grandson in a 7th-century battle at Karbala, in what is now southern Iraq. The city is the focal point of the 10-day festival, which culminated Tuesday.

At least 11 other Shiites observing the holiday were killed in Khanaqin, also in Diyala, near the Iranian border, after a bomb left at a market exploded, Khaiyam said.

A roadside bomb killed 15 Shiites participating in an Ashura procession in Baqubah, the capital of Diyala, and injured at least 30 civilians, according to Brig. Sadoun Salih of the Interior Ministry.

Five other people were killed in the province in other violent acts, Khaiyam said.

Violence targeting Shiites also broke out in Baghdad. A roadside bomb in the sprawling Shiite enclave of Sadr City struck an Ashura procession, killing seven people and wounding 23, Salih said.

In other neighborhoods, gunmen fired Katyusha rockets at processions and used machine guns to attack passing buses heading to Karbala, Salih added. He said at least three people died in those incidents.

In another attack on Shiites headed to Karbala, gunmen opened fire on passengers in a bus leaving Baghdad, killing seven, Salih said.

Mortar shells crashed down into the predominantly Shiite neighborhood of Kadhimiyah, in northern Baghdad, on Tuesday morning. "We have stopped going out or moving in the neighborhood, because one of the rockets fell just in front of my house," resident Yaarub Fadhil Hussein, 41, said in a telephone interview.

DOJ_NMG_0124966

Meanwhile, at the scene of a fierce day-long battle Sunday near Najaf between the followers of a Shiite cult leader and Iraqi and U.S. troops, a clearer picture of the group emerged Tuesday as Iraqi investigators explored its village. A Washington Post special correspondent toured the site.

The village, home to at least 700 people, had several brick houses, a large tented area where meals were served, a printing press used to publish a newspaper, and stockpiles of dry food. There were also a small mosque and dozens of vehicles.

After two days of varying estimates, Iraqi officials said Tuesday that 263 members of the group were killed in Sunday's battle. Provincial officials, who last month took control of security matters in Najaf province, said they acted on intelligence reports to thwart what they described as a plot to conduct a large-scale attack on Shiite leaders and shrines. Such an attack could have exacerbated sectarian violence in Iraq.

Iraqi officials said they were still sifting through conflicting accounts of the leader's background and motivation. The man, identified by a spokesman for the prime minister's office as Samer Abu Kamar, claimed to be the 12th imam, a messianic figure who Shiites believe will reemerge after a centuries-long disappearance to restore order and justice in a war-weary world.

Ahmad Diabel, a spokesman for the Najaf provincial government, said investigators believe that the group, known as the Soldiers of Heaven, received funding from al-Qaeda in Iraq, a Sunni insurgent group that has often targeted Shiites.

"This is definitely a great victory for the security forces, especially in Najaf," Col. Ali Nomas Jerao, a spokesman for those forces, said Tuesday. He said the operation was the first under full Iraqi military control to defeat "terrorists in the mid-Euphrates area." U.S. air and ground units supported the Iraqi troops.

Iraqi investigators combed the destroyed village, walking among piles of charred corpses, ash and debris. They also began questioning about 500 men detained after the battle.

Abu Kamar, a Shiite, might have sought to target Shiite leaders because he saw them as a threat to his messianic claim, officials and a scholar said. Officials described his followers as uneducated people who might have been drawn to him as a symbol of hope and redemption.

In recent months, the group's members cut nearly all ties to the outside world, Iraqi officials said. The armed men planned to travel to Najaf on buses, in the guise of ordinary Shiite pilgrims observing Ashura, they said. The attack was probably intended to unfold Tuesday.

Attacks Kill 58 During Holy Day (WT/AP)

By Bassem Mroue

The Washington Times, January 31, 2007

BAGHDAD -- Bombers struck Shi'ite worshippers in two cities yesterday, and gunmen ambushed a busload of pilgrims in a series of attacks that killed at least 58 persons as more than 2 million Shi'ites jammed major shrines for ceremonies marking Ashoura, the holiest day of the Shi'ite calendar.

The bloodshed took place despite heightened security after a battle with messianic Shi'ites who authorities said planned a large assault on Ashoura ceremonies. With security so intense at the main venues, extremists chose targets in smaller cities where safety measures were less stringent.

In the deadliest attack, a suicide bomber blew himself up among a crowd of worshippers entering a Shi'ite mosque in Mandali near the Iranian border, killing 26 persons and wounding 47, according to police. At least 12 more died and 28 were wounded when a bomb exploded in a garbage can as Shi'ites were performing outdoor rituals in the largely Kurdish city of Khanaqin, police said.

In Baghdad, gunmen in two cars opened fire on a bus carrying pilgrims to the capital's most important Shi'ite shrine, killing seven and wounding seven, police said. Hours later, mortar shells rained down on two mostly Sunni neighborhoods, killing nine and wounding 30 in what police said appeared to be a reprisal attack.

One person was killed in a mortar attack on a Shi'ite neighborhood, police said. Two policemen were killed in a bombing in Mosul, and a Shi'ite man was fatally shot in Baghdad, police said.

But intense security prevented major violence in the Shi'ite holy cities of Karbala and Najaf, venues for the biggest and most important Ashoura commemorations. Police found eight bodies yesterday of persons slain by sectarian death squads in Baghdad, the lowest single-day total in months.

Ashoura ceremonies mark the 7th-century death of Imam Hussein, grandson of the prophet Muhammad, in a battle near Karbala that cemented the Sunni-Shi'ite schism. Worshippers beat themselves with chains, slice their heads with knives and pound their chests in expressions of grief over the death of Imam Hussein.

More than 1.5 million pilgrims, mostly Iraqis but from as far away as India and Pakistan, jammed the southern city of Karbala for the Ashoura commemorations, according to provincial Gov. Akeel al-Khazaali. Hundreds of thousands more joined rituals in Najaf, Baghdad and other cities.

In Karbala, all private transportation was banned -- including bicycles -- and pilgrims had to submit to body searches at dozens of checkpoints before reaching the two golden-domed shrines of Imam Hussein and his half brother Imam Abbas. U.S. unmanned surveillance aircraft flew over the city to look for signs of trouble, Mr. al-Khazaali said.

"Even if the terrorists tear us to pieces, we will not stop coming to visit Imam Hussein," said Abbas Karim, 27, a laborer from Nasiriyah.

Security has been tight at Ashoura commemorations since a string of bombings and suicide attacks killed at least 181 persons at Shi'ite shrines in Baghdad and Karbala in 2004.

Last year's Ashoura commemorations were largely peaceful, but suicide bombers killed 55 Shi'ites in 2005.

Analysis: Najaf Battle Raises Questions (AP)

By Robert H. Reid

AP, January 31, 2007

Accounts of the bloody battle near Najaf have produced more questions than answers, raising doubts about Iraqi security forces' performance and concern over tensions within the majority Shiite community.

Among the questions: How did a messianic Shiite cult, the "Soldiers of Heaven," accumulate so many weapons and — if Iraqi accounts are accurate — display such military skills? Iraqi forces prevailed only after U.S. and British jets blasted the militants with rockets, machine gunfire and 500-pound bombs. Both U.S. and Iraqi reinforcements had to be sent to the fight.

It's also unclear how a shadowy cult that few Iraqis had ever heard of managed to assemble such a force seemingly without attracting the attention of the authorities earlier. Iraqi officials say the cult planned to slaughter pilgrims and leading clerics at Shiite religious ceremonies Tuesday — only two days after police and soldiers moved to arrest them.

If the "Soldiers of Heaven" were able to accomplish all this, how many other fringe groups may be operating beneath the radar, especially in the politically factious Shiite community of southern Iraq? Did the cultists have links to other established insurgent or militia groups?

Virtually all the information about the cult has come from Iraqi officials, who have released incomplete and sometimes contradictory accounts.

Based on the information released, the cult numbered in the hundreds and may have included some Sunnis. Iraqi officials identified the leader as Diya Abdul-Zahra Kadhim, 37, a Shiite from the southern city of Hillah who was killed in the fighting. Some Iraqi reports said he wanted to unleash violence to force the return of the "Hidden Imam," a descendant of the Prophet Muhammad who disappeared as a child in the 9th century.

Shiites believe the Hidden Imam will return to restore peace and justice to the world at a time when the Muslim community is in the gravest danger. Some officials suggested the leader considered himself the Hidden Imam.

In Basra, a Shiite cleric said the "Soldiers of Heaven" is the armed wing of a movement led by Ahmed bin al-Hassan al-Baghdadi, an obscure Shiite cleric also known as al-Yamani. The movement believes the return of the Hidden Imam is imminent. The cleric spoke on condition of anonymity because he did not want to be identified with Shiite factionalism.

Little is known about al-Baghdadi, who is believed to be from the southern city of Diwaniyah and who, according to some clerics, has told his followers he is in touch with the Hidden Imam. Some clerics said he founded his movement about eight years ago and has several thousands followers in southern Iraq.

Iraqi authorities said they became concerned about the cult when an informant told them last week that it was about to launch attacks during Tuesday's festival of Ashoura. They planned to slip into Najaf with the hundreds of thousands of pilgrims that descend on shrine cities for Shiite festivals.

The alleged plot was reminiscent of the 1979 attack in which Sunni extremists seized the Grand Mosque in Mecca, Saudi Arabia, the holiest site in Islam, taking hundreds of pilgrims hostage to protest alleged corruption in the Saudi royal family. Saudi forces stormed the mosque two weeks later, killing hundreds.

U.S. officials praised the role of Iraqi soldiers, most of whom are Shiite forces, for confronting Shiite gunmen.

"The aggressive manner in which the Iraqi soldiers performed north of Najaf going after the anti-Iraqi forces was impressive," Col. Michael Garrett, commander of the 4th Brigade Combat Team (Airborne), 25th Infantry Division, said in a statement.

Clearly, however, the Iraqis underestimated the Najaf cultists.

Units from the Iraqi army, police and the paramilitary national police went to the group's hide-out 12 miles northeast of Najaf early Sunday but came under a ferocious attack, according to Iraqi authorities. The Iraqis called for air support, and U.S. and British jets responded.

DOJ_NMG_0124968

Still, the cultists could not be dislodged. Reinforcements from Iraq's elite Scorpion Brigade and the U.S. Army's 25th Division were sent to the fight. A U.S. Army helicopter was shot down, and the two American crew members were killed. Fighting continued until before dawn Monday, nearly 24 hours after the clash.

The deputy governor of Najaf, Abdul-Hussein Abtan, said Tuesday that more than 300 militants were killed and about 650 were arrested. Eleven Iraqi troops were killed and 30 wounded, he said.

The Shiite-dominated government maintains the cult had links to al-Qaida in Iraq, which seems unusual considering the Sunni group's hatred of Shiites as heretics and collaborators with the U.S.

Nevertheless, the "Soldiers of Heaven" may have had ties to Saddam Hussein loyalists. Najaf officials said they were camped on land owned by a Saddam supporter. The area was once under the control of the al-Quds army, a force raised by Saddam in the 1990s.

It was unclear whether any former al-Quds members, who would have received extensive military training, were part of the cult.

In any case, it appears that the fighting had little to do with either the Sunni-led insurgency or the sectarian bloodletting between Shiites and Sunnis in the Baghdad area. More likely, the battle stemmed from rivalries within the Shiite community, which have led to armed clashes in the past in major southern cities.

Those internal tensions may increase if the Iraqi government bows to U.S. pressure and cracks down on Shiite militias.

"It seems most likely that this was Shiite-on-Shiite violence, with millenarian cultists making an attempt to march on Najaf during the chaos of the ritual season," Juan Cole, a Shiite scholar at the University of Michigan, said on his Web site. "The dangers of Shiite-on-Shiite violence in Iraq are substantial, as this episode demonstrated."

Remnants Show Cult Was Prepared, Organized (LAT)

By Saad Fakhrildeen And Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, January 31, 2007

ZERGHA, Iraq -- The dead wore the same footwear, imitation leather dress shoes with Velcro flaps. Their mangled bodies filled the trenches. Bags of ammunition, with the names of fighters written on them, sat by their sides.

A pulpit made of bamboo stood next to a grassy field, a newspaper filled with rambling religious writing strewn nearby.

An unauthorized hour-long walk Tuesday through the bombed remnants of a religious cult called Heaven's Army revealed provocative clues about group, which was decimated Sunday in a 24-hour U.S. and Iraqi offensive that authorities say left 263 alleged members dead and 210 injured. Nearly 400 members also were arrested, an Iraqi defense official said.

Iraqi officials said the group was poised to launch an attack on clergy and holy sites in Najaf in the belief that it would hasten the dawn of a new age. Iraqi officials said they got wind of the plan and attempted to investigate but were attacked by the group's gunmen in a battle that also killed five Iraqi troops and two U.S. soldiers, who died when their helicopter crashed.

The bulk of the damage to the base was inflicted by U.S. airstrikes, which turned the tide of a ground battle led by Iraqi troops backed by U.S. forces.

Iraqi officials have released scant new details about the composition and aims of the group. Mohammad Askari, a spokesman for the Ministry of Defense, said foreign Arabs were among the Iraqi dead and captured but declined to provide more than basic casualty figures.

But amid lush groves of eucalyptus and palm trees, the camp itself offered a trove of details about the followers of Heaven's Army.

They had plenty of food. Each fighter, many of their bodies lying charred and disfigured, had a supply of chocolate and biscuits. They were prepared: A six-foot dirt berm and an equally deep trench surrounded the 50-acre compound.

They were well-organized. Living in at least 30 cement-block buildings, all the alleged fighters had identification badges. The group published books and a newspaper. They apparently were enamored with their leader, a charismatic, black-turbaned man in his 30s named Dhiya Abdul-Zahra, whose likeness adorned the newspaper.

And they were well-armed and ready for battle. High-powered machine guns, anti-aircraft rockets, mortars, rocket-propelled grenades and late-model pickup trucks with mounted guns were scattered around the eight farms that comprised the compound, about 10 miles north of Najaf.

A wooden platform on a tree served as a sniper outpost. The would-be shooter lay dead on the ground by the tree trunk.

"Without the bombings of the Americans we would have remained for two weeks unable to penetrate," said an Iraqi soldier, who led journalists through the devastated compound.

Except for the identical shoes, none of the fighters wore uniforms. They wrapped black-checkered scarves around their necks and walked around in running suits and flowing dishdasha gowns. Their bodies were contorted and burned in the bombing campaign. A few were blown to pieces. The fighters included young boys as well as middle-aged men Some apparently held day jobs -- one of the dead fighters, Ahmad Mohsen Kadhem, 31, had an identification card in his wallet showing he was authorized to carry weapons as a guard for a nearby company, the government-owned State Organization for Cereals.

DOJ_NMG_0124969

Arabic readers described the articles in the group's eight-page newspaper, "Al-Bayan," or "The Statement," as little more than religiously inflected gibberish, with made-up words and references to "manifestations and sightings" of the Imam Mahdi, the last in a line of Shiite saints worshipped by Shiites.

A book found at the complex, called "Heaven's Judge," also bearing the picture of Abdul-Zahra, dismisses the teaching of Shiite Muslims as well as Sunnis. "The Shiites are misled," said the book, which refutes central tenets of Shiite theology.

"The house of the Prophet Mohammad has adopted a path using signs to point to heavenly facts, a method for considering the order of secrets," it added, in statements that perplexed Shiite and Sunnis who read it.

Special correspondent Fakhrildeen reported from Zergha and staff writer Daragahi from Baghdad.

Reports Fault Oversight Of Iraq Police Program (WP)

By Griff Witte And Renae Merle

The Washington Post, January 31, 2007

The U.S. government has squandered millions of dollars intended for police training programs in Iraq because of rampant problems overseeing contractors, according to federal reviews released yesterday.

In one case, contractors building a camp for American trainers constructed an Olympic-size swimming pool that hadn't been ordered. In another, human waste reportedly continues to leak from plumbing fixtures at a barracks for Iraqi police recruits, a year after the problem was first identified and despite assurances from the contractor that the problem was being fixed.

Together, the reports offer a revealing glimpse at one aspect of the $38 billion American-led reconstruction effort. The police training program has been repeatedly flagged by U.S. officials as particularly crucial to the war effort, given the need for effective Iraqi security forces to take over from the U.S. military. While yesterday's reports by the special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction do not address the training itself, they do find major flaws with how both the government and its contractors attempted to build the program's facilities.

The flaws, auditors concluded, all had common roots: The government's failure to monitor how contractors were spending taxpayer money.

But the two contracts reviewed by the special inspector general's staff produced vastly different types of problems. One of the contracts called on Falls Church-based DynCorp International to build a camp to house its trainers. Auditors found that the company performed $4.2 million worth of work that had not been authorized by the contract, including building the pool and 20 VIP trailers at the behest of Iraqi officials. Because of security concerns, the camp was never used.

At the $73 million Baghdad Police College, meanwhile, inspectors uncovered numerous examples of shoddy construction, including ones that pose potential health problems to Iraqi recruits. The problems, some of which were first reported publicly in September, had still not been fixed when inspectors returned to the site months later for follow-up inspections. Auditors said the contractor, California-based Parsons, knew about the plumbing problems as early as a year ago but failed to correct them.

"As a result, the unsanitary conditions continue," the report said.

Parsons was ultimately paid $5.3 million for substandard work, auditors found. The Army Corps of Engineers will also be paid -- up to $2.5 million -- for monitoring Parsons's work, even though auditors said its oversight was "essentially non-existent."

The inspector general's office said it would begin to investigate evidence of potential fraud connected to the project.

In response to the report, the corps said in a statement that it is "making steady progress on completing warranty repairs related to the sewer, water and electrical systems" at the police college.

In a written exchange, the corps also challenged some of the auditors' findings, contending that in one instance the leaking liquid identified as human waste was actually "dirt-filled fresh water."

Officials in the special inspector general's office replied that regardless of what the liquid is, the corps "needs to realize that the plumbing system is not only tremendously flawed, but the cadets may be supplied with hazardous water."

James F. McNulty, chief executive of Parsons, said in a statement that the company's work had been hampered by security concerns. "Extremely difficult security conditions factored significantly into problems that occurred, and we worked to fix the problems as soon as we learned about them," he said.

Parsons, a $3 billion-a-year construction and engineering firm, had been one of the United States' largest contractors in Iraq. The company's work first came under scrutiny last spring, when the special inspector general's office reported that the company would complete only a small fraction of the 150 health clinics it was tasked to build. The focus on Parsons intensified in the fall, when the special inspector general's office blamed the company and the corps for problems at the police college.

At a congressional hearing in September, a Parsons executive, Earnest Robbins II, testified that the problems at the college would be fixed. "We are repairing it at no cost to the government," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0124970

The company left the repairs to an Iraqi subcontractor, which it blamed for botching the job in the first place. In yesterday's report, however, auditors also found fault with Parsons's designs, which they said did not include enough detail to allow subcontractors to do the work properly.

In its review of work under DynCorp's $1.8 billion State Department contract, the special inspector general found that the department's lax oversight led it to pay $43.8 million for a residential camp for DynCorp trainers that has never been used.

Some of the work on the camp, including the pool and VIP trailers, was requested by the Iraqi Interior Ministry but was never authorized by U.S. officials.

The State Department ordered work on the project stopped in September 2004, shortly after issuing the contract, because of concerns that the location was too dangerous for DynCorp's trainers. DynCorp initially told the department that the camp had already been completed, but more than a year later said it wasn't.

In 2005, a State Department official became concerned about "potential fraud" regarding DynCorp's billing for 500 trailers that may have never been built. Yesterday's report said the investigation is ongoing.

The department also can't account for $36.4 million of weapons and equipment, including armored vehicles and body armor, because DynCorp's invoices were vague, the report said. "DynCorp invoices were frequently ambiguous and lacked the level of detail necessary to identify what was procured," the report said.

A State Department official said the agency initially became concerned about the contract in 2005 and has revamped its contracting practices for work in Iraq, Afghanistan and Jordan. According to the report, the department is reviewing all of DynCorp's contracts and identified a $1.1 million billing error earlier this month.

"We haven't been contacted about the information in this report," said Greg Lagana, a DynCorp spokesman, "but we believe that any investigation or audit will show that the company acted responsibly and with concern for the expenditure of public funds. Of course, should there be any audit or investigation, we will cooperate fully and openly."

Iraq's Refugees (NYT)

The New York Times, January 31, 2007

To calculate the price that Iraqis have paid for the American misadventure in their country, you have to deal in big, round, horrifying numbers. Civilians killed last year: 34,000. Driven from their homes within Iraq: 1.8 million. Fled to other countries: an additional 2 million, and growing. The number of Iraqis who have found refuge in the United States is easier to pin down. This country has admitted a grand total of 466 Iraqi refugees since 2003.

However President Bush tries to manage the endgame of his dismal war, America has an obligation to the Iraqis whose lives it has upended. It owes a particular debt to those who have faced incredible dangers working with American forces as interpreters, guides and contractors. These allies — and their families — have become a haunted and hunted group, branded as traitors and targeted for kidnapping and assassination by insurgents and militias.

By any measure, the Bush administration is failing them. The current price tag for the war is $8 billion a month, yet the State Department plans to spend only $20 million in the coming fiscal year to help shelter Iraqi refugees overseas and to resettle them here. A special visa program to resettle Iraqi and Afghan military translators has been capped at 50 people a year and has a six-year waiting list.

Of all the Vietnam-era mistakes the country has been repeating lately, indifference to refugees is especially unforgivable. The administration can start addressing the problem by devoting a far greater number of refugee slots — currently 70,000 a year — to people from Iraq and Afghanistan. It can streamline entry procedures, which should be a manageable task for those who have already been vetted to work with the United States military.

It should move quickly to organize a conference with Iraq's neighbors to discuss ways to cope better with the human suffering and the potentially destabilizing effects of the rising human tide. And it should answer an urgent appeal for funds by the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, which is seeking $60 million over the next 12 months to shelter and protect displaced Iraqis.

Does it really need to be said yet again that in these perilous times the way to win trustworthy allies is to be one?

Pentagon's Covert Activities Come Under Senate Scrutiny (WSJ)

By Scot J. Paltrow

The Wall Street Journal, January 31, 2007

Congress's new Democratic majority is expanding its review of the Bush administration's push for broad executive power, as the Senate is set to look into how the Pentagon has increased its covert intelligence operations.

DOJ_NMG_0124971

Lawmakers plan to study whether the Pentagon obtained the proper authorization for covert operations and notified Congress as required under the law. The inquiry will also explore whether the Pentagon engaged in activities that legally are the responsibility of the Central Intelligence Agency.

The hearings, to be conducted by the Senate Intelligence Committee beginning March 1, stem from concerns of some lawmakers, particularly Democrats, about an expansion of Defense Department intelligence actions under former Secretary Donald Rumsfeld. Critics have said the effort amounts to building a parallel intelligence network that competes with the CIA, but without the broader oversight under which the CIA operates.

Republican congressional leaders had overruled previous efforts by some lawmakers to investigate the expansion, but they lost control of Congress this month. Sen. Jay Rockefeller (D., W.Va.), the panel's new chairman, has supported such a review and scheduled the hearing.

While the hearings will focus on military covert activity abroad, congressional Democrats and some Republicans also are interested in domestic intelligence activities launched by the Pentagon and other federal agencies since the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks. The new activities include data-mining and domestic warrantless wiretapping. Critics say they threaten privacy and civil liberties. The Senate Judiciary Committee, under its new chairman, Patrick Leahy (D., Vt.), held two hearings this month on these activities. People involved with the Intelligence panel's plans said the hearing witnesses likely will include new Defense Secretary Robert Gates.

Mr. Rumsfeld cited the post-9/11 terrorist threat as justification for broadening defense intelligence activities. The Pentagon established a Counterintelligence Field Activity unit, which has been criticized for collecting data on U.S. citizens. It also created undercover teams from the Defense Intelligence Agency and military Special Operations forces to conduct operations overseas.

So far, however, the Pentagon appears to have been able to conduct those operations without the formal steps required of other U.S. intelligence agencies before covert action.

Traditionally, covert actions overseas have been the task of the CIA. They entail activities such as secret attempts to capture or kill suspected terrorists and propaganda campaigns. One question to be explored during the hearings will be whether the Pentagon's secret operations may have violated a federal law that requires a written presidential finding and notification of the congressional intelligence committees when a covert action is to be carried out.

A November 2006 report by congressional researchers concluded that there was reason to question whether the Pentagon was trying to evade the requirements of the law. That law was adopted in response to congressional concerns about the Iran-Contra affair in the mid-1980s, when the Reagan administration secretly sold arms to Iran, and used the proceeds to fund an anticommunist Nicaraguan insurgency. The changes strengthened requirements for presidential findings and notification of the intelligence committees.

Under Mr. Rumsfeld, the Pentagon contended that its new activities don't fall under the law's definition of "covert actions." Instead, as the Congressional Research Service report notes, it claimed exemption from the requirements because it said the new secret operations carried out by military personnel in Afghanistan, Iraq and elsewhere amount to traditional military activities intended to help prepare for battle.

The law, added in 1991 as a new section of the National Security Act of 1947, defines covert activity as action by the U.S. government "to influence political, economic, or military conditions abroad, where it is intended that the role of the United States Government will not be apparent or acknowledged publicly."

Except under unusual circumstances, the law requires the president to sign a finding beforehand to authorize a covert action, attesting that it supports specific foreign-policy goals and is important to national security.

Former Army Lt. Gen. William Odom, now at the Hudson Institute, said oversight is important partly because such operations easily can go awry, causing unintended results and diplomatic embarrassment for the U.S. "Rumsfeld just ran loose," he said, adding, "You have to have a system where you hold people accountable for making the decisions."

Mr. Rumsfeld has said the expanded intelligence activities by the Pentagon were vital to the global war on terrorism. Gen. Odom also noted recent complaints from CIA officials that covert actions were taking place in countries where local CIA station chiefs knew nothing about them. The Pentagon's press office didn't respond to repeated requests for comment.

With Gratitude In Every Stitch (WP)

By Jura Koncius

The Washington Post, January 31, 2007

The carefully packed boxes stack up daily in the chaplain's quarters at Walter Reed Army Medical Center, about 50 a week. The instructions read simply: "Please give this to a soldier." Chaplain John L. Kallerson, an Army major, gently opens each one and places the contents around his windowless office. Then he lays his big hands on the piles and says a blessing.

His is the ministry of the quilts.

DOJ_NMG_0124972

A phone call to the chaplain four years ago has created a national movement to say thank you to soldiers wounded in the war on terror.

More than 7,900 "comfort quilts," each carefully stitched with love and gratitude, have been sent through the Quilts of Valor Foundation to the wounded soldiers at Walter Reed and 70 other U.S. military medical centers. Kallerson prays over and hands out quilts from church groups, schoolchildren, quilting bees. Quilts made from accomplished artists whose designs sell for thousands. Quilts with bears, fish, basketballs. Quilts with hot-pink flowers for wounded women.

Amish and Mennonites have sent them anonymously. Children at the Colorado School for the Deaf and the Blind have created Braille quilts for soldiers who have lost their sight. Some donors, such as Native Americans who sent quilts bearing warrior symbols, have requested that their quilts be given to kindred spirits. Many have special messages: "You are our hero." "You are very brave."

Some arrive with letters, tapes or prayers.

"This is a gift from the heartland," Kallerson said. "Soldiers get CD players and iPods and DVDs, but this is the greatest gift of all. It comes from people's hearts. This is a simple thank you for your service."

Deborah Francisco, a defense contractor from St. Leonard, spent a year making one with the black and gold Army 1st Cavalry logo. "I hope the soldier who got it feels like someone is thinking of him," Francisco said.

This is how it got started: An accomplished Delaware quilter, Catherine Roberts, contacted Kallerson. She wanted to sew a blue and white Ohio Star quilt and donate it to a wounded service member. For every soldier killed, she knew there were 10 wounded.

"I had this vision in my head of a soldier waking up with horrible flashbacks," said Roberts, 57, a midwife and a quilter for 25 years. "I saw him wrapping himself up in a quilt."

Kallerson talks to a lot of people who want to donate things, but the hospital doesn't have the space or staff to handle them. Still, he was intrigued by Roberts's offer. He had someone in mind, an amputee from Minnesota, who was experiencing phantom pain. He gratefully received the quilt.

Then Roberts realized that she needed to reach more soldiers. "I got all my quilting people together and told them we had to start making quilts for all the wounded. Plenty of people were sending goggles and rat traps and things like that to the soldiers in the war, and there were programs for the families of our fallen heroes. But I didn't see anything targeting service members who had been wounded."

She put out the word online to the 19 million-strong quilting community. E-mails started flooding back. "Many quilters remembered Vietnam days," said Roberts, whose son, Nathanael Vinbury, served a year with the Army in Iraq. "They didn't want our troops coming back to that kind of reception."

Today, comfort quilts are part of the fabric of life at Walter Reed, helping to humanize the 308 government-issue beds, overlit hallways and hushed visitors lounges. As soldiers are wheeled to physical therapy or the endless tests, there is a rush of color from hand-stitched covers as they roll by. Many of the 600 wounded who come in daily for outpatient treatment have quilts folded under their legs or tucked around their bodies. Soldiers clutching the quilts have turned up at inaugural balls and Army-Navy football games.

Daniel Peters, 22, an Army combat engineer from Goffstown, N.H., received his red, white and blue quilt three months ago. It rarely leaves his side. "I use it every day to prop up my foot," he said. All the toes on his right foot were severed in Afghanistan when the Taliban shot a rocket under his Humvee; he has had surgery to reattach them.

"It brought him a lot of comfort," said his mother, Beverly Peters. "It showed him that someone cared."

Quilting has been part of wartime America since the early 19th century. "It's always been in the nature of quilters to have the urge to make something to cover soldiers, warm them and give them comfort," said Karey Bresenhan, a nationally known quilting expert and co-founder of the Alliance for American Quilts.

During the Civil War, soldiers used quilts as bedrolls. Supporters of the Union Army banded together to send quilts to their men, and Southern women cut up their dresses to make quilts for Confederate soldiers. The Smithsonian's National Museum of American History has 400 quilts in its collection, including one made in 1863 by Mrs. Gilbert Pullan's Sunday school in Augusta, Maine, for Union soldiers in Washington hospitals. The Maine quilt is inscribed with Bible quotations, recipes for medicines and jokes.

In World War I, the Red Cross sold quilts, and in World War II quilts were sent to Europe to be given out to the wounded.

Today, soldiers aren't taking quilts to war as much as using them during recovery. Kallerson conducts his wartime ministry from a cart. He loads it up and wheels it down Walter Reed's halls. If men are skeptical about receiving a quilt, he approaches their wives or mothers. Many soldiers ask if the quilt is free. "They are shocked that someone has gone to the trouble of making this for them," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0124973

Eric Frazier, 20, of Altamont, Tenn., a Marine lance corporal, doesn't even remember choosing a quilt because he was on morphine. He was wounded in October in Fallujah and lost both legs, one above the knee and one below, and suffered a head injury. "He could have chosen a pink one, he was so out of it," said his father, Kary Frazier. Eric's quilt is waiting for him at home, on his bed.

One person sent a Purple Heart quilt. Kallerson handed it to a decorated double amputee. "He told me he wasn't sure he deserved it," Kallerson recalled. "I thought if you don't deserve a quilt, then I don't know who does."

Some of the quilts are becoming family heirlooms to be passed down to future generations.

Quilting groups across the country have used Roberts's Web site -- http://www.qovf.org-- as a clearinghouse for information on comfort quilts. Roberts has made it possible for the groups that piece together quilt tops to connect with longarmers, people who own large machines that efficiently stitch the tops to batting and a backing. Hand quilters can take hours and hours to do this; by machine it takes three to 20 hours, depending on the design.

Lisa Langlais, a longarmer from Springfield, said she has donated her services for more than 60 quilts, including 30 she pieced herself. Longarmers can make $75 to $400 for machine-finishing a quilt.

Langlais has never met any of the service members who have received her quilts.

"This is an anonymous project," she said. "I don't expect a thank-you card. I just put all of my good, positive thoughts in the quilt."

Kallerson has personally distributed 3,069 quilts. "One father brought me to tears," he said. "He brought a quilt back to me because his son did not survive."

Kallerson placed the quilt back into the father's hands.

DOJ:

Whistleblower Complaint Filed Against DOJ Civil Rights Division (LAW)

By Jason McLure, Legal Times

Legal Times, January 31, 2007

The Justice Department's Civil Rights Division has seen its share of turmoil in recent years, owing at least in part to changes initiated under former Attorney General John Ashcroft that shifted line-attorney hiring decisions to political appointees.

Now one of the conservatives brought in by former acting Assistant Attorney General Bradley Schlozman has filed a whistleblower complaint with the Office of Special Counsel, charging he was wrongfully fired by the DOJ for complaining about what he calls the "toxic work atmosphere" in the special litigation section of the Civil Rights Division -- an office responsible for investigating civil-rights abuses in law enforcement and prisons and protecting access to abortion clinics.

Ty Clevenger, 37, a former Washington Times reporter and line attorney in the section who was fired in October, has accused veteran Section Chief Shanetta Cutlar of being "abusive toward attorneys and support staff," specifically those hired by Schlozman.

Among Clevenger's allegations: Secretaries were ordered not to assist him with an eight-hour typing project, another attorney was publicly berated for using a paper clip rather than a binder clip on a document and an intern was reprimanded for not greeting Cutlar while passing her in the hallway.

In his whistleblower complaint, Clevenger included a copy of a statement by the intern, Deborah Meiners, 24, to a DOJ ombudsman about the hallway incident.

"I did get the sense that this was a common occurrence," says Meiners, now a third-year law student, of her treatment.

As for Clevenger, he says he decided to go public (the complaint was first posted on the blog Above the Law) after his attempts to get traction with Cutlar's superiors failed.

"Even after I was fired, I called some of my friends in DOJ who are political appointees, and I said, 'Let's not make things ugly,' " says Clevenger, now in private practice in College Station, Texas.

Cutlar's office referred questions to a DOJ spokeswoman, who issued a statement saying the department is looking into the allegations.

Arizona's U.S. Attorney Joining Mass Exodus (AZREP)

By Dennis Wagner And Billy House, The Arizona Republic

Arizona Republic, January 31, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0124974

U.S. Attorney Paul Charlton leaves office today as Arizona's top federal prosecutor amid a cloud of controversy over whether he was forced out by the Justice Department along with a number of colleagues nationwide during a political purge by the Bush administration.

Charlton has been mum since saying last month that he was quitting to become a partner at a private Phoenix firm.

At least 10 U.S. attorneys have announced plans to leave office in recent months, some admittedly forced out. Those events have prompted Sen. Charles Schumer, D-NY, to convene a Judiciary Committee hearing next week. The agenda title: "Is the DOJ Politicizing the Hiring and Firing of U.S. Attorneys?"

"The highly unusual recent flurry of firings of many well-respected U.S. attorneys not only raises some flags, but also requires some explanations from the administration," Schumer said in a written statement. Other lawmakers note that U.S. attorneys are responsible for taking the lead on public corruption cases.

In a speech this month on the Senate floor, Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., said: "At a time when we are talking about toughening the consequences for public corruption, we should change the law to ensure that our top prosecutors who are taking on these cases are free from interference or the appearance of impropriety."

In Arizona, two U.S. House members, Republicans Rick Renzi and Jim Kolbe, were the focus of initial inquiries by Charlton's office last year. No findings from either inquiry have been announced. Kolbe has retired.

During a Senate subcommittee hearing this month, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales flatly denied that any resignation resulted from political maneuvering. But Feinstein claimed in her Jan. 16 floor speech that she was told the Justice Department was dumping top prosecutors so Gonzales could appoint replacements without Senate oversight.

"To date I know of at least seven U.S. attorneys forced to resign without cause, without any allegations of misconduct," Feinstein said, listing Charlton among them.

There are 93 U.S. attorneys in the nation and its territories, responsible for enforcing federal criminal laws and representing the government in civil litigation. They serve at the pleasure of the president and are installed for four-year terms that may be extended. Typically, they are replaced when a new political party takes over the White House. Nominations are made by the president and confirmed by the Senate.

Under a little-known provision of the USA Patriot Act, however, the appointment authority for interim U.S. attorneys was shifted to the attorney general, who may assign replacements without Senate scrutiny or approval.

Gonzales insisted during the subcommittee hearing that he is "fully committed" to seeing that every new U.S. attorney is appointed by the president and confirmed by the Senate.

Democrats have introduced a bill that would reverse the Patriot Act provision and set a 120-day limit on interim appointments.

Questions about the resignations arose after Bud Cummins quit as U.S. attorney in eastern Arkansas and was promptly replaced by J. Timothy Griffin, a 34-year-old former aide to Bush political adviser Karl Rove. In Arizona, Charlton surprised his staff last month with news that he was leaving his federal post after five years to join the Phoenix firm of Gallagher and Kennedy, where his wife also works.

Wyn Hornbuckle, an office spokesman, said there is no alternative explanation. Diane Humetewa, an assistant U.S. attorney and Hopi tribal member, has been recommended by Arizona's two U.S. senators to replace Charlton but has not been nominated for that position.

Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said 11 U.S. attorneys have quit since the appointment authority changed in March 2006. To date, five of those positions have been filled, three by nominees who were confirmed.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Is The DOJ's New Policy On Prosecuting Corporations Real Reform Or Business As Usual? (LAW)

By Abbe D. Lowell, Christopher Man And Obiamaka P. Okwumabua, Special to Law.com

Law.com, January 31, 2007

For the third time in seven years, the U.S. Justice Department has issued a new policy for investigating and charging corporations.

Now, what will be called the McNulty Memorandum (named for Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty, who announced it) will be added to the Thompson and Holder Memoranda (also named for the deputy attorneys general who announced them) in the ever-evolving attempt by the DOJ to get it right.

Putting aside whether the whole idea of prosecuting corporations (versus the people within a company who commit the alleged wrongdoing) makes any sense at all (many countries have no process for charging companies), the question is whether the newest policy has changed anything.

Particularly after the Justice Department implemented the earlier Thompson Memorandum's policy on charging companies, there was vocal criticism from the defense bar that government tactics -- such as encouraging companies to fire suspected employees, requiring waiver of the company's attorney-client privileges and cutting off attorney fees for targeted employees -- were strong-arm measures that violated constitutional rights.

The DOJ had this awesome power because the threat to companies of the stigma of prosecution (e.g., KPMG) or of winning the battle only to lose the war (e.g., Arthur Andersen) was grave. To avoid such dire consequences, companies all too readily opened their confidential files and, in effect, did the prosecutors' job by investigating themselves and giving the government the results. Despite the presumption of innocence, companies then fired any employee suspected or named by the prosecutors and cut off their defense fees to avoid a corporate death sentence that could result merely from being charged. These actions often led the employees caught in the crossfire to enter plea bargains, not because they truly felt they had violated the law but because they could not fight both the prosecutors and their employers.

It was not until a federal judge in New York in the KPMG case said the government "let its zeal get in the way of its judgment" and that its actions "held the proverbial gun to [defendants'] heads" that prosecutors' actions became more widely reviewed. For example, Sen. Arlen Specter introduced legislation to stop what he called abusive prosecutorial tactics. Only in the face of forced change did the DOJ issue a new policy in an attempt to police itself. But, the proposed self-restraint may be a bit too little and a bit too late.

The way the government asserted the power it had over companies was to evaluate whether to charge a company (and likely put it out of business) based on that company's "cooperation." And, this cooperation often was measured by how broad the company's waiver of privileges was, how quickly it fired those involved and how many benefits, like attorney fees, it would take from those former employees. Too many companies were all too willing to do all that was asked (and more) to survive and avoid prosecution.

The McNulty Memorandum addresses two of the most frequent charges of abuse that have been leveled against the department -- the requirement of privilege waiver and denial of attorney fees. The new memorandum states that neither tactic should be employed by prosecutors as a general matter in the evaluation of whether a company has cooperated or should be charged. Yet, the "change" is in degree and not to the tactics themselves. The department is not disclaiming its ability to use either form of pressure but is simply declaring that it will do so more sparingly. The department's message to the business and legal community is "trust us." But when such a message is delivered by the same people who betrayed such trust by engaging in egregious conduct in the first place, the department will have to demonstrate that the McNulty Memorandum works in practice before its words will inspire much confidence.

The most significant problem with the McNulty Memorandum is that it speaks only to what the prosecutor can demand, but it does not place any meaningful limit on what the prosecutor can suggest. As we all know, a prosecutor's request or suggestion of what companies might do to be deemed cooperative can be heard by a company as what it has to do. While the new policy may rein in the rogue or overzealous prosecutor by requiring approval by a senior DOJ official before demanding a privilege waiver or fee cutoff, the policy does nothing to restrain Assistant U.S. Attorneys from making these requests more subtly. The pressure on corporations to accede to a prosecutor's "request" to waive privilege or to make life difficult for suspected employees is still too great so long as the practical reality of failing to do what the government wants is corporate suicide. Without an actual ban of these tactics, prosecutors can wink and nod, and companies will feel that the best way to avoid indictment is to do that which the government used to demand directly. There will be no way for this now sub rosa pressure to be exposed. Exchanges between prosecutors and corporations will now say all the right words, and it will be harder for well-intentioned DOJ supervisors and judges to scrutinize the pressure on corporations that was once overt but is now implicit.

While the department should be commended for recognizing a need for a shift in policy, the problems it seeks to redress may not be solved by the precatory approach the McNulty Memorandum has adopted. If the DOJ is not ready to actually ban strong-arm tactics that violate constitutional rights, then it will have to go a long way in supervising prosecutors to show that a real change has occurred. Otherwise, the new policy will be a press conference and fanfare without any real substance or reform, and it will be back to business as usual.

Abbe D. Lowell is a partner, and Christopher Man and Obiamaka P. Okwumabua are senior associates, in the special investigations and white-collar litigation group in the Washington, D.C., office of Chadbourne & Parke. They can be reached at (202) 974-5600 or via e-mail: adlowell@chadbourne.com, cman@chadbourne.com and ookwumabua@chadbourne.com.

WIDENING SCANDAL At Siemens, Witnesses Cite Pattern Of Bribery (WSJ)

By David Crawford And Mike Esterl

The Wall Street Journal, January 31, 2007

One day in early 2004, senior Siemens AG executive Michael Kutschenreuter says, he got a disturbing phone call from a Saudi Arabian businessman.

The caller said he represented Beit Al Etisallat, a Saudi consulting firm that had been a business partner of Siemens. Now Beit wanted $910 million in commission payments. If Siemens didn't pay up, the caller threatened, he would forward documents to the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission detailing bribes paid on the German industrial giant's behalf to win telecommunications contracts in the kingdom.

Mr. Kutschenreuter says he alerted his superiors, including Klaus Kleinfeld, now the chief executive of Siemens, and Heinrich von Pierer, the CEO at the time. Mr. Kutschenreuter also says that with the backing of the Siemens management board, he reached a deal in January 2005 to pay Beit Al Etisallat $50 million. He says that $17 million was for past obligations and the rest was what he describes as "hush money" to make the problem go away.

It hasn't. Mr. Kutschenreuter was arrested in November as part of a widening criminal investigation that has shaken the foundations of the storied 160-year-old German conglomerate. Mr. Kutschenreuter and five other suspects were released from custody before Christmas after agreeing to cooperate with German prosecutors.

Prosecutors suspect that Siemens officials diverted funds through sham consulting contracts to slush funds to bribe potential customers over several years. Since police raids made the probe public, Siemens says it has uncovered €420 million ($544 million) in suspicious transactions spanning seven years and has ordered an external audit. Investigators now are trying to determine how far up the corporate ladder the corruption traveled.

Mr. Kutschenreuter is their star witness. If allegations by him and others pan out, Siemens could find itself barred from bidding for public-sector projects in many of the nearly 200 countries in which it is active. Mr. Kutschenreuter's lawyer declined to discuss the details of the witness statement but said investigators consider his client to be a reliable witness. The Munich prosecutor's office said the investigation is continuing and declined to discuss details of it. Police are looking into the veracity of Mr. Kutschenreuter's allegations.

Siemens suspended Mr. Kutschenreuter after his arrest and says its payments to Beit Al Etisallat were perfectly legitimate. Siemens says that it is cooperating with authorities and that any wrongdoing was confined to "individual acts" by renegade managers.

Arrest warrants and detailed witness statements by company executives, including Mr. Kutschenreuter, suggest a different story. The statements, reviewed by The Wall Street Journal, depict a company where payment of bribes was common and highly organized. The statements portray top Siemens executives as scrambling to escape detection while prosecutors from neighboring countries drew an ever-tighter net.

The allegations come at a difficult time for Siemens, which manufactures a wide range of products from power turbines and medical scanners to light bulbs. CEO Mr. Kleinfeld has been restructuring its far-flung operations to narrow the focus and bring up profit margins. A plan to merge the bulk of Siemens's telecom-equipment business -- the main focus of the criminal investigation -- into a joint venture with Nokia Corp. has been delayed by the bribery investigation.

The case also underscores what critics say is German industry's failure to improve corporate governance. Until Germany toughened its corruption laws in 1999, companies were actually allowed to write off as expenses bribes paid abroad. DaimlerChrysler AG is under investigation by the SEC and the U.S. Justice Department for what the auto maker acknowledges were "improper payments" in Africa, Asia and Eastern Europe.

Last week, Siemens was hit with a roughly €400 million fine by the European Commission for leading a cartel that allegedly fixed prices in the market for electric-power switching gear. Siemens says the fine is unjustified and that it plans to fight the penalty.

In the potentially more damaging bribery investigation, Siemens says that while it's impossible to keep close watch over every one of its 480,000 employees, it knows of no wrongdoing by members of its current management or supervisory board. CEO Mr. Kleinfeld -- who prosecutors have so far said is only a witness, not a suspect -- says Siemens has "zero tolerance" for corruption. Mr. von Pierer also says he never engaged in illegal activity. Mr. von Pierer gave up the CEO post two years ago to head Siemens's supervisory board.

The highest-ranking executive arrested so far is Thomas Ganswindt, a member of the management board until last September. German prosecutors have also said that Heinz-Joachim Neubürger -- Siemens's chief financial officer until last April -- is a suspect. Mr. Ganswindt's lawyer said his client is not guilty. A lawyer for Mr. Neubürger declined to comment.

Mr. Kutschenreuter, in the witness statement made after his arrest, spread the blame far wider.

In the Beit Al Etisallat matter he described, Mr. Kutschenreuter said that a Siemens colleague of his met in London in early 2004 with the Saudi caller, Abdul Wahab Al-Akeel. According to the witness statement, the colleague returned to Munich with documents detailing bribes by Siemens from the late 1990s until early 2000. The payments allegedly were made to win contracts with Saudi Telecom to supply equipment for land-line and wireless communications networks.

The colleague said Beit Al Etisallat would settle for double-digit millions of dollars, according to Mr. Kutschenreuter -- who added in his witness statement that he informed Messrs. Kleinfeld, Neubürger and Ganswindt of the situation in writing on April 26, 2004. Mr. Kleinfeld then was the senior executive in charge of Siemens's telecom business, a unit in which Mr. Kutschenreuter then oversaw finances for land-line operations.

Siemens's legal department recommended negotiations with Beit Al Etisallat after seeing Mr. Al-Akeel's documents, according to Mr. Kutschenreuter's witness statement.

Mr. Kutschenreuter said he then received a call from Mr. von Pierer, the CEO at the time, asking his opinion. He said he told the CEO it would likely cost $50 million to settle with Beit Al Etisallat, a consulting firm that Siemens had dropped in favor of another Saudi firm in 2000.

Mr. Kutschenreuter said that he worked out the details over Christmas 2004 and the agreement to pay $50 million was routed through a Saudi arbitration court to formalize it. He said he informed Siemens's management board of the agreement in January 2005, just as Mr. Kleinfeld was about to replace Mr. von Pierer as CEO.

Mr. von Pierer said in a written response to questions that the settlement wasn't a bribe. He said Beit did outline $910 million in damages: a "completely arbitrary" $875 million for lost profit up to the year 2024; $19 million in past-due commission claims; and $14 million for damage to the claimant's reputation. In January 2005, Mr. von Pierer said, the sides agreed to settle the matter and certify the payment in a Riyadh court.

A spokesman for Mr. Al-Akeel and Beit Al Etisallat declined to comment on the Siemens negotiations. Executives at Saudi Telecom didn't return phone calls seeking comment.

In a written response, Mr. Kleinfeld gave the same version of events as Mr. von Pierer. "At no time did Mr. Kutschenreuter mention to me, that any 'Hush-Money' was involved in any settlement and at no time did I have any knowledge of documents relating to bribes and still have no such knowledge," he added in his emailed statement.

Mr. Kutschenreuter, 52 years old, joined the company in 1974 and was posted to Algeria in the late 1970s. After six years abroad, including a stint in Iraq, he returned to Germany in 1984 and took up a position in the sales department for telecom contracts in Africa and the Middle East.

Back at Munich headquarters, he told prosecutors, he learned of an encryption code he alleged was widely used at Siemens to itemize bribe payments. He said it was derived from the phrase "Make Profit," with the phrase's 10 letters corresponding to the numbers 1-2-3-4-5-6-7-8-9-0. Thus, with the letter A standing for 2 and P standing for 5, a reference to "file this in the APP file" meant a bribe was authorized at 2.55% of sales.

A spokesman for Siemens said it has no knowledge of a "Make Profit" encryption system.

In the mid-1990s Mr. Kutschenreuter worked on financing for power projects. In that role, he alleged, he witnessed bribe payments for power projects in Russia and Slovakia.

After moving to Siemens's information-technology division in 1999, Mr. Kutschenreuter said, he learned of bribes paid to Argentine government officials as Siemens competed for a contract to develop electronically scannable passports. He said the payments stopped after the Argentine government changed hands in late 2001, before the contract had been awarded.

Siemens says allegations of bribe payments in Russia, Slovakia and Argentina are false. A spokesman at the Argentine Embassy in Berlin declined to comment.

Mr. Kutschenreuter said he was personally involved in lots of bribe payments after becoming finance chief at the land-line telecom unit in early 2001. Though paying bribes abroad was illegal in Germany starting in 1999, many of his colleagues still saw them merely "as peccadilloes because it was all for the good of the company," he told prosecutors.

Two other former Siemens telecom executives have also described alleged bribes, in November statements to prosecutors reviewed by The Wall Street Journal. Reinhard Siekaczek and Andreas Mattes, onetime colleagues of Mr. Kutschenreuter, also said the bribes were carried out with the knowledge of senior managers.

Prosecutors have presented the three witness statements as evidence in the arraignment hearing of Mr. Ganswindt, the former management-board member. Mr. Ganswindt, like Messrs. Kutschenreuter and Siekaczek, was detained by authorities late last year and then released. Mr. Mattes wasn't detained.

Mr. Siekaczek, who worked at Siemens for four decades, said in his witness statement that he was asked to set up slush funds for bribes in 1999 or 2000. He described a bank account in Salzburg, Austria, through which he said more than €75 million in bribe funds flowed each year. In 2001, he alleged, Mr. Kutschenreuter warned him to shift funds elsewhere because Swiss authorities were following the trail of Austrian accounts linked to bribes in Nigeria.

DOJ_NMG_0124978

Mr. Siekaczek gave prosecutors a long list of other countries in which he alleged that bribes were paid to win business, including Egypt, Cameroon and Kazakhstan. A lawyer for Mr. Siekaczek, who left Siemens in 2004, declined to comment on specifics but said police have investigated his client's statements and found them reliable.

Mr. Mattes told prosecutors that a member of the telecom unit's management board told him in 2001 that bribes were commonly paid for securing big telecom projects. Mr. Mattes is now an executive at Hewlett-Packard Co. in the U.S., after leaving Siemens in 2005. His lawyer said Mr. Mattes met with investigators in November and stands by his testimony. The lawyer said his client is suspected of playing only a minor role in the alleged activity.

Messrs. Kutschenreuter and Siekaczek alleged in their statements that Joe Kaeser, now CFO at Siemens, was aware of bribes while overseeing the wireless telecom unit's finances from 2001 to 2004. Mr. Kutschenreuter also cast blame on two other former wireless executives: Rudi Lamprecht, now a member of Siemens's management board, and Lothar Pauly, who left in 2005 to join the management board of Deutsche Telekom AG.

Siemens said Messrs. Kaeser and Lamprecht weren't aware of any alleged bribes and did nothing wrong. A lawyer for Mr. Pauly said allegations of wrongdoing by his client are false.

Prosecutors say bribes became more elaborate after a tightening of money-laundering laws following the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks and also after investigators in Italy, Switzerland and Liechtenstein began circling.

Investigators say Siemens lawyers filed briefs to keep prosecutors from accessing bank records in some countries. Cuno Tarfuser, a prosecutor in the Italian city of Bolzano, said in an interview that his investigation of Austrian accounts was held up for months in 2004 and 2005 by legal challenges.

Siemens says that at no point did it try to prevent prosecutors from examining company-linked accounts. Siemens said that it has been cooperating with authorities for years.

A German arrest warrant for Mr. Siekaczek issued last November, and reviewed by The Wall Street Journal, mapped out how prosecutors suspect bribes were carried out in Egypt, Greece, Indonesia, Kuwait, Saudi Arabia and Vietnam from 2002 to 2004. It said that generally, after money was routed through at least three layers of secret accounts and shell companies, it was entrusted to "bag men" who carried bundles of cash to local "fixers." The fixers then organized the payoffs on behalf of Siemens.

In one case, prosecutors said in the arrest warrant, Mr. Siekaczek signed a consulting contract in July 2002 with Austrian firm Krhoma GmbH related to a project with Saudi Telecom. According to the arrest warrant, Siemens paid €4 million to Krhoma, which took a €60,000 commission before wiring the rest to a firm that was based in the British Virgin Islands and controlled by Mr. Siekaczek.

A lawyer for Krhoma GmbH said Krhoma wasn't involved in illegal activity.

Mr. Kutschenreuter told prosecutors that the chief executive of Siemens in Greece, Michael Christoforakos, told him in October 2004 the company had made illegal payments for an infrastructure project related to the 2004 Athens Olympics. Mr. Kutschenreuter said he informed other senior managers, including Messrs. Ganswindt and Neubürger, of the conversation.

Mr. Siekaczek's arrest warrant cited €1.83 million in suspicious transfers from Siemens to third parties in 2004 and alleged they were related to an Athens security-systems contract.

A Siemens spokeswoman in Greece said Mr. Christoforakos "has never mentioned anything to anybody concerning improper payments" related to the Olympics. She said he has met as a voluntary witness with Greek prosecutors, who are conducting a preliminary probe of the awarding of a security-systems contract. She said Siemens was a subcontractor and "there is no evidence of any wrongdoing or improper behavior whatsoever."

Mr. Kutschenreuter had a busy Christmas in 2004. In addition to trying to settle the Saudi matter, he told prosecutors, he got a call from Mr. Siekaczek telling him that Liechtenstein authorities were investigating certain bank accounts there. Again, Mr. Kutschenreuter alleged, senior management was informed.

Siemens later told Liechtenstein authorities that the accounts were its own, and asked prosecutors to end their investigation, according to Robert Wallner, the lead Liechtenstein prosecutor. The authorities continued to dig. At the same time, investigators in Switzerland, Italy and Austria were tracking separate leads on suspicious transactions flowing through other bank accounts tied to Siemens or people acting on its behalf.

This past November, armed with the information, more than 200 German police raided about 30 offices and homes of current and former Siemens employees. They searched offices of management-board members, including Mr. Kleinfeld, the CEO, and seized 36,000 documents. German prosecutors are sifting the material and questioning more people in a probe that could stretch for several more months or longer.

Mr. Kutschenreuter, who by the time of his arrest had moved on to Siemens's real-estate division, told prosecutors in December that he would cooperate because Mr. Kleinfeld had said he wanted to get to the bottom of the matter. "I can help him with that," he said in his witness statement.

DOJ_NMG_0124979

At the company's annual meeting in Munich last week, Mr. Kleinfeld said he was "shocked" when he heard the allegations of wrongdoing. "I can assure you that we are doing everything that we can to clear up these incidents completely," he said.

His predecessor, Mr. von Pierer, told the crowd of 10,000 restive shareholders that while serving as CEO for more than a decade, he had taken major steps to combat corruption. He added, "I am deeply distressed that these efforts were not successful enough."

Ex-Cendant Finance Chief Gets Three Years Probation (WSJ/AP)

The Wall Street Journal, January 31, 2007

BRIDGEPORT, Conn. -- A former Cendant Corp. chief financial officer was spared jail time Tuesday, becoming the final defendant sentenced in a massive accounting scandal that dragged on for nine years and three trials.

Cosmo Corigliano, who pleaded guilty to fraud, was sentenced to three years of probation, including six months of home confinement with electronic monitoring, and 300 hours of community service.

Mr. Corigliano, who fought back tears during the sentencing, apologized in U.S. District Court in Bridgeport and said he took full responsibility for his actions. "I realize it was very wrong," he said. "My one wish is I had clarity of mind."

Prosecutor Michael Martinez and Senior U.S. District Judge Alan H. Nevas said Mr. Corigliano played an indispensable role in the case and was the only cooperating witness who was able to implicate former Cendant Corp. Chairman Walter Forbes.

"Without your testimony, I don't think Walter Forbes could have been convicted," Judge Nevas said. "You were the only witness that was kind of inside the corporate hierarchy."

Judge Nevas also noted that Mr. Corigliano had paid $14 million to settle a case with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

The scandal surfaced in early 1998, causing Cendant's market value to drop by $14 billion in one day. It became the largest accounting fraud of the 1990s, authorities say. The fraud cost the travel and real-estate company and 119,000 investors more than $3 billion.

The Cendant case was among the first in a series of corporate accounting scandals that sparked outrage from investors in recent years. Prosecutors say the scheme inflated the stock of Cendant's predecessor, CUC International, by $500 million.

Mr. Forbes was sentenced to 12 years and seven months in prison, while Vice Chairman E. Kirk Shelton received a 10-year sentence. Both were ordered to pay $3.28 billion in restitution.

Mr. Corigliano, who faced between six and a half to slightly more than eight years in prison under sentencing guidelines, says he gave authorities an inside account of how the multibillion-dollar accounting fraud was conceived, directed and discussed among executives. Mr. Corigliano, former chief financial officer at CUC, testified that for years he drew up what he called "cheat sheets" to falsify profits.

Two other executives, Anne Pember and Casper Sabatino, were spared prison terms Monday for their roles in the fraud. They also cooperated with authorities.

Mr. Forbes was chief executive officer of CUC and Mr. Shelton was president before the membership marketing operation merged with travel and real-estate services company HFS Inc. to form New York-based Cendant in December 1997. Cendant's brands included Ramada, Howard Johnson, Avis, Coldwell Banker and Century 21.

In September, Cendant stockholders changed the company's name to Avis Budget Group to reflect its Avis and Budget vehicle rental brands. Its real-estate and hotel businesses were spun off as stand-alone companies and the company sold its travel distribution operations.

Copyright © 2007 Associated Press

CRIMINAL LAW:

Libby Wants To Know Miller's Sources (NSDY/AP)

By Matt Apuzzo

Long Island Newsday, January 31, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Former New York Times reporter Judith Miller spent 85 days in jail before testifying that White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby was one of her confidential sources. Now, Libby wants to know who else she was talking to.

Miller testified for more than two hours Tuesday about two conversations she had with Libby regarding CIA operative Valerie Plame. Those conversations are at the heart of Libby's perjury and obstruction trial because they allegedly occurred well before Libby says he learned Plame's identity from another reporter.

She was to return to the stand Wednesday.

Under cross-examination Tuesday, defense attorneys sought to ask Miller about others who provided information about Plame. Miller's memory was shaky at times Tuesday and defense attorneys want to exploit that.

"This is nothing more than classic 101 impeachment," attorney Theodore Wells said. "The very essence of the cross-examination of Ms. Miller is about her credibility."

William Jeffress, another of Libby's lawyers, pressed her on how she could remember in great detail one of her three conversations with Libby -- a conversation she says she'd totally forgotten about for two years before finding a notebook memorializing it.

"Counselor, I have already said I didn't remember that meeting," Miller said.

Libby's defense team wants to show that Miller can't remember any of the other people she spoke with and may have learned Plame's identity elsewhere. Variations of Plame's name appear in her notes, but Miller said Libby was the first to discuss it.

Jeffress said in court that Miller initially resisted testifying before the grand jury -- despite what Libby said was a waiver allowing her to do so -- to protect other sources.

"It's not just Libby," Jeffress said, recalling what he said Miller's lawyer told Libby's original attorney. "She has other problems, other sources."

Jeffress says he has a right to ask about those sources.

Miller's lawyer objected to that line of questioning. U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton indicated he would likely not allow attorneys to go too far when Miller returns to the stand Wednesday.

Fitzgerald's case began as an investigation into who leaked Plame's name to reporters at a time when her husband was criticizing the Bush administration. Three years later, nobody has been charged with the leak. Libby is accused of obstructing the case and lying to investigators.

Journalism organizations have decried this trial, which could see 10 reporters become witnesses. Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald intends to call Matthew Cooper of Time and NBC's Tim Russert. Jeffress has said up to seven reporters are on his witness list.

Reporter's Testimony Contradicts Libby's Timeline (USAT)

By Richard Willing

USA Today, January 31, 2007

WASHINGTON — Lewis "Scooter" Libby told New York Times reporter Judith Miller the identity of a covert CIA officer in the two weeks before Libby said he learned about the agent from another reporter, Miller testified Tuesday.

Miller was the seventh witness in Libby's perjury and obstruction of justice trial to say she talked with Libby about the identity of covert CIA officer Valerie Plame before Libby said he learned of Plame's identity.

The meetings between Miller and Libby in 2003 came as Bush administration officials were trying to counter claims by Plame's husband, former ambassador Joseph Wilson, that the administration had trumped up prewar intelligence.

An attorney for Libby quickly challenged Miller's credibility, establishing that she had forgotten about one meeting before she found notes from that encounter in a shopping bag more than two years later.

Miller detailed meetings on June 23, 2003, in Libby's office and on July 8, 2003, in a Washington hotel. In those meetings, she said, they discussed Plame's identity.

The testimony of Miller, who served 85 days in jail before agreeing to testify to grand jurors in the case, was widely anticipated. The former New York Times reporter is one of a handful of Washington reporters likely to testify.

"In the beginning, he referred to Mr. Wilson as a 'clandestine guy,' " Miller said about the June 23 interview.

Later in the interview, Miller said, Libby said Wilson's "wife worked in the bureau," which she understood as a CIA office.

Miller interviewed Libby again at Washington's St. Regis Hotel on July 8, as she worked on a story on the faulty intelligence produced in the run-up to the Iraq war. In both meetings, Miller said, she agreed to not identify Libby as her source.

Libby told grand jurors that he first learned of Plame's identity on July 10 from NBC reporter Tim Russert. That claim caused Libby, Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff, to be charged with perjury and obstruction. Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald alleges that Libby leaked Plame's identity to reporters in June and July 2003, then lied about it to investigators.

Wilson had accused the administration of twisting intelligence to falsely accuse Iraq of seeking uranium in Africa.

Revealing the identity of a covert officer can be a federal crime. No one was charged with leaking Plame's identity. Libby is the only person charged in the investigation.

In their first interview, Miller said, Libby seemed "agitated, frustrated and angry" by what he called a "perverted war of leaks" by Wilson and others tied to the CIA.

Libby "was concerned that the CIA was beginning to backpedal to try to distance itself from the unequivocal intelligence estimates it had provided before the war," Miller said.

Defense attorney William Jeffress, cross-examining Miller, brought out that she had forgotten about the meeting on June 23, 2003, until she finally agreed to testify before a grand jury in September 2005. That's when Libby released her from her promise of confidentiality.

She didn't recall that meeting until she had returned to her office after testifying before the Washington grand jury, Miller said. Then, she said, she found a notebook in a shopping bag under her desk that contained her June 23 interview notes. Those notes were mistakenly labeled "5/23," or May 23, she said.

Miller then returned to the grand jury and described the June 23 meeting.

Jeffress said Miller can "now describe in great detail" Libby's demeanor and the substance of an interview that she had forgotten about for more than two years.

"Not in great detail," Miller said, describing her testimony. "Highlights."

Reporter's Account Hurts Libby Defense (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig And Amy Goldstein

The Washington Post, January 31, 2007

Former New York Times reporter Judith Miller yesterday helped the prosecutor who landed her in jail and forced her into the witness chair, providing potentially damaging information about the confidential administration source she tried to shield, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby.

Deliberately and sometimes defensively offering her account in Libby's perjury trial, Miller told the jury that "a very irritated and angry" Libby told her in a confidential conversation on June 23, 2003, that the wife of a prominent critic of the Iraq war worked at the CIA. Libby had told investigators he believed he first learned that information from another journalist nearly three weeks later -- the assertion at the core of the charges against him.

Miller testified that Libby, then the chief of staff to Vice President Cheney, shared this information as they talked alone in his office in the Eisenhower Executive Office Building and that he complained that the CIA and a former ambassador were unfairly trying to blame the White House for using faulty intelligence to justify the invasion of Iraq. He then mentioned that the wife of the ambassador, Joseph C. Wilson IV, worked at a bureau of the CIA.

Miller's testimony showcased a new legal reality for the news media -- the fragility of reporters' general working assumption that they can protect the identities of confidential sources. Miller, who spent 85 days in jail trying to avoid disclosing the details of her conversations with Libby to Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald, was the first of several prominent reporters both sides expect to call to the witness stand. For some of the reporters, Libby was a confidential source they never expected to reveal.

Libby is charged with lying to FBI agents and a grand jury and with obstructing justice in the investigation of who leaked undercover CIA officer Valerie Plame's name to the media. He is not charged with the leak itself. Fitzgerald has said Plame's name was leaked by administration officials trying to discredit Wilson's assertions that there was no proof that Iraq was attempting to buy uranium in Niger for its nuclear weapons program.

Libby has pleaded not guilty, contending that he did not remember conversations he had with reporters about Plame amid the crush of his work on national security issues.

Libby told investigators he first learned Plame's name in a July 10, 2003, telephone conversation with NBC's Tim Russert. Miller testified yesterday that Libby discussed the topic with her twice before that date: on June 23 and on July 8, when Libby invited Miller to a breakfast meeting at the St. Regis Hotel.

Miller, who left the New York Times in 2005 and is now a freelance journalist, is the seventh prosecution witness to testify that Libby either knew about Plame's CIA role or was sharing that information in the weeks before her identity was revealed in a syndicated column by Robert D. Novak on July 14.

Miller said that in her dealings with Libby, he typically wanted to be described as a senior administration official or not mentioned at all. But on July 8, she said, he made a proposal for sharing information that he had never suggested to her.

"The ground rules changed," she said. "Mr. Libby said for the purpose of this conversation he wanted not to be described as a senior administration official. I think he said something like 'former Hill staffer.' " That is significant because it could help prosecutors show that Libby's motives were not purely to correct inaccuracies in Wilson's statements to the media.

Miller, who lost her battle with the prosecutor in 2005, yesterday also faced harsh questions from defense attorneys for Libby, who had opened his door to her and had praised her reporting on the hunt for weapons of mass destruction in Iraq.

Defense attorney William Jeffress Jr. attacked Miller's memory, quizzing her on why anyone should believe that she correctly remembered details of the June 23 conversation with Libby but had not been able to recall that it occurred when she first testified before the grand jury in the fall of 2005.

DOJ_NMG_0124982

Miller said that, after that session, Fitzgerald urged her to find any notes she might have for the June 2003 time period. She found some that night in a shopping bag under her desk and recalled the meeting after she refreshed her memory by reading them.

Jeffress suggested it was implausible that she now remembered her June conversation with Libby after first telling the grand jury: " I don't know if I met with him. I remember meeting with Jennie [Libby's assistant]."

"Well then, today, Ms. Miller, you testified to his demeanor," Jeffress said. "You testified to very particular things he said during that meeting."

Growing irritated herself, Miller pointedly explained that her notes indicated that Libby mentioned that Wilson's wife worked at "the bureau" and that she remembered being initially confused about whether he meant the FBI or the CIA.

"Sir, having reviewed my notes, I have a distinct memory of it," she said.

Jeffress also played part of a videotaped interview that Miller gave to a television station explaining her memory lapse.

"People say, 'How could she have forgotten?' " Miller said on the clip. "It's really easy to forget details on a story you're not writing. I had not written about uranium in Niger. I had not written about Niger. I had not written about uranium. It didn't mean anything to me."

In a flashback to pretrial battles, court proceedings were halted temporarily late in the afternoon when Jeffress asked Miller to name any other sources from whom she recalled learning about Wilson or Plame. Miller won her release from jail by agreeing to testify after Libby personally released her from their confidentiality agreement and after Fitzgerald agreed to confine his questions to her discussions with Libby.

Miller's attorney, Robert S. Bennett, said Miller would object to broad questions from Jeffress about any other sources who gave her information about Wilson. He said there would be no relevance to the trial because "there are no other sources she can recollect dealing with [concerning] Mr. Wilson and Ms. Plame."

Fitzgerald argued that the defense was trying to "go fishing far afield," but Jeffress countered that the defense should be allowed to ask the questions in an attempt to damage Miller's credibility. U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton said he would rule on the matter this morning, but the judge indicated sympathy for journalists' interest in not disclosing sources, suggesting they should be asked only about any that are central to the case.

Staff researchers Julie Tate and Madonna Lebling contributed to this report.

Journalist Forced To Reveal Her Methods (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, January 31, 2007

Judith Miller slept on the floor of an Alexandria jail for 85 days to avoid taking the hot seat she found herself in yesterday.

She lost a battle of wills with a special prosecutor, surrendered her job at the New York Times and became an unwanted symbol of journalistic coziness with the Bush administration and media missteps in covering an unpopular war.

In taking the stand in U.S. District Court against her once-secret source, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, Miller found herself answering questions about the very methods that she has spent a professional lifetime concealing. Rather than pointing out flaws in the accounts of public officials, she found herself struggling to explain a spotty memory and to justify why she wrote nothing about the sensitive -- and, as it turned out, classified -- information she had been handed. Once an independent operator who called herself "Miss Run Amok," she disputed what her many critics said was obvious: that Vice President Cheney's former top aide had been trying to manipulate her.

Throughout the afternoon, an unspoken question hung in the air: What do journalists give up when they agree to protect high officials in exchange for juicy information?

In a steady but slightly nervous voice, Miller described how her relationship with Libby began: with a bit of flattery. In their first meeting in the Old Executive Office Building, Miller recalled Libby saying that "he liked my reporting on weapons of mass destruction and terrorism." Libby's only quibble was that he had never received an inscribed copy of "Germs," a book on bioterrorism that she coauthored. Miller said she apologized for the oversight.

Gazing through rimless glasses at prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald, Miller, 59, described one of the most common transactions in journalism: how the contours of the reporter-source relationship are defined.

When she "expressed a desire" for regular conversations, Libby said "he would prefer not to see his name in print," Miller said. "We could continue meeting as long as I would identify him as an administration official or senior administration official." She readily agreed.

When Miller returned from a post-invasion trip to Iraq in 2003 -- where she wrote stories about the U.S. military's hunt for illegal weapons -- she said she was surprised that some of the public anger about the lack of WMD was directed at her. There was anger, too, at the Times, which later acknowledged serious flaws in some of her reporting and where the top editor eventually said he felt misled by Miller.

DOJ_NMG_0124983

She seemed unenthusiastic about her former employer when asked whether she read newspapers upon her return -- especially the New York Times. "Not particularly," she said. "You usually read the competition before you read your own."

At a meeting in Libby's office in June 2003, Libby seemed "agitated and frustrated and angry," not to mention "annoyed," Miller said. He was concerned that the CIA, through a "perverted war of leaks," was distancing itself from its prewar intelligence about Saddam Hussein's illegal weapons.

So Libby would combat these leaks by leaking to Miller, she explained in a tone that indicated this was the most natural thing in the world. Miller said he told her that the wife of Joseph C. Wilson IV, the former ambassador who was challenging the administration's account that Iraq had tried to buy enriched uranium in Africa, worked for "the bureau" -- prompting Miller to put a question mark in her notes until she realized that Libby meant the CIA.

During a two-hour meal at the St. Regis hotel the following month, Miller said, Libby changed the ground rules and went "on deeper background," asking to be identified only as a "former Hill staffer."

Miller recalled that in a phone conversation from her home in Sag Harbor, N.Y., she told him she did not plan to write a story about Wilson's wife, Valerie Plame, and "didn't think the New York Times was interested in pursuing it."

Why not? That has been one of the tale's lingering mysteries. Miller said she recommended to her boss, Jill Abramson, now the Times's managing editor, that the paper go after the Plame story, but "she seemed very distracted that day" and just said "mmm-hmm." Abramson has denied that Miller made such a recommendation.

They may have shared secrets, but Miller and Libby were not exactly friends. When she ran into Libby in the summer of 2003 in Jackson Hole, Wyo., she did not recognize him -- because, she said, he was wearing glasses, a cowboy hat and boots, a black T-shirt and jeans. But once she was incarcerated in 2005, Libby began to convince Miller that he would not hold her to her vow of secrecy. He wrote a poetic letter reminding her that "the aspens will already be turning" while she languished in jail.

After the Plame controversy blew up, Miller posted a letter on her Web site in response to a stinging piece by Times columnist Maureen Dowd, who said that Miller was not "credible" and had written "bogus" stories about nonexistent weapons. Recalling that yesterday, Miller said she told editors that "I did not think I had been a target" of a concerted White House leak campaign.

Miller turned hesitant under cross-examination, stumbling over her words and repeatedly gesturing with her right hand. She admitted that she had forgotten her June 2003 meeting with Libby until she found the missing notes of their conversation.

A frequent television guest, Miller got tripped up by one of her appearances. She stared at a monitor, transfixed and tight-lipped, as a program from last January showed her saying words that she had failed to fully recall a moment earlier: "It's really easy to forget details about a story you're not writing. . . . It was not important at the time."

The videotape provided another reminder of why reporters much prefer asking questions to answering them.

The day ended with legal wrangling about whether Miller could be asked to name other confidential sources. The issue, like the ambiguity of reporters' delicate dance with their informants, was not resolved.

Libby Reportedly Said 'I Didn't Do It' (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, January 31, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) - Amid the furor over the 2003 leak of a CIA operative's identity, Vice President Dick Cheney's chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, bluntly told a White House lawyer, "I didn't do it," the lawyer testified Tuesday.

David Addington, who served as Cheney's legal counsel during the CIA leak scandal, described a September 2003 meeting with Libby around the time that a criminal investigation began.

"I just want to tell you, I didn't do it," Addington recalled Libby saying. "I didn't ask what the 'it' was," Addington added.

Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald says Libby discussed CIA operative Valerie Plame with reporters, then lied about those conversations. He is accused of perjury and obstruction but neither he nor anyone else is charged with the leak itself.

Recalling their 2003 conversation in Libby's office, Addington testified Tuesday that Libby was curious about how someone could determine whether a CIA employee was working undercover. Addington, a former CIA counsel, said there's no way to know.

Addington said he gave Libby a highlighted copy of the federal law barring disclosure of the identity of covert agents.

Fitzgerald hopes Addington's testimony will bolster his argument that Libby was worried about whether his conversations with reporters were improper and therefore lied to conceal them.

DOJ_NMG_0124984

Libby's attorneys have accused White House officials of sacrificing Libby to protect President Bush's top political adviser, Karl Rove. During cross-examination Tuesday, attorney Theodore Wells suggested that Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, who was counsel to the president in 2003, may have been involved in that effort.

Wells has described Rove as crucial to the Republican Party and said Tuesday that Gonzales was tasked with protecting Bush's interests. Addington corrected him, saying White House counselors protect the interest of the office and the Constitution.

Addington said he showed Gonzales every subpoenaed document before sending it to the Justice Department. After reviewing a note in which Cheney said Libby was being sacrificed to protect another staffer, Addington said he believed he showed it to Gonzales and called Cheney's personal lawyer, Terrence O'Donnell.

"You told Mr. O'Donnell you thought this was a very important document?" Wells asked, before Fitzgerald objected and the line of questioning was cut off.

Libby resigned as Cheney's chief of staff after being indicted in October 2005. Addington succeeded him.

The trial's first week has focused on when Libby learned that Plame, the wife of an outspoken Bush administration critic, worked for the CIA. Government officials testified that they discussed her with Libby days before he said he was surprised to hear it from NBC reporter Tim Russert.

Libby's conversations with reporters are about to become the focus of the case. Fitzgerald said former New York Times reporter Judith Miller would follow Addington on the witness stand.

It would be the first time the former New York Times reporter has testified publicly against the man she went to jail to protect as a source.

Miller spent 85 days in jail for refusing to cooperate with Fitzgerald's investigating and reveal her conversations with Libby. She retired from the Times in November 2005, declaring that she had to leave because she had "become the news."

Prosecutors say Libby discussed Plame with Miller three times. Two of those conversations occurred before Libby says he first remembered learning Plame's identity from Russert.

Ex-Reporter For Times Testifies For Prosecutor Who Jailed Her (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis And Scott Shane

The New York Times, January 31, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 30 — Judith Miller, a former reporter for The New York Times, testified Tuesday as a witness for the prosecutor who had put her in jail for 85 days, recounting details of her once-confidential interviews with I. Lewis Libby Jr.

Ms. Miller had initially refused to cooperate with the government in its investigation of Mr. Libby, the former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, saying she would not violate her oath of confidentiality to Mr. Libby. But the special prosecutor, Patrick J. Fitzgerald, with the support of the federal courts, had her jailed until she relented. She asserted that Mr. Libby had released her from her vow of confidentiality.

As she began her testimony, she was calm and soft-voiced as she faced Mr. Fitzgerald, who is still investigating her in an unrelated case, and discussed three conversations she had had in June and July of 2003 with Mr. Libby. Those conversations, in which Ms. Miller said an agitated and anxious Mr. Libby criticized the Central Intelligence Agency and informed her of the identity of an agency operative, Valerie Wilson, are a significant part of the perjury and obstruction case against him.

It was only after Mr. Fitzgerald briskly concluded his questioning, and Ms. Miller found herself facing a caustic cross-examination from one of Mr. Libby's defense lawyers, that her composure slowly withered. Under the questioning by the lawyer, William H. Jeffress Jr., who attacked her memory and credibility, she began to sigh frequently and grow testy in her responses.

Pressed about why she failed to remember an important June meeting with Mr. Libby during her first grand jury appearance, she said with her voice rising: "Counselor, I've already said I didn't remember that meeting. I just didn't remember."

The day ended with an extraordinary argument by lawyers for both sides, as well as a lawyer for Ms. Miller, over whether Mr. Jeffress could ask her if she had other sources she spoke to about Ms. Wilson. The question, which was left unresolved by Judge Reggie M. Walton until Wednesday, threatened to derail the trial over the very constitutional issue that saw Ms. Miller go to jail in 2005.

Judge Walton seemed disinclined to allow questions about Ms. Miller's other sources. "I appreciate that there is an interest the media has in not having questions asked that aren't germane to this case," he said. But if he does allow them, and she refuses to answer, she could be held in contempt once again and a mistrial could result.

In her more than two hours on the stand, Ms. Miller became the focal point for an intense drama involving three people in the room: herself, Mr. Fitzpatrick and Mr. Libby. As she provided the testimony that was most damaging to Mr. Libby, he sat almost motionless in his chair about 20 feet away and stared at her.

Mr. Fitzgerald first took her through her June 23, 2003, meeting with Mr. Libby. Mr. Libby, who she said was usually low key, "appeared to be agitated and frustrated."

DOJ_NMG_0124985

He was unhappy about growing public concern that President Bush had used inaccurate information in his most recent State of the Union speech, in which he said there was evidence that Saddam Hussein had recently tried to acquire uranium from Africa.

She said Mr. Libby said the C.I.A. "was beginning to backpedal from the unequivocal intelligence" it had provided before the war about Iraq's efforts to obtain uranium.

He said the C.I.A. was doing so through "a perverted war of leaks" related to a fact-finding mission to Africa by Joseph C. Wilson IV, who was married to Ms. Wilson, also known by her maiden name, Valerie Plame.

"Did he discuss the wife?" Mr. Fitzgerald asked. "Yes," Ms. Miller replied, adding that Mr. Libby had said Ms. Wilson worked at the agency's division that dealt with limiting the proliferation of unconventional weapons.

Ms. Miller said Mr. Libby told her that Mr. Cheney had asked the agency in early 2002 about Iraq and African uranium, and the C.I.A. decided to send Mr. Wilson on its own without telling the vice president.

She described a second meeting with Mr. Libby at a Washington hotel that lasted two hours, as well as some telephone calls.

The main line of attack by Mr. Jeffress concerned the fact that Ms. Miller did not describe the June 23, 2003, meeting with Mr. Libby when she first appeared before a grand jury on Sept. 30, 2005, the day after she got out of jail.

He noted with a large measure of sarcasm that she had just finished testifying in detail about Mr. Libby's comments and even his mood during the June 23 meeting. How was it possible that she forgot entirely about the same meeting before the grand jury? he asked.

Ms. Miller had said that her memory of the June 23 meeting was jogged only when she accidentally discovered a shopping bag full of notebooks under her desk in the Times newsroom. Her lawyer then informed Mr. Fitzgerald, and she described the previously forgotten meeting in a second appearance before the grand jury.

Ms. Miller is the first of a series of reporters who are lined up to dispute Mr. Libby's account of his behavior in the investigation of who may have leaked to the press Ms. Wilson's identity as a C.I.A. officer.

Beyond the drama of the day's proceedings, the appearance of Ms. Miller as someone forced by the government to testify against a source emphasized how the case has changed the landscape of relations between journalists and government officials.

As the day ended in the argument over whether Ms. Miller could be questioned about other sources, Judge Walton took the unusual step of calling on Ms. Miller's lawyer, Robert S. Bennett, to explore what questions she might be willing to answer.

Mr. Bennett confirmed that Ms. Miller had already indicated she would testify she did not recall any sources other than Mr. Libby with whom she had discussed Mr. or Mrs. Wilson.

But the defense argued that it should be allowed to ask a broader question: whether she recalled other sources with whom she had discussed the issues raised by Mr. Wilson's July 6, 2003, Op-Ed article in The New York Times, which accused the Bush administration of twisting the intelligence that led to war. Mr. Jeffress argued that because Ms. Miller had said in a 2005 affidavit filed with the court that she had discussed those issues with multiple sources, he should be permitted to ask about them.

Mr. Fitzgerald, having once jailed her for protecting a source, now argued that she should not have to answer the question about sources.

"I don't want to make the First Amendment argument," Mr. Fitzgerald said, noting the contradiction of his position. Instead, he argued that questions about sources on subjects other than the Wilsons were not relevant to the charges against Mr. Libby. If they were allowed, the prosecutor said, "We're off on an irrelevant fishing expedition."

But Theodore V. Wells Jr., one of Mr. Libby's lawyers, argued that Ms. Miller should be asked the questions so Mr. Libby could have an opportunity to impeach her credibility.

"This is nothing more than classic 101 impeachment," Mr. Wells said. "I don't think we have a First Amendment collision at this point."

Ms. Miller left The New York Times in November 2005 after a 28-year career at the newspaper. Her reporting came under attack after articles she wrote suggested that Iraq possessed unconventional weapons, coverage that helped the Bush administration build its case for invading Iraq but that turned out to be wrong.

Mr. Fitzgerald is investigating Ms. Miller in an unrelated case involving Islamic charities. The government has contended that calls from reporters tipped off the charities to impending federal raids and asset seizures.

Reporter Takes Stand Against Source (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt And Greg Miller

The Los Angeles Times, January 31, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0124986

WASHINGTON — Testifying against a source she once went to jail to protect, former New York Times reporter Judith Miller said Tuesday that she had three discussions with former vice presidential aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby in which he told her that the wife of a Bush administration critic worked for the CIA.

Miller described one meeting with Libby that occurred a full two weeks before the time that Libby has told investigators he first learned about CIA operative Valerie Plame from another journalist.

The hourlong appearance by Miller — who spent 85 days in jail rather than reveal her conversations with Libby to a federal grand jury two years ago — was a blow to his defense.

Vice President Dick Cheney's onetime chief of staff is charged with lying about his conversations with Miller and two other prominent journalists in an effort to obstruct a federal investigation into how the identity of Plame became public. She is expected to be followed to the stand by former Time magazine White House correspondent Matthew Cooper and Tim Russert, the moderator of the NBC News program "Meet the Press."

The spectacle of reporters from three major news organizations becoming government witnesses in a criminal prosecution has been a source of dread for media advocates concerned that the legal precedent — and glare of publicity — could make it harder for reporters to gather and report the news from confidential sources.

And Miller, 59, was often on the defensive during a hard-edged cross-examination.

She is one of the trial's most compelling figures because of her high-profile role covering Iraq's alleged weapons programs, her extensive contacts with Libby, and the time she spent in an Alexandria, Va., jail for refusing to reveal his identity as her source.

Miller left the New York Times in 2005 and now works as a freelance journalist.

Her jailing became a media event but also raised questions about how far journalists should go in protecting their sources; essentially, she was refusing to blow Libby's cover — even though Libby was blowing the cover of a CIA operative in their conversations together.

During Miller's stay in jail, Libby sent her a famously florid letter, urging her to cooperate with the investigation and resume her life. "Out west, where you vacation, the aspens will already be turning," Libby wrote. "They turn in clusters because their roots connect them. Come back to work — and life."

While Miller was on the stand, Libby spent much of the time directing a steady gaze her way, while she seemed intent on avoiding eye contact.

Miller, known for her combativeness as a reporter, displayed a different persona Tuesday: At one point she asked her attorney to bring her a handkerchief, which she used frequently to dab under her nose and around her eyes.

During her testimony, Miller described how she got to know Libby while co-authoring a book on germ warfare. She said that after she returned from Iraq in June 2003 to become a reporter in the New York Times' Washington bureau, she sought Libby out as a source for stories about why weapons of mass destruction were not found in Iraq.

Miller, who wrote numerous stories that proved to be wrong about Iraq's pursuit of banned weapons, talked about how stunned she was by the public anger after the Bush administration's assertions began to crumble. The anger, she said, "was directed everywhere, but especially at the administration, the media and me."

Around that time, newspapers were beginning to report about a CIA-sponsored trip that a then-anonymous former envoy — Plame's husband, Joseph C. Wilson IV — had taken to Niger in 2002 to assess claims that Iraq was seeking weapons-grade uranium.

Wilson wrote about his trip in a July 6, 2003, op-ed article in the New York Times that accused President Bush of misleading the public about the Iraqi interest in Africa in his January 2003 State of the Union address.

Plame was identified as a CIA officer eight days later in print by syndicated columnist Robert Novak, which triggered the probe into whether anyone had broken federal laws that make it a crime to reveal the identity of a covert agent.

On Tuesday, Miller recounted meeting Libby at his office on June 23, 2003, where she found him "really unhappy and irritated" by accusations that the White House had manipulated intelligence to make the case for war with Iraq.

"Mr. Libby appeared to me to be agitated and frustrated and angry," Miller said. "He is a very low-key and controlled guy. But he seemed annoyed." Miller said he seemed concerned that the CIA was engaged in "a perverted war of leaks" to distance itself from Iraqi intelligence claims.

She also recalled that Libby told her Wilson's wife worked for the "bureau" — a reference she said she found puzzling because the term commonly refers to the FBI, not the CIA.

Miller grew testy under cross-examination by defense attorney William H. Jeffress Jr., who sought to cast her as an unreliable witness with a faulty memory. In particular, he questioned Miller's claim that she had failed to remember her first face-to-face meeting with Libby until long after the leak investigation started, when she found a notepad under her desk with details from that encounter.

DOJ_NMG_0124987

Jeffress challenged her to explain how she could have forgotten about the meeting when she initially testified before the grand jury but suddenly had complete recall of Libby's demeanor and use of unusual terms.

The defense lawyer punctuated the questioning with an excerpt from a television interview that Miller gave last year in which she answered questions about her role in the case. Miller, who never wrote about Plame and Wilson, said it was "really easy to forget details about a story that you are not writing."

"You remember 'bureau' clearly today even though you forgot it for three years and testified to the grand jury that there was no such meeting," Jeffress said.

Miller explained that she had a "note-driven" memory and that discovering the lost notebook allowed her to recall other details from the meeting.

Miller turned the tables on Jeffress at one point, when the defense counsel repeatedly confused the date of the initial Miller-Libby encounter.

"I don't know why I keep doing that," Jeffress said after being informed that he was again making the error.

"I understand," Miller shot back, to laughter in the courtroom.

Libby Trial Puts Reporters' Recall To A Severe Test (WSJ)

By Evan Perez And Sarah Ellison

The Wall Street Journal, January 31, 2007

WASHINGTON -- As any reporter knows, it is easier to ask questions than answer them.

Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald is calling several prominent reporters to help bolster the government's case in the perjury trial of Lewis "Scooter" Libby, Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff. But the journalists are likely to find themselves the subject of unflattering scrutiny as defense attorneys highlight imprecise and inconsistent recollections and note-taking.

MORE ON JUDITH MILLER

· Miller Retires From Times, but Not Quietly1

11/10/05

· Support Wanes for Reporter in CIA Leak2

10/24/05

· Reporter's Account Suggests Probe's Tack3

10/17/05

· Times's Miller Released from Jail4

9/30/05

Former New York Times reporter Judith Miller, who went to jail to avoid spilling Mr. Libby's name to federal investigators, was the first of the reporters to appear as a witness in U.S. District Court here yesterday. She calmly answered questions from Mr. Fitzgerald, describing how Mr. Libby first leaked to her that Valerie Plame, the wife of an administration critic, former diplomat Joseph Wilson, worked at the Central Intelligence Agency. Her testimony initially helped the prosecution's case because she said she received the information from Mr. Libby before the date that he has since said he first learned the information from reporters.

However, she appeared nervous and became confused as William Jeffress Jr., an attorney for Mr. Libby, launched into an aggressive series of questions to start his cross examination.

Ms. Miller, who retired from the Times in November 2005 amid a storm of controversy, yesterday gave the jury details of her three meetings with Mr. Libby. But, Mr. Jeffress noted, when she first appeared before the grand jury in late 2005, she couldn't remember the first meeting. 5

"No," Ms. Miller replied.

Not a thing? "No," she repeated. Then how was it, asked Mr. Jeffress, leaning into his lectern, that she suddenly could recall the meeting "in great detail"? Ms. Miller appeared momentarily flustered, then gathered herself. "Not in great detail," she replied, adding that she was now merely giving highlights of the meeting.

As Mr. Jeffress repeatedly sought to bring up Ms. Miller's grand-jury testimony, Ms. Miller became more agitated and said, "I don't remember everything that occurred in the grand jury." Mr. Jeffress wouldn't drop his line of questioning and Ms. Miller interrupted him to say she had already told him she couldn't recall all her testimony.

"Do you remember my question?" Mr. Jeffress quipped. Ms. Miller glared at him. During a subsequent bench conference with Judge Reggie Walton, Ms. Miller turned to jurors, rolling her eyes and shaking her head in frustration. Mr. Fitzgerald also guided her through a careful recounting of her note-taking, which fastidiously used different color pens and brackets to note asides.

WASHINGTON WIRE

6

See the expanded online Washington Wire7. The Journal's Washington bureau updates the Wire each weekday with political news, analysis and buzz.

The defense, though, is trying to zero in on reporters' fallibility when they take the stand. For instance, even though Ms. Miller had several notations of Ms. Plame's initials and a misspelling of her name as "Valerie Flam," she said yesterday she can't recall where the name came from.

Ms. Miller's court testimony ground to a halt nearly an hour ahead of schedule after Mr. Jeffress tried to ask her about other sources, besides Mr. Libby, with whom she may have discussed Mr. Wilson and his criticism of the administration. Ms. Miller's attorney, Bob Bennett, told the court that questions about other sources were off-limits and asked for time to confer with Ms. Miller.

The judge dismissed the jury and agreed to hear arguments about whether to allow the questions. Mr. Libby's attorneys were adamant about asking Ms. Miller about other sources. Mr. Jeffress told the judge, "I think she's going to say she couldn't remember which is very important to her credibility." Theodore V. Wells Jr., another defense lawyer, told the judge it was important to get Ms. Miller to answer the question because it would cast doubt on her testimony. "This is classic 101 impeachment," he said. The judge said he would consider the matter.

Since leaving the Times, Ms. Miller has written mainly op-ed pieces for publications such as The Wall Street Journal, the Los Angeles Times, and the New York Sun. She left the paper in November 2005 after internal support for her disintegrated. People familiar with the matter say she received a severance package that included a financial component and an agreement from the Times that it would allow her to publish a letter in the paper. Although Ms. Miller agreed not to talk about the terms of the settlement, she remained free to talk about her experiences and has made public appearances to discuss her 85 days in jail, her support for a federal shield law and freedom of the press.

Ms. Miller is expected to be followed by Matthew Cooper, formerly a Time magazine reporter, and Tim Russert, host of NBC's "Meet the Press." In all, 25 of the 80 names listed as possible witnesses in the case are journalists, though not all are likely to be called.

Ironically, some news organizations had initially urged the White House to launch an investigation to determine who leaked to the media the identity of Ms. Plame as a CIA agent, shortly after her husband published an opinion article criticizing the Bush administration's use of intelligence prior to the Iraq war. Critics of the administration said Ms. Plame was outed as part of a retaliatory campaign to silence a critic.

Instead, the investigation turned into a showdown over media rights when prosecutors subpoenaed Ms. Miller and Mr. Cooper to reveal their confidential sources. The testimony has also pointed to discussions in the White House about leaking -- or spoonfeeding -- information to journalists and playing them off against each other with exclusives. All of this is now being publicly aired before a Washington jury. "Nobody's going to come out of this looking good," says Lucy Dalglish, executive director of the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press. "People are going to see the reporting process isn't precise. The one thing this case has done is reveal how political journalism works in D.C., and it's a lot like a sausage factory."

Mr. Libby was indicted on perjury charges in October 2005. Soon after, Richard Armitage, the former deputy secretary of state, revealed he was the source of the original leak to syndicated columnist Robert Novak. Karl Rove, President Bush's political guru, had discussed the case with Time's Mr. Cooper, although he first denied it, then amended his testimony. Neither man, nor Mr. Libby, has been charged with exposing the identity of an undercover agent -- in part because it is difficult to prove the disclosures were intentional.

In the remaining perjury case, Mr. Fitzgerald is expecting the reporters to reinforce his charge that Mr. Libby knowingly lied when he told investigators he learned the name of Mr. Wilson's wife from reporters, including from Mr. Russert. Instead, prosecutors allege, Mr. Libby was already leaking the information and discussing Ms. Plame with reporters and White House officials.

Mr. Russert's testimony is important because he has said he couldn't have passed the information to Mr. Libby because he didn't know it at the time and only learned about Ms. Plame when he read a piece by Mr. Novak. As a well-known TV newsman who hosts a popular show, Mr. Russert is seen as particularly important for the prosecution and is expected to be highly credible with jurors. Mr. Cooper has also contradicted Mr. Libby's statements to investigators.

In Mr. Cooper's case, Time Inc. turned over the reporter's notes to investigators, which, Mr. Wells told jurors, make no mention of the leak he allegedly got confirmed by Mr. Libby.

Similarly, Mr. Wells has suggested that Mr. Russert may be misremembering. Mr. Wells told jurors he would explore details of a special deal under which Mr. Russert agreed to give information to investigators. This deal, Mr. Wells said, precluded testimony that Mr. Russert may have learned about Ms. Plame from other NBC reporters. It has emerged in court that NBC reporters Andrea Mitchell and David Gregory also learned about the leak, and, Mr. Wells told jurors, if they knew it, "then doggone it, Mr. Russert probably knew."

DOJ_NMG_0124989

Alternatively, Mr. Wells could use Mr. Russert's testimony to show that when Mr. Libby spoke to investigators, he may have made a confused reference to Mr. Russert when he meant to name Mr. Novak, to whom Mr. Libby also had spoken.

Mr. Wells told jurors in his opening statement that he wasn't seeking to show that reporters are lying. Rather, he said, the reporters, like Mr. Libby, may simply be misremembering events.

"Tim Russert is a great reporter," Mr. Wells said. "But he's a human being. Everybody makes mistakes. The question is did someone tell an intentional lie."

It isn't clear exactly which reporters beyond Messrs. Cooper and Russert will testify. Washington Post reporter Bob Woodward also has been named as a potential defense witness. Mr. Woodward has said he learned Ms. Plame's identity from Mr. Armitage, the former deputy secretary of state who has emerged as the likely original leaker. Mr. Woodward could help Mr. Libby's attorneys make jurors aware of Mr. Armitage's role in the case. Mr. Fitzgerald knew about Mr. Armitage's leak early in the investigation, but he wasn't charged.

The best witnesses for the government have been Ari Fleischer, who was the main White House spokesman from 2001 to 2003, and Catherine Martin, who worked for Vice President Dick Cheney and remains on the White House communications staff.

In contrast with Ms. Miller's testimony, both were unflappable on the witness stand. Accustomed to staying on message under questioning from reporters, the two didn't fumble in describing key meetings and conversations with Mr. Libby.

Bears Fans Put Money On—everything (CHIT)

By John Keilman, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, January 31, 2007

Chicago is a seven-point underdog in the Super Bowl, but the city is an overwhelming favorite with bookmakers, who think Bears fans will help push betting on the big game to record levels.

Nevada casinos and Internet wagering sites are counting on a combination of a nationwide fan base, an intriguing matchup between the Bears' stout defense and the Colts' jet-powered offense, and the fervor that comes from a big city starved for a football championship.

Super Bowl betting, though, isn't just a matter of whether the Bears will win or lose. People can gamble on everything from how many rushing yards Thomas Jones will gain to how long it will take Billy Joel to sing the national anthem.

Still, most money goes toward the outcome of the game, and high rollers have already begun to put down six-figure bets.

Though most of the wagers won't come until the weekend, the heaviest cash so far is on the Bears' side of the ledger, said Robert Walker, sports book director for the MGM Mirage casinos.

"Chicago is a very popular team, a huge city, with a storied program," he said. "They're just one of those franchises that when they get to the big game, they're going to enhance it."

Though experts estimate that the NCAA men's basketball tournament has become the nation's biggest overall gambling event, the Super Bowl remains by far the largest single game for wagering.

Casinos in Nevada took in $94 million last Super Bowl and expect to top $100 million this year.

Frank Streshley, senior analyst for the Nevada Gaming Control Board, said the strengthening economy of the last few years has been chiefly responsible for the increase in wagering, but the teams playing also make a difference.

"The Colts and the Bears have a large base of fans, especially Chicago," he said.

Putting money where heart is

Chuck Esposito, a native of the northwest suburbs who helps to run the sports book at Caesars Palace in Las Vegas, said Chicago fans seem more willing than others to put their money where their hearts are.

Before the football season begins each year, he said, more people pick the Bears to win the championship than any other team, regardless of how the squad is shaping up. The same is true with the Cubs. The Bears were at 12-1 odds for this season, so an optimistic fan who put down $100 a year ago would collect $1,200 with a victory Sunday.

Esposito said most of his colleagues rooted for the Bears and the Colts during the playoffs, figuring that matchup would spur the most action.

"You have offense against defense, two of the most popular players with [Colts quarterback] Peyton Manning and [Bears linebacker] Brian Urlacher," he said. "It's just a dream matchup for the viewing public; a dream matchup for the betting public too."

Some Internet-based casinos also foresee a big day. Calvin Ayre of Antigua-based Bodog.com, which takes wagers from all over the globe, said through a spokesman that betting on the Super Bowl probably would be second only to last year's World Cup soccer championship for the site.

DOJ_NMG_0124990

Internet gambling is not legal in the United States—credit card companies and banks are prohibited from processing online wagering transactions—and Ayre said his company no longer markets to this country. But BetUS.com, a site based in Costa Rica, still accepts American wagers.

Spokesman Reed Richards wouldn't comment on how American gamblers are placing their bets. Richards did say, though, that bets coming from Chicago and Indianapolis are split almost 50-50, reflecting an enthusiasm that he believed would drive the 10-year-old site to a record day.

"You're seeing two teams that haven't made an appearance in quite some time," he said. "There's a little bit of classic Americana being played there."

The Chicago area's illegal bookies might be in for a windfall of their own, even though they tend to set firm limits on what their customers can bet, said FBI spokesman Ross Rice.

"They don't want them to get down too far [so they] won't be able to pay," he said. "A new player, someone who bets [only] for the Super Bowl, will have a small limit."

Organized crime fills niche

Jim Wagner, president of the Chicago Crime Commission, said gambling is still a big moneymaker for organized crime and most local bookmakers must pay a percentage to the Outfit. Unlike casinos and Internet sites, they're willing to take wagers on credit, but woe be to the gambler who can't make good on his bet.

"They'll have you sell whatever you have, your car, your house," he said. "If you don't have any property to sell, you are the collateral."

Sports betting is technically a misdemeanor in Illinois, punishable by a fine of up to $2,500 and a year in jail.

But John Gorman, spokesman for the Cook County state's attorney's office, said he cannot recall a prosecution dealing with Super Bowl gambling in recent years.

Betting can still be trouble, though, and some local addiction counselors say they expect a surge in phone calls once the big game is over. Jim Mulcahy, clinical director of the Phase treatment center in Rockford, said it would be similar to people who get in trouble for drinking and driving.

"Now with the Bears playing, we would expect that to go up, and the same goes with gambling," he said. "A lot of people think they're magic when it comes to those things."

Experts say fewer than 5 percent of all adults are problem gamblers, and some casino pros say Super Bowl bettors seem to be in it mostly for fun.

Jay Kornegay, executive director of the race and sports book at the Las Vegas Hilton, said half of his business will come from proposition bets, side wagers on everything from the total number of punts in the game, to who wins the coin toss, to whether Rex Grossman will throw a touchdown or an interception first.

"Even though it might seem like a routine play, we know you can hear little groans or applause because some player just went over seven yards," he said.

Alan Palmer, who trades grains and metals at the Chicago Board of Trade, said some of his colleagues are going wild over the game, putting down as much as $10,000. And even though he rarely bets on sports, he said a small win on Sunday would be far sweeter than any big victory in the trading pits.

"I'm taking the Bears at seven [points], come on!" he said.

jkeilman@tribune.com

Why The Local Bookie Could Be A Big Winner In 2007 Super Bowl (WSJ)

By Peter Sanders

The Wall Street Journal, January 31, 2007

On Sunday, a 28-year-old Hollywood assistant named Seth plans to enjoy the Super Bowl in the same way millions of other football fans will: He'll bet on it.

How, exactly, will he wager that $100 burning a hole in his pocket? One thing he knows for sure is that he won't do it legally. Trekking to Vegas for the weekend is out of the question. And he won't do it using one of the publicly traded online services based abroad that have been taking sports bets from Americans over the past few years. They have mostly stopped taking action from U.S. residents in the wake of an aggressive government crackdown on Internet wagering.

But that doesn't mean he and other gamblers will be shut out. In fact, the government's war against illegal online wagering may be driving gamblers back to where they started: their local bookie. And in an ironic twist, there's a good chance the bookmaker is taking bets over the Internet, too.

DOJ_NMG_0124991

"Even my bookie is online these days," says Seth. He would be logging in to place his bet but misplaced the username and password the bookmaker gave him. "I guess I'll just have to call him and get him to resend me the instructions, sort of a tech support for the sports bettor," he says.

The government's crackdown has, in recent months, targeted executives at offshore Internet-gambling outfits and the foreign credit-card-processing companies that facilitate the transactions with U.S. bettors. But while it may have dented the $12-billion-a-year online-gambling industry, it didn't break it.

No one thinks that American gamblers' appetites have waned either. Last year, about $94.5 million was legally wagered on the Super Bowl in Nevada casinos, the only place in the land where it's lawful to bet on sports. Illegally, the American Gaming Association -- a casino-industry trade group -- figures that Americans bet between $5 billion and $6 billion each year on football's marquee event.

"The likely impact is that people who previously wagered on legal, regulated sites ... will now call a local bookie or bet on an unregulated site," says Alan Feldman, a spokesman for casino giant MGM Mirage.

It's true that many of the publicly traded online-gambling sites have pulled out of the U.S. market since last summer. Some have folded entirely. And the Justice Department served subpoenas to a number of investment banks that allegedly helped underwrite foreign public-stock offerings for some of the companies.

But as the kickoff at Super Bowl XLI in Miami gets nearer, the overall picture of Internet gambling has only gotten muddier. It's not just that local bookies are taking bets over the Internet. For every established Internet-gambling company that has stopped accepting bets from the U.S., others have cropped up to fill the void.

"The online-gambling ban should be renamed the Sopranos Support Bill," says Wayne Allyn Root, an outspoken professional sports handicapper in Las Vegas. "All of this money has moved to brand-new, privately held companies [that] opened overnight and [are] run by criminals engaging in fraud and organized crime."

"The crackdown has taken the online bets out of a fairly transparent set of companies and put them into companies that aren't transparent at all," adds Sue Schneider, president and CEO of River City Group, a St. Charles, Mo., Internet-gambling consultancy. "Players could be more at risk."

To eliminate paper trails and take advantage of technology, some bookmakers have apparently joined forces with offshore-betting sites and now issue their clients account numbers. Bettors log on to the Web sites like ordinary gamblers and enter their account numbers. But instead of sending credit-card data, they simply make their bets, which are linked electronically to their bookie's name. The bookie keeps track of his clients online but still collects debts and pays winnings the old-fashioned way: in person. He likely pays a cut to the Web-site operators.

Nelson Rose, a law professor and expert in gambling law, has fielded dozens of phone calls from casual gamblers since the U.S. government went on the offensive. The No. 1 question: "Will I get arrested for betting on sports?" His response: "About as likely as the chances of their winning the World Series of Poker." In other words: not likely.

But even before the government's sudden interest in chasing down online-gambling companies, some sports bettors found the online experience frustrating. Most online-gambling sites required U.S. bettors to open an online account and deposit a certain sum via credit card. Betting losses would be deducted from the account and wins credited.

Seth once had an account like this, but after a few months of losses, he decided it was too laborious and resumed using his local bookmaker. Months later, he says, he still receives annoying telemarketing calls from the site.

For the Super Bowl, Seth says that if logging onto his bookie's site is too complicated, he may just skip the bet altogether. "I don't think I'd work that hard just to lose $100," he adds.

· Lee Gomes will be back next week. You can email me at peter.sanders@wsj.com1.

EU Mulls Legal Challenge To US Internet Gaming Clampdown (UKIND)

By Stephen Castle

London (UK) Independent, January 31, 2007

Laws that prevent Amer-icans gambling online on European-run websites may be challenged, the EU said yesterday, raising the prospect of a fresh trans-atlantic trade rift.

Charlie McCreevy, the European Internal Market Commissioner, issued the threat against the background of rising US pressure on the gambling industry.

At the heart of the dispute is the Unlawful Internet Gambling Enforcement Act of 2006 under which US financial institutions are in effect barred from making payments with US credit cards to online gambling sites. The law, which technically prohibits payments involving "inter-state or foreign commerce", wiped billions off the market values of British online gaming companies when it was passed last year.

DOJ_NMG_0124992

Washington has long regarded online gambling as illegal and cracked down on US firms. Because of that, foreign - particularly British - companies have suffered most from the legislation.

Critics accuse the US government of seeking to enforce their own laws on businesses based outside the country.

Mr McCreevy told the European Parliament: "In my view it is probably a restrictive practice and we might take it up in another fora." He argued that the US is protecting its own gambling industry by stopping foreign companies from building up an online betting sector. Mr McCreevy said: "It's not my intention to bring forward a harmonised piece of legislation on gambling in the European Union."

US pressure on the industry continues and last week the US Justice Department demanded information from some of the world's biggest investment banks as part of the investigation into online gambling companies such as Britain's PartyGaming.

Mr McCreevy, who takes a well-known interest in horseracing, said that the US online gambling rules were a "prima facie" case of protectionism and that the World Trade Organisation was a possible venue for tackling them.

Officials said that he was in consultation with the EU Trade Commissioner, Peter Mandelson, who has responsibility for pursuing such disputes.

European officials are watching two cases already before the WTO in which Antigua and Barbuda challenged American gaming rules. An adjudication on the implementation of an earlier ruling against the US is expected in the coming months and, if it goes against the US, online gambling firms in the UK are likely to put pressure on the EU to press their case against the US.

A spokesman for Mr Mandelson said: "We recognise the right of a country to regulate gambling and we are following the Antigua case closely because if there is discrimination that would clearly affect Europe."

A Former Shelby County Official Admits To Buying Cars For Drug Dealers. (WPTY)

WPTY-TV, January 31, 2007

Joe Cooper pleaded guilty to money laundering.

He admitted to buying wheels for dealers in federal court today.

His conviction is part of an FBI sting called "Operation Clean Sweep."

Today, Joe Cooper told a federal court that while he was working here at Bud Davis Cadillac in 2006, he accepted more than $4,300 from two drug dealers.

Cooper would lease Cadillacs to customers, but drug dealers were the ones driving the cars and paying for them.

The drug dealers would then give Cooper cash payments.

Cooper would take then and use the money for the lease payment.

On July 27th, 2006, Cooper admited he knew he was dealing with drug dealers to one who was wearing a wire for the FBI.

On August 9th, 2006, FBI officials confronted Cooper. He agreed to wear a wire to help them investigate Memphis council members Edmund Ford and Rickey Peete.

On November 30, 2006, Peete and Ford were charged with bribery. The FBI says Cooper wore a wire to record the council members taking more than $2300 dollars in bribes.

The prosecutor involved in the case says he will ask for Cooper to be given a light sentence.

Cooper has promised to continue cooperating in the Rickey Peete and Edmund Ford bribery cases.

That could include Cooper testifying against the two Memphis councilmen in court.

Cooper will be sentenced August 29th. Under federal sentencing guidelines, he could spend between 2/12 years and 3 years behind bars.

But again, the prosecutor is expected to ask the judge to give Cooper a lighter sentence.

Joe Cooper Pleads Guilty To Money Laundering (WHBQ)

WHBQ-TV, January 31, 2007

MEMPHIS, Tenn. (WHBQ) -- Joe Cooper has plead guilty to one count of money laundering stemming from "Operation Main Street Sweeper."

Cooper is said to be the government's informant in Operation Main Street Sweeper where Cooper allegedly bribed Memphis City Councilmen Rickey Peete and Edmund Ford for their votes on a rezoning case in front of City Council.

Cooper could receive up to 25 years in prison and $5,000 in fines, but officials say he will more than likely continue to assist the prosecution in the corrution trials of Peete and Ford.

Cooper will be sentenced August 29.

Joe Cooper Enters Guilty Plea On Money Laundering Charge (WMC)

WMC-TV, January 31, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0124993

Joe Cooper, charged with money laundering, entered a guilty plea in federal court this morning.

Cooper is charged based on his receipt of cash and a money order as partial payment towards the acquisition of automobiles by drug dealers. He also acted as an informant in a federal operation that yielded bribery charges against City Councilmen Rickey Peete and Edmund Ford.

Cooper pleaded guilty to an "information," an alternative method of charging an individual if that individual waives his right to an indictment, which Cooper did.

He told us by phone, "I have accepted responsibility. I apologize to my family and friends, if I have caused any problems."

Below is the news release issued by the U.S. Attorney's office this morning:

Memphis, TN - David Kustoff, United States Attorney for the Western District of Tennessee, Andrew Dimond, Resident Agent in Charge of the DEA's Memphis Resident Office, My Harrison, Special Agent in Charge of the FBI's Memphis Division, and Mark Luttrell, Shelby County Sheriff, announced that this morning former County Commission Candidate Joe Cooper pleaded guilty to a money laundering offense. This was the same charge as in the complaint against Cooper unsealed on November 30, 2006.

Cooper plead guilty to an information alleging the money laundering offense. An information is an alternative method of charging an individual if that individual waives his right to an indictment, which Cooper did.

Cooper is charged in the information with a violation of 18 U.S.C. § 1956(a)(3) based on his receipt of cash and a money order as partial payment towards the acquisition of automobiles by drug dealers. In addition to entering into a written plea agreement with the Government, Cooper signed a detailed factual statement explaining the basis for the charge.

According to the statement of facts, one of the drug dealers involved in the car transactions agreed to work with the investigators in documenting his relationship with Cooper and the existence of the car transactions. That individual is Korreco Green, and he is a defendant in another federal criminal prosecution. As described in the statement of facts, Green's telephonic and in-person communications with Cooper were recorded. According to the statement of facts, on July 27, 2006, Green met with Cooper and paid him $3,500.00 in cash and a money order as partial payment for the amount Green and the other dealer owed Cooper for the cars. The statement of facts describes how, in that meeting and in other recorded communications, Cooper made statements indicating that he understood that he was dealing with drug traffickers.

The statute cited in the information,18 U.S.C. § 1956(a)(3), provides in relevant part that:

3) Whoever, with the intent-

...

(B) to conceal or disguise the nature, location, source, ownership, or control of property believed to be the proceeds of specified unlawful activity;

...

conducts or attempts to conduct a financial transaction involving property represented to be the proceeds of specified unlawful activity, or property used to conduct or facilitate specified unlawful activity, shall be fined under this title or imprisoned for not more than 20 years, or both. For purposes of this paragraph ..., the term "represented" means any representation made by a law enforcement officer or by another person at the direction of, or with the approval of, a Federal official authorized to investigate or prosecute violations of this section.

Possible Penalties

The penalties for a violation of section1956(a)(3) are a maximum prison term of 20 years, a maximum $500,000 fine, and a maximum of three years of supervised release.

Conclusion

This case is being prosecuted by Assistant United States Attorney Tom Colthurst with the Office of the United States Attorney for the Western District of Tennessee.

The prosecution of defendant Cooper was part of Operation Clean Sweep. The Clean Sweep cases are being investigated by the DEA Task Force in Memphis, in partnership with the Shelby County Sheriff's Office. The DEA Task Force is comprised of DEA Special Agents and agents and officers with U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, the U.S. Marshal's Service, the Germantown Police Department, the Shelby County District Attorney General's Office, the Memphis Police Department, the Shelby County Sheriff's Office, the Millington Police Department, and the Tennessee Bureau of Investigation.

Laundered $43,500 For Drug Dealers; Pledges Continued Help In Federal Case Against Ford, Peete (MCA)

By Lawrence Buser

Memphis Commercial Appeal, January 31, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0124994

Longtime political operative Joe Cooper pleaded guilty Tuesday to money laundering and pledged to continue his role as an FBI informant in the bribery and extortion case against City Councilmen Rickey Peete and Edmund Ford.

Cooper, 61, admitted to accepting $43,500 in cash payments from two drug dealers who leased automobiles from him when he was a salesman at Bud Davis Cadillac last year.

"I accept my responsibility and I apologize for taking up the court's time," Cooper told U.S. Dist. Court Judge Daniel Breen.

Cooper's offense carries a maximum of 20 years in prison and a $500,000 fine, but federal sentencing guidelines suggest his punishment range is actually 30 to 37 months.

The tentative sentencing date is Aug. 29. Asst. U.S. Atty. Tom Colthurst told the judge that he likely would make a formal motion for a sentence reduction at that time if Cooper continues his cooperation, which could include testifying against Peete and Ford.

Cooper, who helped the FBI secretly record $23,400 in payoffs allegedly made to the councilmen, declined comment after the 30-minute hearing.

His attorney, however, said prosecutors could count on his client's ongoing help.

"He's obviously very remorseful and will do whatever he can to make the situation right, not only for his family but also for the community," said attorney Kemper Durand. "Any time the government is going to ask something, he's going to give truthful information."

Federal authorities persuaded Cooper to help an investigation into public corruption, dubbed Main Street Sweeper, when they confronted him with a sealed complaint last Aug. 9 outlining money-laundering charges. The complaint was unsealed on Nov. 30 when Peete and Ford were indicted.

Cooper, a longtime Democratic candidate and lobbyist, was charged after one of the drug dealers in the auto-lease scheme, Korreco Green, agreed to help authorities by secretly recording conversations with Cooper.

On the tapes, authorities said, Cooper acknowledges his understanding that he is dealing with drug traffickers and their illegal proceeds.

The Cadillac automobiles were leased by other customers, but the drug dealers drove them and assumed informal responsibility for the lease payments.

The drug dealers made cash payments to Cooper who would forward the lease payments to customer named on the lease.

The subleases were not documented by contracts.

Green and the other drug dealer in the car scheme, Aaron Vaughn, also worked in Cooper's unsuccessful campaign for Shelby County commissioner in last May's Democratic primary.

From 1972 to 1977, Cooper served as a squire on the commission's predecessor, the Shelby County Quarterly Court. He was forced to resign after being convicted on bank fraud charges and was sentenced to a year in prison.

Cooper on Tuesday waived indictment by a grand jury and pleaded guilty to a one-count criminal information.

Another Former Laborers Local 91 President Pleads Guilty (WIVB)

WIVB-TV, January 31, 2007

(Buffalo, NY, January 30, 2007) - - Another former leader of Niagara Falls Laborers' Local 91 has begun a federal prison term.

Judge Richard Arcara sentenced former Local 91 president Robert Malvestuto to four and a quarter years.

Malvestuto pleaded guilty to racketeering and conspiracy.

The wide-ranging federal racketeering case against Labors' Local 91 is the focus of a special report from News 4 Investigative Reporter Luke Moretti.

For years top officials in Local 91 used muscle to get what they wanted, and if threats didn't work, violence would follow.

At the center of it was former president Mark Congi, who's now serving a 15-year prison sentence.

Buffalo FBI agent Frank Runles said, "When he showed up at a work site, you had a six-foot-four, 300-plus-pound guy coming in and telling you, 'You're going to work with us. You're going to hire my people, and if you don't, you got a problem.' "

It's a story of beatings and bombings, threats and extortion.

For the first time, you'll hear from those who worked the case since the beginning.

Thursday night on News 4 at 11, watch "Inside Local 91", a special report.

FBI:13 Members Of NYC Crime Families Charged (WABC)

WABC-TV, January 31, 2007

Reportedly 10 members of Gambino family; three members of Luchese family

(New York - WABC, January 30, 2007) - Authorities say thirteen members of two New York City crime families have been charged in a criminal enterprise involving extortion, racketeering, loan sharking, money laundering and bribery.

The suspects were all arraigned one by one however bail was not discussed since defense attorney's were still going through the 35 pages of charges.

The FBI said Tuesday morning that ten of the defendants are members of the Gambino crime family, including 77-year-old George DeCicco, an alleged captain. His son Robert DeCicco, reportedly in his 50s, was also among those charged.

Three other defendants are said to be members of the Luchese crime family.

FBI spokesman Jim Margolin said more information would be released this afternoon by the U.S. attorney after the defendants have made their initial court appearances. The arrests came after a two year investigation, Margolin said.

Margolin says a cooperating witness helped make hundreds of hours of taped evidence. He says some of those tapes are expected to be played today as part of the defendants' initial court appearances.

On the tape, investigators say DeCicco is heard uttering an explicit threat to the cooperating witness, saying "I will burn your eyes out." Another tape reportedly involves a conversation between the witness and reputed Gambino soldier Joseph Orlando. In that conversation, investigators say Orlando appears to admit to eight murders, saying "I've got eight under my belt and I don't give a (expletive) who becomes the ninth."

Margolin says the government will oppose any bail being set, saying the defendants pose a significant threat to others and could flee.

Officials say some of the defendants face more than 100 years in prison if convicted on all charges.

NYC Mobsters Allegedly Said They Had Bazookas, Chainsaws (WNBC)

WNBC-TV, January 31, 2007

NEW YORK -- Reputed mobsters looking to settle scores boasted of an arsenal of weapons -- chainsaws, bazookas, crossbows, rocket launchers and hand grenades -- according to recorded conversations of Gambino, Luchese and Sicilian crime family members arrested Tuesday in Lower Manhattan.

"In actuality, to be perfectly honest with you, I shot him in the leg first, and he went down screaming, and then I started taking his arm off with the chainsaw. He couldn't move. He felt every f---ing thing I did to him," Steven Famigletta, 44, allegedly said.

Famigletta was among 13 suspected mobsters arrested and charged with a host of offenses, including racketeering, loan-sharking, extortion and money laundering. They were led from FBI headquarters to their arraignment in Brooklyn Federal Court.

Authorities said an undercover informant secretly recorded hundreds of hours of gritty dialogue during an 11 month federal investigation.

Reputed Gambino capo George DeCicco threatened, "I'll burn your eyes," in trying to collect on a loan, according to federal prosecutors. He continued, according to the transcripts, by saying, "Did you ever screw me? Do you want me to burn your eyes out?"

Investigators said alleged Gambino soldier Joseph Orlando boasted of his murder tally, saying "I got eight under my belt already, so I don't give a f--- who nine's gonna be," authorities said.

The FBI said DeCicco conducted much of his business from his crew's social club on Bay 14th Street in Bath Beach, Brooklyn.

Andrew Arena, head of the FBI's Criminal Division, said these recordings reaffirm the mafia's longstanding reliance on muscle and threats of violence to hold sway over rivals and conduct business.

Federal prosecutors said these Gambino and Luchese families also tried to bribe an immigration official to obtain documents. But that official turned out to be an undercover FBI agent. The suspects also allegedly cashed in tens of thousands of dollars in stolen HSBC bank checks.

"The mob always goes where the money is," said Arena.

Investigators said two of the suspects charged today have links to the Sicilian Mafia and one is wanted in Sicily for crimes there. The suspects pleaded not guilty to the charges that carry up to 30 years in prison.

FBI Arrests A Dozen Alleged Mobsters (NY1)

NY1, January 31, 2007

Ten alleged members of the Gambino and Luchese organized crime families, along with two Italian associates, were arrested Tuesday and charged with extortion, bribery and racketeering.

The foreign suspects are allegedly sons of high ranking crime family bosses in Sicily.

DOJ_NMG_0124996

FBI officials say the men were caught trying to bribe someone they thought was an immigration official in an attempt to affect the status of one of the two Sicilians.

The highest profile American arrested is George DeCicco. His 57-year-old-son was also arrested.

Officials say if convicted, some of the men face 100 years behind bars.

LAST OF THE GOTTI GANG (NYPOST)

By Stefanie Cohen

The New York Post, January 31, 2007

The feds yesterday finally stuck it to the only member of John "Teflon Don" Gotti's murderous inner circle who had never been busted.

Infamous reputed Gambino capo George "Butter" DeCicco was among 13 alleged crime-family thugs nailed for a slew of extortion, racketeering, loan-sharking and money-laundering raps after a two-year probe fueled by a Mafia mole, authorities said.

The federal case will involve hundreds of hours of damning tapes made with the help of the turncoat witness, a member of DeCicco's crew, FBI officials said.

On one tape, the bloodthirsty DeCicco, 77, is heard warning the snitch, "I'll burn your eyes out," officials said. In another taped chat between the witness and DeCicco's nephew, alleged Gambino soldier Joseph "Joey Boy" Orlando, investigators say Orlando all but admits to committing eight murders when he says: "I've got eight under my belt, and I don't give a [expletive] who becomes the ninth."

One Mafioso is caught on tape gushing about one of three brutal murders he's committed, authorities said. "I shot him in the leg first, and he went down screaming," Steven "Steve Rigatoni" Famiglietta is heard boasting to the mole, officials said. "And then I started taking his arm off with a chain saw . . . He felt every f- - -ing thing I did to him."

The feds said the mobsters' downfall evolved from a simple scheme gone awry. It involved Orlando asking DeCicco's crew for help landing an immigration green card for his girlfriend.

One thug in the group said he could help - then panicked when he realized he couldn't pull off the request. Fearing for his life, he went to the feds offering his services. The authorities set up an undercover agent as an immigration official and, with the help of their now-cooperating witness, offered the services of the undercover to the mob. But by then, the Mafiosi had a more pressing problem.

DeCicco had been asked by top Sicilian mobsters to keep their countryman, Francesco Nania, who was in U.S. custody, from being deported to face mob-related charges back home.

The Gambinos eventually offered $70,000 to the undercover to broker the immigration deal, officials said.

Also busted was DeCicco's son, Robert, who is in his 50s.

George DeCicco's lawyer said he will seek house arrest for his client because DeCicco has heart problems and wears a nitroglycerin patch.

DeCicco is the brother of the notorious late Frank DeCicco, who lured then-Gambino chief Paul Castellano to his rubout outside Sparks steakhouse on East 46th Street in 1985.

Frank DeCicco wound up dead a little over a year later - killed by a car bomb meant for his boss, Gotti.

stefanie.cohen@nypost.com

Friend Contradicts Coke Defendant (WXIA)

WXIA-TV, January 31, 2007

A combative Joya Williams took the witness stand in federal court in Atlanta Tuesday, replacing the docile Joya Williams who testified Monday.

This time Williams was under cross examination by a disbelieving prosecutor who challenged her defense that she had nothing to do with a conspiracy last year to steal Coca-Cola trade secrets when she worked for Coke in 2005 and 2006, to try to sell them to Pepsi for $1.5 million.

"You all twist everything people say and manipulate it to make it go for your case," Williams accused Assistant U.S. Attorney B. J. Pak in front of the jury. "You're trying to twist" what she has said and what witnesses against her have said, Williams told Pak several times during Pak's 45-minute cross examination of her.

Williams and her two co-defendants who pleaded guilty in October, each face up to ten years in prison.

Pak brought in a rebuttal witness for the government, to try to blast apart one of Williams' key alibis. The witness, Cliff Carroll, a friend of Williams, testified that he's not the one who gave Williams $4,000 in June, 2006, as Williams had testified. Williams had deposited that money into her personal bank account the day after one of Williams' co-defendants received $30,000 from an undercover FBI agent posing as a Pepsi representative.

DOJ_NMG_0124997

Williams denied the money came from her co-defendant. She testified on Monday that Carroll loaned her $4,000 that day, so she could make a credit card payment.

But the defense never called Carroll to the stand to back up Williams' story. Instead, the prosecution called Carroll to the stand to refute it.

Pak asked Carroll, "Prior to her arrest, did you ever give her $4,000 in cash?"

"No, Sir," Carroll replied.

Williams' attorney, Janice Singer, tried to introduce a tape of a phone conversation between Williams and Carroll just after Williams' arrest in July. Williams was in the Fulton County Jail, which records all inmate phone calls.

The judge ruled Singer could not use the tape. But Singer said that on the tape, Williams and Carroll talked about the $4,000 loan, and Carroll never disputed giving Williams the money. Singer suggested for the jury that Carroll was forgetting the loan now, and testifying on Coke's behalf, so he would not jeopardize any business his company does with Coke. Carroll insisted he never gave Williams the money.

During Pak's cross examination of Williams, he asked her, "You never talked to [co-defendants] Dimson and Duhaney about selling any Coke secrets?"

"No," Williams replied, "I never talked to them about selling any Coke secrets."

Edmund Duhaney was a family friend of Williams who pleaded guilty to the conspiracy against Coke. Duhaney testified last week that Williams recruited him to help her sell Coke trade secrets that he claimed she had been taking from her office at Coke headquarters. Ibrahim Dimson also pleaded guilty to the conspiracy. Duhaney testified he met Dimson while they were serving time together in a federal prison, and that he recruited Dimson to help him and Williams.

Williams' defense is that Duhaney and Dimson must have taken the Coke materials from her without her knowledge, to try to sell to Pepsi.

"I never noticed the Coke documents were gone," Williams told Pak, "really until you [federal agents] busted through the door with your 30 guns" to arrest her on July 5, 2006.

"I'm hurt," Williams said at one point. "Everybody hates me.... I respect Coke and I respect this system" of justice.

"I could have took the plea and just faced two [years in prison], but I feel that strongly about my innocence. I know I didn't do it. I know. I'm sitting here risking the other eight [years in prison]" to tell the truth, she said.

Pak pointed out that Williams had $45,000 in credit card debt, and before he could make a point about how that might relate to the case against her, Williams said she's been carrying that debt for several years and retorted, "I didn't suddenly say, 'Let's go steal some documents to pay my credit card debt.' I worked two and three jobs, and you know it."

Pak's 45 minutes of cross examining Williams compares with the two and a half hours she testified on direct examination, on Monday.

Closing arguments are scheduled for Wednesday morning.

Friend Denies He Gave $4,000 To Coke Trade Secrets Theft Suspect (SDUT/AP)

By Harry R. Weber, Associated Press

The San Diego Union-Tribune, January 31, 2007

ATLANTA – A friend of the woman charged with conspiring to steal Coca-Cola trade secrets denied Tuesday that he gave the defendant $4,000, contradicting her testimony that money she deposited two weeks before her arrest came from him rather than payment for the scheme.

"Prior to her arrest, did you ever give her $4,000 in cash?" Assistant U.S. Attorney Byung J. Pak asked Roswell businessman Clifton Carroll, referring to Joya Williams.

"No, sir," Carroll responded.

Carroll was called by the government as a rebuttal witness after the defense rested its case after Williams testified for a second day that she believes she is a victim, not a criminal. Closing arguments in Williams' trial were expected Wednesday.

On Monday, an undercover FBI agent testified about a $4,000 cash deposit that posted to Williams' bank account on June 19, 2006. That was three days after the agent gave co-defendant Ibrahim Dimson $30,000 in cash in exchange for a sample of a new Coca-Cola product that was part of so-called Project Lancelot.

Williams, who was fired as a secretary to Coca-Cola's global brand director at the company's Atlanta headquarters after the allegations came to light, testified Monday that the money she deposited came from Carroll, not Dimson.

But Carroll told jurors Tuesday that isn't true. He said the most money he ever loaned Williams was $400, and that was after her July 5 arrest.

Williams' credibility will be an issue for the jury to weigh during its deliberations.

Earlier Tuesday, Williams testified that she believes she is the victim of overzealous prosecutors and FBI agents who she claims tore apart her life.

In sometimes confrontational, longwinded responses to questions from Pak, Williams said during her second day on the stand that she didn't take a plea deal to lessen the up to 10 years she faces in prison if convicted because she is innocent.

"I could have took the plea and just faced two, but I felt so strongly about my innocence that I know I didn't do that," Williams told jurors. "I'm here risking going to jail an additional eight years for sitting here on the stand."

The government has alleged that Williams, 41, stole confidential documents and samples of products that hadn't been launched from The Coca-Cola Co. and gave them to Dimson and Edmund Duhaney as part of a conspiracy to sell the items to Purchase, N.Y.-based PepsiCo Inc. for at least $1.5 million.

Dimson and Duhaney have pleaded guilty and are awaiting sentencing. Duhaney testified previously that Williams spearheaded the scheme. Dimson did not testify.

The exchanges between Pak and Williams were tense at times Tuesday, but Williams did not alter her claim of innocence.

"Did you talk to them about selling Coke secrets?" Pak asked Williams, referring to Dimson and Duhaney.

"No," Williams responded. She then added, "You are trying to turn it all around to be something else."

Williams then said she considered Duhaney family, even though the two are not related.

"You do have family of your own, don't you?" Pak asked.

"You're trying to twist it again," Williams responded.

Pak then asked Williams about the key she claimed she left under her doormat for one of the co-defendants, perhaps suggesting a means by which the documents could have been stolen from her.

"When did you first notice that the Coke documents were gone?" Pak asked.

"I didn't notice the Coke documents were gone really until you all came and busted the door with the 30 guns," Williams said, referring to her arrest.

Pak also asked Williams about a FedEx package she sent to Dimson last year, and a text-message she sent to a former boyfriend nine days before the trial began. The former boyfriend testified previously that he felt Williams wanted him to lie on the stand about what was in the package.

But Williams testified Tuesday that she didn't try to coerce him, and she insisted she did not know what was in the package.

"You all twist everything someone says," Williams told the prosecutor. "You try to manipulate it."

She added, "I was just trying to call him because I don't have the resources that the government and Coke has. It's just me and somebody you all appointed."

Williams complained about how the government has portrayed her.

"You really upset me about that too because you made it seem like something that it wasn't," Williams said, referring to the discussion with her former boyfriend. "I'm hurt. You turn everybody."

"I respect Coke and I respect this system and everything that goes along with it," Williams added.

"Anything else?" prosecutor Pak asked, almost sarcastically.

"No. But thank you for letting me say it," Williams responded.

Infomercial Fraud Nets Year In Jail (PHI)

By John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, January 31, 2007

A Philadelphia executive who pleaded guilty to participating in a $40 million television infomercial fraud was sentenced yesterday to one year and one day in prison.

Patrick Buttery, 55, was the chief financial officer of Computer Personalities Systems Inc., which operated as the Video Computer Store and Direct 2 U Inc.

On a national scale, the company charged consumers nearly $4 million for computers and parts that were never delivered - putting customers who complained on hold for hours, prosecutors said.

The company also bilked vendors of $13 million in sales and defrauded financial institutions of approximately $22 million. MBNA alone lost $10 million, prosecutors said.

Victims were defrauded between 1999 and 2001, as the business spiraled out of control. An FBI and IRS investigation soon followed, culminating in indictments in 2003.

Buttery's cooperation with authorities helped lead to a guilty plea from George Cappell, the primary defendant. Cappell, the company CEO and star of its television commercials, was sentenced last year to seven years in prison.

"Your cooperation should be substantially rewarded," U.S. District Judge Anita B. Brody told Buttery yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0124999

"You understand that this wasn't just a bad business deal," she said. "You understand this was fraud. In some sense, you were a victim."

Prosecutors Peter Hardy and Judy Goldstein Smith had sought a term of "several years."

Nonetheless, Hardy said afterward: "We believe this is a good sentence and still sends a message to people in Mr. Buttery's position who have gone to business school and have executive positions: When your business starts to go bad on you, what you don't do is turn to crime."

Defense attorneys Benjamin Brait Cooper and Catherine C. Henry told Brody that Buttery was contrite and had worked hard to make up for his mistakes.

"The judge said he was doing a yeoman's job of taking care of his family," Henry said. "It's not just words: Here's a guy who's gone from being a COO to living in his mother-in-law's house, getting up at 2 a.m. each day to deliver the paper, takes care of the kids during the day while his wife works, and then bartends at night. He's changed his life and standard of living and that's what the judge wanted to reward."

Leon A. LaRosa Jr., a forensic accountant who worked with the bankruptcy trustee in the case, shook his head as Brody pronounced sentence.

"A disgrace," he muttered aloud in the last row of the gallery, clearly upset. Afterward, he told reporters: "This shows that crime pays."

Schafer Won't Be Charged In UNT Case (DRC)

By Matthew Zabel, Staff Writer

Denton (TX) Record-Chronicle, January 31, 2007

Federal prosecutors will not press charges against a former Pentagon official whom the University of North Texas paid $310,000 even though he never actually worked for the university, bringing to an apparent end a two-year-long investigation.

Klaus Schafer

Instead, federal investigators said the U.S. Defense Department should handle internally problems with that three-way agreement among itself, UNT and Dr. Klaus Schafer, who served as a top Pentagon adviser on chemical and biological defense.

That decision was outlined in a Jan. 5 investigation report, which the Defense Department made public Monday in response to an open-records request from the DentonRecord-Chronicle.

The federal investigation and UNT's internal investigation found evidence that Schafer backdated parts of the agreement in order to make it appear he had worked for the university when, in fact, he had not.

The federal report says investigators did not interview Schafer.

He could not be reached for comment.

Glen J. Logan, of the Defense Department's Inspector General's Dallas regional office in Arlington, said investigators presented facts of the UNT case to a federal prosecutor and left the decision whether to prosecute with the Justice Department.

"This case was one of those where we didn't have a particular preference either way," Logan said of the Justice Department's decision. "A lot of times what it comes down to is how they can best use their resources. To prosecute a case is a huge demand on resources for the Department of Justice, and they have to determine if it's worth it."

Logan said the Defense Department officials could decide whether or not to take any action, such as firing an employee, changing its procedures, ceasing to do business with an outside institution.

Pentagon officials did not immediately respond to questions about what administrative action the Defense Department would take.

UNT officials said they are happy to see the investigation come to an end.

"The outcome of the federal government's investigation – that UNT engaged in no criminal wrongdoing – is consistent with the findings of our own comprehensive investigation," said Deborah Leliaert, a spokeswoman for the university.

Schafer served as deputy assistant to the Secretary of Defense for nuclear, chemical and biological defense programs between July 2004 and June 2005.

On paper, Schafer was a UNT employee, working under the Intergovernmental Personnel Act of 1970, a law that allows universities and certain other institutions to assign employees to a short-term federal position if authorities at both agencies determine it is in the public's best interest to do so.

UNT signed such an agreement with Schafer and the Defense Department in November 2004, even though Schafer had not been a UNT employee before that.

But federal investigators found evidence that Schafer backdated the agreement and his employment application to make it effective July 1, 2004 in an apparent effort to show he was a UNT employee all along and thus validating his assignment agreement. The federal investigators also found evidence that Schafer coached UNT employees to backdate other documents.

Under the agreement, UNT was to front Schafer's $310,000 salary plus benefits, but the university was eligible to reclaim more than $275,000 from the Defense Department.

UNT has not sought reimbursement for that money.

UNT hired an outside law firm two years ago to begin investigating that agreement and possible fraud associated with it and reported their findings to the Defense Department five months later.

That law firm has billed UNT more than $1.3 million.

MATTHEW ZABEL can be reached at 940-566-6884. His e-mail is mzabel@dentonrc.com

Crime-plagued Regions Vie For New Grants (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 31, 2007

Regions plagued by rising violent crime could share in a $200 million grant next year with a new Justice Department grant targeting gangs, illicit drugs and gun offenses.

The Justice Department will ask for the funding for state, local and tribal authorities as part of its 2008 budget request to Congress next week. It comes in the wake of a 2.2 percent rise nationwide in rapes, murder, robbery, aggravated assault and other violent crimes in 2006 — the first increase since 2001.

Communities that team up with other cities and regions, partnering with at least one federal law enforcement agency, will be eligible for the grants, Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said. Those that work with other communities across state lines will be given priority, he said.

An ongoing department study of crime rates in 18 cities and regions shows that such task forces have "played a significant role in helping to effectively combat violent crime," he said.

Last fall, mayors and police chiefs reported seeing recent spikes in violent crime, calling for greater support from federal law enforcement agencies that have been distracted by counterterror missions since 2001. At the time, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales made combating violent crime a high priority, but he did not commit to providing extra funding.

Whether the new money will get in the hands of local and state police any time soon is another question, as Congress has yet to approve a budget for 2007 fiscal year that began last October.

Roehrkasse said the Justice study's final results will be released later this spring. So far, he said, it has concluded that "there is not one single factor that is contributing to the rise in violent crime in some communities."

Man Receives Rare Death Sentence In New York For Slayings Of Two Police Officers (FINDLAW/AP)

By Tom Hays, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 31, 2007

(AP) - NEW YORK-A man convicted of shooting two police detectives in the head was sentenced to death Tuesday, becoming the first person in more than 50 years to receive a death penalty sentence in a federal case in New York.

The jury had deliberated since Monday before sentencing Ronell Wilson, 24, to die by injection. The jury had convicted Wilson last month of two counts of murder, along with robbery, carjacking and firearms charges.

The last time someone was sentenced to death in a federal case in New York was in 1954 for a bank robber who killed an FBI agent.

Prosecutors claimed the defendant knew that Rodney Andrews and James Nemorin were undercover New York Police Department detectives when he climbed into the back seat of their unmarked car on the pretense of selling them an illegal gun on Staten Island in 2003. Both officers were shot in the head, Nemorin after he pleaded for his life.

An accomplice testified that he and Wilson were in on a plot by a violent drug gang to rob the undercover detectives, believing they were carrying $1,200 to buy guns. But the defense contended there was no convincing evidence the men knew their victims were police officers.

Wilson's attorney, Kelley Sharkey, had cautioned jurors they were making "the ultimate moral decision," and she urged them to show mercy.

"You must be able to say to yourself that 24-year-old Ronell Wilson is beyond hope, is beyond redemption," she said.

Wilson was one of seven people arrested in the case; the other six pleaded guilty to various charges.

There are fewer than 50 inmates nationwide on the federal death row. Three, including Oklahoma City bomber Timothy McVeigh, have been put to death since 2001.

Cop Killer Sentenced To Death (NSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, January 31, 2007

"You are a dead man!"

That was the outcry from the mother-in-law of a slain New York City cop after a jury in a Brooklyn federal courtroom announced Tuesday that Ronell Wilson should be executed for killing her son-in-law and another undercover detective.

Wilson's face seemed to collapse in stunned disbelief as the panel of seven men and five women announced shortly after 5 p.m. that he should get the death penalty for the murders of James Nemorin, 36, of Baldwin Harbor, and Rodney Andrews, 34, of Middle Village, during a botched weapons buy on Staten Island in 2003. The same anonymous jury convicted Wilson, 24, of the racketeering murder charge last month.

Then, in a gesture that shocked and angered many in the courtroom, Wilson appeared to stick out his tongue at the families and supporters of the slain men after the death verdict was announced.

"He stuck his tongue out," said Michael Palladino, the head of the Detectives Endowment Association, who was in court when the verdict was announced. "It was done to taunt the [victims'] families."

Wilson would be the first federal inmate to be executed in a New York case since the 1950s. Julius and Ethel Rosenberg were electrocuted in 1953 for espionage, while Gerhard Puff was executed in 1954 for the murder of an FBI agent.

"I just want to say thank you to God and thank you to the jury and thank you to the prosecutors," Nemorin's widow, Rose, said outside the courthouse. "... I know now James and Andrews can rest in peace. ... When God starts something, he never stops."

"All I can say is that my prayers have been answered," said Andrews' widow, Mary Ann.

"He will get what he deserves," Nemorin's sister, Jean Marie, said of Wilson.

Defense attorneys said they planned to appeal both the verdict and the death penalty sentence.

At the direction of Judge Nicholas Garaufis, the jury foreman rose at 5:07 p.m. and began reading through the panel's decisions, which consisted of a 29-page special verdict form. When the foreman, a young man dressed in a gray suit, announced at page 16 that Wilson should be executed for killing Nemorin, a short, sharp clap broke out from the families of the victims.

"Yes!" exclaimed Nemorin's mother-in-law, Nicole Edouard.

The brief outbursts startled defense attorney Kelley Sharkey, who was standing with Wilson, along with co-counsels Mitchell Dinnerstein and Ephraim Savitt. Wilson's relatives began to sob softly, clasping each other.

The jury announced the death penalty a total of five times to cover Nemorin's and Andrews' deaths through use of a .44-caliber handgun and for the carjacking the resulted in the shootings.

Savitt said appeals on a number of issues could go up to the U.S. Supreme Court.

As the jury was leaving, Wilson's brother Daniel blurted out an expletive before a relative muzzled him with her hand. Federal marshals then took him out of the courtroom.

"You are a dead man," Eduoard shouted at the defendant.

"We love you, Ronell," Wilson's mother and sisters yelled as he was led from the courtroom.

"You're the murderers now," Wilson's mother, Cheryl, shouted toward the side of the courtroom where the victims' families sat.

Outside the courtroom, a group of NYPD officers and detectives applauded the prosecution team of Jack Smith, Colleen Kavanaugh and Morris Fodeman.

"We are gratified for that verdict and hope the verdict brings some closure to the families," Brooklyn U.S. attorney Roslynn Mauskopf told reporters later.

"I want to commend the jury for their difficult and courageous work," Police Commissioner Ray Kelly said last night in a statement.

But Savitt, the lead defense attorney, said he was greatly disappointed by the verdict.

"Applying the death penalty does not do honor to the slain detectives," said Savitt. He said Wilson was only allowed by Garaufis to give a sanitized statement of remorse in court, which the jurors indicated on their verdict form convinced none of them.

Killer Of Detectives Gets Death Sentence (NYT)

By Michael Brick

The New York Times, January 31, 2007

A federal jury sentenced a 24-year-old Staten Island man to death yesterday for killing two undercover police detectives in 2003. It was the first successful federal capital punishment prosecution in New York in more than 50 years.

DOJ_NMG_0125002

After the verdict was read, the defendant, Ronell Wilson, 24, rubbed his palms, looked at his mother, then stuck his tongue out at the families of his victims. His younger brother loudly cursed the jurors, while their mother cried out that they were "the murderers now."

The widows and other relatives of the slain detectives applauded briefly from the gallery, crying, "And the Lord rejoices."

In December, the anonymous jury of seven men and five women convicted Mr. Wilson of shooting the two detectives, James V. Nemorin and Rodney J. Andrews, in the back of the head in a car during a weapons sting on Staten Island on March 10, 2003.

They reached their verdict yesterday after nine hours of deliberations that started Monday afternoon. They found Mr. Wilson devoid of remorse and directed Judge Nicholas G. Garaufis of federal court in Brooklyn to impose sentences of death by lethal injection on five counts.

Three men have been executed in federal cases in the United States in recent decades, first among them Timothy J. McVeigh, for the bombing of the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building in Oklahoma City. Mr. Wilson will join 46 other people on the federal death row.

But in the 20 years since a moratorium on federal capital punishment was lifted, prosecutors in New York have failed to win death sentences against at least 14 defendants, including violent gang members. Federal jurors even refused to execute two terrorists involved in the bombing of United States embassies in East Africa in 1998, after their lawyers argued it would turn them into martyrs. The last federal inmate to be executed in the state was Gerhard Puff, in 1954, a bank robber convicted of killing an F.B.I. agent.

But the murder of two undercover detectives, found bleeding on a Staten Island street in the aftermath of a botched gun transaction, resounded in a city still shaken by the terror attacks of 2001. They were the first two officers killed by gunfire on a single day since 1988.

Working from 29 pages of questions, the jurors dissected a series of factors weighing for and against execution. Affirming elements of their conviction, they found that Mr. Wilson had acted with the intent to kill. They endorsed all the prosecution's assertions, including that Mr. Wilson would remain a danger in prison.

The jurors, who declined interview requests conveyed by the judge, unanimously endorsed nearly all of the defense team's mitigating factors, finding that Mr. Wilson had grown up depressed, sick and trapped in a realm of poverty, deprivation, drug abuse and violence. They wrote in another factor weighing against the death penalty: "Ronell Wilson was possibly subject to peer pressure."

But they unanimously rejected the notions that he has adjusted well to federal prison, taken responsibility for his actions or "has remorse for the murder of Detectives Andrews and Nemorin."

Federal prosecutors vigorously sought the death penalty against Mr. Wilson, taking the case from state prosecutors in Staten Island after the New York death penalty was largely invalidated in 2004. They endorsed plea bargains with seven defendants, young men based around the Stapleton Houses project in northeastern Staten Island.

The group members had forged their camaraderie on admiration for a slightly older man, nicknamed Keyo, who had been killed under unresolved circumstances.

"I heard different stories," testified one group member, Mitchell Diaz, who has pleaded guilty to supplying the weapon used to kill the detectives.

Bearing Keyo tattoos and T-shirts, the men gave themselves nicknames like O and Mal-G, evidence and testimony showed. Between the humdrum stuff of growing up, community college courses, talent shows and outings to Six Flags Great Adventure, they mastered gang signs, sold crack cocaine and beat and robbed their rivals.

On that March night in 2003, the men sold a handgun to Detective Nemorin, 36, a Haitian immigrant and father of three, admired by other officers for his ability to convincingly shed dapper silk scarves for the trappings of a street tough.

As his supervisor would later testify, Detective Nemorin arranged to buy a second gun, a Tec-9 assault pistol, at a rendezvous by the Stapleton Houses a week later. For backup, he brought Detective Andrews, 34, a Navy veteran and divorced father of two with a reputation for making tough arrests.

In a police-issued Nissan Maxima, the detectives approached the towering Stapleton Houses with a handgun for protection and a surveillance transmitter disguised as a pager. As Detective Nemorin drove, they exchanged goofy banter between calls for directions.

On the other side of the telephone line, plans for the transaction were shifting from sale to robbery, members of the group later testified. Outside the housing project, Mr. Wilson climbed into the backseat with Jessie Jacobus, at 16 a 6-foot-3, 240-pound enforcer for the group.

As they circled the streets, Mr. Wilson voiced suspicions of a police presence in the neighborhood.

"It's mad hot," Mr. Wilson said, according to a surveillance recording.

DOJ_NMG_0125003

He also questioned the presence of Detective Andrews, who Detective Nemorin claimed was his brother-in-law. The detectives sought to reassure him with canny street talk and evasive driving, to little discernable effect.

On a dark dead-end street, with no apparent warning, Mr. Wilson fired a single .44-caliber bullet into the skull of each man, starting with Detective Andrews. Gunpowder residue on Detective Nemorin's hand would later bear evidence of his efforts to survive. It was never proven whether Mr. Wilson knew his victims were officers, and an accomplice's recantation eventually prompted prosecutors to drop such charges.

But Mr. Jacobus testified that Mr. Wilson gave a reason for the shootings in the minutes after he pulled the trigger. He quoted Mr. Wilson as saying he did it because he did not care about anybody.

After losing their surveillance signal, police supervisors frantically searched Staten Island, only to find the blood-soaked bodies of their undercover detectives. They temporarily shut down traffic out of the borough, recalling departed ferries and closing bridges. They rounded up the crew within two days.

The prosecutors, Colleen Kavanagh, Morris J. Fodeman and Jack Smith, assisted by Special Agent Thomas Shelton of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobaco, Firearms and Explosives, presented three weeks of testimony and evidence from members of the gang, scientific experts, civilian witnesses, investigators and audio and video surveillance recordings.

Mr. Wilson's lawyers, Ephraim Savitt, Mitchell Dinnerstein and Kelley J. Sharkey, sought to save Mr. Wilson's life by recounting the circumstances of his childhood. Before the jury retired, Mr. Wilson read a brief, heavily edited statement of remorse.

Yesterday afternoon, the jury foreman, dressed in a suit and tie, gave the panel's answers in a loud crisp voice, glancing now and again at Mr. Wilson. He ordered the death sentence, in response to a question, with the word "yes."

From the victim's families came calls of "God bless."

As the jurors receded, Mr. Wilson kissed his forefinger and middle finger, then waved to his mother. If sustained on appeal, his sentence will be carried out by lethal injection at a death row facility in Terre Haute, Ind.

It could be appealed to the Second Circuit Court of Appeals in Manhattan, said Russell Neufeld, a capital defense lawyer who was not involved in the case. If a majority of justices upheld the sentence, it could ascend to the U.S. Supreme Court for a hearing.

The appeal will be the second before the circuit under the modern federal death penalty. The first, from Vermont, entered the appeals court about a year ago and has yet to be decided.

Ephraim Savitt, a lawyer for Mr. Wilson, predicted an appeal based on the jury selection process, among other issues. He lamented the sentence.

"It's a very sad day for the justice system," he said, "when justice and vengeance become one and the same."

"If any case screamed out for the death penalty," said Michael Palladino, president of the Detectives Endowment Association, "it was this case."

Roslynn R. Mauskopf, the United States attorney for the Eastern District of New York, said, "Today justice has been served, and it has been served by a jury from this community. "

In a statement, the police commissioner, Raymond W. Kelly, said: "I want to commend the jury for their difficult and courageous work."

When the courtroom was cleared, the prosecutors emerged to a sustained round of applause.

And Derek Williams, a cousin of Detective Andrews who testified in the penalty phase of the trial, said: "It is some measure of relief, but it is not full closure. It won't be full closure until the sentence is carried out."

The relatives of Mr. Wilson walked away in the dark, under the glare of TV camera lights. He was removed from the courtroom by a different passage.

Prison Time Sought For Ex-official In 'Egregious' Scam (WT)

By Jim Mcelhatton

The Washington Times, January 31, 2007

Federal authorities are seeking at least three years in prison for a former D.C. Office of Property Management executive who pleaded guilty in a scam to extort bribes from contractors with threats that he would blackball them from city contracts.

Narase Bob Oudit, 51, was supposed to be sentenced in federal court in the District earlier this month, but recent concerns about his health have prompted a delay in the criminal case.

Oudit, a former city engineer in charge of several city construction projects, should go to prison for at least 37 months for "sordid misuse of his office to extort city contractors," federal prosecutors argued in a recent court memo.

"On the scale of corruption cases, this one is egregious," Assistant U.S. Attorney Howard R. Sklamberg wrote. "The defendant did not make an isolated demand for a bribe -- he demanded bribes day after day and month after month."

Investigators recorded statements by Oudit to one contractor in which Oudit purportedly sought a contractor to pay him bribes through Oudit's company, BT Contractors.

"Now don't play hardball with me, alright?" Oudit said, according to court records. "Because I'm going to take it away. Then you're all going to eat this."

Mr. Sklamberg called for "stern punishment," saying "these were not requests for a $50 bribe, but demands for bribes totaling hundreds of thousands of dollars."

In one instance, Oudit received $13,500 in bills marked by the FBI from another contractor from whom he demanded $294,000 in exchange for keeping a project from going into default.

Oudit's attorney is seeking probation for his client, whom he calls a devoted family man with no other run-ins with the law.

"Mr. Oudit, prior to this episode in his life, was a law-abiding family man with no prior involvement with the criminal justice system, whose wife and two children depend on him for emotional and financial support," defense attorney Thomas Abbenante argued.

Oudit was supposed to be sentenced earlier this month, but the hearing was postponed amid concerns over an apparent cardiac condition. A letter from his doctor submitted in a recent defense pleading states that stress from being in prison would cause Oudit's heart problems to worsen.

Mr. Sklamberg said Oudit could be incarcerated in a federal prison hospital.

"While the defendant's medical conditions are serious ones, there is no indication they cannot be treated within the [U.S.] Bureau of Prisons," he argued.

Former PR Executive Is Sentenced In Fraud Case (LAT)

By John Spano

The Los Angeles Times, January 31, 2007

Douglas R. Dowie was sentenced today to 42 months in prison for defrauding city taxpayers, tarnishing a career that once scaled the heights of Los Angeles media influence and political power.

In handing down the sentence, U.S. District Judge Gary Feess said that Dowie had "lost moral compass."

"I maintain my innocence, your honor," Dowie said in a three-minute speech before he was sentenced. It was the first time Dowie had spoken about the case in court.

John Stodder Jr., a Dowie assistant and co-defendant, was sentenced to 15 months.

Dowie headed public relations giant Fleishman-Hillard's Los Angeles office and was former managing editor of the Daily News of Los Angeles. He was convicted last year of masterminding a scheme in which he overbilled for services, allowing his office to generate at least $6 million in unearned fees.

The scandal rocked Los Angeles City Hall, spurred ethics reform and helped persuade voters to elect Antonio Villaraigosa as mayor. It also bloodied one of the nation's premier public relations firms, which paid millions in penalties.

Dowie, 58, earned as much as $330,000 a year and built a bustling office through his media and political contacts. The firm's City Hall contracts amounted to $3 million a year from the DWP alone.

Two years ago, Fleishman-Hillard paid almost $6 million to the city of Los Angeles to cover the fraudulent billings. The St. Louis-based firm, with 80 offices worldwide, was not charged with a crime, though a succession of top executives at its Los Angeles office under Dowie were alleged to have participated in the scheme.

Fleishman paid $1 million to defend Dowie, then dropped him. Dowie has run up $3 million in additional unpaid defense costs.

Dowie's lawyers tried to persuade U.S. District Judge Gary Feess that his employer threw him to the wolves and compromised Dowie's constitutional rights.

When Feess turned down Dowie's request for a new trial, the judge said that all of the prosecutor's witnesses, except one, had credibly outlined the conspiracy to defraud.

Stodder, 51, was also convicted by the same federal jury last year. Most other Fleishman co-workers made deals with prosecutors to avoid charges, leaving just one other Dowie aide, Steve Sugerman, to be convicted. He pleaded guilty and testified against Dowie in the trial last year.

The principal witnesses were political figures from the administrations of former Mayors Tom Bradley, Richard Riordan and Kenneth Hahn, powerbrokers at the nexus of business and city politics who claim they can burnish public images for a price.

Deadline For Responses To Justice Subpoenas Extended (HILL)

By Susan Crabtree

The Hill, January 31, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0125005

The deadline for House leaders to respond to Justice Department subpoenas sent to three powerful committees late last year has been extended for a second time.

The U.S. district court in San Diego sent subpoenas requesting documents related to the bribery case against former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.) to the House Appropriations, Armed Services and Intelligence committees late last year. Cunningham, a former member of the Appropriations and Intelligence panels, is serving eight years in prison for accepting more than $2.4 million in bribes in exchange for earmarking government contracts.

The original deadline for Congress to respond was Jan. 11, but that was extended to Jan. 31. A Democratic leadership aide yesterday said that "an agreement on this issue is close" and that the "committees have been given additional time."

House Democratic and GOP leaders contribute to a bipartisan legal advisory group, which works with the House General Counsel's office to respond to subpoenas. Together, these leaders must decide whether to invoke the Speech or Debate Clause of the Constitution, which provides protections for members of Congress and staff, just as those leaders did in May after the FBI raided the office of Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.).

Yesterday, the leadership aide declined to comment about whether House leaders were planning to cooperate or fight the subpoenas.

"The Office of General Counsel remains in negotiation on the terms of the agreement with the [assistant U.S. attorney's office in San Diego]," the aide said.

Consumers Warned Of Loan Scams (USAT)

By Kevin Mccoy

USA Today, January 31, 2007

A flurry of advance-fee loan scams is victimizing consumers across the USA and Canada, the Council of Better Business Bureaus warns.

Consumers who respond to phone calls or ads that purportedly guarantee loans to those with poor credit instead lose hundreds of dollars or more in fees demanded by the suspected scammers.

The frauds follow a typical pattern. Consumers call a toll-free number and are told to submit credit information over the phone or fill out paperwork to be mailed later. In exchange for a $5,000 to $100,000 loan, they are told to wire or mail a money order for $500 or more to pay processing fees or other charges.

The applicants never get the loan, and they lose what they paid in fees. They also risk having their identity stolen if they provided a Social Security number or other personal data to the scammers.

"People with the poorest finances are being victimized," said Steve Cole, CEO of the Council of Better Business Bureaus.

Although the group had no data on the number of victims, spokesman Stephen Cox said workers in the council's 129 local bureaus have fielded a rise in complaints about the alleged scam.

Nata Clegg, a 30-year-old legal-office worker from Fort Worth, said she almost lost $607 this month when scammers told her she qualified for a $5,000 loan.

Luckily, Clegg checked the address listed by the purported firm, Elmhurst Financial Loan Corp., and discovered the location was actually a Boston Market restaurant in Wisconsin.

Clegg immediately called her husband, John, who had gone to a Texas Wal-Mart to wire the required fees.

"I got him just in time," Clegg said. "We were really, really fortunate not to fall victim to this."

Others haven't been as lucky.

According to the council, scammers using the name B&T Financial Group hijacked the website of an Ohio insurance firm near Cleveland late last year. Consumers who responded to loan offers saw the insurance firm's identifying information online. But new phone and fax numbers had been set up by the suspected scammers.

Several victims lost as much as $1,000 each in fees wired to Canada, the council said.

Better Business Bureaus across the country advise consumers who need a loan to search for a reputable local lender. Although fees may be required, legitimate lenders usually deduct them from the loan.

"It is best to double-check any and all loan offers with the BBB to find out if the business can be trusted," Cole said. "We can tell you if other consumers have filed complaints" and try to "verify the legitimacy" of the purported lender.

Federal Judge Asks NY Times Reporter To Appear In Case Of Zyprexa Document Disclosures (FINDLAW/AP)

By Seth Sutel, Ap Business Writer

AP, January 31, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0125006

(AP) - NEW YORK-A New York Times reporter has been asked to appear in federal court next month to answer testimony that a judge said implicated the writer in a "conspiracy" to obtain confidential documents regarding the anti-psychotic drug Zyprexa.

The reporter, Alex Berenson, wrote a number of articles starting late last year saying the drug's manufacturer, Indianapolis-based drug maker Eli Lilly and Co., downplayed Zyprexa's risks and marketed it for unapproved uses. Lilly has denied the charges.

Jack B. Weinstein, a judge in U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York, invited Berenson to appear voluntarily in the court on Feb. 7 to explain how he got the documents, which had been sealed by the court. In a filing Tuesday Weinstein said Berenson could be accompanied by his attorney and would be subject to cross-examination.

The Times said it is considering how to respond. "We just got all the papers in this matter, including the invitation, and we're studying them and will respond to the judge in due course," said spokeswoman Diane McNulty. "We believe our reporting in this matter was very newsworthy and was derived from routine newsgathering procedures."

Weinstein wrote in the filing that he was asking Berenson to appear after hearing testimony from James Gottstein, an Alaska-based lawyer named in Berenson's stories as the source of the documents.

"This invitation is intended to permit Alex Berenson to confront testimony received at a hearing in this court on January 16-17 implicating him in a conspiracy to obtain and publish confidential documents sealed by this court," Weinstein wrote.

In excerpts of Gottstein's testimony included in Weinstein's filing, Gottstein said Berenson had told him that a plaintiff's expert named Dr. David Egilman had a number of documents that Gottstein could obtain by subpoena.

The testimony was taken during a hearing earlier this month over whether the documents provided to The New York Times should be made public.

Lilly also said it had no role in the judge's decision to ask Berenson to appear. Lilly spokesman Phil Belt said he didn't know whether Berenson was involved in a conspiracy but the company would be interested in hearing what he would tell the judge.

Lilly has settled 28,500 Zyprexa-related lawsuits and there are another 1,200 outstanding, according to Belt.

AP Business Reporter Theresa Agovino contributed to this story.

CVS Execs Plead Not Guilty To Corruption (AP)

By Eric Tucker, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 31, 2007

CVS Executives Plead Not Guilty in Influence-Peddling Probe

PROVIDENCE, R.I. (AP) -- Two former executives at CVS Corp. pleaded not guilty Tuesday to federal charges they paid a state senator to kill legislation the drug store chain opposed or sponsor bills that favored the company.

John R. "Jack" Kramer, former CVS senior vice president for corporate affairs and government relations, and Carlos Ortiz, former vice president of government affairs, pleaded not guilty in U.S. District Court to one count each of conspiracy and bribery and 21 counts each of fraud for their contract with former state Sen. John Celona.

U.S. Magistrate David Martin ordered both men released on $10,000 unsecured bond.

Celona, who resigned from the General Assembly in 2004 amid questions about his business dealings with CVS, pleaded guilty to federal mail fraud charges in 2005 and will be sentenced Wednesday.

Kramer and Ortiz have been on leaves of absence from Woonsocket-based CVS since 2004. CVS, the drugstore chain with the most stores in the nation, was not charged with any wrongdoing. CVS has said it is cooperating with the probe.

In his federal guilty plea, Celona also admitted to improper arrangements with Roger Williams Medical Center and Blue Cross and Blue Shield of Rhode Island.

He has been cooperating with the federal government in hopes of a lighter sentence, and he was the star witness during a trial last year that resulted in two former Roger Williams executives being convicted of paying Celona to do the hospital's political bidding. Those executives will also be sentenced Wednesday.

Kramer and Ortiz hired Celona in February 2000, supposedly as a $1,000-per-month consultant to educate senior citizens about health topics and do other public relations tasks. Instead, the indictment said, the money was meant to influence his votes and power as a lawmaker.

Celona was paid roughly $45,000 until the relationship ended in the fall of 2003, according to the indictment.

Celona served on several committees that deal with health care and pharmacies.

His chairmanship on the corporations committee, for example, allowed him to block legislation that CVS opposed.

DOJ_NMG_0125007

One bill he worked to block would have allowed competition to a restrictive network of pharmacies that CVS participated in with Blue Cross and Blue Shield. The position was a switch: Before he was on the CVS payroll, Celona voted in favor of the legislation, known as "Pharmacy Freedom of Choice."

He also blocked the progress of a bill that would have allowed Canadian pharmacies to sell drugs to Rhode Island, a law that could have hurt the chain's business in the state.

Celona also introduced legislation that would benefit CVS, allegedly at the request of Kramer and Ortiz. In one example, he sponsored a bill to require drug manufacturers to accept the return of recalled or damaged pharmaceuticals.

Prosecutors said Celona received other benefits, such as sports tickets and trips to Florida and San Diego.

Lawyers for both men said Tuesday their clients were innocent and would fight the charges.

"We pled not guilty, and we're just going to see the case through," said Mark Smith, an attorney for Ortiz.

Outside the courthouse Tuesday, U.S. Attorney Robert Clark Corrente said his office's influence-peddling probe was continuing.

http://www.cvs.com

2 CVS Execs Plead Not Guilty To Bribery (PROJO)

By Mike Stanton, Journal Staff Writer

The Providence Journal, January 31, 2007

PROVIDENCE -- Two CVS executives, John R. Kramer and Carlos Ortiz, pleaded innocent today in federal court to charges of bribery and conspiracy for hiring former state Sen. John A. Celona as a $1,000-a-month CVS consultant.

U.S. Magistrate Judge David L. Martin ordered the two men released on $10,000 bond apiece and restricted their travel.

Journal photo / Mary Murphy

CVS executive Carlos Ortiz leaves his arraignment.

Kramer, who also has a residence in Arizona, was allowed to travel there and within Rhode Island. Ortiz, who lives in Amherst, Mass., had his travel restricted to Massachusetts and Rhode Island.

Today's court appearance was brief. Neither man had any additional comments.

Ortiz and Kramer were charged on Jan. 18, in a 23-count indictment of conspiracy, of fraud and bribery. They are accused of hiring Celona as a consultant from early 2000 to the fall of 2003, paying him a total of about $45,000 and also lavishing him with golf outings, trips to Florida and California and tickets to professional sporting events.

Although Celona was ostensibly paid to improve CVS' image among consumers, U.S. Attorney Robert Clark Corrente charged that Kramer and Ortiz put Celona on the payroll "to advance the company's legislative agenda … through illicit payments to Senator Celona."

Journal photo / Mary Murphy

CVS executive Jack Kramer arrives with his lawyer, Peter DiBiase, right.

In return, the indictment said, Celona used his political clout to kill controversial "pharmacy choice" legislation that would have expanded the Rhode Island network of pharmacies that accepted Blue Cross reimbursements. CVS, which dominated the restricted network, opposed the bill so strongly that the company tied Kramer's and Ortiz's performance reviews to defeating the legislation.

Killing the legislation, Ortiz wrote in one review, had "helped to protect millions of dollars of sales."

The indictment says that Celona also opposed the licensing of Canadian pharmacies in Rhode Island, pushed legislation to allow the electronic filing of prescriptions and promoted the creation of a state-backed loan program for pharmacy students.

Digital Extra:

More on the CVS indictments

Celona pleaded guilty in 2005 to selling his office to CVS, Blue Cross & Blue Shield of Rhode Island and Roger Williams Medical Center. He testified last fall in the corruption trial leading to the conviction of former Roger Williams executives Robert Urciuoli and Frances Driscoll.

Urciuoli and Driscoll are also set to be sentenced tomorrow.

Bismarck Library Clerk Held For Federal Sex Offense (BISTRIB)

By Jenny Michael

Bismarck (ND) Tribune, January 31, 2007

A Bismarck librarian has been charged in federal court with one count of traveling with the intent to engage in illicit sexual conduct with a minor.

DOJ_NMG_0125008

David Boschee, 37, was charged for allegedly traveling to South Dakota on Sept. 29, 2006, for the purpose of engaging in illicit sexual conduct with a minor, said a news release from U.S. Attorney Marty Jackley from the district of South Dakota.

The charge is punishable by up to 30 years in prison and fines of up to $250,000.

United States Magistrate Judge Charles S. Miller ordered on Monday that Boschee be held until he can be transferred to South Dakota. Boschee was being held in the Burleigh County Detention Center as of Tuesday afternoon.

A trial date has not yet been scheduled.

According to an affidavit written by Federal Bureau of Investigations agent Michelle Behan, Sioux Falls Police Detective Andrea Kelly informed her on Jan. 25 that Boschee had met a 15-year-old Sioux Falls girl over the Internet. Both of them had Myspace.com profiles, the affidavit said.

The girlâ€™s birth date was on her profile, identifying her as a 15-year-old girl, the affidavit said.

Boschee and the girl began e-mailing and chatting with each other online, the affidavit said.

â€œSome of the conversations were sadomasochistic in nature,â€ Behan wrote.

The affidavit said Boschee and the girl planned to meet for sex in Sioux Falls, but the girl changed her mind a week before he came. However, he allegedly went to Sioux Falls anyway and paid for a room at the Super 8 in Sioux Falls with a credit card, the affidavit said.

The girl told police she had sex with him at the motel, the affidavit said.

Miller wrote in an order filed Tuesday that Boschee will be held because evidence suggests he is a flight risk and a danger to the community.

â€œThis evidence includes: the defendantâ€™s itinerant history and tenuous ties to both the district of the offense and the district of the arrest,â€ the order said. It also said there was evidence that Boschee suffers from depression.

â€œWhile the defendant has family that lives in Bismarck and he is employed at the Bismarck Public Library, he is single and has spent considerable time in the past out-of-state,â€ Miller wrote.

Bismarck Police Lt. Dan Donlin said the FBI out of Sioux Falls and the North Dakota Bureau of Criminal Investigations requested that the police department assist in locating Boschee Monday morning.

Police first checked Boscheeâ€™s home on the 900 block of North 13th Street, then found him at the Bismarck Public Library, at 515 N. Fifth St., Donlin said.

Library director Tom Jones said Boschee started a part-time position as a clerk at the circulation desk of the library in August. He has worked 20 to 23 hours per week in a highly visible position in which he was always with other staff members, Jones said.

â€œIâ€™m not aware of any misconduct while he was here,â€ Jones said.

Jones said no action has been taken regarding Boscheeâ€™s employment at the library, and Boschee has not resigned his position.

Donlin said Boschee was taken to the police department for questioning, then was placed in the custody of the U.S. Marshal.

A search warrant was executed on Boscheeâ€™s residence later Monday, the news release said.

The news release said the case is being investigated by the FBI, Sioux Falls Police Department, Bismarck Police Department and North Dakota Bureau of Criminal Investigation.

The case also is part of U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzalesâ€™s Project Safe Childhood, a nationwide initiative designed to protect children from online exploitation and abuse.

(Reach reporter Jenny Michael at 250-8225 or jenny.michael@bismarcktribune.com)

Bill To Track Sex Predators On Web Offered (LAT)

By Jim Puzzanghera, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 31, 2007

Sponsors want offenders to register e-mail addresses. Networking sites could use the data to protect children.

WASHINGTON — Convicted sex offenders released from prison must register their home addresses with authorities. Now some in Congress want to extend that requirement to cyberspace.

To prevent sexual predators from trolling the Internet for young victims, a bipartisan group of lawmakers Tuesday introduced legislation that would require sex offenders to register their e-mail addresses and make them available to social networking sites. The proposal also would make it a crime for adults to lie about their age in pursuit of sex with a minor.

"Just as we protect kids in physical neighborhoods, we have to protect them in online communities," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y), a sponsor along with Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.). House legislation was introduced by four lawmakers, including Earl Pomeroy (D-N.D.), who helped create a new online database of convicted sex offenders last year.

Named in memory of Adam Walsh, the son of "America's Most Wanted" host John Walsh, and other victims, that legislation easily passed Congress and was signed by President Bush in July.

Backers predicted the new proposal, called the Keeping the Internet Devoid of Sexual Predators Act, would receive similar support, although the Electronic Frontier Foundation has expressed privacy concerns.

MySpace.com, the most-visited social networking site, endorsed the legislation and already is using data from the existing registry to try to identify sexual predators, said Chief Security Officer Hemanshu Nigam. Concerns about child safety have dogged MySpace and its parent, Fox Interactive Media.

"Our laws need to change with the times," said Nigam, a former federal prosecutor hired last year. "We can no longer unwittingly provide an advantage to predators online."

Facebook.com, another popular social networking site, also backs the bill.

The bill would require convicted sex offenders to register any e-mail address or instant messaging handle with the National Sex Offender Registry. Failure to comply would result in a maximum 10-year prison term and constitute a parole violation that would send any released felon on supervised release back to prison.

The information would not be released to the public, but would be provided by the Justice Department to commercial social networking sites. Although sites would not be required to use the database, Pomeroy said they would be risking civil liability if they did not.

In addition, the legislation would make it a federal crime, with a maximum 20-year prison sentence, for Internet users to misrepresent their ages in order to engage in or facilitate sexual conduct with a minor.

Sponsors admit the law would not be foolproof and that convicted sex offenders simply could create new e-mail addresses. But the stiff penalties would lead many to comply, just as they do with their physical addresses, the lawmakers said.

"Maybe you can't force them off the Internet, maybe you can't force them to change their ways," said Rep. Anthony Weiner (D-N.Y.). "But you increase the penalty and increase the way we track their movements as best we possibly can."

jim.puzzanghera@latimes.com

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Noxubee Official: Races Divided (JCL)

By Jimmie E. Gates

Jackson (MS) Clarion-Ledger, January 31, 2007

Trial into alleged voting bias continues today

Black and white residents in Noxubee County are as divided as they were 35 years ago, one black county leader testified Tuesday.

In the small, majority-black county in east Mississippi, racial division has been the norm, said Noxubee County Election Commission Chairman John Bankhead.

"We don't need to be split; we need to come together," Bankhead said. "This will put them (race relations) back 10 years before they can come together again."

In the first lawsuit of its kind in the United States, the U.S. Department of Justice is accusing black political leaders in Noxubee County of discriminating against white voters.

The three-week trial in U.S. District Court is expected to conclude by the end of this week.

The defense began putting on its case Monday, with Bankhead as one of the witnesses.

Bankhead said that when integration began, white residents pulled their children out of public school in the county. He said he has both white friends and black friends but there is little socialization of the races today.

The Election Commission is a defendant in the federal lawsuit, but the Justice Department has alleged few or no overt acts by the commission to discriminate against white voters.

The Justice Department's lawsuit mostly accuses Noxubee County Democratic Committee Chairman Ike Brown and people working in concert with him of discriminating against white voters.

Bankhead served as head of the Noxubee Democratic Executive Committee before Brown.

"When I was chairperson, there was no discrimination against anyone," Bankhead said.

Shuqualak Mayor Velma Jenkins testified Tuesday that she had served as a poll worker in Democratic primaries while Brown was executive committee chairman.

"He has never asked me to do anything to violate the law," Jenkins said.

Most of the complaints from the Justice Department revolve around county elections in 2003.

On cross-examination by a Justice Department attorney, Jenkins said she didn't see any white poll workers for Democratic races and didn't see any black poll workers for Republican races during the Aug. 5, 2003, primary elections.

At one point during Jenkins' cross-examination, Wil Colom, attorney for Brown and the executive committee, accused the government of badgering defense witnesses about the race of people working polls.

"I have refrained from asking white witnesses about them sending their kids out of the county to school because I knew it would make things worse in Noxubee County," Colom said.

Justice Department attorney Christopher Coates immediately objected, saying Colom was threatening there could be violence in the county as a result of the suit.

U.S. District Judge Tom S. Lee urged the parties not to make inflammatory statements.

Lawsuit Accuses Black Officials Of Violating Whites' Voting Rights (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 31, 2007

A federal court trial is expected to end this week in a Justice Department lawsuit seeking an end to "relentless voting-related discrimination" by black political leaders in a rural Mississippi county -- the first suit brought under the Voting Rights Act of 1965 that accuses blacks of suppressing the rights of whites.

The lawsuit targets Ike Brown, longtime political boss of Noxubee County, Miss., who serves as chairman of the Democratic Executive Committee and superintendent of Democratic primary elections, and Carl Mickens, circuit clerk for Noxubee County and superintendent of non-primary elections.

The two black officials are charged with engaging in a "pattern of discriminatory action" over a period of several years that resulted in the denial of the rights of white citizens of Noxubee County to "participate in the political process and to elect candidates of their choice."

The non-jury trial, which is scheduled to conclude later this week and go to U.S. District Judge Tom S. Lee, has pitted the county's black-controlled political power structure against government prosecutors, who have accused Mr. Brown and his backers of seeking to rig elections to guarantee that white candidates lost.

Defense attorneys in the case began calling witnesses this week, hoping to counter government accusations that Mr. Brown was "the puppet master" of a far-ranging conspiracy to violate the voting rights of whites.

Mr. Brown's attorney, Wil Colom, told the Commercial Dispatch that the Justice Department in three weeks of testimony had presented only scant evidence that his client was biased against whites as he oversaw Noxubee County elections during his six-year tenure as Democratic Party chief.

"They can't find a racist statement Ike Brown has made since he became chairman," Mr. Colom said.

A defense witness, James Bridges, one of eight black Noxubee County precinct workers called to testify, yesterday told the judge, "We're in charge of the [poll] tables. Nobody else dictates," the newspaper said.

The lawsuit was filed in February 2005 in the wake of a two-year Justice Department investigation into suspected voting irregularities in Noxubee County. The department is seeking a preliminary and permanent injunction to prevent any discrimination against voters based on race.

Noxubee County is located about 100 miles northeast of Jackson, the state capital, on the Alabama border. Its 12,548 residents are 69 percent black and 29 percent white, according to the U.S. Census Bureau. The lawsuit said "racially-polarized" discrimination in the county affected 2,826 white persons of voting age.

Mr. Brown and Mr. Mickens have denied government's accusations they conspired against white voters and candidates, saying whites lose in local elections because they are in the minority.

"Voting is racially polarized in Noxubee County," Richard Engstrom, a voting-rights specialist hired by Mr. Brown to rebut the Justice Department's arguments, said in a report to the court. "Whites voters clearly prefer white candidates over African-American candidates, and they frequently are on the losing end of the elections because their candidate preferences are not shared by the African-American voters."

But the Justice department lawsuit said:

·White voters and candidates, along with those who supported them, experienced "relentless voting-related racial discrimination" at the direction of Mr. Brown, Mr. Mickens and others acting in concert with them.

·Mr. Brown recruited and qualified black candidates from outside Noxubee County to run against white candidates he knew "did not qualify under state residency laws" and excluded whites from participating in Democratic Executive Committee meetings and caucuses.

DOJ_NMG_0125011

·Mr. Mickens manipulated and permitted Mr. Brown to tamper with voter registration polls "in an unlawful manner" by moving voters from one district to another to affect racial percentages "in an attempt to alter the outcome in certain black-on-white elections."

·Mr. Brown attempted to prohibit white voters from voting in Democratic primaries even though they were legally entitled to do so, criticized black citizens for supporting white candidates or forming biracial coalitions, illegally rejected the absentee ballots of white voters, and failed to provide white candidates with information about absentee ballots.

·Mr. Brown and Mr. Mickens discriminated against whites in the selection of persons to work as poll managers and workers, discriminated against whites by not allowing them and their supporters to observe the disposition of challenges to absentee ballots, and allowed blacks who were not residents of Noxubee County to vote in county elections.

·Mr. Mickens treated voters in a "hostile and intimidating manner" after they went to the courthouse to vote absentee ballots, instructing them "in a coercive manner" to vote for candidates he preferred rather than those preferred by the voters.

Attorneys for the Democratic Executive Committee, Mr. Brown and the Noxubee County Election Commission asked last week for the case to be dismissed after the government rested on Monday. Judge Lee denied the request.

Mr. Brown, a former tax preparer who served 21 months in prison in the 1990s on a felony conviction of preparing fraudulent federal income-tax returns, also has denied Justice Department accusations he used racial slurs to alienate blacks who supported white candidates, published the names of white voters to intimidate them, and illegally labeled white voters' absentee ballots so they would be rejected by election officials.

Can Blacks Discriminate Against White Voting Rights? (JCL)

Jackson (MS) Clarion-Ledger, January 31, 2007

A trip to any public library that offers a history book can establish that for more than a century, the white power structure in Mississippi found innumerable methods to discriminate against black voters.

That discrimination took the form of acts as raw and blunt as murder, terrorism, beatings, threats and economic sanctions. It also was as oblique and infuriating as poll taxes and literacy tests that required the voter to successfully ascertain the number of bubbles on a bar of soap.

In 1875, the so-called "First Mississippi Plan" to discriminate against black voters was an open campaign of murder, violence, terror and fraud perpetrated in most cases by undisguised whites against the state's black registered voters.

By 1890, the "Second Mississippi Plan" took up where the first one left off. This time, white voter discrimination against blacks was written into the law in the 1890 Mississippi Constitution and state laws.

Vestiges of those "Jim Crow" laws were routinely practiced in Mississippi well into my childhood in the 1960s and visible in segregated rest rooms, drinking fountains and even hospital and clinic waiting rooms.

In some sections of Mississippi, the murder, violence, terror and fraud continued into and past the 1960s in Mississippi, as well. By then, the perpetrators of the violence hid behind sheets or under cover of darkness.

Against the backdrop of Mississippi's history of white voter discrimination against blacks, does one even dare ask the question: "Can blacks discriminate against white voting rights in Mississippi?"

It's a valid question and the answer is obvious.

The "First Mississippi Plan" - brute violence and oppression - was made expressly illegal in 1964. The Civil Rights Act of 1964 outlawed discrimination based on race, color, religion, sex or national origin.

The "Second Mississippi Plan" - voter discrimination written into the law - was expressly outlawed a year later. The Voting Rights Act of 1965 held that "no voting qualification or prerequisite to voting, or standard, practice, or procedure shall be imposed or applied by any state or political subdivision to deny or abridge the right of any citizen of the United States to vote on account of race or color."

Neither of those laws declared that civil rights or voting rights were sacred for African Americans exclusively. Therefore, black citizens can under the right circumstances without question discriminate against white citizens' voting rights.

The Voting Rights Act has been used dozens, perhaps hundreds of times to protect the voting rights of black Mississippians against discrimination from whites. But in the federal courthouse in Jackson this month, U.S. District Judge Tom S. Lee has been presiding over the first case in history in which the federal government has accused black Mississippi election officials of violating the Voting Rights Act by discriminating against white voters in Noxubee County.

U.S. Justice Department attorneys have been trying to convince Lee that black Noxubee County Democratic Party leaders now in power have systematically denied the voting rights of white voters.

The feds are alleging that Noxubee County Democratic Party Chairman Ike Brown and his loyalists have rigged the voting process against white voters by manipulating voter rolls, making threats to ban some whites from voting and miscounting ballots to ensure white candidates lost and other discriminatory acts.

Brown has denied all allegations, accusing the white minority in Noxubee County of sour grapes after years of white discrimination against black voters there.

There is no jury. Lee will decide this historic case. The nation will watch the outcome. But if the government proves voter discrimination by Brown, the outcome of the case shouldn't be in doubt.

Discrimination is discrimination - and it's wrong in whatever color it comes. That's the law.

FBI To Interview Student In Greenwood School Confrontation (AP)

By Holbrook Mohr

AP, January 31, 2007

JACKSON, Miss. - The FBI wants to interview a high school student involved in a confrontation with a police officer who twice pulled his gun in front of dozens of pupils at Greenwood High School last month, the bureau confirmed Tuesday.

Carlos Moore of Grenada, the attorney for 18-year-old James Marshall, issued a news release saying the FBI is "launching a preliminary investigation into whether Officer Casey Wiggins of the Greenwood Police Department violated Marshall's civil rights in violation of federal criminal law."

However, Deborah Madden, spokeswoman for the FBI in Mississippi, told The Associated Press there is no investigation at this point.

"In order to determine whether grounds exist to open a preliminary investigation, a request was made to Mr. Moore that the FBI be allowed to interview Mr. Marshall," Madden said.

Moore did not immediately respond to a message left Tuesday at his office.

Moore already has filed a $2 million lawsuit seeking damages from Wiggins, Greenwood High School, the police department and others. He also filed a federal criminal complaint with the U.S Justice Department, accusing Wiggins of violating Marshall's civil rights with excessive force and of making a false arrest under the color of law.

Moore claims race played a factor in the Dec. 6 confrontation that was captured by school surveillance cameras.

The video tapes show a brief scuffle in which the white officer, who was working a security detail at the school, pointed his weapon at an unarmed Marshall, who is black. The officer also appears to put the teen in a choke hold.

The security tapes are the basis of the case. Marshall says they show excessive force. Wiggins and his attorney claim the officer was using necessary tactics to subdue a resisting Marshall.

Marshall has not been charged with a crime, and was released soon after other officers viewed the tapes, Moore has said.

Wiggins' attorney has said his client will be vindicated. Wiggins still is on the police force but no longer works in the school.

Moore has also questioned why Wiggins, who is not certified by the state, was allowed to work in the school.

Robert Davis, director of Law Enforcement Standards and Training for the Department of Public Safety, has said Wiggins should have been under the direct supervision of a certified police officer. In Mississippi, police officers can serve for up to two years as trainees before they get their state certification.

There were no other police officers visible in the video of the scuffle.

Ex-jailers' Sentences On Hold Until After Teel Trial (BSH)

By Robin Fitzgerald

Biloxi Sun Herald, January 31, 2007

GULFPORT - Former corrections officers who have agreed to plea bargains in an inmate-abuse investigation won't be sentenced until after the trial of Ryan Michael Teel on May 28.

Morgan Lee Thompson, one of five former Harrison County jailers to plead guilty in the federal criminal case, was set for sentencing Tuesday. He and the others won't be sentenced until after Teel's charges are resolved, court orders show.

Nearly a year has passed since the fatal beating that prompted scrutiny of complaints of unnecessary, excessive use of force against inmates at the Harrison County jail. Teel's charges accuse him of attempting to kill Jessie Lee Williams Jr., a 40-year-old inmate beaten Feb. 4, 2006. Williams died when taken off life-support two days later.

It remains unclear if others will be charged in the exposé of jailers who conspired to deprive rights under color of law and covered up the illegal acts.

U.S. Attorney Dunn Lampton on Tuesday said he couldn't give a time frame for the investigation's end.

"The investigation will continue until every avenue and every lead is exhausted," Lampton said. "It's going to be thorough. I'm hopeful we're getting to the end of it and I think we are."

Lampton said he can't discuss details because of Teel's pending trial and the ongoing investigation.

"At the proper time, I will release a detailed report," Lampton said, "but under the circumstances, mainly because of Teel's charges, I'm somewhat limited in what I can say."

Teel, 29, remains in custody at an undisclosed location. The detention order signed after his arrest Aug. 28, 2006, says he is considered a serious flight risk and a possible endangerment to "the safety of another person or the community."

Jim Davis, Teel's lead defense attorney, confirmed his recent meeting with the U.S. Justice Department's death-penalty panel in Washington. The government has until Feb. 16 to announce whether it will seek the death penalty.

If not, Teel faces a life prison sentence plus 20 years if convicted on both counts. He has pleaded not guilty.

Guilty pleas by Regina Lynn Rhodes, 29, and Morgan Thompson, 29, include admission of their roles in Williams' beating and confirmation of a pattern of jailhouse abuse against hundreds of inmates.

Evidence behind the guilty pleas shows the abuse began sometime before August 2001 and continued until at least April 2006, according to federal trial attorney John Richmond. The other pleas came from Dedri Yulon Caldwell, 45, Thomas Preston Wills, 25, and William Jeffery Priest, 34.

Rhodes faces a maximum sentence of 13 years. The others face up to 10 years. They're likely to receive leniency for becoming government witnesses. All five remain free on unsecured bonds of $25,000. An unsecured bond doesn't have to be paid unless a defendant fails to appear in court.

Seattle Violated Constitutional Rights Of 1999 World Trade Organization Protesters, Jury Says (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, January 31, 2007

(AP) - SEATTLE-A federal jury found Tuesday that the city of Seattle violated the constitutional rights of 200 protesters who were arrested during a demonstration during the World Trade Organization meeting in 1999.

The jury found the city liable for violating the protesters' constitutional rights against unreasonable search and seizure, but did not find a violation against their free speech rights.

U.S. District Judge Marsha Pechman had already ruled that police had made the arrests without probable cause.

Attorneys for the city said they plan to appeal the decision.

The week of the arrests, about 50,000 protesters swarmed Seattle, overwhelming police and closing down the meeting. The mayor imposed a curfew and limited the downtown core to WTO delegates, police and emergency workers, store employees, residents and shoppers.

The area became known as the "no-protest zone," even though shoppers, residents and others allowed in the zone were not exempted from protesting.

The group of demonstrators were arrested when they marched within the zone, where they sat down, chanted and sang.

Chief Denies Police Were Told To Retreat (WT)

By S.a. Miller

The Washington Times, January 31, 2007

U.S. Capitol Police Chief Phillip Morse met privately yesterday with a senator and denied that he ordered officers not to arrest war protesters who painted slogans on the sidewalk near the Capitol.

Chief Morse conceded shortcomings in the police response Saturday at the protest against the Iraq war, however, and vowed to revise plans for managing demonstrations, Sen. Wayne Allard said after meeting with the chief.

"There was no order to retreat [or] not arrest anybody," said Mr. Allard, Colorado Republican. "He had ordered them that if they saw anybody breaking the law, they were to arrest them. ... They did not see them paint the graffiti."

The chief's pledge to review department policy follows public complaints that protesters painted anarchist symbols and slogans on the Capitol sidewalk Saturday right in front of Capitol Police officers.

The graffiti included the phrases "all cops are pigs" and "you can't stop us," officers said.

Sgt. Kimberly Schneider, a department spokeswoman, said a band of protesters splintered from the tens of thousands on the Mall, mixed with visitors exiting the Capitol and in the confusion spray-painted the sidewalk.

However, some officers said the order for "hands off" protesters came from House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat.

"The word going around is that [the order] came from Pelosi's office," an officer told The Washington Times. "The order was not to interfere with the protesters."

Pelosi spokesman Drew Hammill said the speaker, who was in Afghanistan on Saturday, had not communicated with police about the demonstration. "No one from our office had any contact with police about response to [protesters]," he said.

He suggested conservative groups were spreading the story about Mrs. Pelosi's involvement.

Capitol Police officials could not verify whether any orders originated from the speaker's office.

DOJ_NMG_0125014

"There are a lot of rumors going around, and I can't confirm that," Sgt. Schneider said. "There was a set of decisions that were made at the time, based on the circumstances."

Those decisions were made by "law-enforcement officers on the scene," she said.

She also said officers discovered the graffiti after a crowd cleared from the west entrance to the building.

A police union leader contradicted the official account of events.

"The officers, who did their job both professionally and courageously, were ordered to withdraw by their officials and let the demonstrators have the area where the graffiti was later discovered," Andy Maybo, chairman of the U.S. Capitol Police Fraternal Order of Police, told members in an e-mail, a copy of which was obtained by The Times.

"We, as officers, take our duties and responsibilities very seriously and are disappointed that no arrests were made," he said. "But we must follow the orders of our officials even when we may disagree with such orders. We are just thankful that no one was injured."

Mr. Allard said that he was satisfied with Chief Morse's explanation that the officers did not see vandals writing on the sidewalk.

"From what I can tell, they worked in a responsible way," he said.

Leaders of the demonstrations, including peace activist Cindy Sheehan, say Democrats owe their election gains to the anti-war movement and now must bow to demands to end the Iraq war. And Democrats have shown tolerance of such protests since taking control of Congress earlier this month.

At a hearing yesterday into whether Congress has the authority to end the war by cutting off funding, a large group of people wearing anti-war T-shirts and buttons repeatedly shouted down senators delivering opening remarks.

One woman shouted that she wanted to know why President Bush's daughters are not being sent into battle. Later, a row of women stood and hoisted a hand-made banner calling for an end to the war.

Capitol Police were summoned, but Democrats running the hearing permitted the protesters to remain, despite the disruptions.

c Charles Hurt contributed to this report

Prison's Hidden Threat (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 31, 2007

Male inmates and their partners are at high risk of HIV infection, so Maxine Waters' bill for automatic testing is a step in the right direction.

EVERYONE KNOWS THAT male prisoners are one of the highest-risk populations for HIV/AIDS, spreading the virus not just behind bars but out in the community upon release. Yet few public officials have done anything about it. Until now.

Rep. Maxine Waters (D-Los Angeles) is about to introduce legislation to make HIV testing automatic for inmates as they enter and exit federal prisons, unless the prisoners opt out. It's a strong step in the right direction, even if we'd rather see that loophole closed.

Research shows that male prisoners are three to five times more likely to be infected with HIV than are members of the general population, yet many prisons test only when an inmate shows HIV symptoms or when body fluids have been exchanged in detectable incidents such as fights.

Because two-thirds of inmates are black or Latino men, the consequences of unprotected sex in prisons have been particularly devastating for minority communities. HIV rates have skyrocketed among young gay men and the female partners of ex-cons. As of 2003, African Americans and Latinas accounted for 83% of all new AIDS cases among women in the United States.

And it's not just the inmates and their outside partners who are at risk. In a Centers for Disease Control and Prevention study of HIV in Georgia's state prisons, many men who became infected said their partners were prison staff members

Waters is calling for HIV testing to become part of the comprehensive medical exam inmates receive upon entering prison; counseling would be provided before and after the test. The bill also would beef up HIV education for inmates and confidentiality training for prison staff. The Congressional Budget Office estimates that it would cost $750,000 to $2 million annually.

When announcing the bill, Waters lambasted national leaders, African Americans in particular, for their "morally reprehensible" silence on the subject of HIV/AIDS. Fear of testing and of being stigmatized shouldn't block real-world efforts to halt the spread of HIV, she warned.

Yet that's what happened last fall, when Waters first proposed the bill. The American Civil Liberties Union, gay rights advocates and some members of Congress quickly lined up against the idea of mandatory testing, arguing that HIV-positive inmates endure violence and discrimination. But deliberate and potentially life-threatening ignorance is not the solution to that problem.

Making HIV tests automatic for a high-risk, captive population is vital not just for the health of inmates and their partners but for policymakers in understanding what goes on in the nation's disgracefully dysfunctional prisons. Now if only the state of California would follow suit.

Woman Jailed After Reporting Rape (AP)

By Phil Davis, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 31, 2007

A woman who told police she had been raped was jailed for two days after officers found an old warrant accusing her of failing to pay restitution for a 2003 theft arrest.

While she was behind bars, according to the college student's attorney, a jail worker refused to give her a second dose of the morning-after contraceptive pill because of the worker's religious convictions.

The 21-year-old woman was released Monday only after attorney Vic Moore reported her plight to the local media.

"Shocked. Stunned. Outraged. I don't have words to describe it," Moore said. "She is not a victim of any one person. She is a victim of the system. There's just got to be some humanity involved when it's a victim of rape."

Moore said the woman was not allowed to take the second emergency contraceptive pill until Monday afternoon, a day late, after reporters called police and jail officials.

Tampa Police Chief Steve Hogue said the arrest led to a new policy Tuesday that tells officers not to arrest a crime victim who has suffered injury or mental trauma whenever "reasonably possible." The agency also apologized to the student.

"Obviously, any policy that allows a sexual battery victim to spend a night in jail is a flawed policy," police spokeswoman Laura McElroy said.

The woman is not being identified by The Associated Press because she reported being the victim of a sex crime.

Tampa attorney Jennifer D'Angelo, who represents the jail worker, said Tuesday that her client is prohibited from giving inmates any medication without specific orders. The worker insists she never discussed religion with the woman who reported being raped.

"She was mortified at what was being reported in the press," said D'Angelo, who declined to identify the worker. "She's frightened for her job and she's frightened about community backlash about these allegations."

The employee, who has worked for a jail health care contractor for about six months, was placed on administrative leave, D'Angelo said.

Moore said it was too soon to say if his client would sue. Her first priority was making sure detectives find her attacker.

"She is brave," Moore said. "We are going to work with police to catch this monster."

She was in Tampa on Saturday for Gasparilla, an annual pirate-themed parade that draws thousands of people. She said she was walking alone to her car when a man pulled her behind a building and raped her, McElroy said.

She reported the rape Saturday afternoon, and officers took her to a rape crisis center where she was given the first of two doses of the morning-after pill, McElroy said. The second dose is supposed to be taken within 24 hours.

Later, as she was riding in a patrol car trying to locate the crime scene in the dark, police found the warrant stemming from a 2003 juvenile arrest for grand theft and burglary. It said she owed $4,585.

"They stopped the investigation right there," and put her in handcuffs, Moore said.

Authorities arranged a special bond hearing Monday. "When the chief's office learned we had a rape victim in jail, we began working very aggressively to get her out," McElroy said.

Jennifer Dritt, executive director of the Florida Council Against Sexual Violence, wanted more explanation from the jail, saying the woman's arrest "makes people think law enforcement doesn't have a victim-centered approach."

Moore said his client believes she paid the fine for what he described as a childish mistake. He didn't have details of that arrest, but the woman has no criminal history as an adult, according to the Florida Department of Law Enforcement.

The sheriff's office, which runs the jail, said in a statement Tuesday that it is investigating the complaint and declined to comment further.

ANTITRUST:

Wall Street Firms Bank On Independent Delta (AJC)

By Russell Grantham, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, January 31, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0125016

With a decision on US Airways' $10 billion takeover bid looming, Delta Air Lines is trotting out some heavyweight support for its drive to stay independent.

The Atlanta airline announced Tuesday that it had arranged for $2.5 billion in exit financing to fuel its plan to emerge from Chapter 11 proceedings on its own this spring. Such financing is an expected but critical step in any Chapter 11 reorganization.

The news was well-timed for those rooting for Delta to fend off the US Airways merger proposal, which carries a Thursday deadline for a response from Delta's official creditors committee. The committee usually meets on Wednesdays and could announce a position on the merger as soon as today.

Delta said its financial backing comes from six powerhouse Wall Street firms, inluding Goldman Sachs and Merrill Lynch, and represents an endorsement of its independent reorganization.

"We appreciate the confidence the financial markets are showing by making this commitment in support of Delta's standalone plan," Delta Chief Financial Officer Ed Bastian said in a statement.

Delta's press release included endorsements of Delta's exit plan from all six of the firms.

"UBS is excited to be involved in Delta's exit financing and helping Delta emerge on a standalone basis," the Swiss investment bank said in a statement.

"That little wrinkle is unusual," said Jack Williams, a bankruptcy expert at Georgia State University. He said lenders often express support for their client companies, but not in such detail.

But given the hostile takeover bid, added Williams, "it's not surprising that you'd see some public posturing."

Delta management — aided by employee and retiree groups — has vigorously fought US Airways' stock-and-cash offer to merge with Delta and adopt the Delta name. However, the creditors committee could force the airline to move into serious merger talks if it concludes the proposal offers better returns on claims than Delta's standalone plan. The committee represents the biggest suppliers, banks and other groups owed money by Delta.

A hearing on the next step in Delta's standalone restructuring plan is set for Feb. 7 in bankruptcy court in New York. US Airways wants the creditors committee to signal support for continued merger talks by, among other things, seeking a delay in that hearing.

US Airways Chief Executive Doug Parker told CNBC on Tuesday that he has not gotten a response from Delta's creditors since his airline sweetened its bid earlier this month. He said he's not interested in pursuing Delta beyond Thursday's deadline without creditors' support.

A spokesman for US Airways, Phil Gee, called Delta's exit financing announcement "no surprise."

"It doesn't really mean anything," Gee said.

But analysts say Tempe, Ariz.-based US Airways' bid seems to have lost momentum in the last week or two as Delta rallied support among employees, politicians, communities and industry groups worried about job losses and higher fares. Those issues might work against Justice Department approval of a merger — another factor creditors have to weigh as part of their calculations of a merger's viability.

"I think it's all over," veteran airline analyst Ray Neidl of Calyon Securities said Tuesday of US Airways' run at Delta.

Unlike some other bankrupt airlines trying to get out of Chapter 11 in recent years, Delta's ability to round up financial backers was not thought to be in doubt. While Delta and some other carriers are still dipping into the red in some quarters and struggling with fuel costs, industry conditions are much improved.

"It's a different environment now," said Neidl. "Airlines are in favor now."

Delta plans to use most of the money to pay off earlier, so-called "debtor-in-possession" loans from GE Capital and American Express, which total $2.1 billion.

Getting such financing is "potentially a very difficult hurdle," noted Walter Curchack, a New York bankruptcy attorney who was involved in Pan Am's Chapter 11 case. He said Pan Am died in 1991 when Delta, after buying certain assets from the beleaguered carrier, pullled the plug on a deal to provide exit financing.

"Delta backed out and the rest was history," he said.

But Curchack said the exit financing package announced Tuesday indicates many Delta creditors and lenders have concluded it's safer to back Delta's standalone plan than US Airways' potentially more valuable, but also more risky, proposal.

"I think the uncertainty around the merger proposal doesn't make anyone comfortable," he said.

Delta hopes to emerge in the spring if it can win the backing of a majority of creditors, including at least two-thirds in terms of the value of their claims. It would pay off their claims with newly issued stock.

One group of creditors holding about 15 percent of Delta claims has publicly backed further exploration of a merger. Last weekend it worked to broker a $1 billion boost to the cash portion of US Airways' offer. Parker told CNBC on Tuesday that his airline is "willing to have discussions" about the offer but has put no sweetened offer on the table.

But even if Delta fends off US Airways, it could still face a rough time rounding up enough creditors' votes and getting its plan confirmed at a hearing currently set for April 25, Curchack said.

"There's still lots of things that can go wrong," he said.

Some key upcoming dates

· Thursday: US Airways' deadline for Delta creditors to indicate interest in merger proposal. If creditors say no, US Airways says the offer will die. If the creditors agree to certain steps, management could be forced to open merger talks and federal regulators would be asked to review any deal.

· Feb. 7: Bankruptcy court hearing on Delta's request for permission to start gathering creditor backing for its standalone reorganization plan.

· March 20:* Delta's deadline to file additional details, including executive compensation.

· April 9: Deadline for Delta to win backing from a majority of creditors — and at least two-thirds in terms of the value of claims — for its reorganization plan.

· April 25: Judge to rule on reorganization plan.

· Shortly after: If judge approves of reorganization plan, Delta would pay off lenders, issue new stock to creditors and exit Chapter 11. Current stock would be eliminated.

* Approximate date, based on company plans

US Airways May Be Ready To Abandon Offer For Delta (USAT)

By Marilyn Adams

USA Today, January 31, 2007

Showing frustration, US Airways CEO Douglas Parker said Tuesday that his company will drop its bid for Delta Air Lines on Thursday if bankruptcy creditors don't signal support for the $10 billion offer.

Delta's creditors "know exactly what they have to do," Parker said in a conference call on quarterly earnings. "If this (creditors) committee is not willing to do what it should do for investors … we're not willing to pursue this transaction anymore."

Although Parker had earlier placed a Feb. 1 deadline on his offer, his comments suggested for the first time that US Airways may be poised to walk away from the deal it proposed in mid-November and sweetened earlier this month.

Parker's comments followed days of frantic maneuvering by people on all sides of the controversial bid. US Airways' cash-and-stock offer for Delta, which has been in Chapter 11 reorganization since September 2005, has been rejected by Delta's management. Delta has lobbied its creditors to accept Delta's own plan to emerge as a stand-alone carrier. A merger would create the country's biggest domestic carrier.

Parker sweetened the offer for Delta by 20% three weeks ago, and the court-approved committee representing Delta's creditors hasn't responded. The committee could act today. Parker wants the creditors to force Atlanta-based Delta to open its books and postpone a bankruptcy court hearing scheduled for next Wednesday on Delta's stand-alone plan.

Delta on Tuesday announced it has landed $2.5 billion in bankruptcy exit financing from JPMorgan, Goldman Sachs, Merrill Lynch, Lehman Bros., UBS and Barclays Capital. Delta hopes to exit bankruptcy in the spring. The loan would be used to repay the $2.1 billion Delta borrowed from American Express and GE Capital when it filed for Chapter 11.

Delta CFO Edward Bastian said the number of A-list lenders shows support on Wall Street for an independent Delta. Delta says it would be worth as much as $12 billion as an independent company.

To win support for its own plan, Delta has told creditors it would not rule out a future merger with another airline and would forgo establishing a "poison pill," a mechanism that would allow directors to block future takeovers. To be approved, Delta's stand-alone plan must win support from creditors representing two-thirds of total claims.

Parker said his airline has become the nation's most-profitable network carrier. For 2006, US Airways posted a $303 million profit, or $3.32 a share. For the last quarter, including special items, it reported a profit of $12 million, or 13 cents a share. That compares with a loss of $261 million, or $3.27 a share, a year ago.

Firms Go Private In Search Of Deeper Pockets (WP)

By David Cho

The Washington Post, January 31, 2007

The world may be eating more doughnuts now that Jon Luther's firm, Dunkin' Brands, has joined the most prominent trend on Wall Street these days: going private.

Since three private-equity firms bought out the Dunkin' Donuts parent for $2.4 billion in 2005, Luther has doubled store growth, retooled his executives' pay and opened his first branches in Asia. And he did it behind a veil of privacy, away from the glare of analysts and federal regulators.

DOJ_NMG_0125018

All of this was made possible by the deep pockets of private-equity firms. "These are not barbarians at the gate," Luther said. "They are more partners than owners."

Not since junk bonds has an alternative form of investment risen to prominence as quickly as private equity, an obscure world where fund managers risk billions to buy and try to turn around slumping companies, and then sell them for a profit.

With unprecedented sums in their coffers, private-equity firms have the ability to buy all but the biggest companies. Among their prize catches are Toys R Us, Neiman Marcus, Hertz, Burger King, Harrah's Entertainment, Clear Channel Communications and HCA, the nation's largest hospital company.

Last year, private-equity firms spent a record $540 billion to acquire companies in virtually every sector, up from $59 billion three years ago, and in the process have been dramatically changing the cast of powerbrokers on Wall Street. Although average investors can benefit from the run-up in stock prices during one of these buyouts, the trend has concentrated control of major swaths of U.S. industry in the hands of a few wealthy groups that do not have to reveal much about their operations.

This year began with the biggest proposed private buyout on record -- for Equity Office Properties Trust, the nation's largest office landlord. Blackstone Group last week put forth a $38.3 billion buyout offer, which would include the assumption of Equity Office's $16 billion debt. That bested a $38 billion bid earlier this month by a group of real estate investors led by Vornado Realty Trust. Today is the deadline for that group to make a counter bid.

The surge in private deals is raising concerns in Washington. The Justice Department is looking into whether some of these buyouts are anti-competitive. Last week, the Federal Trade Commission ordered District-based Carlyle Group, the nation's largest private-equity firm, to give up management control and its board seats at Magellan Midstream because Carlyle is part of the group buying oil pipeline operator Kinder Morgan for $22 billion. The two energy-distribution companies dominate the same 11 markets across the Southeast United States.

Unlike the late 1990s, when founders of Internet start-ups dreamed of seeing their ticker symbol stream across public exchanges, going private is suddenly in vogue.

The success of private equity has drawn the affluent and powerful, including former president George H.W. Bush, former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney and U2's Bono, as well as such corporate luminaries as Jack Welch, the retired head of General Electric, and the former chief executives of Wells Fargo, IBM and Procter & Gamble.

"Today there isn't a public board out there that hasn't talked once about private equity, whereas five years ago it may have been the exception," said Jordan Hitch, managing director at private-equity shop Bain Capital. "The sexiness of being public has been diluted."

Private-equity firms usually accept money from only super-wealthy investors and huge institutions like pension funds. As massive private funds formed over the past few years and returned about 25 percent annually -- with top performers getting 40 percent or higher -- nearly all major pensions reallocated their holdings, pouring billions into the sector despite the higher risks. These pensions now are tied to how private equity navigates the economy, said Colin Blaydon, director of the Center for Private Equity and Entrepreneurship.

Private equity "is seen by pension funds as their best hope," Blaydon said. It will have a huge impact on "the average worker -- teachers, firemen, the guys on the assembly line. . . . It is a big part of their retirement benefit."

But this murky world is not easy to grasp and can be risky. The deals are complex in how debt and financial tools are used to acquire firms. Also, private companies do not have to submit financial statements to the Securities and Exchange Commission or hold public conference calls with analysts.

Yet private equity's imprint on Wall Street is unmistakable. When recent rumors emerged of a possible deal for Home Depot, the company's stock rose while the price of its corporate bonds dropped -- a sign that both stock and bond holders thought a private buyout was possible, despite the company's market capitalization of $87 billion, said Michael Dahood, a fixed-income analyst at Sterne, Agee & Leach Group.

Analysts say even bigger buyouts than the one proposed for Equity Office could happen this year since private-equity firms often team up to buy companies. Private buyouts drove the volume of mergers and acquisitions to a near record last year, accounting for 30 percent of announced deals, according to Bloomberg Financial. In the 1980s and '90s, that figure had been between 3 and 5 percent.

"If one firm is capable of taking down a $30 billion firm, where is the ceiling for what two or three or four private-equity firms could do [together]?" said Robert Keiser, vice president of proprietary research at Thomson Financial.

Some analysts are concerned that this trend -- like the dot-com era of the late 1990s -- is a bubble that will burst during a downturn when the money for acquisitions becomes harder to borrow. They add that it is hard to track what many of these firms are doing.

"When a credit downturn occurs, there's the potential here for quite high default rates and large losses for debt holders," said Ken Emery of Moody's Investor Service.

DOJ_NMG_0125019

For their part, chief executives say going private can be a boon to business. Burlington Coat Factory Warehouse agreed to a private buyout last year after 34 years as a family-owned business. The stock had been languishing when Bain Capital bought the firm for $2.1 billion. Since then, said chief executive Mark Nesci, the firm has invested in new technology and customer research -- expenditures that may pay off down the road but could adversely affect earnings the next quarter.

"As a private company, if the results take a little longer to produce than expected, we don't get crucified," Nesci said.

Chief executives typically restructure executive compensation after a private buyout to align performance and pay. Luther of Dunkin' Brands, for one, insisted that all of his officers invest in the business.

This does not mean pay is lower in the private sector. Millard "Mickey" Drexler, whom private-equity shop Texas Pacific Group hired to run J. Crew, earned a modest $200,000 salary. But he was allowed to invest his own money and held a 12 percent stake when the retailer was spun back to the public market in what was one of the most successful initial public offerings of 2006. The value of his shares is estimated at $194 million.

Private-equity firms make money by charging pensions and other investors about a 2 percent fee each year, meaning a $1 billion fund would produce $20 million for the fund managers. They aim to sell these companies in about three to five years, typically reaping 20 percent of the gain, with the rest going to investors. In some cases, the pressure to sell has created a slash-and-burn attitude. The billionaire investor Warren Buffett decried this aspect of private equity and criticized the firms for bilking investors with high fees.

Private-equity firms acquire companies through leveraged buyouts. In general, firms have two sources of cash for operations, debt and equity. Private-equity buyouts aim to load companies up with lots of debt.

The concept is akin to buying a house with a small down payment. If a buyer purchases a $100,000 home with $10,000 in cash and a $90,000 mortgage loan, that person would enjoy a bigger percentage gain if the house rises in value than someone who buys it outright. The downside, of course, is the risk of taking on so much debt -- a homeowner may not be able to make the mortgage payments. The buyer also could lose the down payment if the value of the property falls.

In recent years, borrowing massive sums has become easier, with more favorable terms offered to borrowers. This cheap credit has been the primary driver behind the surge in leveraged buyouts.

Many industry buffs say this party won't last forever. Even Blackstone Group co-founder Steve Schwarzman said last week that he expects returns from private-equity firms like his to decline as the business cycle turns.

Others say that even if returns decline, companies in the long run would be strengthened by the turnaround efforts of private-equity firms.

"Money has become a commodity," said Daniel D'Aniello, co-founder of Carlyle Group. "It's what you add on the shop-room floor that will make the real difference."

U.S Senate To Look Into Mergers In Pharmacy Benefit Industry (BLOOM)

By Rob Waters

Bloomberg, January 31, 2007

Jan. 30 (Bloomberg) -- U.S. Senator Herb Kohl, the Wisconsin Democrat who has taken over as chair of the Senate's antitrust subcommittee, said the panel will scrutinize mergers among pharmacy benefit managers.

The subcommittee will examine such transactions ``to ensure that this consolidation does not create any anti-competitive bottlenecks," according to a statement posted today on the senator's Web site.

Caremark Rx Inc., the second-largest U.S. pharmacy benefits manager, is currently the object of a bidding war between Express Scripts Inc. and CVS Corp. If Express Scripts prevails, the merged company would be larger in the pharmacy benefit management field than Medco Health Solutions Inc., now the biggest competitor in the industry.

The subcommittee will also focus on ``eliminating barriers" that might keep cheaper generic versions of name-brand drugs from getting on the market, according to the posting.

AMD Lawyer Sees Easing Of Antitrust Enforcement (MERCN)

By Therese Poletti

The San Jose Mercury News, January 31, 2007

BERKELEY - An attorney for Advanced Micro Devices, longtime foe of chip giant Intel, said Tuesday that regulators are less aggressive in going after monopolistic practices in the United States in recent years.

``Right now from a business perspective, it appears frankly that there has been a retreat from Section 2 enforcement," said Tom McCoy, executive vice president of legal affairs at AMD of Sunnyvale, referring to the part of the Sherman Act that prohibits monopolization. McCoy made his comments during a day of informational hearings held by U.S. regulators on monopolistic behavior.

DOJ_NMG_0125020

McCoy was one of several technology company executives who spoke at the event, held at the University of California at Berkeley's Haas School of Business to examine whether and when specific types of single-company conduct may violate Section 2 of the Sherman Act. The hearings were informational and were meant to provide ``real-world insight'' for regulators, said FTC assistant general counsel Karen Grimm.

In answer to a question from Grimm on whether the FTC and the Department of Justice are failing to challenge single-firm conduct, McCoy said he believed that Section 2 violations ``are not getting the same kind of energetic enforcement and investigation'' as they have in the past. Grimm declined to comment on McCoy's response.

In June 2005, AMD sued Santa Clara-based Intel for anticompetitive practices in the United States. That suit was on the heels of an action in March 2005 by the Japanese Fair Trade Commission, which told Intel to halt the practice of requiring PC makers to limit the use of competitors' chips in exchange for monetary rebates. Intel said it would adhere to the recommendations by Japan's FTC, but said it did not agree with the agency's findings of fact.

As an example of AMD's concerns, McCoy described an instance cited in its U.S. complaint. In 2003, AMD tried to give computer maker Hewlett-Packard 1 million new processors for free, as an attempt to gain some share in the PC market.

But HP only used 140,000 of the chips, leaving 860,000 on the table, because it was afraid of retaliation from the dominant chip player Intel, AMD said.

``Customers paid more and were forcibly deprived of AMD alternatives,'' said McCoy.

Intel denies AMD's charges, and says its rivals claims are incorrect and contradictory.

AMD is also pursuing an antitrust case in the European Union against Intel.

In a morning panel, a Microsoft attorney discussed the general chilling effect of the company's constant review of potential antitrust concerns on its product development. He said the consequences are longer product development times, limits to product improvement and increased research and development costs.

NY Teen In Piracy Lawsuit Accuses Record Companies Of Collusion (AP)

By Jim Fitzgerald, The Associated Press

AP, January 31, 2007

WHITE PLAINS, N.Y. (AP) — A 16-year-old boy being sued for online music piracy accused the recording industry on Tuesday of violating antitrust laws, conspiring to defraud the courts and making extortionate threats.

In papers responding to a lawsuit filed by five record companies, Robert Santangelo, who was as young as 11 when the alleged piracy occurred, denied ever disseminating music and said it's impossible to prove that he did.

Santangelo is the son of Patti Santangelo, the 42-year-old suburban mother of five who was sued by the record companies in 2005. She refused to settle, took her case public and became a heroine to supporters of Internet freedom.

The industry dropped its case against her in December but sued Robert and his sister Michelle, now 20, in federal court in White Plains. Michelle has been ordered to pay $30,750 in a default judgment because she did not respond to the lawsuit.

Robert Santangelo and his lawyer, Jordan Glass, responded at length on Tuesday, raising 32 defenses, demanding a jury trial and filing a counterclaim against the companies for allegedly damaging the boy's reputation, distracting him from school and costing him legal fees.

His defenses to the industry's lawsuit include that he never sent copyrighted music to others; that the recording companies promoted file sharing before turning against it; that average computer users were never warned that it was illegal; that the statute of limitations has passed; and that all the music claimed to have been downloaded was actually owned by his sister on store-bought CDs.

Santangelo also claims that the record companies, which have filed more than 18,000 piracy lawsuits in federal courts, "have engaged in a wide-ranging conspiracy to defraud the courts of the United States."

The papers allege that the companies, "ostensibly competitors in the recording industry, are a cartel acting collusively in violation of the antitrust laws and public policy" by bringing the piracy cases jointly and using the same agency "to make extortionate threats ... to force defendants to pay."

The Recording Industry Association of America, which has coordinated most of the lawsuits, issued a statement saying, "The record industry has suffered enormously due to piracy. That includes thousands of layoffs. We must protect our rights. Nothing in a filing full of recycled charges that have gone nowhere in the past changes that fact."

Tobacco's Stigma Aside, Wall Street Finds A Lot To Like (NYT)

By Andrew Martin

The New York Times, January 31, 2007

There are plenty of reasons cigarettes would seem to be a terrible business.

DOJ_NMG_0125021

The number of American smokers usually drops about 1 or 2 percent a year. Government agencies keep adding cigarette taxes and outlawing smoking in restaurants, workplaces and even on public sidewalks. And tobacco companies continue to pay billions of dollars in legal settlements, money that is used in part to produce antismoking ads.

For all the industry's apparent troubles, however, the future of cigarettes appears to be brighter than ever.

That at least is the message investors are sending as the Altria Group — the company once known as Philip Morris and the maker of the world's most popular cigarette, Marlboro — prepares to split itself by spinning off its Kraft Foods division to shareholders and become, once again, primarily a tobacco company. Today, Louis C. Camilleri, the chief executive of Altria, is expected to set a timetable for completing the spinoff.

It is a move that Wall Street is responding to with the equivalent of a standing ovation, but it is not because Kraft Foods, the world's second-largest food company, after Nestlé, will finally shed the taint of tobacco.

Investors are glad that Altria will finally be rid of Kraft Foods, the maker of Oreo cookies, Velveeta and Tang. Since October, when the company announced its plan for the move, its shares have risen 10 percent.

"Something that is forgotten in all of this is people like to smoke," said David Adelman, an analyst at Morgan Stanley, who noted that United States tobacco stocks have beaten the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index in each of the last six years. "It's enjoyable and there's not an alternative product."

He added: "If frozen dinners get too expensive, people will try something else. That's not true with cigarettes — you are not up at night worried about that product that is going to make cigarettes obsolete."

In the five and a half years since Altria sold 280 million shares of Kraft at $31 each in an initial public offering, the stock has remained relatively unchanged, closing yesterday at $34.83. Altria owns 88.6 percent of Kraft's stock.

By contrast, shares of Altria have nearly doubled during that period, moving from $47 to yesterday's price of $87.54.

It is a remarkable turnabout, considering that in late 2001, Philip Morris announced its plan to change its name to the Altria Group (drawn from the Latin word altus, meaning high, to suggest high performance). At the time, executives said the name change was intended to reduce the damage to the company's reputation that cigarettes were causing, reflected in the long-depressed share price at the time.

Now, it is Kraft that is seen by many investors as a hindrance to the company.

Why is Wall Street so infatuated with cigarettes? Cigarettes have certain advantages over other consumer products, not the least of which is that they are addictive. They are inexpensive to make, require almost no innovation, there is a global market for them, and cigarette makers can raise prices without seeing much of a drop in business.

On top of all that, a recent string of court decisions has convinced investors that the worst of the litigation against tobacco companies is over.

That, in turn, has allowed Altria to move forward with a revamping that begins with cutting Kraft loose and will ultimately allow Altria to use the huge amounts of cash generated by cigarettes to buy back stock or acquire other tobacco companies, particularly overseas.

"You take away Kraft out of Altria and you are left with a balance sheet that is extremely strong," said Charles Norton, portfolio manager at the Vice Fund, a mutual fund that invests in tobacco, gambling, alcohol and military contractors. Altria is the fund's biggest holding. "It's just a cash cow. The free cash flow on this business is just tremendous."

The future prospects are particularly attractive in developing countries, where smoking has not yet declined as it has in more developed parts of the world like the United States and Europe.

In China, for instance, the Philip Morris International unit of Altria signed a deal in 2005 that allows it to manufacture and sell Marlboro cigarettes to the country's 350 million smokers. There are an estimated 1.3 billion smokers worldwide.

But even in the United States, with 45 million smokers, the Philip Morris USA unit of Altria continues to generate sizable profits by raising prices. It also hopes eventually to lure consumers with new tobacco products, including a small tea-bag-like pouch that is smoke-free, spit-free and tucks into the cheek.

It says it is also working on developing cigarettes that are less harmful.

"The exciting part for me," said Bonnie Herzog, an analyst at Citigroup, "is that tobacco use today will evolve. It's unlikely that there will ever be a 100 percent safe cigarette, but we feel that a reduced-risk cigarette is on the horizon."

But some health advocates say that the diminished social acceptability of cigarettes will hurt the long-term prospects of companies like Altria.

"The industry knows that its days of successfully selling their product in this country are limited," said Dr. David A. Kessler, who called for regulating the tobacco industry as commissioner of the Food and Drug Administration in the 1990s and is now dean of the medical school at the University of California, San Francisco.

"They may be finding favor on Wall Street, but they're not finding favor in the public arena," he added. "There are fewer and fewer places that you can go and smoke in public."

DOJ_NMG_0125022

Still, on Wall Street, analysts are much less enthusiastic about the future of an independent Kraft Foods — which makes a wide range of well-known food products — compared with Altria's prospects.

Kraft has struggled for several years to find its way in a rapidly changing marketplace, and Irene B. Rosenfeld, the chief executive, is expected to lay out her plans for a turnaround next month.

While many analysts say that Kraft is better off without the taint of tobacco, it still faces formidable challenges in repositioning its products at a time when consumers are less loyal to brands and more attracted to natural products, analysts said.

Investors in Altria are expected to get 0.695 share of Kraft for every share of Altria they own, said Ms. Herzog, who predicted that Altria would distribute the shares early in a 120-day period between the announcement and the distribution.

There is, however, a possibility that the distribution could be delayed by a legal challenge.

Michael D. Hausfeld, a lawyer in a pending class-action lawsuit against tobacco companies, said he might file an injunction to stop a spinoff of Kraft. The lawsuit, first filed in 2004 and known as the Schwab case after the lead plaintiff, Barbara Schwab, contends that cigarette manufacturers defrauded consumers by marketing light cigarettes as safer than regular cigarettes.

The idea behind seeking an injunction is that a judgment could be so enormous that Altria might need Kraft — with a market capitalization of $57.25 billion — to pay off the damages.

"Apparently at this point they have decided to spin Kraft off because they believe there's a diminishment in their legal exposure," Mr. Hausfeld said. "We disagree. If anything, the light's fraud presents the strongest legal merit claims against the industry and Philip Morris."

He estimated that a judgment in the case could be "several hundreds of billions of dollars" because 30 million to 50 million people who smoked light cigarettes made by several different tobacco companies were affected over more than 30 years. Asked to comment on Wall Street's affection for tobacco stocks, Mr. Hausfeld said: "Wall Street loves money. And cigarettes are money. You are clearly earning huge returns at the expense of people's lives."

Several analysts who track Altria have dismissed the chances of an injunction's success, and in an October conference call with investors, Mr. Camilleri, the Altria chief executive, said, "We believe that such an action would not have merit and that we would ultimately prevail."

Altria's plan to spin off Kraft is part of a long-term revamping plan that may ultimately split the domestic and international tobacco businesses into two companies because Altria thinks they would have more value as independent companies.

For example, Philip Morris International would no longer be dragged down by problems associated with smoking in the United States, like diminished demand and government intervention.

"At times, as a tobacco investor or a tobacco analyst, it seems like an unending stream of negative news," Mr. Adelman of Morgan Stanley said. "You hear about smoking bans, a new piece of legislation. You hear about criticism from the World Health Organization.

"And then lo and behold, manufacturers release their results," he said. "And they are good."

Change Of Control Or Out Of Control? (WP)

By Steven Pearlstein

The Washington Post, January 31, 2007

One thing you can count on in any merger or acquisition is that the executives who negotiate them always come out winners.

That's not the case for shareholders, who, according to academic studies, are as likely as not to see a decline in the value of their holdings. Or rank-and-file employees, some of whom inevitably lose their jobs. These deals are not even a sure win for customers, who often suffer from glitches when organizations combine operations.

But there's never any doubt about the executives. The history of mergers and acquisitions is full of deals that fell apart over the issue of which chief executive would wind up running the show. And I've yet to run across the corporate executive who doesn't emerge from a merger with a set-for-life severance payment or a pay-and-stock-option package bigger than it was before.

A case in point is the proposed purchase of Caremark Rx, the pharmacy-benefits manager, by CVS, the pharmacy chain, which was announced late last year.

Under the merger terms, Caremark's top executives, down to the level of senior vice president, are to receive change-of-control payments due under their employment contracts. The top five executives are collectively entitled to about $100 million, with more than half going to Mac Crawford, the chief executive who oversaw the CVS negotiations. Add to that at least another $10 million going to other top executives.

DOJ_NMG_0125023

These change-of-control payments are now standard fare in the executive-compensation game. Their purpose is to attract highly sought individuals by offering them a measure of financial security in case they lose their jobs as a result of mergers and acquisitions. In the case of top executives, these provisions are also meant to align their personal interests with those of shareholders, so they remain open to any offer to buy the company that might involve losing their jobs.

We could have a lively debate about the size of these payments, or why comfortable executives ought to be protected from the vicissitudes of market capitalism while the working stiffs are left to fend for themselves. But the more immediate question is why Caremark executives are in line to get any change-of-control payments, given that the merger agreement also guarantees them generous employment contracts in the newly combined enterprise.

To be fair, not everyone is staying. Crawford agreed to step down as an executive and will serve only as chairman of the new board of directors. We also learn from the company's proxy statement that, as an indication of his commitment and confidence in the merger, the 58-year-old Crawford has agreed to reduce his change-of-control payments by at least $10 million.

For the others, however, the question remains: Why should shareholders provide millions of dollars in what amounts to severance payments to executives who aren't being severed?

Caremark officials argue these are not severance payments but "signing" bonuses designed to keep a successful management team in place. After all, under the terms of the agreement, the money will be paid only if the executives remain with the company for three years.

This sounds reasonable, until you think about it a bit. Last year, these executives were apparently willing and eager to work for Caremark for $500,000 or $750,000 a year, plus bonuses and stock options. But now that the name on the door is about to change, we are supposed to believe these same executives are available to do the same jobs only if they get a million-dollar signing bonus.

This isn't the only item that has caught the attention of shareholders. Some have criticized provisions that indemnify executives and directors from lawsuits or legal penalties that might arise from anything they did while at Caremark -- including possible backdating of stock options, which is now the subject of a federal inquiry. Questions have also been raised about the $625 million "breakup fee" Caremark will have to pay if it backs out of the deal and the offer of board seats for many of Caremark's directors.

These concerns take on greater significance now that Caremark's executives and directors have rejected a competing bid from Express Scripts valued at 13 percent above the CVS offer. Irrespective of the other issues raised by the Express Scripts offer, have the views of Caremark executives and directors been colored by the sweet terms they negotiated for themselves in the CVS deal?

That question will be explored by Delaware's chancery court, where Express Scripts and two public pension funds have filed suit to stop the merger. The judge in the case, William Chandler, will have a chance to review all particulars, including evidence of other offers Caremark spurned before it accepted the one from CVS. But the case also gives Chandler an opportunity to set some reasonable limits on the widespread use of breakup fees, indemnification clauses and change-of-control payments, all of which may be of greater value to corporate executives than to the shareholders whose interests they are supposed to represent.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Scientists: White House Pressured Us To Downplay Global Warming (USAT/AP)

USA Today, January 31, 2007

WASHINGTON — Federal scientists have been pressured to play down global warming, advocacy groups testified Tuesday at the Democrats' first investigative hearing since taking control of Congress.

The House hearing focused on allegations that the White House for years has closely controlled what scientists have been allowed to tell the public.

"It appears there may have been an orchestrated campaign to mislead the public about climate change," said Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif. Waxman is chairman of the Oversight and Government Reform Committee.

Two private groups produced a survey of 279 government climate scientists showing that many of them say they have been subjected to political pressure aimed at downplaying the climate threat. Their complaints ranged from a challenge to using the phrase "global warming" to preventing scientists from talking to the media.

The survey and separate interviews with scientists have "brought to light numerous ways in which U.S. federal climate science has been filtered, suppressed and manipulated," Francesca Grifo, a senior scientist at the Union of Concerned Scientists, testified. Grifo's group and the Government Accountability Project produced the report.

DOJ_NMG_0125024

Drew Shindell, a climate scientist with NASA, described how a news release on his study forecasting a significant warming in Antarctica was "repeatedly delayed, altered and watered down" at the insistence of the White House.

Administration officials were not called to testify. In the past, the White House has said it has only sought to inject balance into reports on climate change. President Bush has acknowledged concerns about global warming, but he strongly opposes mandatory caps of "greenhouse gas" emissions, arguing that such an approach would be too costly.

Waxman, White House Are At Loggerheads On Climate Papers (LAT)

By Richard Simon

Los Angeles Times, January 31, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Following through on the Democratic Party's pledge to conduct aggressive oversight, Rep. Henry A. Waxman of California headed toward a possible confrontation Tuesday with the White House over his demands for documents that could show whether the Bush administration interfered with the work of government climate scientists to downplay the dangers of global warming.

Waxman, presiding over his first hearing as chairman of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, did not threaten to issue subpoenas, but said he would "insist on Congress' right" to the information. Waxman and the committee's top Republican, Rep. Tom Davis of Virginia, sent a strongly worded letter to the White House Council on Environmental Quality calling on it to "reconsider the confrontational approach" and produce the documents within 10 days.

"The committee isn't trying to obtain state secrets or documents that could affect our immediate national security," said Waxman, complaining that he and Davis have been asking for the documents for six months. "We are simply seeking answers to whether the White House's political staff is inappropriately censoring impartial government scientists."

Davis added: "We have every right to understand what the science is showing and how the administration is spinning it."

A spokeswoman for the Council on Environmental Quality branded as "false" allegations that the administration has attempted to interfere with the work of climate scientists. Kristen Hellmer also said the agency has provided more than 10,000 pages of documents and would try to work with the committee.

The oversight hearing was one of the first held by the new Democratic majority in Congress. Waxman plans to hold four hearings next week on fraud, waste and abuse in government spending in Iraq and other areas.

Tuesday's hearing was prompted by reports that administration appointees, including a former oil industry lobbyist who was chief of staff at the Council on Environmental Quality, edited climate change reports or pressured scientists to tone down statements about the dangers of global warming.

The White House has opposed mandatory caps on greenhouse gases, such as carbon dioxide, blamed for global warming, contending they could prove costly to industry and harm the economy.

Waxman said that the evidence examined by his staff so far strongly suggests administration officials have attempted to "mislead the public by injecting doubt into the science of global warming."

He cited documents that were edited to add "balance" by emphasizing the "beneficial effects" of climate change, to delete a discussion of the human health and environmental effects of climate change and to remove the statement that changes "observed over the last several decades are likely mostly the result of human activities."

Appearing before the committee, Rick Piltz, a former official in the U.S. Climate Change Science Program who is now director of Climate Science Watch for the Government Accountability Project, a "whistle-blower protection" group, said he experienced first-hand the administration's "politicization of climate science."

"Administration political officials appeared increasingly to take an interest in managing the flow of communications pertaining to climate change in such a way as to minimize the perception that scientifically based communications might be seen as conflicting with the administration's political message on climate change policy," he said.

During the hearing, the Union of Concerned Scientists reported that it has found 150 government scientists who say they have experienced political interference in their work in the last five years.

Drew Shindell, a NASA scientist, told the committee that the title of a news release was changed from "Cool Antarctica may warm rapidly this century, study finds" to "Scientists predict Antarctic climate changes."

"Not surprisingly, it generated relatively little media interest and the results have been slow to enter the wider public discussion regarding the level of scientific understanding of global warming," he said.

Davis, however, said that he hadn't seen evidence of anything other than an administration attempting to put its own political spin on research, something he said that Democratic and Republican administrations have done.

Has The White House Interfered On Global Warming Reports? (CSM)

By Peter N. Spotts

DOJ_NMG_0125025

Christian Science Monitor, January 31, 2007

More than 120 scientists across seven federal agencies say they have been pressured to remove references to "climate change" and "global warming" from a range of documents, including press releases and communications with Congress. Roughly the same number say appointees altered the meaning of scientific findings on climate contained in communications related to their research.

These findings, part of a new report compiled by two watchdog groups, shed new light on complaints by a scattering of scientists over the past year who have publicly complained that Bush administration appointees have tried to mute or muzzle what researchers have to say about global warming.

"We are beyond the anecdotal," says Francesca Grifo, director of the scientific integrity program at the Union of Concerned Scientists (UCS), one of the two groups, referring to press reports of a dozen instances of interference that have emerged over the past 12 months. "We now have evidence to support the view that this problem goes deeper than just these few high-profile cases."

Global-warming science must be accurately represented to enable lawmakers to craft adequate policies to control the problem and adapt to climate change, Dr. Grifo says. Scientists at the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, and other agencies working on climate-related issues are doing excellent work. "But it's under threat, and they are struggling to get their results out" to the general public, she says.

Grifo described some of the report's findings during hearings Tuesday before the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform and during a press briefing afterward. The two groups say they will release additional material next week, when the Senate Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation holds similar hearings.

On the eve of 'consensus' report

The hearings and the new report come as climate scientists from around the world have gathered in Paris to put the finishing touches on a comprehensive "state of the science" report on global warming. The volume is a "consensus" document that summarizes the past five years of peer-reviewed research on the subject and is set for release Friday.

Meanwhile, Congress is considering several pieces of legislation that would impose controls on industrial carbon-dioxide emissions – blamed for trapping heat in the atmosphere and contributing to the noticeable warming effect on the earth's climate.

The question is not so much about federal scientists' ability to publish their results in specialized journals that few but their colleagues read, the report's authors say. Instead, the trouble arises when agencies translate "journalese" into language the general public or lawmakers can grasp for use in official government reports or media releases.

The UCS is an environmental group with a longstanding interest in the politicization of science. The other watchdog group behind the report, the Government Accountability Project (GAP), supports strong protections for whistleblowers.

Their report combines a written survey the UCS gave to 1,600 scientists (of which 279 responded) with in-depth interviews GAP held with some 40 scientists and officials, such as agency press officers. GAP also pored over thousands of pages of documents gathered via the Freedom of Information Act, says Tarek Maassari, a staff attorney with the group.

Sometimes scientists and career public-affairs officers would send press releases related to global warming up the ladder for review, then never hear back. Or appointees changed the wording in ways that scientists felt distorted the results or their implications, and the researchers weren't given a chance to argue their case. One of the most blatant examples focuses on the issue of hurricanes and global warming. According to the report, in 2005, the White House stepped in to block an interview MSNBC sought with NOAA scientist Thomas Knutson, who a year earlier had published a modeling study on the potential link between hurricanes and global warming. The interview was to focus on new research by other scientists that suggested global warming has contributed to trends toward stronger hurricanes.

Documents GAP obtained showed that instead of approving subsequent interviews with Dr. Knutson, high-level public-affairs officers routed interview requests to NOAA scientist Chris Landsea in Miami, who argued, in part, that the quality of global hurricane data was too poor and inconsistent to draw meaningful conclusions. In another instance, reporters interested in interviewing a NOAA scientist who had coauthored a new research paper concluding that modern warming "is dominated by human influences" were sent instead to then-deputy administrator Jim Mahoney.

Details of interference

In all, 150 scientists reported a combined 435 instances of real or perceived "interference" related to global-warming research within the past five years. This has led to self-censorship, Mr. Maassari says,

During Tuesday's hearing, additional evidence came from Rick Piltz, who resigned from his position as senior associate with the administration's Climate Change Science Program (CCSP) in 2005 over what he saw as repeated instances of interference in the program's reporting process – often with pressure coming from two conservative think tanks that have spearheaded efforts to debunk global warming. One of their key contacts in the White House, he says, was the chief of staff of the president's Council on Environmental Quality, Philip Cooney, who served as an attorney and lobbyist for the American Petroleum Institute prior to joining the council.

DOJ_NMG_0125026

The UCS and GAP offer what they call a model policy that they say would reduce the likelihood of political interference in communicating scientific results on climate. "We respect the idea that policy needs to be coordinated within agencies," Grifo says. "We're not talking about having scientists coming out with policy" but rather with their specific results.

The issue of climate-science politicization reemerged last year following a report in The New York Times about a NASA public affairs officer's attempt to muzzle James Hansen, a noted climate researcher at NASA's Goddard Institute for Space Studies in New York. Subsequent stories alluded to similar activities at NOAA.

This led NASA Administrator Michael Griffin and NOAA's chief, retired Vice Adm. Conrad Lautenbacher Jr., to issue strongly worded statements in support of scientific openness and the need to communicate federal science to taxpayers accurately, and without political interference. But while some NASA researchers say the climate has improved in their agency, many in NOAA say they are still waiting to see change.

It's unclear whether the hearings this week and next will lead to legislative changes to reduce political interference. Some analysts suggest that in the governmental realm, politics and science are tightly intertwined. Roger Pielke Jr., a science-policy specialist at the University of Colorado at Boulder, noted in testimony before the committee Tuesday that selecting which results to highlight with a press release is by nature a political act.

Yet even Dr. Pielke says that "the Bush admininstration has engaged in hypercontrolling strategies for controlling information" on global warming.

Adds Grifo, "It's time for the public to stand up and be angry, too. It's their knowledge, their scientists, just like Washington is their capital."

Scientists Criticize White House Stance On Climate Change Findings (NYT)

By Cornelia Dean

New York Times, January 31, 2007

Under its new Democratic chairman, Representative Henry A. Waxman of California, the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform took on the Bush administration's handling of climate change science yesterday, and even the Republicans on the panel had little good to say about the administration's actions.

The subject of the hearing was accusations of administration interference with the work of government climate scientists. Almost to a person, Republicans on the panel introduced themselves by proclaiming their agreement that the earth's climate was warming and that the principal culprit was greenhouse gases generated by people and their machinery.

And when witnesses spoke in defense of the administration, it was often to say only that there were still some scientists who doubted that climate view or that the administration's approach was not unique.

"Cherry-picking" science to suit policy or political goals is at least as old as the Eisenhower administration, said Roger Pielke Jr., a professor in the Environmental Studies Program at the University of Colorado. The committee itself is guilty of it, he added, pointing to a news release linking rising ocean temperatures to bigger and more frequent coastal storms, something about which there is still debate.

But the other witnesses spoke about how the administration had delayed, altered or watered down the findings of government scientists, the kind of thing they said they had not experienced in the Clinton administration.

Drew Shindell, a NASA scientist who said he was speaking as an individual, not for his agency, described research he and his colleagues did on ozone depletion and greenhouse gases over Antarctica.

Dr. Shindell said the findings helped explain recent cooling on the continent, a phenomenon cited by climate dissidents as challenging the mainstream view. And, he said, the findings suggested Antarctica might warm rapidly in the future, melting ice and sharply raising sea levels. By the time the administration had signed off on the work, he said, its importance had been played down and references to "rapid warming" had been deleted.

Another witness, Rick Piltz, said he resigned in protest in 2005 from his job with the federal Climate Change Science Program when he became convinced that the administration's goal was to "impede" the understanding of climate science among the public and even the Congress.

Part of his job, Mr. Piltz said, was to compile periodic assessments of government climate research for the Congress. "This report has essentially been made to vanish by the Bush administration," he said.

The fourth witness was Francesca Grifo, who directs the scientific integrity program of the Union of Concerned Scientists, a private group that researches environmental, arms control and other issues.

Dr. Grifo's testimony drew largely from a report produced by the Union of Concerned Scientists and the Government Accountability Project, a private group that defends whistle-blowers. The report, made public yesterday, is based on a Union of Concerned Scientists survey of federal climate scientists and interviews and document searches by the Government Accountability Project. It says it is common for scientists to be pressured to eliminate references to climate change, for their work to be changed to misrepresent their findings, and for climate-related materials to disappear from Web sites.

DOJ_NMG_0125027

Almost 60 percent of the scientists who responded to the survey said they had personally experienced such an incident in the last five years, the report says, and those who said their work was most closely related to climate change experienced the most interference. (Information about the report is available at www.ucsusa.org.)

Representative Darrell Issa, Republican of California, noted that a majority of scientists queried had not responded to the survey. Dr. Grifo said she attributed that to the "chilling effect" of administration actions. Anyway, she said, scores of scientists reported problems. "That number should be zero," she said.

Bush 'distorted' Climate Change Reports (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner And Fiona Harvey

Financial Times, January 31, 2007

The Bush administration has routinely suppressed or -distorted communication of climate change science to the public, a climate specialist at Nasa's Goddard Institute said on Tuesday.

The accusation, before the chief oversight committee in the House of Representatives, was reinforced by claims by Democratic lawmakers that the White House was withholding documents proving that Philip Cooney, a former Bush administration official who now works as a lobbyist for ExxonMobil, regularly edited climate reports for political reasons.

"We know that the White House possesses documents that contain evidence of an attempt by senior administration officials to mislead the public by injecting doubt into the science of global warming and minimising the potential dangers," said Henry Waxman, the Democratic chairman of the oversight committee.

In one instance of political interference described by Drew Shindell, the Nasa specialist, a press release he drafted in 2004 about future warming in Antarctica was "repeatedly delayed, altered and watered down" by Nasa headquarters. After being told to soften the title of the proposed press release, officials altered the title of the document from "Cool Antarctica may warm rapidly this century" to "Scientists predict Antarctica climate changes".

Rick Piltz, a former government official who co-ordinated and edited reports on climate change, said he resigned from his post in 2005 in protest against the Bush administration impeding communication on -climate science and its implications.

Mr Piltz testified that the administration systematically attempted to "bury" a "national assessment" report that had been published during the Clinton administration that analysed the consequences of climate variability on the US.

He also accused Mr Cooney of editing reports that had already been drafted and approved by scientists in a way that added an "enhanced sense of scientific uncertainty about global warming".

ExxonMobil said on Tuesday that Mr Cooney was not giving interviews.

The testimony risks embarrassing the Bush administration ahead of the release on Friday of a landmark report on climate change science that will say there is a 90 per cent certainty that human activity is changing the world's climate and temperatures will rise by 3 degrees Celsius by 2100. It paints the most dramatic and comprehensive picture yet of a future of heatwaves, droughts and floods.

The report from the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, a scientific body convened by the United Nations, is based on research carried out over six years by more than 2,500 scientists.

The White House has been accused of attempting to weaken or change crucial wording on the state of climate science in this and previous IPCC reports, which form the basis of international climate change policy.

Panel Hears Climate 'Spin' Allegations (AP)

By H. Josef Hebert

AP, January 31, 2007

Federal scientists have been pressured by the White House to play down global warming, advocacy groups testified Tuesday at the Democrats' first investigative hearing since taking control of Congress.

The hearing focused on allegations that White House officials for years have micromanaged the government's climate programs and has closely controlled what scientists have been allowed to tell the public.

"It appears there may have been an orchestrated campaign to mislead the public about climate change," said Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif. Waxman is chairman of the Oversight and Government Reform Committee and a critic of the Bush administration's environmental policies, including its views on climate.

DOJ_NMG_0125028

Climate change also was a leading topic in the Senate, where presidential contenders for 2008 lined up at a hearing called by Sen. Barbara Boxer. They expounded — and at times tried to outdo each other — on why they believed Congress must act to reduce heat-trapping "greenhouse" gases.

"This is a problem whose time has come," Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., proclaimed.

"This is an issue over the years whose time has come," echoed Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz.

Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., said "for decades far too many have ignored the warning" about climate change. "Will we look back at today and say this was the moment we took a stand?"

At the House hearing, two private advocacy groups produced a survey of 279 government climate scientists showing that many of them say they have been subjected to political pressure aimed at downplaying the climate threat. Their complaints ranged from a challenge to using the phrase "global warming" to raising uncertainty on issues on which most scientists basically agree, to keeping scientists from talking to the media.

The survey and separate interviews with scientists "has brought to light numerous ways in which U.S. federal climate science has been filtered, suppressed and manipulated in the last five years," Francesca Grifo, a senior scientist at the Union of Concerned Scientists, told the committee.

Grifo's group, along with the Government Accountability Project, which helps whistle-blowers, produced the report.

Drew Shindell, a climate scientist with NASA's Goddard Institute for Space Studies, said that climate scientists frequently have been dissuaded from talking to the media about their research, though NASA's restrictions have been eased.

Prior to the change, interview requests of climate scientists frequently were "routed through the White House" and then turned away or delayed, said Shindell. He described how a news release on his study forecasting a significant warming in Antarctica was "repeatedly delayed, altered and watered down" at the insistence of the White House.

Some Republican members of the committee questioned whether science and politics ever can be kept separate.

"I am no climate-change denier," said Rep. Tom Davis of Virginia, the top Republican on the committee, but he questioned whether "the issue of politicizing science has itself become politicized."

"The mere convergence of politics and science does not itself denote interference," said Davis.

Administration officials were not called to testify. In the past the White House has said it has only sought to inject balance into reports on climate change. President Bush has acknowledged concerns about global warming, but he strongly opposes mandatory caps of greenhouse gas emissions, arguing that approach would be too costly.

Roger Pielke Jr., a political scientist at the University of Colorado who was invited by GOP lawmakers, said "the reality is that science and politics are intermixed."

Pielke maintained that "scientific cherry picking" can be found on both sides of the climate debate. He took a swipe at the background memorandum Waxman had distributed and maintained that it exaggerated the scientific consensus over the impact of climate change on hurricanes.

Waxman and Davis agreed the administration had not been forthcoming in providing documents to the committee that would shed additional light on allegations of political interference in climate science.

"We know that the White House possesses documents that contain evidence of an attempt by senior administration officials to mislead the public by injecting doubt into the science of global warming and minimize the potential danger," said Waxman, adding that he is "not trying to obtain state secrets."

At Boxer's Senate hearing, her predecessor as chairman of the Environment and Public Works Committee, Sen. James Inhofe, R-Okla., had his own view of the science.

There is "no convincing scientific evidence" that human activity is causing global warming, declared Inhofe, who once called global warming a hoax. "We all know the Weather Channel would like to have people afraid all the time."

"I'll put you down as skeptical," replied Boxer.

Senator Boxer Calls For Action On Global Warming (MCT)

By David Whitney

McClatchy Newspapers, January 31, 2007

WASHINGTON - A key Senate committee found broad bipartisan support Tuesday for doing something about global warming, but deep divisions remained over how to curb the emissions that scientists think are causing the Earth to warm rapidly.

"A consensus is developing that we must take action at the federal level now," declared Sen. Barbara Boxer, a California Democrat, who's presiding over her first hearing as the chair of the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee.

In the House of Representatives, Democrats charged Tuesday that they'd found repeated instances in which the Bush administration had ordered changes to scientific studies to soften references to the cause and effect of global warming.

DOJ_NMG_0125029

Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., the chairman of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, said top administration officials had sought "to mislead the public by injecting doubt into the science of global warming and minimizing the potential dangers."

Boxer said she'd try to steer the Senate committee toward enacting something like California's tough global-warming law, which requires lowering emissions to 1990 levels by 2020. But she acknowledged that she was uncertain how far she'd get.

The hearing, the first of many that Boxer will hold before trying to craft a compromise bill, was limited to senators describing where they stood on the issue. Several Republicans joined committee Democrats in calling for legislation.

There was less agreement on how far and how fast Congress should go to reduce emissions from cars, power plants and industry. The emissions, primarily carbon dioxide, are thought to be contributing to global climate change by enveloping the Earth in a virtual greenhouse.

Many Democrats and industry leaders favor "cap and trade" legislation, which would set tough federal emissions standards and allow companies to sell emissions credits when they fall below that standard and to buy credits when they exceed the limits.

Others want to limit emissions reductions to power plants, which are responsible for about 40 percent of total U.S. emissions. That could invite a fight with states that rely heavily on coal-fired power plants, particularly in the Midwest, or states that provide coal for them.

Another controversial issue is whether a uniform national standard should pre-empt tougher state laws, an issue that could divide California lawmakers if the deal Boxer cuts falls short of the state's standards.

At least out of the starting gate, Boxer kept the hearing from drifting into an ideological argument with a minority of Republican committee members who remain skeptical that human activity is at the root of rising temperatures and changing global weather patterns.

Sen. James Inhofe, R-Okla. - who was unseated as committee chairman by the November elections, which thrust Boxer into her most prominent role in Congress - is a skeptic of global warming who was able to bottle up remedial legislation.

He didn't seriously challenge the science Tuesday. The harshest Republican critic was Idaho Sen. Larry Craig, who said the rush to enact legislation was driven by the 2008 presidential elections, which Democrats didn't dispute.

Some of the more prominent advocates of global-warming legislation are candidates for the White House. Among those speaking at Tuesday's hearing were Arizona Republican Sen. John McCain and New York Democratic Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton.

Differences have emerged already between Boxer and Sen. Dianne Feinstein, California's senior Democratic senator, over whether federal legislation should pre-empt the state law to create a uniform national standard.

"If you think about it, there should be one system," Feinstein testified Tuesday. "And that system should be worldwide."

Feinstein had considered pre-empting state law when she introduced legislation to curb power plant emissions two weeks ago. But she said she backed off because of concerns from the state and Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger.

Boxer is a strong states' rights supporter. In an exchange after Feinstein's testimony Tuesday, however, the two senators seemed to move closer together.

"If we have one system with good goals, then one system is the best," Boxer said. "One system is what we need if we can do it."

The exchange demonstrates the formidable task ahead for Boxer, with issues such as the future of coal far from resolved. Feinstein noted that 40 states rely on coal, and together those states hold 80 percent of the seats in the Senate.

After testifying before Boxer's committee, Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts, the 2004 Democratic presidential nominee, was asked whether he thought there ever would be enough votes for global-warming legislation to beat back a promised Republican filibuster. It takes 60 votes to stop a filibuster.

"We have to gin up the grass roots on this," Kerry said. "People are going to have to understand that this is an election issue for `08."

Lawmakers On Hill Seek Consensus On Warming (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, January 31, 2007

As 600 scientists meet this week in Paris to finalize the first worldwide assessment in six years of the evidence on global warming, lawmakers on Capitol Hill searched for a political consensus yesterday on how to address climate change.

In a prolonged Senate hearing that one senator compared to "open-mike night," several lawmakers spoke in passionate terms about a need to put a cap on U.S. carbon dioxide emissions before global warming's effects become irreversible, while others sketched out possible policy compromises on the contentious issue. In a separate House hearing, a bipartisan group of lawmakers questioned whether the Bush administration has been suppressing climate science.

DOJ_NMG_0125030

Sen. Thomas R. Carper (D-Del.), a member of the Environment and Public Works Committee who has pressed to regulate greenhouse gases for several years, said he did not want his children and grandchildren chastising him for inaction in decades to come.

"I don't want them to say, 'What did you do about it? What did you do about it when you had an opportunity? Weren't you in the Senate?' " Carper asked, adding that he hoped to tell them, "I tried to move heaven and Earth to make sure we took a better course."

The panel's chairwoman, Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.), said several hours into the hearing that lawmakers would heed the warnings of Carper and others, including Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.): "I think this is the moment we will take a stand."

Several lawmakers said they felt a new sense of urgency in light of the mounting scientific evidence that the globe cannot sustain an additional temperature rise of more than two degrees Fahrenheit. On Friday, the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (IPCC), a U.N. body, will release its first report since 2001 on the current state of science on global warming: According to scientists who have read the latest draft of the report, it will conclude there is at least a 90 percent chance that human activity accounts for much of Earth's warming over the past half-century.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), who testified before the Environment and Public Works Committee on her proposal to "cap and trade" carbon emission credits, said in an interview the U.S. political debate on global warming has recently "shifted considerably because people know it's real. The science has coalesced."

Some scientists and lawmakers, including Feinstein, have raised concerns in recent weeks that the final IPCC report may in fact understate global warming's impact because the science is changing so rapidly. Yesterday the Zurich-based World Glacier Monitoring Service reported that the rate of mountain glacier melt is accelerating, with initial reports for 2005 suggesting key glaciers lost an average of 3 1/2 feet of thickness.

Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.), chairman of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, who held his own hearing yesterday, said that as a result of the rapidly changing data, when the international report comes out Friday, "in many ways it will be dated." The IPCC cannot incorporate any scientific data published after December 2005 in its report.

Still, advocates of action on global warming said the IPCC will further strengthen the public perception that the United States must move more aggressively to curb its carbon dioxide emissions. The report will outline how climate change will transform the planet -- with summer sea ice virtually disappearing from the Arctic by the end of the century -- as well as assess the spike in global temperatures in the past 15 years, in which Earth has experienced roughly a dozen of the hottest years on record.

"The timing of this report is critical for the debate that's taking place in Congress, in the business community, and in the evangelical community," said Robert T. Watson, who chaired the IPCC during its last round and now serves as the World Bank's chief scientist.

In the House hearing, lawmakers questioned whether the White House had altered reports by government scientists over the past several years to mask the problems posed by climate change. They highlighted a survey published yesterday by two advocacy groups, the Union of Concerned Scientists and the Government Accountability Project, which found that 46 percent of the federal scientists they polled reported they personally had experienced or perceived pressure to eliminate the words "global warming" or "climate change" from their writings, and roughly the same percentage had experienced edits that changed the meaning of their findings.

"All of us have a right to our own opinions as to the seriousness of global warming," Waxman said. "We don't have the right to our own science."

Waxman and the panel's top Republican, Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (Va.), sent a letter to the White House yesterday demanding that the administration hand over documents that could shed light on whether political appointees had altered climate reports. Davis said he was "disappointed at the [administration's] lukewarm response" to the panel's requests for information but added that when it comes to pressing the case for action to combat climate change, "we're seeing a dangerous trend toward inflammatory statements and hyperbole."

Kristen Hellmer, spokeswoman for the White House Council on Environmental Quality, said the administration had provided 10,000 pages of documents to the panel and allowed staffers to review some "deliberative documents" on climate change. "CEQ has been working with the committee and hopes to continue working with the committee to reach an appropriate accommodation," she said.

While House members debated the administration's approach to global warming yesterday, senators focused on promoting their own proposals. Feinstein told the Environment and Public Works Committee that any good climate-change bill must be "practical and doable," citing her plan to reduce greenhouse-gas emissions by 25 percent by 2020, while Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) told reporters after testifying that a plan he introduced with Sen. Olympia J. Snowe (R-Maine) to reduce emissions 65 percent by 2050 made the most sense.

"Anything less than getting the job done is crazy," Kerry said.

Even opponents of a strict cap said they expected lawmakers to craft legislation capping carbon dioxide in the coming months. "The climate-science questions have now given way to real policy analysis -- the tough choices of what policies will work," electric utilities lobbyist Scott Segal said about the Senate hearing. "That will require serious homework, and this hearing doesn't do any at all."

Senators Sound Alarm On Climate (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, January 31, 2007

One-quarter of the Senate yesterday called global warming a serious threat to the world's future and urged quick action, despite disagreement on how to stem its effects.

During a rare open forum that lasted hours, senators from both major parties including four seeking the presidency shared ideas about curbing carbon emissions, which many scientists blame for global warming. The senators also promised substantial legislation this year.

"Global warming is an international problem requiring international effort," said Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican and a candidate in the 2008 presidential race.

His proposal to curb carbon emissions is co-sponsored by several Republicans and Democrats. He said he welcomes amendments.

"We have no pride in authorship; this is too important," he said. "The object is to get something done and soon."

"This is a problem whose time has come," said Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat, who also has eyes on the White House.

Sen. Barbara Boxer, California Democrat, said she sees consensus in Congress, at the state level and even among oil executives. "The time for action is now," she said.

Mrs. Boxer, chairman of the Environment and Public Works Committee, took statements from about 25 senators during the forum. "We're not going to take a lot of time debating this anymore. We're moving beyond the argument, we are moving toward solutions."

She allowed each person 10 minutes to "take their temperature" on the climate change issue.

Sen. Christopher S. Bond and a few other Republicans fear that sweeping legislation to restrict carbon emissions will result in economic hardship.

"I'm not from the state of macroeconomics. I'm from the state of Missouri, and I need to know how these proposals will hurt Missourians," Mr. Bond said. "Do not fight climate change on the backs of the poor, on the backs of certain sectors of this country."

Sen. Larry E. Craig, Idaho Republican, questioned the motivation for rushing legislation. "My sense is the rush at this moment, all due apologies to Senator Clinton, is something about an '08 election," he said.

He said drastic federal legislation could crush business in the United States, even while India and China are revving their economies without taking action against climate change.

"I reject that. We are the most innovative nation in the history of the world," Mrs. Clinton said. "I don't underestimate the task we face, but I am optimistic."

Senators evoked the images of the nation's children and grandchildren.

"This is our generation's test to protect their futures," said Sen. Barack Obama, Illinois Democrat. "The world is going to be watching us over the next several years to see what action we take on this issue."

Mr. Obama compared climate change legislation to an insurance policy. "We don't have to stand helplessly by and accept this future. In fact, we can't afford to," he said.

He and another Democrat who testified, Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, also have 2008 White House aspirations.

Sen. Lamar Alexander, Tennessee Republican, said that even his conservative district recognizes "it is now time for Congress to take reasonable steps."

Sen. James M. Inhofe of Oklahoma, the ranking Republican on the committee, attended the hearing briefly to give his remarks.

"There is no environmental issue that has become more politicized," he said. "I look forward to vigorously pointing out the lack of scientific consensus, the real economic impact and the effects of unilateral disarmament of our economy if we enact mandatory carbon reductions in the U.S. while the rest of the world is failing to meet its goals."

"I'll mark you down as skeptical," Mrs. Boxer told Mr. Inhofe, who has called global warming a "hoax."

DOJ_NMG_0125032

"I hope that when I'm done you'll put my temperature down as hot," said Sen. Joe Lieberman, Connecticut independent and the lead co-sponsor of the McCain bill. "I'm hot to get something done. It's hard not to conclude that the politics of global warming has changed and a new consensus for action is emerging and it is a bipartisan consensus."

Several senators praised former Vice President Al Gore, a Democrat who has publicized the issue through speeches and a documentary film, "An Inconvenient Truth."

The senators also noted that President Bush, in his State of the Union address last week, acknowledged the "serious challenge of global climate change."

Sen. Benjamin L. Cardin, Maryland Democrat, displayed photos projecting heavy flooding of the Delmarva Peninsula as a result of global warming.

Global Warming Is Hot Topic In Congress (LAT)

By Janet Hook and Richard Simon

Los Angeles Times, January 31, 2007

WASHINGTON — All of a sudden, global warming is hot.

After years of languishing on Capitol Hill, efforts to curb global warming have picked up momentum, powered by a growing bipartisan belief that climate change can no longer be ignored.

Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., has declared it a top priority for the House. Presidential candidates from both parties call it one of the biggest issues faced by the next occupant of the White House. Even President Bush, long a skeptic, is sounding the alarm.

That's an abrupt break from the past, when the issue -- the role man-made pollutants play in the increase in the Earth's temperature -- was shrugged off by many politicians. Especially among Republicans, it was regarded as an untested theory or an alarmist fantasy.

Polls show that most Americans believe the studies that show pollution is a cause of climate change. And politicians now are scrambling to keep up with science and public opinion.

Legislation to curb global warming is still a long shot in Congress because there is no consensus on a solution. But almost all the candidates who want to succeed Bush -- from Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., to former Sen. John Edwards, D-N.C. -- are far ahead of him in proposing ways to reduce carbon emissions.

"There has been a sea change in this issue over the last year," said Cathy Duvall, national political director of the Sierra Club. "It went from a backburner issue to something people understand is a problem. Now they are looking for leaders to take action."

The United States is the leading emitter of carbon dioxide, about one-quarter of the worldwide total. About 80 percent comes from fossil fuels, with power plants and vehicles as the leading culprits. Presidential politics and legislative debate came together Tuesday when McCain and several other candidates discussed their climate change legislation at a Senate hearing.

"The number of individuals in Washington who reject the clear evidence of global warming appears to be shrinking as its dramatic manifestations mount," McCain said. "We are no longer just talking about how climate change will affect our children's and grandchildren's lives, as we did just a few years ago, but we now are talking about how it is already impacting the world."

McCain, considered a front-runner for his party's presidential nomination, has introduced a bill to impose mandatory limits on the greenhouse gases that contribute to global warming and intends to introduce another to target vehicle emissions by raising miles-per-gallon rules. His cosponsors on the first bill include two leading Democratic presidential contenders, Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois.

Other candidates have their own proposals. New Mexico's Democratic Gov. Bill Richardson touts his efforts to get his state to generate more electricity from cleaner sources, such as solar and wind power. Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., D-Del., recently introduced a resolution calling for the United States to return to international negotiations on climate change that Bush spurned.

Edwards, who ranks global warming as one of his top three issues, recently pointed out that he has given up his old-fashioned sport utility vehicle for a hybrid one. Even conservative Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., mentioned the need to reduce carbon dioxide emissions in announcing his candidacy.

The issue's prominence is rising for a variety of reasons.

There is mounting scientific evidence that pollution plays a significant role in global warming. Climate scientists who advise the United Nations will meet in Paris this week and are expected to issue a report on how it is likely to affect sea levels.

Former Vice President Al Gore's Oscar-nominated documentary, "An Inconvenient Truth," raised awareness of the issue, vividly depicting the consequences of a warmer planet.

Some states are beginning to act on their own, causing influential business leaders to call for federal regulation to avoid a patchwork of different state and local laws.

DOJ_NMG_0125033

Most important, Democrats who want action on the issue now control the House and the Senate, and the party's leaders have moved it to center stage.

Pelosi has asked committees to produce legislation by July 4 and has moved to establish a special global warming committee to bypass Rep. John Dingell, D-Mich., an auto industry ally who chairs the House Energy and Commerce Committee. He is seen as a potential obstacle to legislation, including new limits on tailpipe emissions.

Despite signs that Congress might shift from talking to legislating, advocates of limits on greenhouse gases warn against high expectations, noting that any measure must make it through the narrowly divided Senate and past Bush's veto.

And proposals to cap emissions, especially from coal-fueled power plants, also face opposition from many Republicans and some Democrats who contend they would harm the economy.

"There's going to be a lot of sound and fury," said Dan Becker, director of the Sierra Club's global warming program, "but unless something changes pretty radically, it's really hard to see how an important bill passes this Congress -- and is signed by this president."

That's why many environmentalists are looking ahead to the 2008 elections. The League of Conservation Voters Education Fund has launched an initiative, called "The Heat Is On," to ensure global warming is at the center of debate. The organization is tracking what candidates say and hopes to pressure them through town hall meetings and ballot initiatives.

"We will make sure there is an expectation they will outline clear solutions," said Navin Nayak, director of the project.

Like ethanol in Iowa, global warming could become a litmus-test issue for candidates in New Hampshire, which holds the first primary. More than 100 Granite State towns are planning votes on a resolution calling for federal action to curb greenhouse gas emissions.

Ted Leach, a Republican and former state lawmaker from New Hampshire, is co-chairman of the Carbon Coalition, which persuaded the towns to weigh in. He has issued a warning to presidential contenders: "If we don't hear out of you what we want to hear, you're probably not going to get our votes."

The 2008 presidential candidate most deeply involved in the issue is McCain, who has for years pushed legislation to impose mandatory limits on emissions that contribute to global warming. It is a goal that has put him at odds with most in his party, and one that helped him build his reputation as a maverick.

One candidate who has kept a distance from the issue is Republican Mitt Romney. As governor, he pulled Massachusetts out of a regional accord to reduce emissions, worried about its effect on energy bills. But GOP pollster Whit Ayres said Republican candidates would do well to follow McCain's lead. Ayres argues that global warming is a winning issue.

In a July 2006 survey of GOP voters, he found that a majority agreed that the Earth's temperature was rising and that human activity, not normal climate cycles, was the cause. Ayres said the issue "is an opportunity for Republicans to reach out to people in the middle and demonstrate their sensitivity in an area not normally thought to be a Republican strength."

He acknowledged, however, that there is political risk for candidates in certain regions, such as coal- and auto-producing states.

Fossil Fuels Are To Blame, World Scientists Conclude (USAT)

By Patrick O'driscoll And Dan Vergano

USA Today, January 31, 2007

A major international analysis of climate change due Friday will conclude that humankind's reliance on fossil fuels — coal, fuel oil and natural gas — is to blame for global warming, according to three scientists familiar with the research on which it is based.

The gold-standard Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (IPCC) report represents "a real convergence happening here, a consensus that this is a total global no-brainer," says U.S. climate scientist Jerry Mahlman, former director of the federal government's Geophysical Fluid Dynamics Laboratory in New Jersey.

"The big message that will come out is the strength of the attribution of the warming to human activities," says researcher Claudia Tebaldi of the National Center for Atmospheric Research (NCAR) in Boulder, Colo.

Mahlman, who crafted the IPCC language used to define levels of scientific certainty, says the new report will lay the blame at the feet of fossil fuels with "virtual certainty," meaning 99% sure. That's a significant jump from "likely," or 66% sure, in the group's last report in 2001, Mahlman says. His role in this year's effort involved spending two months reviewing the more than 1,600 pages of research that went into the new assessment.

Among the findings, Tebaldi says, is that even if people stopped burning the fossil fuels that release carbon dioxide, the heat-trapping gas blamed most for the warm-up, the effects of higher temperatures, including deadlier heat waves, coastal floods, longer droughts, worse wildfires and higher energy bills, would not go away in our lifetime.

"Most of the carbon dioxide still would just be sitting there, staring at us for the next century," Mahlman says.

DOJ_NMG_0125034

"The projections also make clear how much we are already committed" to climate change, Tebaldi says, echoing the comments of more than a dozen IPCC scientists contacted by USA TODAY. Even if every smokestack and tailpipe stops emissions right now, the remaining heat makes further warming inevitable, she says.

The report will resonate worldwide because the current debate over global warming has been more about what is responsible — people or nature? — than about whether it is happening.

President Bush only recently has acknowledged the link, mentioning global warming in last week's State of the Union address. It was the first time he has included climate change in the annual speech before Congress. Bush called for developing renewable and alternative fuels.

The IPCC was established in 1988 by the World Meteorological Organization and the United Nations Environment Program. This will be its fourth climate assessment since 1990. The last one, in 2001, predicted average global temperatures would rise 2.5 to 10.4 degrees by the end of this century. The rise from 1901 to 2005 was just 1.2 degrees.

The report is the work of more than 2,000 scientists, whose drafts were reviewed by scores of governments, industry and environmental groups. The document is based on research published in the six years since the last report.

The analysis comes at a time when awareness of global warming in the USA and efforts to combat it are more intense than ever. Former vice president Al Gore's climate-change documentary An Inconvenient Truth scored two Oscar nominations last week. Meanwhile, some states and hundreds of American cities are taking steps to curb emissions that intensify the heat-trapping "greenhouse gases" in the atmosphere.

Officially, the panel's 2007 findings are still under wraps, but details have been leaking out for a year, particularly in recent weeks.

News accounts have featured projections of more droughts, floods, shrinking glaciers and rising sea levels.

There is so much media attention now, "I almost think there won't be any surprises compared to six years ago," says Steve Running, a University of Montana ecologist. "When the report came out (in 2001) it was all 'new' news. This time, I think everybody will say, 'Well, yeah, that's already what we've been hearing about.' "

Michael MacCracken, chief scientist for the Climate Institute, a Washington, D.C., think tank, says the studies underlying the report make the broad conclusions clear anyway. A 2005 Nature magazine study, for example, narrowed the 2001 estimate of warmer temperatures to an increase from 2.7 to 8.1 degrees by the year 2100.

Similarly, two Science magazine studies in 2005 of satellite and balloon measurements of temperature confirmed the Earth's atmosphere is warming exactly as predicted from human-caused increases in carbon dioxide.

What will be released this week is the first of three parts of the report: a scientific synthesis of global warming's physical manifestations that includes measurements and projections of temperature, precipitation, storms, wind, polar melting and sea levels. New this time is a chapter on paleoclimatology, the study of climate change from fossils and the reconstruction of data and clues going back hundreds of thousands of years.

In addition to the extensive scientific conclusions, which MacCracken says have been settled, a short "summary for policymakers" is still being hammered out and will be released Friday in Paris.

The second phase of the report is on the effects of those measured and projected changes and is due in April. A third group's work on ways to try to lessen those impacts is to be released in May.

The IPCC report lands amid a rush of climate-change developments. Sharing the spotlight:

·Congress. After winning a majority in the House and Senate in November's election, Democrats have climate-change bills in the works. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., is creating a special committee on climate change. Next week, the House Science and Technology Committee will discuss the IPCC report.

·States. More than 12 states are taking steps to reduce greenhouse gases. California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger this month ordered the world's first low-carbon limits on passenger-car fuels in the most populous state. The new standard would reduce the carbon content of transportation fuels at least 10% by the year 2020.

·Cities. More than 375 mayors who have signed pledges since 2005 to cut greenhouse-gas emissions in their communities launched a drive last week for major climate legislation in Congress this year. They represent 56 million people in all 50 states. The day after the State of the Union address, the U.S. Conference of Mayors announced global warming is No. 1 on its top-10 list of priorities.

·Industry. Ten major companies, including industrial giants General Electric, Alcoa and DuPont, joined four environmental and climate groups last week to demand swift passage of federal legislation to cut emissions that worsen warming. Their U.S. Climate Action Partnership says further delay only "increases the risk of unavoidable consequences … at potentially greater economic cost and social disruption."

In their own studies, Tebaldi and her colleagues at NCAR found broad agreement in climate projections for North America by 2100, including a rise in average temperatures from 3 to 9 degrees.

DOJ_NMG_0125035

That could lead to more frequent heat waves and more warm nights when daytime temperatures linger longer after sundown, especially in the South and West, Tebaldi's group concluded. NCAR also says increasing rain would soak northern states but bypass the already dry Southwest, where drought would be more common except when torrential rains bring flash floods.

The IPCC report is likely to reflect climate uncertainties and disagreements, too. Scientists have strongly debated the last two years, without resolution, whether global warming intensifies hurricanes.

Rising sea levels are a huge concern for the USA because more than half the population lives within 50 miles of the coastlines, according to the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration. The 2001 report contained a wide estimate of the rise this century — from 3.5 inches to 34. MacCracken says that projection has fallen to about 20 inches or less.

Such a drop in the top estimate alarms glacier experts such as John Turner of the British Antarctic Survey, who was quoted in the United Kingdom's Guardian newspaper as saying the low projection is "misleading." He says the low number accounts only for the heat-related rise of sea level and slow trickles from ebbing glaciers, and it ignores potential ice-sheet collapses in Antarctica or Greenland.

"Greenland is just a relic of the last Ice Age, after all, just jutting out into the Atlantic, frozen at latitudes further south than anything else," MacCracken says. "What might happen when it gets warmer?"

MacCracken contends past IPCC reports have been too conservative, partly by design, in warning about the dangers of climate change, especially sea level rise.

"Scientists don't like to be wrong, so they tend to discount the most uncertain things," MacCracken says. "And that's good, but policymakers and risk managers usually want to know the worst case, as well as the middle one, when they plan for things."

Every IPCC report has been controversial. When the 1995 report's economic analysis estimated that the worth of a human life in a developing nation is less than in developed ones, it triggered protests and sit-ins.

In 2005, federal hurricane researcher Chris Landsea resigned from the IPCC, suggesting its hurricane warnings were too overblown and "politicized."

Climate scientist Roger Pielke Sr. of the University of Colorado at Boulder has suggested that development and deforestation, rather than the burning of fossil fuels, are the main drivers behind global warming. He says on his climate-science website that the IPCC should recognize the importance of these other factors.

In contrast, Australian scientist Tim Flannery has complained in his 2005 book The Weather Makers: How Man is Changing the Climate and What it Means for Life on Earth that IPCC estimates downplay the impact of warming.

In Paris this week, the process of negotiating and revising the short summary is painstaking and "line by line," says Kevin Trenberth, one of the lead authors and climate analysis chief at the National Center for Atmospheric Research. More than 100 of the panel's 193 member nations are taking part in the negotiations on the summary, he says.

"They'll do a lot of rewriting. It's all going to change to cover the concerns of each nation," whether it's monsoons in India or polar bears in Canada, says MacCracken, who helped lead the USA's involvement in the IPCC in 1995 and 2001. The summary also must be translated in six official U.N. languages.

In 1995, MacCracken says, negotiations at the meeting in Madrid stretched from 8 a.m. to an hour past midnight.

"But luckily, it was Madrid," he adds, "so the restaurants were still open at 1 a.m."

Scientists To Advise EPA To Cut Smog Limit (USAT)

By Traci Watson

USA Today, January 31, 2007

WASHINGTON — Scientists at the Environmental Protection Agency will recommend today that the level of smog allowed in the nation's air be cut to protect public health, the EPA said Tuesday.

The scientists will advise the agency to cut the nation's smog limit by as much as 25%. When the EPA last cut the smog limit, in 1997, industry groups fought the change all the way to the Supreme Court. Industry ultimately lost.

If adopted by the government, a drop in the smog standard could lead to fewer "Code Red" days and easier breathing for those with asthma. Smog exacerbates asthma and other lung disorders.

Nearly 160 million people live in counties that do not meet the federal smog limit. Most are in California or on the East Coast.

Further cuts to the amount of smog in the nation's air could also require strict regulations on cars, power plants and factories, which emit the chemicals that make up smog. States and counties struggling to achieve federal clean-air limits have taken measures such as requiring car-emission inspections and mandating the sale of cleaner but more costly grades of gasoline.

DOJ_NMG_0125036

EPA Administrator Stephen Johnson has until June to decide whether to take his staff's advice. The new limit would become final after a year of public comment and review.

Industry groups have already told the EPA that they oppose tightening the smog limit.

"This is going to be a royal fight, because the cost is too big," said William Kovacs, a vice president of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

The EPA's current rule requires counties to adhere to a limit of no more than 0.08 parts of smog per million parts of air. The scientists will advise Johnson to consider a new standard as low as 0.06 parts per million.

The last time EPA scientists advised Johnson to tighten air standards, in December, he slightly lowered the amount of soot from diesel engines and other sources allowed in the air, though EPA staff and a panel of independent scientific advisers urged a larger decrease.

William Wehrum, the Environmental Protection Agency's chief of air pollution, said Johnson would not be bound by his staff's recommendation.

"We will take the recommendations very seriously," he said. "The administrator is the ultimate decision-maker here, and he has to make the best decision he can, based on the facts he has available."

In Brief EPA Staff To Suggest Cuts In Allowable Smog Levels (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 31, 2007

Environmental Protection Agency staff today will recommend as much as a 25% cut in allowable smog levels, after new health data showed smog in traffic-congested cities is more dangerous than previously thought. The agency's experts will also recommend new ways to measure smog's impact on crops. If cuts are approved, the result would be tougher requirements on cities and states, which would have to figure out how to meet them by tighter controls on industries and perhaps on traffic.

Germany Sees Muted Inflation

Lower oil prices helped to offset a tax increase to keep German inflation below expectations in January, but the data are unlikely to sway the European Central Bank from raising interest rates a quarter point to 3.75% in March. Consumer prices in the euro area's largest economy rose 1.8% from January 2006, according to an estimate from the Federal Statistical Office. Many economists had expected that Germany's three-percentage-point sales-tax increase to 19% would propel the inflation rate to around 2%.

Merkel Snubs Car-Emissions Plan

Germany will block any attempt by the European Commission to impose general emission-reduction standards for all cars and will oppose including the auto industry in its carbon-dioxide trading program, Chancellor Angela Merkel said. The German auto industry opposes mandatory emission limits because it claims the tough standards will lead to lost profits and job cuts.

Manchester Wins Megacasino Bid

Manchester unexpectedly won the fight to host the United Kingdom's first Las Vegas-style supercasino, beating out favorites Blackpool and London's Millennium Dome. The advisory panel announcing the decision said that Manchester, a northwestern industrial city of 440,000, badly needed economic development.

Mixed News For Wolves (NYT)

The New York Times, January 31, 2007

The Interior Department's decision on Monday to remove the gray wolves that inhabit the western Great Lakes region from the endangered species list represents yet another triumph for the much-maligned Endangered Species Act. First listed in 1974, when their numbers had dwindled to the low hundreds, the wolf population there now numbers about 4,000, thanks almost entirely to the act's prohibitions on hunting and trapping. State and tribal governments will now be responsible for keeping their numbers at healthy levels.

This good news, however, was immediately spoiled by the department's proposed delisting of the gray wolves (also known as timber wolves) that roam the northern Rocky Mountains. Virtually eliminated from their range in the 1920's, these wolves have also staged a remarkable comeback.

What's disturbing about this proposal is that two of the states that will assume responsibility for managing the wolves have shown little interest in protecting them. At a recent rally, Idaho's governor, C. L. Otter, called Butch, said he would authorize the destruction of more than 80 percent of the state's 650 wolves, leaving the bare minimum required to keep them from being returned to the endangered list. Not to be outdone, Wyoming said it would allow 16 of its 23 wolf packs to be killed on sight. Montana, by contrast, will bar any hunting until officials see how well the wolves are doing, and even then hunting will be strictly monitored.

DOJ_NMG_0125037

This eagerness to resume the slaughter is based on claims that the wolves are devastating livestock populations and game animals like elk. These claims have little basis in fact and should be rigorously examined during the public comment period ahead. Even then, the wolves should not be de-listed until Idaho and Wyoming adopt adequate regulatory mechanisms for protecting wolf populations that present no threat to humans, are valuable to the ecosystem and have taken years to rebuild.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Hiring Freeze Could Deplete FBI Staffs (FEDTIMES)

By Stephen Losey

Federal Times, January 31, 2007

The FBI may not be able to replace 800 crucial agents and intelligence analysts who are expected to retire this year because Congress has failed to pass a 2007 budget, the agency's deputy director said Jan. 25.

John Pistole, the second-highest ranking official in the FBI, told the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence that continuing to fund the agency at fiscal 2006 levels, as the current continuing resolution does, could prevent the agency from replacing 400 agents and 400 analysts when they retire this year.

That would hit the bureau's analysts particularly hard. The FBI has more than 2,200 analysts, and the retirements could gut their ranks by almost one-fifth. Pistole said 370 analysts have less than a year of experience with the FBI.

The FBI has 12,659 special agents.

Pistole said those losses would particularly hurt the FBI's ability to investigate and counter domestic extremists such as the Earth Liberation Front, Animal Liberation Front and white supremacists.

Most agencies are experiencing tight budgets due to the continuing resolution passed last fall. Congress only approved budgets for the Homeland Security and Defense departments before fiscal 2007 began. Republicans passed the job of approving permanent spending bills for most federal agencies onto the incoming Democratic majority, which is preparing a joint funding resolution that will include funding increases for some agencies. That funding resolution will replace the current continuing resolution, which expires Feb. 15.

Sen. Barbara Mikulski, D-Md., lambasted the previous Congress for leaving agencies unfunded. And that failure is even worse considering the FBI is the only major part of the nation's intelligence community without a fiscal 2007 budget, Mikulski said.

Pistole said that a continuing resolution also will jeopardize the FBI's attempts to upgrade its case management system, called Sentinel. The second phase of the $425 million project — which is meant to convert the FBI's vast paper files into a Web-based system of searchable electronic documents — is scheduled to begin in April. But the FBI warns that Sentinel will be endangered if the FBI does not get $157 million in funding by February and could miss its planned 2009 debut.

Pistole said the FBI has done a poor job analyzing data to find leads on terrorist acts and sharing information with other agencies. Collecting data and acting on it have traditionally been the FBI's strong suits, he said.

The FBI has started at least 10 new training classes for analysts since 2001, Pistole said, and other national security courses are being lengthened. Not only are new FBI agents and analysts undergoing training, but veterans are receiving refresher courses or learning new skills.

"There's been a very intentional focus on how we can professionalize and make sure we are full players in the intelligence community and law enforcement community," Pistole said. "We are trying to share everything and restrict only what has to be restricted."

But committee chairman Sen. John Rockefeller IV, D-W.Va., said he is troubled that needed reforms are not in place, more than five years after the Sept. 11 attacks.

The FBI still hasn't finished setting up standardized field intelligence groups or an automated intelligence collection management project, and it has just begun setting a strategy for field offices to collect threat intelligence, Rockefeller said. It also has just started trying to set up a cadre of senior analysts to understand threats in a strategic context, he said.

"If this were late 2002, I would feel much better about the bureau's pace of change," Rockefeller said.

E-mail: slosey@federaltimes.com

Democrats Move Leftover Spending Measure (WP)

By Lyndsey Layton

The Washington Post, January 31, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0125038

House and Senate Democratic leaders agreed yesterday to a $463 billion spending plan for the remainder of the fiscal year that would freeze many federal agencies at 2006 levels but include more money for veterans' health, education, scientific research, HIV programs and public parks, among other things.

In an unusual move, the congressional leaders stripped the spending bill of all earmarks, or narrow, special-interest provisions. The measure had to be cobbled together now because Congress did not finish its work last year and failed to pass nine of 11 spending bills.

Four months into the current fiscal year, the federal government has been running on a temporary budget that is set to expire Feb. 15. The House is scheduled to vote on the spending package today, while the Senate will take it up in the coming weeks.

A spokeswoman for the House Appropriations Committee said enough additional money will be provided to the Social Security Administration and other agencies that none will have to furlough employees, close offices or take other such measures as a result of a budget crunch. She also said that federal employees will see a 2.2 percent pay increase set by President Bush.

Among the priorities for the District that are preserved in the plan is a $20 million upgrade to the Navy Yard Metro station near the new Nationals baseball stadium, officials said.

Republicans grumbled about the fact that Democrats in the House will not allow amendments to the budget and said the party in power plans to ram through a spending bill without committee hearings or meaningful debate. Democrats said that they have no choice, because the previous Congress left the budget process in such disarray that they are under great pressure to quickly pass a spending bill for the remaining eight months.

"I don't expect people to love this proposal. I don't love this proposal and we probably have made some wrong choices," said House Appropriations Committee Chairman David R. Obey (D-Wis.). "But in contrast to last year's Congress, which decided to duck these choices, at least we have made them in order to bring last year's issues to a conclusion so we can turn the page and deal with next year's priorities."

Both Republican and Democratic budget analysts said that the bill is not the ideal way to fund the federal government but that it is pragmatic. "If your strategy is to get it out of here and move it on, fine, this works," said Jim Dyer, a former Republican staff director for the Appropriations Committee.

By declaring a one-time moratorium on earmarks, the Democratic leaders are granting the Bush administration more leeway in spending. The Army Corps of Engineers construction budget, for instance, typically outlines funding for specific projects. But under the no-earmarks pledge, Obey and Senate Appropriations Committee Chairman Robert C. Byrd (D-W.Va.) decided that Congress cannot spell out spending, so they opted to give a lump sum of $2.3 billion to the Army Corps -- about $38 million less than it received in 2006 -- and to allow the agency to decide which projects deserve the money.

"They really delivered on their promise to wipe out earmarks," said Richard Kogan, a federal budget expert at the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities.

Among the winners in the bill are veterans' health, which will get $23.3 billion, or $3.6 billion more than it got last year. The Defense Department will receive $21.2 billion -- an increase of $1.2 billion -- to treat U.S. troops wounded in Iraq and Afghanistan. The FBI will get $6 billion, an increase of $216.6 million to fully fund 31,359 positions, including those of 12,213 agents and 2,577 intelligence analysts.

Other programs that will see a boost include those that Democrats complained were underfunded when Republicans ran Congress.

Pell grants, the federal stipends for low- and middle-income college students, will be increased by $615.4 million, to a total of $13.6 billion. That will allow the maximum Pell grant to rise $260 to $4,310, the first increase in four years.

Head Start, the early childhood program for low-income students, will get $6.9 billion, an increase of $103.7 million. Democrats say that Head Start funding has been cut by 11 percent since 2002 and that centers nationwide have reduced hours, transportation and instruction as a result.

The National Institutes of Health will receive $28.9 billion, an increase of $619.5 million, which Democrats say will pay for an additional 500 research grants. The National Science Foundation will get $4.7 billion, an increase of $335 million for research.

When it comes to housing, the Democrats' bill would allot $15.9 billion, an increase of $502 million, to renew 70,000 housing vouchers under the Section 8 program, which provides federal housing subsidies to low-income families and individuals. It would provide $5.9 billion, an increase of $939 million, to the Department of Housing and Urban Development to renew subsidies for 157,000 housing units.

Before adjourning last year, Congress ratified money for defense and homeland security but left the rest of the federal budget -- including Social Security, Medicare, veterans programs, education and transportation -- in limbo. Most of the government has been operating at 2006 levels through a series of stopgap measures.

DOJ_NMG_0125039

Democrats Offer Fiscal 2007 Joint Funding Bill (GCN)

By Mary Mosquera, GCN Staff

Government Computer News, January 31, 2007

House and Senate Democrats banded together to write a $463.5 billion measure to complete appropriations bills left over from last year. The House is expected to consider it tomorrow.

House Appropriations Committee Chairman Rep. Dave Obey (D-Wis.) co-wrote the measure, which he filed yesterday, with Senate Appropriations Committee chairman Sen. Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.).

To avoid a partial government shutdown, Congress must complete work on funding by Feb. 15, when the current continuing resolution expires.

Last year, the Republican leadership was unable to complete work on nine of the 11 annual appropriations bills. In December, Byrd and Obey announced a plan to wrap up the bills in a joint funding resolution.

"This legislation is a good step forward for the nation. But, in order to meet the challenges ahead in our economy, in technology and in security, we must not settle for 'good enough,'" Byrd said.

The legislation remains within the overall budget cap established by the Republican-led 109th Congress.

Under the measure, most programs will continue to be funded at the 2006 levels adjusted for increased pay costs. Limited adjustments were made within the confines of the Republican budget resolution to increase funding for veterans and military health care, public housing, scientific research, and for the Labor, Health and Education bill to keep up with inflation, Obey said.

Among major IT projects, the measure also includes $100 million to proceed with Sentinel, the FBI's system to move to electronic data sharing from paper-based case management.

Last fall, the Senate Appropriations Committee agreed to provide $40 million for the Sentinel case management system on top of $100 million in reprogrammed 2006 funds. By contrast, the House passed a $100 million increase for Sentinel on top of the reprogrammed funds. The Senate panel said it expected the FBI to recover funds from the contractor for Sentinel's failed predecessor, the Virtual Case File system, and use that money to help pay for the new system.

The Office of Personnel Management has $6.9 million available for the Enterprise Human Resources Integration project and $1.4 million for the Human Resources Line of Business, similar to what the Senate committee bill last fall also contained.

The recent explosion in earmarks left Congress unable to ensure the integrity of the system and public confidence is at an all time low, Obey said. The chairmen decided to place a moratorium on the practice until a new, reformed process is fully in place. The joint resolution is free of earmarks.

"I don't expect people to love this proposal; I don't love this proposal, and we probably have made some wrong choices," Obey said in a statement. "But in contrast to last year's Congress, which decided to duck these choices, at least we have made them in order to bring last year's issues to a conclusion so we can turn the page and deal with next year's priorities."

Democrats' Spending Plan Would Raise Some Budgets (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, January 31, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 30 (Bloomberg News) — Education, veterans' health care, international AIDS relief and the Federal Bureau of Investigation are among the government programs that would receive more money this year under a spending plan released Tuesday by House Democrats.

The House is scheduled to vote Wednesday on the $463.5 billion spending bill.

The measure, if passed and signed into law, would deliver the budgets that federal agencies have been awaiting for the fiscal year that began Oct. 1. The government has been operating on a stopgap spending measure that expires Feb. 15.

The chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, Representative David R. Obey, Democrat of Wisconsin, said the measure would leave most federal programs near last year's financing levels, drop thousands of pet projects known as earmarks and give larger increases to a few programs backed by Democrats or deemed to be in need of more money.

"I don't expect people to love this proposal — I don't love this proposal," Mr. Obey said in an e-mailed statement. "But in contrast to last year's Congress, which decided to duck these choices, at least we have made them in order to bring last year's issues to a conclusion so we can turn the page and deal with next year's priorities."

The legislation was greeted with complaints from Republicans who said they had been given little opportunity to amend or debate a measure that would provide almost half of the government's discretionary budget.

"It is legislation that few have seen, which we are informed by the majority leader will not be able to be amended and that will pass the House after only one hour of debate," said Representative Jerry Lewis, Republican of California and the ranking minority member of the Appropriations Committee.

DOJ_NMG_0125040

Mr. Obey dismissed the complaints, saying the overdue spending measures should have been completed last year when Republicans were in charge.

The plan would increase financing for veterans' health care by $3.6 billion, to $32.3 billion.

The budget for the National Institutes of Health would expand by $620 million, to $28.9 billion. The National Science Foundation would get an additional $335 million, for a total of $4.7 billion.

The Office of Science in the Department of Energy would get an additional $200 million. The F.B.I.'s budget would grow by $217 million, to $6 billion.

Financing for prison construction would jump by $343 million, to $432 million. Efforts to combat AIDS abroad would get an additional $1.3 billion, for a total of $4.5 billion.

The plan would cut the budgets of more than 60 programs from last year's level of spending.

Most programs would see their budgets frozen at current levels, with small increases to accommodate required raises for government employees. Critics have said that would amount to a cut once inflation and other additional costs are considered.

Couple Await Extradition In Meth Case (AZREP)

By Joseph W. Cox, The Arizona Republic

Arizona Republic, January 31, 2007

A Scottish couple is awaiting extradition to the United States today on charges alleging they distributed chemicals used in the production of methamphetamines to labs all over the United States.

Authorities said the investigation and subsequent arrests of Brian Howes, 43, and Kerry Ann Shanks, 28, led to the dismantling of about 100 meth labs across the country, including 20 in Arizona.

The couple were taken into custody today by Central Scotland police after an 82-count indictment was handed down by an Arizona grand jury in September 2006, according to the U.S. Department of Justice.

advertisement

The couple ran a Web site, KNO3.com, which distributed iodide crystals as well as red phosphorus used in the making of some methamphetamines, according to a press release by the Central Scotland Police department.

Chemicals from the site sold between August 2004 and November 2006 totaled enough to produce 1,400 pounds of methamphetamines, the Justice Department said.

The site first came to the attention of officials after finding containers marked with the name in numerous busts around the country, according to the U.S. Department of Justice.

Scottish Couple Arrested On U.S. Smuggling Indictment (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, January 31, 2007

(AP) - PHOENIX-A British couple indicted on charges they ran a company that illegally supplied chemicals to clandestine drug manufacturing operations were arrested Tuesday, the U.S. Attorney's office announced.

Brian Howes, 43, and Kerry Ann Shanks, 28, of West Lothian, Scotland, were arrested by Central Scotland Police in the culmination of an investigation involving local and federal authorities in the U.S. and Great Britain. They are named in a sealed 82-count indictment handed up in September by a federal grand jury in Phoenix and await extradition to the U.S., said Wyn Hornbuckle, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney in Phoenix.

The couple allegedly ran an internet-based operation that supplied chemicals to illicit manufacturers of methamphetamine for the past several years. Investigators began the probe of the couple's firm, http://www.KNO3.com, nearly three years ago, when raw chemicals from the company began showing up at clandestine labs raided by Arizona police.

The indictment alleges that the couple sent enough red phosphorus and iodine to U.S. customers to make 1,400 pounds (635 kilos) of methamphetamine.

More than 100 illicit drug labs, including 20 in Arizona, were broken up during the investigation of shipments of chemicals from the couple, Hornbuckle said.

The 82 counts include two conspiracy charges, 64 felony counts of illegally importing or distributing chemicals and 15 counts of using the mail or the Internet in a crime.

Attention: Drug Dealers (BNNJ)

By Sean C. Mccullen, Staff Writer

Bridgeton News, January 31, 2007

CAMDEN -- A federal judge on Tuesday sentenced a "major" Bridgeton crack dealer to more than 10 years in prison, U.S. Attorney Christopher J. Christie announced.

Nearly six months after pleading guilty to a one-count indictment for possession with intent to distribute more than 50 grams of crack cocaine, 29-year-old Rufus Kirkland Jr. learned on Tuesday that he will spend the next 14 years in federal prison.

U.S. District Judge Robert B. Kugler also ordered that Kirkland must serve five years of supervised release upon completion of his prison sentence, according to a press release issued by the U.S. Attorney's Office for the District of New Jersey.

City, county and federal narcotics investigators recovered a total of approximately five ounces of crack cocaine when arresting Kirkland on two separate occasions last year.

Kirkland was arrested for distributing crack cocaine by Bridgeton narcotics detectives last January and then by a task force consisting of investigators with the federal Drug Enforcement Administration, Bridgeton Police Department, and Cumberland County Prosecutor's Office last March.

The news of Kirkland's lengthy prison sentence was welcomed at the Bridgeton Police station Tuesday afternoon.

"That's excellent. Fourteen years on drug charges -- there's nothing that sends a message more than that," Det. Lt. Michael Gaimari said.

Bridgeton Police are hopeful that word of Kirkland's 14-year prison sentence will help reduce drug trafficking in the city, specifically among those who are selling crack cocaine.

"I would think it would definitely cause them to think twice before dealing crack," Gaimari said.

Kirkland's crack-dealing enterprise was investigated over a six-month period beginning in late 2005. The investigation included four controlled buys from Kirkland, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office press release.

The investigation was initiated by the Bridgeton Police Department Anti-Crime Team (ACT), which focuses on narcotics investigations. It was headed by former ACT Det. Thomas Gramp, who now serves in the department's patrol division.

Kirkland was arrested Jan. 28, 2006, as city police raided his apartment at 123 N. Pearl St. and recovered nearly five ounces of crack, less than a half-ounce of marijuana, and roughly $3,000, which was believed to be the proceeds of narcotics trafficking.

Kirkland's initial arrest followed a three-month investigation by Bridgeton ACT detectives.

On March 16, 2006, city, county and federal narcotics investigators arrested Kirkland outside of his home -- and found him to be in possession of 30 bags of crack -- on a federal warrant for the crack distribution charge.

The distribution charge had been moved from state to federal jurisdiction on March 15, when a federal grand jury handed down the one-count indictment against Kirkland.

Bridgeton Police had indicated in March 2006 that Kirkland would not be additionally charged for possessing the 30 bags of crack since the total weight of the drug was not enough to warrant an upgrade of the indictment.

The fact that he was in possession of the crack at the time of his second arrest was, however, added to the indictment.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Allen Harberg Jr. prosecuted the case.

Christie credited Bridgeton Police and the DEA, under the direction of Special Agent-in-Charge Gerard P. McAleer, who is based in Newark, for their roles in the investigation.

Gaimari credited Gramp and the ACT detectives for raiding Kirkland's apartment last January when he had a solid supply of crack.

"They hit him when he was loaded," he said.

Gaimari pointed to Kirkland as yet another Cumberland County drug dealer the federal government was able to prosecute and put behind bars for relatively lengthy sentences, including Bridgeton's Timmy Smith and Kamal Martin and Fairfield Township's Lavinston Lamar.

The Bridgeton lieutenant was pleased when he learned last year that DEA Special Agent Jim Kerrigan was interested in bringing the case against Kirkland to the federal level.

Careful to distinguish between the prosecutors and the courts, Gaimari was critical Tuesday of "liberal" rulings and sentences handed down in recent years by the state's courts -- rulings and sentences he asserted have made the war against drugs more difficult for law enforcement and easier on dealers.

In determining Kirkland's sentence, Kugler consulted the advisory U.S. Sentencing Guidelines, which provide appropriate sentencing ranges that take into account the severity and characteristics of the offense, the defendant's criminal history, if any, and other factors. Federal judges are not bound by those guidelines in determining sentences.

Parole has been abolished in the federal system. Defendants who are given custodial terms must serve nearly all that time.

Safety Kiel Cited For Relieving Himself In Public In San Diego (AP)

AP, January 31, 2007

SAN DIEGO -- Chargers strong safety Terrence Kiel was cited for urinating in public last month, his second run-in with the law in less than three months and the eighth by a San Diego player since April.

Maria Velasquez, spokeswoman for City Attorney Mike Aguirre, confirmed that Kiel was cited and released by police outside a nightclub in the Gaslamp Quarter at 1:50 a.m. on Dec. 18. The case is being reviewed and no charges have been filed yet, Velasquez said. Kiel is scheduled to make a court appearance on Feb. 20.

"It's very disappointing when you hear of things like this," Chargers general manager A.J. Smith said.

Kiel faces five felony drug charges stemming from his arrest in late September by Drug Enforcement Administration agents. The DEA said Kiel admitted to shipping at least two parcels of prescription cough syrup to Texas, apparently to be mixed with soft drinks to make a concoction known as "lean."

Kiel was led off the practice field and arrested in the locker room on Sept. 26. He didn't accompany the team to its game at Baltimore the following Sunday.

The Chargers were an NFL-best 14-2 and earned home-field advantage throughout the AFC playoffs, but were upset 24-21 by the New England Patriots in the divisional round. AP NEWS

Kiel Cited For Urinating Outside Downtown Club (SDUT)

By Brent Schrotenboer, Union-tribune Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, January 30, 2007

Chargers safety Terrence Kiel was cited by police for public urination outside a downtown club last month, the latest incident in a string of legal embarrassments for the Chargers stemming from the Gaslamp Quarter.

Kiel was cited in the 600 block of J Street, by the popular Jbar lounge. The San Diego City Attorney's office is reviewing the case, with Kiel scheduled for a court hearing on Feb. 20.

Meanwhile, cornerback Cletis Gordon will not face drunken-driving charges after he was arrested near the same corner, at 6th and J, in November. His blood-alcohol was below the legal limit of .08.

“However, the City Attorney's Office will keep the file open and will not pursue this case provided there are no other violations of the law,” city attorney spokeswoman Maria Velasquez said.

Tight end Ryan Krause's DUI case also still is under review by the city attorney's office, stemming from his arrest Jan. 6, this one in Pacific Beach. He also faces a court hearing in February, a busy month for Chargers legal proceedings.

In addition to his public urination citation, Kiel is to appear in court in February hoping to reach a deal with the San Diego County District Attorney on felony charges of theft and possession of a controlled substance. Kiel was arrested in September after Drug Enforcement Administration agents intercepted two packages containing 18 pint bottles of a codeine-based cough syrup. Authorities said Kiel admitted to shipping the syrup to his native Texas, where it can sell for up to $325 on the street.

Linebacker Steve Foley is facing two DUI counts after being shot near his house Sept. 3 by an off-duty police officer, who suspected him of driving drunk. Foley had been driving home after leaving Stingaree, another Gaslamp club.

Another Chargers linebacker, Shaun Phillips, was arrested in April in the Gaslamp after a struggle with police. The district and city attorneys declined to file charges in the matter.

Coaches The Chargers continue to wait out the siege on their assistants. As coordinator Wade Phillips yesterday awaited to hear whether he's the Dallas Cowboys' next head coach, linebackers coach Greg Manusky interviewed with the San Francisco 49ers about their defensive coordinator job. Meanwhile, head coach Marty Schottenheimer has not yet named his next running backs or tight ends coach.

California Man To Be Jailed For Mailing Cocaine, Meth (NOTP)

By Gwen Filosa, Staff Writer

New Orleans Times-Picayune, January 31, 2007

He shipped dope through N.O. port

A California man faces at least 20 years in federal prison for using the U.S. mail to traffic pounds of illegal drugs from his hometown to ports across the country.

Andy Huynh, 36, of El Monte, Calif., worked in a drug-dealing ring that shipped parcels of methamphetamine and cocaine to New Orleans; Honolulu, Hawaii; and Paoli, Pa.; from April 2005 until Hurricane Katrina hit the Gulf Coast, a jury concluded Tuesday at U.S. District Court.

During the two-day trial, federal prosecutors William Quinlan Jr. and Emily Greenfield detailed how Huynh's illicit business venture sent 9 pounds of nearly pure crystal meth, or "ice," through the mails, along with at least 890 grams of cocaine.

The shipments originated from El Monte, which is part of Los Angeles County, and were destined for drug dealers outside Philadelphia, New Orleans and Hawaii's capital city, according to prosecutors.

El Monte is about 12 miles east of downtown Los Angeles, and is known as the hub of the San Gabriel Valley, where Interstate 605 and Interstate 10 intersect.

Huynh was convicted on two counts of illegal drug distribution and faces a minimum of 10 years to life for each, along with fines of up to $4 million on each count.

Postal inspectors seized the parcels.

Huynh is due back in court for sentencing May 16, before Judge Eldon Fallon.

Letten's office worked the drug trafficking case with the El Monte police force, the Drug Enforcement Administration and the U.S. Postal Inspection Service.

4 More Colombian Politicians Face Probe (WP/AP)

By Toby Muse, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, January 31, 2007

BOGOTA, Colombia -- The Supreme Court opened preliminary investigations into four more politicians for alleged ties to illegal right-wing militias after it was revealed they signed a 2001 letter of understanding with the paramilitary groups, the court's president said Tuesday.

The court also ordered another four politicians, including the foreign minister's brother, to submit to additional questioning as probes deepened into their relations with paramilitaries.

"A preliminary inquiry is going forward, this is the initial phase of the process and to hear their testimony does not imply formal charges," said Alfredo Gomez, a Supreme Court judge.

Seven of those called to testify are backers of President Alvaro Uribe, while one belongs to an opposition party.

Senator Miguel de la Espriella, one of those called to testify, revealed the existence of the document in a November interview with the national daily, El Tiempo.

Some 30 politicians signed the letter, which was headed "confidential and secret," including congressmen, governors, mayors and regional deputies. The pact proposed "rebuilding our country" and the creation of a "new social contract."

While some of the politicians have claimed they were coerced into signing, others said they thought it was the foundation for a peace process. Top commanders of the paramilitaries were present at the meeting.

The pledge is the latest indication of the collusion of Colombia's political establishment with the paramilitaries. Seven current politicians have so far been jailed and are awaiting trial on charges ranging from the creation of paramilitary groups to homicide.

Originally created by landowners and drug traffickers to fight leftist rebels, paramilitaries are accused of some of the worst massacres in Colombia's long-running conflict. They are also accused of exporting hundreds of tons of cocaine abroad.

The paramilitaries are in a peace process with the government that has led to more than 31,000 fighters laying down their arms.

New Details On Sintia Mesa Murder (WUSA)

By Phyllis Armstrong

WUSA-TV, CBS 9, Washington, DC, January 31, 2007

9 News Now has learned disturbing new details about the murder of a Hyattsville woman reported missing last week.

Sources say federal agents with the Baltimore office of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms arrested a man named Jamal Jones (multiple spellings) earlier this month. He was charged with conspiracy to distribute heroin and released. An ATF spokeswoman says federal authorities had been looking for Jones since September of 2005. Sources had also identified the murdered woman's boyfriend as a Jamal Jones. Police have not confirmed or denied that it is the same man.

Baltimore City Police found the body of 25-year-old Sintia Mesa in the trunk of her Toyota Solara on Monday. The cause of death has not been released, but her body showed signs of trauma. Mesa's family reported her missing after she failed to show up for a nail appointment Friday afternoon in Baltimore County and a mandatory work meeting that evening.

Baltimore County police investigators began the search for the Morgan State University Graduate shortly about 12:25 am on Saturday. They say detectives discovered that someone had broken into Mesa's storage locker in Laurel, Maryland. Sources say authorities are looking into the possibility that money was taken from that locker.

Relatives have said Mesa lived with her boyfriend in Laurel until moving back with her parents last year. Police say they interviewed her boyfriend and other people close to her on Saturday about Mesa's disappearance. It is not known whether the arrest of Jones on drug charges had any connection with the murder of Mesa.

DOJ_NMG_0125044

Last Sunday morning, police located Mesa's cell phone and other personal belongings in a dumpster. Sources say a signal from that cell phone was picked up around 9:30 pm Friday in the same area as the dumpster. Baltimore City homicide detectives are continuing the search for her killer.

IMMIGRATION:

Citing Persecution, Judge Grants Gay Mexican Immigrant Asylum In U.S. (LAT)

By Tami Abdollah, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 31, 2007

An immigration judge granted a Mexican immigrant asylum, citing his sexual orientation and the severe persecution of gays in Mexico, the immigrant's lawyer said Tuesday.

Jorge Soto Vega, 38, said he had suffered harassment and violence from family members and authorities in Mexico because he is gay.

According to court documents, while living in Guadalajara, Soto Vega was beaten by police with a "metal baton or flashlight" and then robbed, called "anti-gay slurs" and told that he would be killed if he was ever seen again.

In 1988, Soto Vega paid a smuggler to sneak him into the United States, and he settled in the Hollywood and Silver Lake areas. In 2001, Soto Vega returned from a brief visit to Mexico after his mother's death, during which he said he was afraid to go outside. He said he found out about the asylum process upon his return and filed an application the following year.

Soto Vega's request for asylum was denied in 2003 by immigration judge John D. Taylor, who said he could return to Mexico since "it would not be obvious that he was homosexual unless he made it obvious himself."

The case was returned to Taylor after the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals ruled it is the government's responsibility to prove Soto Vega had no "well-founded fear of persecution" in Mexico.

At the hearing Tuesday, the judge agreed that a person should not have to conceal his or her sexual orientation in order to be free from persecution, said Jon W. Davidson, legal director at Lambda Legal, a nonprofit gay-rights group. The U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency waived the right to appeal in the case, spokeswoman Virginia Kice said.

Davidson, who represented Soto Vega, said there was "overwhelming testimony showing severe persecution of gays in all areas of Mexico and therefore the inability of [Soto Vega] to move safely to any other area."

"He's a 38-year-old man who is not married and has never been married. In Mexico, that means you're gay," Davidson said.

Citing strict confidentiality provisions regarding asylum cases, Kice would not comment on the decision.

Soto Vega, who moved to Brooklyn, N.Y., to be near his partner's family about four years ago, said he can now live without fear of deportation.

"It's been a long, long wait to get to this point where I feel today, secure and happy," Soto Vega said.

*

tami.abdollah@latimes.com

US Visa Policy To Come Under Attack (FT)

By Edward Luce

Financial Times, January 31, 2007

US private-sector bodies will on Tuesday criticise the Bush administration for persisting with strict visa policies that they say are damaging the country's reputation around the world and harming US business interests.

The group, which includes bodies representing US universities, business exporters, student associations and think-tanks, will urge the White House and Capitol Hill to make rapid changes to the US visa regime.

These would include steps to expand the number of countries that benefit from the US visa waiver programme and ending the requirement that all visa applicants to the US must submit to a personal interview at US consular offices.

The National Foreign Trade Council estimated that US businesses lost more than $30bn in the two years before mid-2004 because of the visa restrictions imposed after the 2001 terrorist attacks. That figure is likely to be much larger now.

"American businesses now routinely hold training seminars, conferences and sometimes even board meetings outside of the US," said Bill Reinsch, head of the NFTC. "At the same time you see foreign universities attracting more students by advertising the fact that they don't have a US-style visa regime."

The State Department says it has responded to private sector criticisms by employing more than 500 new consular officers, increasing the use of electronic visa processing and cutting down the waiting time for scientists to obtain a visa.

"We recognise the critical importance for the US economy and American public diplomacy of making it easier for students and business travellers to get visas," Dina Habib Powell, US assistant secretary of state, told the FT in a recent interview. For example, the number of visas granted to foreign students last year stabilised at 565,766 after consecutive years of decline, she said.

However, private sector groups say the Bush administration has not done nearly enough to address the seriousness of the problem. "US agencies must recognise that the conduct of visa policy and the treatment of visitors at ports of entry is public diplomacy," says the private sector statement that will be issued today.

Last year the Discover America partnership – a coalition of travel and tourist groups – found that two-thirds of the 2,011 international business travellers it surveyed thought the US was "the worst country in the world" in the way it treated foreign visitors at the border.

Similar proportions said they feared mistreatment at the hands of US immigration officials. There was no difference in response between visa waiver countries, such as France and Germany, and those requiring visas, such as China and India. Discover America will separately today issue a recommended "blueprint for change" to persuade 10m more foreign visitors to visit the US.

U.S. Is Urged To Step Up Plan To Attract More Visitors (NYT)

By Rachel L. Swarns

The New York Times, January 31, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 30 — One year after the Bush administration vowed to try to slow the decline of overseas visitors to the United States, travel industry executives and some Democratic lawmakers say that the initiative needs to be stepped up.

The lawmakers and executives point to continuing delays in processing visas, staff shortages at international airports here and American consulates abroad and what they describe as a failure to promote the United States adequately as a travel destination since the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

Officials at the Departments of State and Homeland Security counter that they have already made significant progress in addressing such problems. But Senator Daniel K. Inouye, Democrat of Hawaii and chairman of the Senate Commerce Committee, and Senator Byron L. Dorgan, Democrat of North Dakota and chairman of the tourism subcommittee, say legislation is needed to prod the administration to do more.

"Announcing a new initiative is the easy part," Mr. Dorgan said of the administration's plan, which is intended to encourage tourism and business travel. "The follow-through is what is important. And the fact is the results so far have been less than impressive."

Between 2000 and 2005, the number of overseas visitors dipped from 26 million annually to 21 million, according to the Travel Industry Association. In some places in Brazil, Mexico, Venezuela and the Dominican Republic, travelers still wait nearly two months or more to get an interview for a visa, State Department statistics show. And travel industry executives say that an effort to transform the Houston and Dulles international airports into model airports has made "marginal progress."

An association of travel industry executives, called the Discover America Partnership, has hired Tom Ridge, the first homeland security secretary, to help promote its efforts.

The group includes Jay Rasulo, chairman of Walt Disney Resorts and Parks; Jonathan M. Tisch, chairman of Loews Hotels; and Roger Dow, president of the Travel Industry Association. The travel executives are calling for legislation that would increase financing for consular and airport staff and require the administration to report to Congress on its efforts to improve visa processing and customer service at customs checkpoints, among other things.

Mr. Dorgan, who will hold a hearing on the issue on Wednesday, praised the partnership's proposals and said he and other lawmakers would consider them as they drafted legislation. "Other countries have become more aggressive while we have become less aggressive," he said. "It seems to me we ought to change that."

Maura Harty, assistant secretary for consular affairs in the State Department, said critics failed to acknowledge progress that had been made. In September 2006, 47 of the 219 American embassies and consulates that handle nonimmigrant visas had wait times of 30 days or more for visa interviews. Now, she said, only 20 of the postings have wait times of that length.

Ms. Harty noted that the number of business visas issued in Brazil had surged by 70 percent over the past year and that the number of student visas had increased by 32 percent in China and 30 percent in India. In the meantime, she said, the State Department was testing video conferencing of interviews and mobile consular units in remote locations.

She expressed disappointment that such achievements were not recognized. "We have in essence been changing out the engine while the aircraft is in midflight," she said. "We have enhanced our service delivery."

DOJ_NMG_0125046

Jarrod Agen, a spokesman for the Department of Homeland Security, echoed her concerns. He said his department was pressing ahead with legislation that would expand the number of countries where travelers are not required to apply for visas in exchange for tougher security reviews of those travelers, among other changes.

"A number of the points are areas where we're already working to improve and have made strides," Mr. Agen said.

Stevan Porter, the chairman of the Discover America Partnership, said more needed to be done. "America is experiencing a travel crisis, one that hurts our economy, national security and global standing," said Mr. Porter, who is also the president of the Intercontinental Hotels Group.

Mr. Ridge said a concerted effort was needed to make sure that America was viewed as a welcoming destination. "I suspect every congressman, senator, ambassador, business leader as well as thousands of individuals citizens have a litany of anecdotes that confirm that it is more difficult traveling to this country," Mr. Ridge said.

Immigrant Groups Want 'Legalization For Everyone' (CHIT)

By Emma Graves Fitzsimmons

Chicago Tribune, January 31, 2007

An alliance of Chicago immigrant advocates called on Congress Tuesday to give undocumented immigrants legal status when the Democratic majority takes another look at immigration reform in February.

"The language in Washington, D.C., is different from the language here at the grass-roots level," said Carlos Arango, the executive director of Casa Aztlan, a cultural center for the Mexican community in Pilsen. "This is the agenda that comes from the community. It is not negotiable. We want legalization for everyone."

The United Front of Immigrants released a set of demands at a news conference Tuesday that included suspending construction of a fence along the border, establishing a path to citizenship for more immigrants and ending recent attempts by customs officials to intimidate immigrants.

In February, the Senate is expected to reconsider a bill it passed in May that proposed a three-tiered approach for illegal immigrants, requiring some to leave and permitting others to stay.

U.S. Rep. Luis Gutierrez (D-Ill.) is working on a bill in the House and has been in early discussions with Sens. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and John McCain (R-Ariz.) about addressing immigration reform.

Gutierrez "is committed to an earned legalization program that helps people already here to adjust their status," said Scott Frotman, the representative's press secretary. "The congressman believes the time for real comprehensive immigration reform is now. The current system is badly broken. It's hurting families, it's harming business, and it's hindering efforts to guard our homeland."

Chicago has been at the foreground of the national immigration debate after several marches last spring brought hundreds of thousands of protesters calling for the legalization of undocumented immigrants to downtown streets. There are 1.5 million Mexican immigrants residing in Illinois, according to figures from the 2000 U.S. Census.

Immigrant advocates have been trying to harness those numbers to support candidates backing an opportunity for illegal immigrants to earn legal status.

Since 2004, the Illinois Coalition for Immigrant and Refugee Rights has registered 42,057 people in the Chicago metropolitan area. The organization had more than 1,500 volunteers calling voters and knocking on doors on Election Day in November.

A more just immigration reform bill will test how much the Democrats value Latino voters that helped them get elected last year, Arango said.

The United Front alliance includes several groups that participated in the marches, including Casa Aztlan, the United Network for Immigrant and Refugee Rights, Latino Organization of the Southwest and the International Coalition of Mexicans Abroad.

The guiding principles behind the group's demands are keeping families together and allowing immigrants to live and work in the U.S. without the fears of deportation and discrimination, organizers said.

The alliance plans on working with immigrant advocates in New York and California to pressure Congress, in addition to appealing directly to legislators.

TAX:

The Barrett Report (WT)

By Mark Goodman

DOJ_NMG_0125047

The Washington Times, January 31, 2007

The bell has just rung on the 2008 presidential sweepstakes and already more entries have crowded into the gates than the American grandstand can count, much less account for. That's all to the good, as the only winners over the past two decades have been named either Bush or Clinton. Still, since nothing less than the fate of the nation seems to be at stake, it is imperative that all candidates be measured as closely as possible for merit and accountability, beginning with the most visible pretender, Sen. Hillary Clinton.

The disturbing problem is, neither the Democrats or Republicans on Capitol Hill are disposed to brace Mrs. Clinton, even though it is immediately within their power to do so.

Let's return one year to the yellowing Barrett report. In February 2006, after nine years of hard labor, Washington lawyer David Barrett, the independent counsel appointed to investigate the Henry Cisneros scandal, finally published his 684-page report. His study provoked commentary mainly for what was missing — 120 pages of evidence, reportedly devastating to both Clintons, which Democratic congressmen, led by Sens. John Kerry, Dick Durbin and Byron Dorgan, had redacted by attaching a rider to another bill.

Deeply frustrated by nine seasons of blockading by Clinton lawyers and Democratic congressmen, Mr. Barrett issued a statement saying, "An accurate title for the report would be, 'What We Were Prevented from Investigating.' " What, indeed. In an online column written before he signed on as President Bush's press secretary, Tony Snow reported that by all accounts the redacted pages contained enough damning evidence to sink Mrs. Clinton's presidential ship.

Mr. Snow's widely held view made sense, else why would the Democrats go to such extravagant lengths to shield the pages from the light of day? However, there was a catch to the redaction: Any congressman could secure a copy of the vaulted evidence merely for the asking.

As it happened, I had trod a path parallel to Mr. Barrett's in my own investigation into corruption in the highest precincts of a global media conglomerate which led in turn led to evidence of obstruction by President Clinton.

An abiding theme in the redacted pages, insiders say, is the Clinton camp practice of using the IRS to punish its enemies. Mr. Clinton plainly did not leave this illegal practice behind in the Oval Office. By all accounts he has maintained a tight grip on a number of government departments and agencies, notably the Justice Department and the IRS, the folks who can deal the deadliest damage.

I can personally vouch for the Clinton-IRS strategy. In 2002, after I had learned of Mr. Clinton's intrusion into the case I had reported to the IRS, I informed Mrs. Clinton of the facts I'd uncovered. Soon enough the IRS came calling with unwarranted tax demands and threats of criminal investigation. I replied accusing the IRS of conspiring with the Clintons and the media conglomerate to perpetrate "institutionalized terrorism." The agency, finally grasping the irony that it was seeking to punish its own whistleblower, quickly backed off.

So: You really can Just Say No to Clintonian bullying. All of which brings me back round to the 120 missing pages of the Barrett report, still smoking in some nether Beltway trash barrel. I tried to pry the pages out of Florida Republican Rep. E. Clay Shaw Jr. (who, in this tale's one comic episode, referred me to my local Democratic representative) and even appealed to Mr. Snow and the chairman of the Republican National Committee — and got nowhere. It's a puzzlement: Why would the Republicans sit on a report they think destined to deep-six the presidential campaign of the Democratic front-runner?

Alas, there are several unholy answers to that riddle. The first is the cynical theory that we don't really live in a democracy but in a series of autocracies changed at fixed intervals. Thus the inevitable corollary: At the top, power-brokers stick together. It further must be clear to the Republican brain trust that the party is on course to take an even worse drubbing in 2008 than it did in 2006, so they're surely counting future cards. And if they have to suffer a Democrat in the White House, who better than Mrs. Clinton, poster girl for moral ambiguity? In that event, it follows, the sequestered pages of the Barrett Report would surely give the Republicans a dandy wild card when upcoming hands are dealt on Capitol Hill. Bluntly put, they'd have Mrs. Clinton at least halfway in their pocket.

Finally, under the law of unintended consequences, it occurs to me that Mr. Bush's Roman abuses of power have provided welcome cover and concealment for Clinton crimes and misdemeanors. I'm an avowed liberal and a registered Democrat, but I do understand that a wrong Bush doesn't make two right Clintons. I submit that in this crucial election season the American public — which, after all, paid $20 million in hard tax dollars for the Barrett report — has every right to access of all pertinent information available on presidential candidates.

Now that the senator from New York has announced "I'm in to win," voters should demand that their representatives release the mystery pages so that they may examine Mrs. Clinton red in tooth. Otherwise, Americans run the risk of going to the polls in 2008 seeking the rebirth of a nation only to discover that they have merely traded the devil for a witch.

Mark Goodman is a veteran journalist and author of the novel "Hurrah for the Next Man Who Dies."

DOJ_NMG_0125048

IRS Calculators Offer Guidance Web Site Can Help Figure Out AMT, Sales Tax Deduction (WSJ)

By Tom Herman

The Wall Street Journal, January 31, 2007

Looking for help on your taxes? Consider what may seem like an unlikely source: the Internal Revenue Service.

This year, the IRS Web site (irs.gov) offers a handy new feature designed to help taxpayers calculate whether it is better to deduct their state and local sales taxes instead of their state and local income taxes. More than 11 million people claimed the sales-tax deduction on their returns last year.

The IRS also recently updated a calculator that could help some perplexed taxpayers figure out whether they are likely to be ensnared by the alternative minimum tax, or AMT.

IRS National Taxpayer Advocate Nina Olson says the AMT is the most serious problem facing individual taxpayers. More than 3.5 million people are expected to get hit by it for 2006.

Here is a guide to these features, and their strengths and weaknesses:

Sales-tax deduction. If you itemize your deductions, you can choose to deduct either your state and local sales taxes or your state and local income taxes -- but not both. This provision, which expired at the end of 2005, was recently resurrected by Congress. It is especially helpful to people in Florida, Texas, Washington and other states that have no state income tax. But you don't have to live in those states to benefit.

To figure your deduction, you can use the amount of sales taxes you actually paid, assuming you saved all those receipts. The other, easier choice is to use the standard amount allowed by the IRS -- plus the taxes you paid on certain purchases, such as a car, boat or material to build a house.

That is where the IRS's new calculator comes in handy. It is remarkably easy to figure out the standard amount. Just go to the IRS site and type "sales tax calculator" in the search box. You don't have to give your name or Social Security number. Just plug in details such as your adjusted gross income, number of exemptions and ZIP Code. I tried it for a hypothetical taxpayer with more than $200,000 of income for last year, two exemptions and a 33480 ZIP Code for Palm Beach, Fla. The answer: $2,137.42.

Initial reviews from tax professionals have been favorable. "I'm impressed," says Claudia Hill, owner of Tax Mam Inc., a tax-preparation and planning firm in Cupertino, Calif. Donna LeValley, a tax lawyer and contributing editor of the book "J.K. Lasser's Your Income Tax 2007," says the IRS tool is "easy to use, has clear explanations" and -- most important -- was accurate for the areas in the country she tested. But be sure to print out a copy of your results to show how you calculated the amount, just in case you are questioned, Ms. LeValley adds.

If you don't want to use the online calculator, you can use the worksheet in Publication 600, posted on the IRS Web site.

Warning: Because of the intricacies of the AMT and how state and local income taxes are calculated, residents of some states who are hit by the AMT might be better off claiming the sales-tax deduction even if they paid more in state income taxes. Deducting sales taxes may make more sense from a state income-tax perspective. To be safe, crunch the numbers both ways to see which is best for you.

Alternative minimum tax: The IRS recently updated an online tool that it says will help most taxpayers figure out in about five or 10 minutes whether they might owe AMT. "Nobody likes the AMT. But this tool helps people learn quickly whether they're going to be paying this tax," says IRS Commissioner Mark W. Everson.

The IRS says this is an automated version of a worksheet used to see if you should fill out Form 6251 for the AMT. But it won't be much use to people who have any of 17 items, such as accelerated depreciation, tax-exempt interest from private-activity municipal bonds or investment interest expense reported on Form 4952. If you check yes to any of these, you still have to fill out Form 6251. * * *

SOME EARLY BIRDS seek inflated phone-tax refunds.

The IRS is investigating "potential abuses" on some individual income-tax returns filed this year. The agency says "some" individual taxpayers have claimed "large and apparently improper amounts" for the special telephone-tax refund.

The IRS says the government stopped collecting the long-distance excise tax last August after several court rulings. Federal officials have authorized a one-time refund of tax collected on service billed in the prior 41 months, from the start of March 2003 to the end of July 2006.

Officials have spotted "some clear abuse involving overstated refund requests," Mr. Everson says. Those requesting an inflated amount "will likely see their refund frozen, may have their entire tax return audited and even face criminal prosecution where warranted."

DOJ_NMG_0125049

In some cases, people appear to be requesting a refund of the entire amount of their phone bills, not just the 3% tax on long-distance and bundled service they are entitled to, the IRS said. Some people are requesting "thousands of dollars, indicating they had phone bills topping $100,000 -- an amount exceeding their income."

Some tax preparers "are helping their clients file apparently improper requests," the IRS said. * * *

BRIEFS: IRS Publication 17, "Your Federal Income Tax for Individuals," a general guide for individual taxpayers, is available on the IRS Web site....Rep. John Lewis, a Georgia Democrat, is the new chairman of the Ways and Means subcommittee that oversees the IRS. He succeeds Rep. Jim Ramstad of Minnesota, now the panel's ranking Republican.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Lauds Caterpillar's Teamwork (JSO)

By Paul Gordon

Journal Star (Central Illinois), January 31, 2007

EAST PEORIA - Caterpillar Inc. has shown American companies can compete in a global economy, and do it well, President George W. Bush said during a speech at a Caterpillar plant here Tuesday.

That's why Bush chose Caterpillar and Building SS, where its largest earthmoving equipment is built, as his backdrop in an address about the U.S. economy and the need to continue working toward free trade throughout the world.

"The good folks here show others that in the manufacturing world, we can compete. And that's really what Americans wonder, can you compete in a global economy? My answer is, darn right you can, with good policy. And in this company, you've shown how to compete," Bush told an audience of more than 500 consisting of Caterpillar employees and officials and invited area dignitaries. He was accompanied from Washington, D.C., by U.S. Rep. Ray LaHood, R-Peoria, whom Bush said "has been buggin' me" about coming to Peoria since he was elected.

But in an address where he spent much time touting his own policies on trade, tax cuts, education and other issues, Bush cautioned that there are some who favor protectionist policies he believes would close off free trade for American companies.

Those companies, including Caterpillar, make up the largest exporting country in the world, one that can get even stronger if free trade agreements are allowed to multiply and flourish.

"I strongly believe that if we can compete with people on a level playing field, nobody can compete with us. And so the key is to make sure the rules are fair," Bush said, addressing an issue that is important to Caterpillar.

While the president used the speech to discuss issues that affect the entire country, he interwove Caterpillar into most of it, holding the company up as an example of a firm that gets things done.

"People say, why would you want to go to Peoria â€¦ I want to get out of Washington and sit down with folks that are really the backbone of this country. And I wanted to come to one of America's great companies, and that's Caterpillar," he said.

Bush praised the company's motto, Team Caterpillar, as meaning "everybody works together for the common good and if it benefits one, it benefits all. And that's the spirit I have found here."

His speech followed an hour-long tour of Building SS, including viewing some of the training programs Caterpillar has in place for employees and visiting with workers on the assembly lines.

He even took a brief spin on a D10 bulldozer. "If you've never driven a D10 - it's a cool experience," he said to the laughter of the audience.

Bush used what he saw and learned on his tour in his speech when discussing trade and exports, when talking about attitudes of the American work force and in connection with the need to make our children skilled and educated.

"Let me talk to you about Caterpillar. Half the products you make in America are exported. It's an interesting statistic, isn't it? You walk by one of these things, it's sold right here in the United States, but the other one right here is sold overseas," he said, motioning to the bulldozers that stood near the podium.

He pointed out that Chile, a country with which he signed a free trade agreement only a few years ago, is now Caterpillar's fifth largest export market.

Bush said the growing export market for Caterpillar is why the company is adding jobs.

"People want Caterpillar products. Why? Because they work. They generally don't break down, the master craftsmanship is great, and there's a demand for them," he said.

Bush said he knows trade with China is controversial. "But I want to tell you something, if you're a Caterpillar worker or a Caterpillar shareholder, what that has meant. It meant that Caterpillar exports to China have increased by 40 percent since the market was opened. That's helped to create more than 5,000 new jobs right here in America."

Bush also discussed his tax cut policies that he said has helped companies like Caterpillar to better afford research and development and small companies to purchase needed equipment. Those cuts, he added, also meant people kept more of their hard-earned income in their pockets.

He intends to continue those cuts, he said, and will submit a budget to Congress next week showing how to balance the budget in five years while keeping taxes down.

Bush spoke about new technologies and how those, including new batteries for autos and ethanol development from sources other than just corn, will help reduce the country's dependence on foreign oil.

Bush In Illinois To Tout Policies (CHIT)

By James P. Miller

Chicago Tribune, January 31, 2007

EAST PEORIA, Ill. -- President Bush plugged his economic policies Tuesday, telling an audience at Caterpillar Inc.'s manufacturing plant that his administration's actions played a role in helping Caterpillar achieve its three-year string of record earnings.

After touring the company's factory, and test-driving one of the mastodon-size tractors made at the plant, Bush told the crowd that the economy is strong and said, "The fundamental question is, what are we going to do to keep it strong?"

The answer he proposed was a continuation of the tax and trade policies that the Bush administration has pursued for the last six years. But with Congress now controlled by the Democrats his policies are being challenged.

Bush's trip to the heartland was part of a two-day campaign aimed at focusing public attention on the economy's health. On Wednesday the president is scheduled to deliver what is being billed as a "State of the Economy" speech in New York.

In Caterpillar the White House selected a company that competes successfully on the global stage and has profited from global trade. It has operations in 23 of the world's 24 time zones and it is enjoying strong sales in China and other offshore markets, even as its U.S. sales have sagged in response to the steep falloff in housing starts.

The company has been riding a global boom in commodity prices, which has spurred demand for its mining and oil-exploration equipment, its construction equipment, and its massive diesel-powered electric generators.

"In this company," Bush told a crowd of about 400 Caterpillar employees and local officials, "you've shown how to compete in a global economy."

Caterpillar has long been known for its organizational and logistical prowess in support of its far-flung operations. However, it was not always as lean and efficient as it has become over the past decade. In the early 1990s Caterpillar endured a series of lengthy and bitter strikes by the United Auto Workers union, as it sought to rein in wages and benefits.

The company eventually prevailed, and for more than a decade has experienced labor peace with the UAW. The Peoria-based company employs about 17,000 people in the local area, but its production workforce is smaller than it once was, thanks in part to the company's expansion of production in Asia and Europe. A residue of bitterness over those strikes still lingers among former workers for the town's leading employer.

White House spokesman Tony Snow told reporters Monday that the president's address in East Peoria would be "highlighting, among other things, the benefits of global trade and the way in which free and fair trade have enabled companies like Caterpillar to prosper on the global market."

Caterpillar is a major exporter, and it also produces products in foreign markets for sale in those regions. But it was apparent when Bush spoke that the rank-and-file workers remain unconvinced on the issue.

When Bush told the crowd, "We don't need more taxes," he drew a big round of applause. But the group failed to respond with similar warmth when he told the workers that "the temptation is to say: 'Let's protect ourselves. Let's isolate ourselves.'"

Because international trade is so crucial, Bush said, "it would be a mistake for Caterpillar workers to do that."

The president's speech had been expected to include a call for a legislative renewal of what used to be known as "fast-track" trade authority. In essence, that power enhances the president's ability to make trade deals with other nations, because it obliges Congress to simply vote yes or no on accords that the president negotiates.

But in his speech, delivered from a podium situated among huge pieces of equipment in the factory's cavernous shipping area, Bush did not raise the issue of renewing the trade authority.

But he praised "fair trade" accords, such as those his administration helped bring about between the U.S. and the nations of Chile and Australia, and said those pacts had played a major role in the surging sales Caterpillar has seen in both countries.

Of course, a dramatic run-up in the price of metals such as copper, nickel and iron ore, which is largely attributable to China's fast-growing industrial economy, has been a key driver of Caterpillar's booming sales overseas.

Bush's effort to align his administration with Caterpillar's success has drawn mixed reviews in this industrial town on the Illinois River.

DOJ_NMG_0125051

An editorial in Tuesday's Peoria Journal Star conceded that the administration's efforts in certain areas have benefited the company. But, the editorial continued, "the difficult decisions Cat made to put the company in the position it enjoys today … were largely made in Peoria, not in Washington, D.C."

The president arrived at the Peoria airport about 9 a.m., when the temperature was about 7 degrees and a biting wind made conditions even more unpleasant. His first stop was a breakfast with some local small-business owners.

"People say, 'Why would you want to go to Peoria?'" Bush told the factory audience, before adding, "I want to get out of Washington and sit down with folks that are really the backbone of this country. And I wanted to come to one of America's great companies, and that's Caterpillar."

Much of the president's comments involved a detailed defense of numerous policies, including his education plan, his desire to make earlier tax cuts permanent and the administration's alternative-energy proposals.

Before his speech Bush walked through the manufacturing facility accompanied by Caterpillar Chief Executive Jim Owens.

At the end of the tour the president climbed aboard a massive piece of heavy equipment painted the iconic Caterpillar yellow and told the press pool: "I'd advise you to stand back. I'm about to crank this sucker up."

He drove it forward about 20 feet, then backed it into a turn and straightened the giant vehicle out.

Bush then climbed down, saying, "Oh, yeah."

Bush Pushes For More Free-trade Deals In Cat Speech (PG)

By Mike Riopell And Blackwell Thomas

Pantagraph.com, January 31, 2007

EAST PEORIA -- President Bush visited central Illinois Tuesday and stood before Caterpillar Inc.'s iconic yellow bulldozers to call for more free trade agreements that he says make it easier for U.S. companies to export their goods. | Video

"I know it's a bad mistake for the country to lose our confidence and not compete," he said.

The president, during a 24-minute address to a crowd of about 500, said exports by the giant manufacturer of earth-movers increased following trade agreements his administration negotiated with other countries.

But it's not clear the Democratic leadership in Congress will wholeheartedly endorse creating more.

U.S. Sen. Dick Durbin says current trade agreements aren't strictly enforced by Bush's administration.

And Durbin suggests Caterpillar's success isn't necessarily reflective of the country's manufacturing climate, noting substantial layoffs in several Illinois communities including Herrin and Pinckneyville.

"As we lose good paying jobs in America overseas to China and other countries, we need to enforce the trade agreements that this administration and others have entered into," Durbin said on the Senate floor Tuesday.

While some have found new work, Durbin said many jobs aren't of as high a quality as many of the ones lost.

"The reality of America's economy is that on his watch we have lost three million manufacturing jobs," he said.

But Caterpillar assembler Raymond Knollenburg said the president's visit to the 1 million square foot East Peoria factory meant a lot to him.

"Our products are all over the world and the president recognizes that," he said.

Bush began the visit at a local eatery and took a spin driving a large bulldozer before speaking to the crowd.

His remarks focused on the economy in order to preface a major policy speech he'll give Wednesday in New York.

But he didn't completely avoid some of the controversial policies of his presidency â€“ promoting the No Child Left Behind education program and defending his tax cuts.

"It's important for you to keep your own money," he said. "You work hard for your money."

Gary Ball, who works in repairs at Caterpillar, said the speech notably didn't deal much the war in Iraq.

"I thought he had a very good message, especially with education," he said. "But I am sure everyone would like to hear something about the war. I guess this just isn't the place for it."

Tuesday's visit to the Peoria area was Bush's only stop in Illinois. About 500 Caterpillar employees and local officials heard the speech, with some workers sitting on bulldozers as part of the backdrop.

Despite the pomp that comes with a presidential visit, Caterpillar spokesman Rusty Dunn said everyone would get back to work soon after Bush left.

"Once the bleachers and seats are removed we'll be back to work immediately," he said.

Bush Pushes Free Trade At Tractor Plant (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang And Molly Hennessy-fiske

The Los Angeles Times, January 31, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0125052

EAST PEORIA, ILL. — Using two huge yellow earthmovers as his backdrop, and giddy over driving a third, President Bush sought Tuesday to calm fears about globalization, the nation's economic future and the risks of easing trade barriers, arguing that free trade benefits U.S. workers.

"The temptation is to say, 'Well, trade may not be worth it, let's isolate ourselves, let's protect ourselves,' " Bush said, adding: "It's a bad mistake for the country to lose our confidence and not compete."

Opening a campaign for renewed trade-negotiating authority before a low-key audience of workers and managers from Caterpillar Inc., which manufactures heavy equipment and sells a large portion of it overseas, Bush is facing a tough battle with an uncertain outcome.

He has not yet specifically asked Congress to renew his "fast-track" negotiating authority, which expires July 1, but he is expected to do so soon. Also known as "trade promotion authority," it allows him to negotiate trade agreements that Congress cannot amend — just vote to approve or disapprove.

Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.), chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, signaled a readiness Tuesday to work with Bush on the issue, saying he was trying to get the two political parties out of "divorce court."

"If we don't give trade promotion authority [to the White House], we've got to have a good reason for not giving it," he said during a committee meeting.

This month, 37 Democrats who had campaigned against free trade urged Rangel to "reverse the troubling results of the administration's trade agreements and trade policies." The issue has taken on added importance in recent weeks because efforts are underway to energize negotiations of a global trade treaty that have been stalled for half a year.

Bush's speech was the first of two this week promoting the nation's economic strength. He is to travel today to Wall Street, where he will speak at historic Federal Hall.

The president told the audience at Caterpillar that the nation's exports of goods and services last year were worth $1.4 trillion, and that exports amounted to 11% of the nation's economic value, with one in six manufacturing jobs dependent on foreign sales.

He noted that half of Caterpillar's products were sold overseas, and that since the United States and Australia initiated a free-trade pact in 2005, Caterpillar's exports to that country had grown 26%.

However, there is a counterpoint to the president's numbers and his optimistic tenor.

Although wages and employment are growing, Bush faces an undercurrent of concern — over the effects of technology, the struggles facing the Big Three automakers and other traditional blue-collar manufacturing employers, and, most notably, globalization.

And though Bush cites recent improvements in the economy, Bureau of Labor Statistics figures indicate that over the six years of his presidency, real earnings of rank-and-file workers, comparing their earnings with purchasing power, have grown only 3%.

Lawrence Mishel, president of the Economic Policy Institute, a liberal research organization, says that the nation's trade imbalance cost 3 million manufacturing jobs in the United States from 2000 to 2005 and has brought down wages in the typical American household by $2,000 to $6,000 a year.

But at Caterpillar, Bush found room to argue for trade's benefits.

The company employs 45,000 workers overseas — nearly half its workforce of 94,000, according to company figures — and Bush said that Caterpillar sales to China, where its staff numbers in the thousands, had boosted the company's workforce in the United States by 5,000.

But Alan Reuther, legislative director for the United Auto Workers union in Washington, responded to Bush's comments Tuesday by noting that as Caterpillar expanded overseas, it "adopted a couple of policies we think are terrible" to cut costs domestically, including a two-tier pay scale for new workers and reduced benefits for retirees and their families.

"Meanwhile, the industry has been booming, and Caterpillar cites record profits," Reuther said. "The feeling among our folks is they could easily do better by their workers." Caterpillar employs about 11,000 UAW members, Reuther said.

Bush's audience, 300 plant workers and company managers, was generally subdued. But it came alive, just as he did, when he described his encounter with a D10 track-type tractor, a behemoth of a machine.

He climbed aboard, telling reporters, "I would suggest moving back. I'm about to crank this sucker up."

With that, the machine came to life, moving forward on its yellow metal treads, until the president brought it to a halt about 20 feet down the line and started it on a backward turn. When Bush climbed down from the cab, the inner boy was shining through, and a broad, sheepish grin crossed his face.

"Oh, yeah," he said.

"If you've never driven a D10," he told the workers and managers a few minutes later, "it's a cool experience."

DOJ_NMG_0125053

Bush Pushes For More Free-trade Deals (AP)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, January 31, 2007

President Bush, pressing his free-trade agenda on a Congress now run by Democrats, said Tuesday more foreign markets need to be opened to U.S. products.

"The temptation is to say, well, trade may not be worth it. Let's isolate ourselves. Let's protect ourselves," Bush said, standing on a factory floor before 300 employees of Caterpillar Inc.

"I know it's a bad mistake for the country to lose our confidence and not compete," the president said.

Bush wants Congress to extend his authority to negotiate free-trade deals, a request that likely will face an uphill battle in Congress. Democrats won the November elections in part by arguing that the administration's free-trade policies were costing U.S. jobs and exposing American workers to unfair competition from low-wage countries.

Now with Democrats in control, Bush faces an even bigger challenge in getting Congress to renew the Trade Promotion Authority. Also known as fast-track authority, it lets the president negotiate trade deals that Congress must approve without amendments. That authority expires on July 1.

"We're going to continue to negotiate free trade agreements," Bush said. "And by that I mean, we just want people to treat us fairly. I'm confident in our ability to sell American products and services overseas if the playing field is level."

Bush used Caterpillar's huge earth-moving equipment as a backdrop for the first of two economic speeches this week. He travels to New York City on Wednesday to give what he's calling an address on the state of the economy.

Since his State of the Union address, Bush, whose job approval ratings are at record lows, has focused his public events on health care, energy and the economy — domestic issues that have been overshadowed by the unpopular war in Iraq.

He traveled to visit Caterpillar because the company is taking advantage of a growing global demand for construction and mining equipment. The company posted record profits and revenues for three straight years, creating about 5,000 jobs at its U.S. plants in Illinois, Colorado, Pennsylvania and Tennessee.

Caterpillar spokesman Timothy Elder says Bush's trade policies helped the company net about $9 billion in sales outside of North America in 2006, when revenues of about $41.5 billion netted profits that topped $3.5 billion — both company records.

Since Bush took office in 2001, however, the country has seen one in five manufacturing jobs disappear, a total of 2.96 million lost jobs, with U.S. automakers and textile companies particularly hard-hit. The U.S. trade deficit is expected to climb to a fifth consecutive record when the final figures for 2006 are totaled up next month.

U.S. Business and Industry Council, which represents small and medium-sized U.S. manufacturing companies and is critical of the administration's trade policies, called Tuesday for a moratorium on all new trade agreements until the trade deficit is brought under control.

Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., said, meantime, he is exploring approaches to bridge the gap on trade between Democrats and Republicans in Congress and the White House. His committee, which oversees trade issues in the House, held a hearing Tuesday to air those differences.

Rep. Sander Levin, D-Mich., said he wished that Bush had decided to visit a factory in an industry that has been battered by foreign trade rather than Caterpillar, which is one of the U.S. success stories. Levin is from Michigan, where American auto companies have been hard-hit by foreign competition.

Before he spoke, Bush stopped at the Sterling Family Restaurant to chat with customers having breakfast near a grill laden with steaming hash browns. He talked in a back room with small business owners before heading to tour the Caterpillar factory.

"I would suggest moving back. I'm about to crank this sucker up," Bush called from the cab of a yellow tractor. He started the motor. A puff of smoke belched from its stack, and the president steered it around the assembly line. "That was fun," he exclaimed as he got off.

Citi Will Buy Egg To Raise U.K. Presence (WSJ)

By Carrick Mollenkamp And Ian Mcdonald

The Wall Street Journal, January 30, 2007

Citigroup Inc.'s £575 million ($1.13 billion) purchase of Egg Banking PLC from Prudential PLC sets the stage for the U.S. financial-services company to step up its battle in the British credit-card market against entrenched banks such as Barclays PLC and Bank of America Corp.

For Prudential, one of Britain's largest insurers (unrelated to the U.S. Prudential), the transaction is part of a broad review of its United Kingdom business.

DOJ_NMG_0125054

The cash transaction, which is expected to close by April pending regulatory approval, gives Citigroup access to online bank Egg's three million customers, 2.9 million of whom are Egg card customers. Before this deal, Citigroup had just 800,000 card customers in the U.K. Egg's share totals about 5.7% of U.K. credit-card outstanding balances.

Citigroup will be up against banks such as Bank of America, which has about a 15% share of U.K. credit-card outstanding balances, and Barclaycard, which has about a 13% share. They dominate the market along with Royal Bank of Scotland Group PLC, which has about a 15% share, according to industry estimates.

Citigroup is paying a high price -- roughly two times Egg's book value, or its assets minus liabilities -- especially considering Egg's recent struggles.

Egg, based in London, is expected to post a pretax operating loss of £145 million for 2006, Prudential said.

Bush Promotes His Free Trade Initiatives (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, January 31, 2007

EAST PEORIA, Ill., Jan. 30 — With Democrats making the case that his economic policies have benefited the rich more than the middle class, President Bush struck back on Tuesday, in the first of back-to-back speeches promoting what the White House characterizes as 41 consecutive months of economic growth.

Mr. Bush came here to East Peoria, home to Caterpillar, the world's biggest manufacturer of earth-moving equipment, to advance his free trade initiatives and press Democrats to make his tax cuts permanent. On Wednesday, he heads to New York's financial district to deliver a more formal "State of the Economy" address at Federal Hall, where he is expected to ask Congress to extend his authority to negotiate trade agreements that cannot be amended.

"The temptation is to say, well, trade may not be worth it, let's isolate ourselves, let's protect ourselves," Mr. Bush told a friendly audience of Caterpillar employees, standing against a backdrop of gigantic tractors in the company's familiar colors of yellow and black.

He added, "It's a bad mistake for the country to lose our confidence and not compete."

The president was mostly preaching to the converted. Caterpillar was carefully chosen by the White House to put Mr. Bush's policies in the best possible light. The company's exports to Chile and Australia have shot up following free trade agreements negotiated by the Bush administration. And China, which negotiated a trade deal with President Bill Clinton, is now Caterpillar's fifth-largest export market.

"Americans wonder, can you compete in a global economy?" Mr. Bush said, before answering himself. "My answer is, darn right, you can."

With Mr. Bush's public approval ratings having crumbled, his domestic agenda faltering and his Iraq strategy running into a wall of opposition on Capitol Hill, White House advisers are hoping to capitalize on economic growth and low unemployment figures as a way to elevate public opinion of the president.

Already, the polls show a fresh hint of optimism. A survey by the Pew Research Center found that while public approval of Mr. Bush's handling of the war had dropped nine points, to 23 percent from 32 percent, from August to December 2006, approval of his handling of the economy went up six points, to 39 percent from 33 percent. A recent Gallup Poll, meanwhile, found 65 percent of respondents predicted they would be better off a year from now than they were today.

But Democrats, who won control of Congress in part by arguing that Mr. Bush's economic policies are giving short shrift to the middle class, do not intend to give up that ground without a fight. The president's twin appearances this week are setting the stage for a battle between Mr. Bush and Congressional Democrats over the economy in general and trade in particular.

Already, Democrats are signaling they will resist extending the president's "fast track" trade negotiating authority, unless Mr. Bush couples the plan with proposals to demand tougher labor and environmental standards from the United States' trading partners and help for American workers who are displaced by foreign competition.

"We don't want to abandon free trade," Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, said in an interview Tuesday, "but he's got to offer more protections and cushions for people who are caught in its maw through no fault of their own."

On Wednesday, while Mr. Bush is delivering his speech in Manhattan, a House-Senate committee will hold a hearing on the economy, led by Mr. Schumer, who has just published a book outlining how Democrats can hold power by reclaiming their status as the party of the middle class. The chief Democratic witnesses are Robert E. Rubin and Lawrence H. Summers, both former treasury secretaries under President Bill Clinton.

"When the average middle class voter hears the president speak, he or she thinks, 'The guy doesn't know what I'm going through, it's not terrible, but it's not so rosy either,' " Mr. Schumer said, adding that the hearing is "intended to be an answer to the president."

DOJ_NMG_0125055

In East Peoria on Tuesday, there was a preview of this same political clash. At Caterpillar, with Representative Ray LaHood, a Republican, in tow, Mr. Bush found what a pool report described as his “inner boy” when he drove one of the giant tractors for about 20 feet.

“I would suggest moving back,” Mr. Bush announced as he climbed into the tractor cab. “I’m about to crank this sucker up.” And then he did, later pronouncing it “a cool experience.”

While the president was busy driving, the freshman Democrat who represents the district next door was busy issuing a press release arguing that Mr. Bush was ignoring the financial condition of his constituents. The congressman, Representative Phil Hare, who worked as an aide to his predecessor before winning election in November, pointed to another Illinois community, Galesburg, where he said free trade treaties “drove 1,600 good-paying Maytag jobs” to Sonora, Mexico.

In Peoria, President Plays Up Economy (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, January 31, 2007

PEORIA, Ill., Jan. 30 -- So it's come to this. As President Bush tries to win back public support and sell his new domestic program, he came here Tuesday to see whether it would play in, well, you know the rest.

Bush flew here to have breakfast with small-business leaders at a diner in perhaps the nation's most famous place for testing the marketability of ideas, then headed over to the Caterpillar plant across the Illinois River in East Peoria to climb aboard a massive D10 tractor and take a presidential spin.

The other presidential spin of the day was about the strength of the economy. While the Iraq war dominates the political dialogue in Washington, Bush reminded audiences that the economy has been growing along with U.S. exports and credited his tax and trade policies. He touted health-care and energy proposals from his State of the Union address and made the case for brokering further free-trade agreements.

"The temptation is to say, 'Well, trade may not be worth it, let's isolate ourselves, let's protect ourselves,' " Bush told workers surrounded by Caterpillar's trademark earthmovers. "I know it would be a mistake for Caterpillar workers to do that. . . . I know it's a bad mistake for the country to lose our confidence and not compete."

U.S. exports increased by 13.1 percent in the first 11 months of last year and 10.7 percent the year before that. Caterpillar has enjoyed particularly strong growth, with $9 billion in exports last year and $41.5 billion in overall sales.

But most Americans have lost faith in Bush's stewardship of the economy. In a Washington Post-ABC News poll this month, 41 percent of Americans approved of the president's handling of the economy, while 57 percent disapproved. Critics argue that Bush's ratings reflect a poor economic record, noting increases in the trade deficit, the national debt, the number of uninsured Americans and other barometers since he took office.

Bush argues that his tax cuts have spurred a robust economic recovery and pumped enough additional revenue into federal coffers to cut the deficit substantially. He plans to press his case with a fuller speech on the economy in New York on Wednesday.

He focused here on trade, promoting his record at a time when lawmakers are considering whether to extend his authority to negotiate agreements that are subject to "fast-track" up-or-down votes in Congress without amendment. Every president in modern times has enjoyed such power, but it expires this summer, and with Democrats now in charge of Congress, Bush faces a tough time getting it extended. He has completed trade pacts with Panama, Peru and Colombia that are awaiting congressional approval, and he is negotiating with South Korea and Malaysia. He also wants to jump-start stalled global trade talks.

The president used Caterpillar to make his case, noting that Chile became its fifth-largest export market after a Bush trade agreement. Similarly, he said, Caterpillar sales to Australia rose 26 percent after a 2005 trade pact. And he said Caterpillar business with China since it opened its market has risen 40 percent and helped create 5,000 jobs.

As he toured the facility here with Jim Owens, the chairman and chief executive, though, Bush made no mention of the schism between him and the company over climate change. Owens and Caterpillar joined nine other major corporations last week calling on Bush to support mandatory caps on emissions generally believed to contribute to global warming. Bush rebuffed the idea but proposed cutting gasoline consumption 20 percent over 10 years.

Asked about the disagreement with the corporate executives by ABC News after the visit, Bush said "I appreciate their call" for caps but repeated his preference for innovating out of the problem. "There needs to be time for some of these technologies to kick in, to give them a chance to work," he said.

Caterpillar was the second of the 10 companies in the climate-change alliance that Bush has visited since the State of the Union. He went to a DuPont facility in Delaware the day after the speech. Aides said it was coincidence.

It may be that Bush chose to come here to indulge a male fantasy -- the chance to drive one of those dirt-digging tractors that seem to fascinate every young boy. At the end of his tour, he climbed aboard and plopped down at the controls.

DOJ_NMG_0125056

"I would suggest moving back," he warned reporters. "I'm about to crank this sucker up."

The president cranked the sucker up, powered it forward 20 feet, then backed it into a turn and finally straightened it out. No reporters were hit. But Bush was delighted.

"Oh, yeah," he said with satisfaction as he climbed down.

Dems Want Trade Talks To Include Protections (USAT)

By David J. Lynch

USA Today, January 31, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush and congressional Democrats fired the opening salvos Tuesday in what could become a major debate about whether the U.S. pursues additional trade agreements.

On Capitol Hill, key Democrats said Tuesday that they would insist on new protections for workers and the environment before granting President Bush an extension of his trade negotiating authority.

At issue is the president's ability to negotiate trade deals, which expires June 30. Monday, White House spokesman Tony Snow said the president "absolutely" wants an extension of his so-called trade promotion authority, which limits Congress to approving or rejecting trade agreements. The administration's formal request could come as soon as today.

The looming battle about an extension comes amid what Democrats say is rising economic insecurity despite an unemployment rate of 4.5%. The House Ways and Means Committee has scheduled a hearing today on the economic challenges facing the middle class.

Tuesday, Bush touted the benefits of trade while visiting a Caterpillar plant in East Peoria, Ill.: "We're 5% of the people in the world. That means 95% live outside of America, and shouldn't we try to put ourselves in a position where we can sell goods and services to those 95%? I think it makes sense to do so."

Democrats, however, don't want to give the president a blank check. Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., chairman of the Ways and Means panel, said Democrats required "assurances" before extending the president's authority.

The price of an extension may be administration agreement on new efforts to prepare workers for an era of less job security and help for those who lose their jobs as the economy adjusts. Senate Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus, D-Mont., is calling for a "globalization adjustment assistance" package that would broaden existing programs to cover service industry workers.

But with U.S. exports booming, and a potential new global trade deal at risk, Democrats don't want to appear obstructionist. Rangel said he would try to reach a trade bargain with Republican colleagues on the powerful panel.

"If we don't give (the White House) trade promotion authority, we've got to have a good reason," he said during a hearing on the impacts of trade and globalization.

Levin Fires A Salvo On Fast Track (HILL)

By Ian Swanson

The Hill, January 31, 2007

House Democrats should not hold serious talks on extending fast-track negotiating authority with the Bush administration until it agrees on changes to the labor provisions of three pending free-trade agreements, a senior House Democrat told The Hill yesterday.

“I think we need a breakthrough in those areas before there can be meaningful discussions about renewal of fast track,” said Rep. Sandy Levin (D-Mich.), who chairs the trade subcommittee of House Ways and Means.

Levin’s statement, which was made outside a Ways and Means Committee hearing on trade and globalization, is the latest indication of how contentious trade legislation will be during the 110th Congress.

Levin said the free-trade deals the administration has already negotiated with Colombia, Peru and Panama will have to be renegotiated. The lawmaker said that getting those countries to make commitments in so-called side letters would not be sufficient because the only way to ensure that changes to the deals are enforceable is to make changes to the text.

“I think we’re going to have to renegotiate and put new provisions in those agreements, because I don’t see how else you do it in a way that’s fully enforceable,” Levin said.

If this is done before the end of March, Levin said the three trade agreements, which are opposed by organized labor, could still be submitted under the current fast track authority, which expires at the end of June. Levin suggested these changes would build confidence with Congress that the administration will use fast track in the right way.

Fast track requires that Congress be given 90 days’ advance notice of the administration’s intent to sign a free-trade agreement. The administration has already signed the deals with Peru and Colombia, but would have to renegotiate those deals and sign new ones to meet the demands of Levin and other House Democrats. The administration has completed talks with Panama and announced its intention to sign that deal.

DOJ_NMG_0125057

President Bush is expected to ask for an extension of fast track this week. Without fast track, also known as trade promotion authority, the administration could not send deals to Congress for up or down votes. As a result, other WTO members would be unlikely to negotiate with a U.S. administration that lacks fast track.

If Democrats refuse to grant Bush a fast-track extension, the U.S. risks being blamed for killing the WTO negotiations, according to Gene Sperling, a former economic adviser to President Clinton, who testified at the Ways and Means hearing. In response to a question from Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles Rangel (D-N.Y.), Sperling said he thought it was possible for the administration and Congress to agree to an extension of fast track limited to allowing the administration to conclude the current round of WTO talks.

In exchange, Sperling said Democrats should get a commitment that the administration will press for stronger environmental and labor language not only in bilateral agreements, but in the ongoing WTO round. He acknowledged it is probably not possible to win labor concessions in the current WTO discussions, but said stronger environmental provisions were possible.

"I think that if the administration comes forward with a good-faith down-payment on the type of things that the Democrats are concerned with, the Democrats should at least be willing to consider a temporary extension of [fast track]," Sperling told The Hill after the hearing.

Rangel told reporters after the hearing that U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab has warned him that the U.S. would be blamed for the failure of the WTO talks if fast track is not extended by Congress. Rangel said Schwab spoke to him from Geneva, where she is discussing the Doha round with her counterparts.

Some lobbyists have argued that requesting an extension of fast track is a win-win situation for the administration, since if Democrats refuse to grant the extension, the administration could blame them for the failure of the WTO talks.

Rangel said a fast-track extension would depend on what conditions are tied to the authority, and on how long of an extension is considered. In a joint press release with Senate Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus (D-Mont.), Rangel said a reauthorization required a "great deal of trust," and that Congress would need certain assurances before being willing to extend fast track.

Democrats Give Bush The Business On Trade (WP)

By Peter S. Goodman

The Washington Post, January 31, 2007

As President Bush was out in Peoria touting the virtues of foreign trade and asking for fresh authority to promote it, newly ascendant Democrats on Capitol Hill signaled just how tough it's going to be for the president to get what he wants.

In a hearing, Democrats repeated earlier warnings that they are unlikely to approve pending trade pacts with Peru, Colombia and Panama unless the administration agrees to provisions tightening labor and environmental protections in those countries. They pledged to demand similar labor rules before extending the president's authority to negotiate new trade deals.

"We have had trade policies in this administration that assume that trade is an end in itself, that market forces will work themselves out, that there isn't really an active role for government," said Rep. Sander M. Levin (D-Mich.), who chairs a House subcommittee on trade. "We've had a tremendous loss of U.S. manufacturing jobs."

The new chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.), presided over a wide-ranging discussion that touched on how to prevent companies from shifting production to exploitative factories in poor countries, how to confront China over allegedly unfair trade practices and how to help Americans who lose jobs.

The hearing took place as President Bush visited the Illinois headquarters of Caterpillar, the construction-equipment giant and a highly successful exporter. There, the president asked Congress to extend his so-called trade promotion authority -- his legal right to negotiate trade pacts that he can submit to lawmakers for a simple up-or-down vote. It expires at the end of June, and without it, trade deals stand little chance of getting through Congress as individual legislators pick them apart to protect jobs in their districts.

The administration is intent on gaining an extension in hopes of restarting talks aimed at lowering tariffs around the world. Those talks, known as the Doha round of trade negotiations, have been stalled for months over American and European unwillingness to pare farm subsidies and over claims from India and other poor countries that they will not benefit enough from opening their markets further to foreign goods.

In recent days, trade ministers have been meeting at the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland, to try to jump-start the talks. Though most analysts assume the prospect of a breakthrough remains dim, U.S. Trade Representative Susan C. Schwab offered tempered optimism yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0125058

"This was the first time we had a large group of trade ministers gathering in one venue where there was clear agreement on the need to move forward with the Doha round and a sense of urgency that if at all possible we need to identify a means of achieving a breakthrough," Schwab said at a news conference in Geneva.

During the House hearing, and in a flurry of written statements, Democrats said they would not readily give the president the extension he seeks, expressing skepticism about the administration's willingness to ensure that trade deals benefit American workers.

"It requires a great deal of trust," Rangel said in a statement. "Congress must have some key assurances before it is willing to extend this leverage."

But as the chairman acknowledged during the hearing, turning Bush down would carry political risks. The Doha talks have been aimed at extending the benefits of globalization to poor countries. If Democrats refuse to extend the president's authority, that could convince the Europeans that concessions would be futile, since any agreement could die in a quagmire of congressional amendment-making.

"If we don't give trade promotion authority, we have to have a good reason for not giving it," Rangel said.

Yesterday's House hearing, which ran for more than three hours, revealed the competing views on trade that now divide the nation.

Several Republican lawmakers from districts where companies enjoy strong exports called for congressional approval of the Colombia and Peru trade deals to extend the good times.

"We're not at the mercy of globalization; we control our own destiny," said Grant D. Aldonas, a former Bush administration undersecretary of commerce for international trade. He noted that Wal-Mart had become emblematic of the threats seen by foes of cheap imports, but those same imports help people living on limited paychecks. "Every day Sam Walton's store is open for business, it's delivering globalization to the American doorstep," Aldonas said.

Democratic lawmakers and some panelists kept the focus on the costs of expanded trade -- the steady move of manufacturing jobs to lower-cost countries.

Lawrence Mishel, president of the Economic Policy Institute, a research group critical of globalization, said the United States needed expanded benefits for laid-off workers and health care coverage to address the gap between rich and poor before embracing further trade.

"How are people going to accept further liberalization when they are anxious in their daily life?" he asked. "Let's get things right in the United States before we press further down this road."

Ex-Clinton Aide Urges Free Trade Deal (FT)

By Eoin Callan

Financial Times, January 31, 2007

The Democratic leadership in Congress has turned this week to old-school Clintonites to help persuade the freshman class of ’06 to moderate the militant critique of globalisation that helped get them elected.

Gene Sperling, a former economic adviser in the Clinton administration, on Tuesday testified before the House ways and means committee on the need for a new consensus on free trade during a hearing addressed by both corporate cheerleaders and labour movement critics of trade policy.

The architect of Bill Clinton’s pro-trade economic policies has also held private meetings with the new Democratic representatives.

The testimony and encounters are part of a battle for hearts and minds in the hearing rooms and corridors of Capitol Hill as Congress waits to decide on an expected request from President George W. Bush to extend his trade promotion authority.

Lawrence Summers and Robert Rubin – former Treasury secretaries under Mr Clinton – will on Wednesday add their voices to the debate as they advocate a centrist economic policy that ensures middle-class prosperity.

But of the party’s distinguished “three wise men” on economic policy, it is Mr Sperling who has spent the most time working the Hill, imparting advice and answering critics.

Mr Sperling has met with scepticism – and even hostility – from rank and file members, according to people familiar with the discussions. In a letter obtained by the Financial Times, a stunning 39 of the 42 freshman Democrats in the House said “the issue of trade and the impact of the administration’s policy” was “critically important” to their campaigns during the mid-term elections.

“Vital to our electoral success was our ability to take a vocal stand against the administration’s misguided trade agenda,” adds the letter, addressed to party leaders.

The letter is seen as a signal that new members are reluctant to be pressed into voting on controversial, pending trade agreements with Colombia, Panama and Peru or the extension of trade promotion authority, which expires on June 30.

DOJ_NMG_0125059

Mr Sperling said on Tuesday he regretted contributing to a polarised debate during his time in the White House by not presenting “a balanced assessment” of the costs and benefits of trade.

But he called on Democratic leaders to negotiate a limited extension of the president’s fast-track trade negotiating authority to facilitate an agreement in the Doha round of world trade talks so the US was “not blamed for killing the agreement”.

The quid pro quo, he said, would be “limited down-payment” on the demands of Democratic leaders for the inclusion of tougher labour standards in bilateral deals and steps towards a big expansion of the social safety net.

Mr Sperling also called for long-term moves towards universal health care as the “most important” step to address voter anxieties about trade.

There were also signs on Tuesday that business leaders have accepted the new political realities that will shape trade policy in the wake of the mid-term elections.

Terry McGraw, the head of the Business Roundtable, told the Congressional hearing: “We need changes in our trade policy.”

The roundtable, which represents 160 of the top US chief executives, indicated it would drop its opposition to the inclusion of tougher labour standards in bilateral agreements.

Consumer Confidence Looks Robust (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, January 31, 2007

WASHINGTON — Consumers had a more upbeat view of the economy in January, but their optimism was tinged with concern that growth could slow in coming months, a private research group said Tuesday.

The New York-based Conference Board's consumer confidence index rose to 110.3 in January, the highest since May 2002 and a slight increase from the revised 110.0 figure of December.

While consumers' assessment of current conditions improved, their expectations for future growth declined to 94.5 from 96.3 last month.

"Looking ahead … consumers are not as optimistic as they were in December. All in all, the index suggests a moderate improvement in the pace of growth in early 2007," says Lynn Franco, director of The Conference Board Consumer Research Center.

The index, based on a telephone survey of 5,000 households, comes as the Federal Reserve winds up a two-day meeting today on interest rates and the economy. Economists surveyed by USA TODAY expect the Fed to hold the target for short-term rates steady at 5.25% at the meeting.

The central bank is trying to engineer a soft landing, in which growth and inflation moderate but the economy continues to expand.

San Francisco Fed President Janet Yellen in a recent speech said one of the biggest puzzles for policymakers right now is why the job market was "going gangbusters" while overall growth is only "middling."

The unemployment rate was 4.5% in December. The January figure will be released Friday.

"If labor markets are as tight as the unemployment rate suggests, then there may be reason for concern about building inflationary pressures. If … they are not, then it is more likely that we are headed for a 'soft landing,' " Yellen said.

In a note to clients, Moody's Economy.com noted that the share of consumers in the confidence survey terming jobs plentiful hit the highest level in more than five years, suggesting employment may still be robust — boding well for near-term wages and spending, but not for Fed rate cuts.

The number of consumers calling current conditions "good" rose to 28.1% from 27.4%, with the level calling jobs "plentiful" rising to 29.9% from 27.6% in December.

However, the slice of consumers expecting their incomes to rise in the next six months fell to 19.8% from 21.4%. Those expecting business conditions to get better dipped to 16.2% from 16.7%. The share of people planning to buy a home rose to the highest level in five months.

Mike Englund of Action Economics says confidence was "benefiting from solid fundamentals, including falling gasoline prices, lofty stock prices, low interest rates, a tight labor market and surging income."

He calls the survey more evidence the USA should be able to avoid a recession in 2007 and that consumer spending, two-thirds of the economy, should hold up.

U.S. Consumer Confidence Level Is Flat Amid A Softer Outlook (WSJ)

By Michael S. Derby

The Wall Street Journal, January 31, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0125060

U.S. consumer confidence was flat in January from December amid softer expectations for the economy's outlook, a report Tuesday said.

The Conference Board said that its consumer confidence-index for January moved to 110.3, from the revised 110.0 in December and 105.3 in November. Economists had expected a reading of 110, according to a survey by Dow Jones Newswires.

A gauge of expectations for the future retreated to a reading of 94.5 in January from December's revised 96.3, though consumers' assessment of current conditions rose to 133.9 from a revised 130.5.

"This month's slight increase in confidence was solely the result of an improvement in the present situation index," said Lynn Franco, who leads the private research group's Consumer Research Center. She tied the better mood over the economy's current state to the labor market, and said that the overall index "suggests a moderate improvement in the pace of growth in early 2007."

The number of consumers who called jobs "plentiful" rose to 29.9% from 27.6% in December. Those calling jobs "hard to get" slipped to 19.7% from 21.3%. The improvement in employment sentiment is unsurprising in light of the economy's solid job creation and its low 4.5% unemployment rate. The government is set to report on the January hiring situation on Friday, in a report economists expect will show further strength.

Survey respondents calling current economic conditions "good" represented 28.1% of the survey, versus 27.4% who held that belief a month ago. But at the same time, those calling conditions "bad" inched up to 16.5% from 14.9%. Consumers' view on the outlook for hiring was mixed, and those who expect to see incomes rise over coming months fell to 19.8% from 21.4%.

The Conference Board survey is based on a mail-in survey of 5,000 households. The cutoff date for responses was Jan. 23.

Stocks Shrug Off Concerns Over Oil Prices, Interest Rates (WSJ)

By E.s. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, January 31, 2007

Oil prices surged and the Federal Reserve began a two-day meeting on interest rates, but stocks rose despite the oil and interest-rate uncertainty.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average advanced 32.53 points, or 0.26%, to 12523.31, back within 100 points of the record hit last week, of 12621.77. It is up 0.48% in 2007.

The gain came despite a 5.5% jump in crude-oil futures to $56.97 a barrel, the highest finish since Jan. 3. Natural-gas futures rose 11.6%.

Traders blamed cold weather, which could increase demand for natural gas and heating oil. They pointed to Saudi Arabia's decision to go through with a small production cut on Feb. 1. (For more on oil's move, see related article1.)

Oil stocks gained on the news, but for most companies and consumers, higher oil prices are a problem.

Money managers looked past the issue because many are becoming more comfortable with the outlook for the economy and interest rates. They think oil prices are rising because of the strong economy, and that they aren't high enough to be a threat. They were reassured to see an index of consumer confidence hit a five-year high.

Few investors now expect a Fed rate cut in the first half of the year, but many believe this is because of the economy's strength. They hope the Fed's meeting will end today with a statement suggesting little change in the Fed's plans for rates.

"If there is no change in the Fed's interest-rate outlook, the market is likely to just shrug it off," said stock trader Larry Peruzzi of Boston Company Asset Management. "The one thing that could probably cause some reverberation would be if the Fed became more hawkish, and said it had to do something about inflation."

Investors would dislike any hint of Fed plans for a rate rise, since higher rates raise costs for businesses and consumers and tend to hurt stocks.

The Russell 2000 small-stock index hit a record, up 0.61% to 797.97.

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 0.58%, or 8.20 points, to 1428.82, ahead 0.7% this year. The Nasdaq Composite Index advanced 0.31%, or 7.55 points, to 2448.64, up 1.4% in 2007.

Outside the U.S., stocks advanced in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. stocks, rose 0.47%, or 1.14 points, to 244.53.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks advanced2. Trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.65 billion shares, as 2,361 stocks rose and 975 fell.

Bond prices gained3. The 10-year Treasury note rose 4/32, or $1.25 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.875%. The 30-year bond was up 4/32 to yield 4.983%.

DOJ_NMG_0125061

The dollar weakened4. Late in New York, it traded at 121.61 yen, down from 121.80, while the euro rose against the dollar to $1.2966 from $1.2953.

Senate Clears Way For Minimum Wage Vote (AP)

By Jim Kuhnhenn

AP, January 31, 2007

The Senate cleared the way for an increase in the minimum wage Tuesday, but only with business tax breaks that House Democrats want removed.

Final Senate passage of the legislation is expected later this week, setting the stage for a round of difficult negotiations between House and Senate Democrats over how to get the legislation to President Bush for his signature.

In a key test, the Senate voted 87-10 to end debate on the bill Tuesday, well clear of the 60 votes needed.

Earlier this month, the House passed the same increase in the wage floor — from $5.15 to $7.25 an hour over two years — without any tax provisions. Senate Democrats tried to push through the House version last week, but failed to get the 60 votes to end debate.

The vote Tuesday emphasized how Senate passage of the bill depends on the tax package to attract Republican votes. The White House has also signaled that Bush wants tax breaks in the legislation.

"Raising the minimum wage will cost some jobs," Al Hubbard, the director of the president's National Economic Council told reporters aboard Air Force One Tuesday. "We think it's important to counter that with tax breaks that will replace those jobs."

"The Senate has recognized that our economy is interdependent," said Sen. Michael Enzi, R-Wyo. "One simply cannot claim credit to be helping workers at the same time that they're hurting the businesses that employ them."

The tax breaks in the Senate bill have divided the private sector, pitting small businesses and retailers that would benefit from them against the larger corporations and manufacturers that would have to pay for them. The package costs $8.3 billion in lost tax revenue over 10 years.

To help pay for the tax breaks, corporations no longer would be able to deduct the cost of jury verdicts or settlements in liability suits against them and their executives' tax-deferred pay packages would be capped at $1 million a year.

The bill's business critics are especially annoyed that the tax benefits would be short-term while the provisions that pay for them would alter tax law for the long-term.

"The permanent tax law changes here far outpace and outweigh the few benefits," said Bruce Josten, the chief lobbyist for the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, which opposes the bill.

The bill would extend tax breaks that allow small businesses to deduct up to $112,000 in new investments a year. It also would reduce the depreciation period for improvements to retail properties and extend a tax credit for businesses that hire low-income or disadvantaged workers.

"We think they are all significant," said Dan Danner, an executive vice president at the National Federation of Independent Business, whose membership consists mostly of business owners with 10 or fewer employees.

The rift stems from the new Democratic Congress' approach to tax relief, which requires that every tax dollar lost to a new tax break be offset by a tax increase or closed loophole elsewhere. It also signals the new Democratic majority's willingness to pay heed to the small business community even as it irritates larger corporate interests.

Still, House Democrats want to pass a clean bill — without tax breaks — and cite constitutional precedents that require tax legislation to begin in the House. Some Democrats want their leaders to dare Senate Republicans to vote against the minimum wage increase. House Democratic Leader Steny Hoyer said Tuesday that House and Senate leaders have not decided how to proceed.

"The Senate has different challenges than we do," Hoyer said, referring to the 60-vote thresholds needed in the Senate to end debate.

In the Senate, Republican critics of the legislation have argued that raising the minimum wage might force some businesses to stop hiring entry level employees. They also contend that beneficiaries of a higher minimum wage likely will be teenagers working part-time jobs, not the working poor. But few if any Republicans have protested the revenue provisions in the tax package.

Ending the business deduction for court settlements, jury verdicts and fines would generate about $540 million over 10 years. Josten said such a provision would eliminate the incentive for companies to settle liability lawsuits out of court.

The cap on tax-deferred compensation responds to congressional and public criticism of large executive pay packages, including a $210 million severance package for ousted Home Depot Chairman-CEO Bob Nardelli. The Senate bill would allow employees to defer up to $1 million a year or a figure equal to the five-year average of their taxable salary, whichever is less. That cap would generate about $810 million in revenue over 10 years, according to the Senate Finance Committee.

DOJ_NMG_0125062

Brigen Winters, an executive compensation attorney at the Groom Law Group in Washington, said the five-year average could end up taxing deferred compensation for middle managers or employees of startup businesses who are offered deferred compensation based on the performance of the enterprise.

"It affects various types of compensations for a very broad array of employees," Winters said.

But congressional tax writers dismissed the complaints, saying the vast majority of people affected by the cap would be highly compensated executives.

"These hypotheticals are really red herrings," said Carol Guthrie, a spokeswoman for the Senate Finance Committee. "When most Americans would be thrilled to be able to put away even a portion of the $15,000 the average worker is allowed to save in a 401(k) every year, it's a pretty hollow argument that $1 million or 100 percent of pay is not enough for executives and managers to add to their tax-deferred accounts."

Danner, speaking of the NFIB's small business membership, said: "Our guys could not be worried less that you could only roll over $1 million in compensation."

Senate Debate Ends On Wage Bill (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, January 31, 2007

ASSOCIATED PRESS

The Senate cleared the way for an increase in the minimum wage yesterday, but only with business tax breaks that House Democrats want removed.

Final Senate passage of the legislation is expected later this week, setting the stage for a round of difficult negotiations between House and Senate Democrats over how to get the legislation to President Bush for his signature.

In a key test, the Senate voted 87-10 to end debate on the bill yesterday, well clear of the 60 votes needed.

Earlier this month, the House passed the same increase -- from $5.15 to $7.25 an hour over two years -- without any tax provisions. Senate Democrats tried to push through the House version last week but failed to get the 60 votes to end debate.

Yesterday's vote emphasized how Senate passage of the bill depends on the tax package to attract Republican votes. The White House also has signaled that Mr. Bush wants tax breaks in the legislation.

"Raising the minimum wage will cost some jobs," Al Hubbard, the director of the president's National Economic Council told reporters aboard Air Force One yesterday. "We think it's important to counter that with tax breaks that will replace those jobs."

"The Senate has recognized that our economy is interdependent," said Sen. Michael B. Enzi, Wyoming Republican. "One simply cannot claim credit to be helping workers at the same time that they're hurting the businesses that employ them."

The tax breaks in the Senate bill have divided the private sector, pitting small businesses and retailers that would benefit from them against the larger corporations and manufacturers that would have to pay for them. The package costs $8.3 billion in lost tax revenue over 10 years.

To help pay for the tax breaks, corporations no longer would be able to deduct the cost of jury verdicts or settlements in liability lawsuits against them and their executives' tax-deferred pay packages would be capped at $1 million a year.

The bill's business critics are especially annoyed that the tax benefits would be short term while the provisions that pay for them would alter tax law for the long term.

"The permanent tax law changes here far outpace and outweigh the few benefits," said Bruce Josten, the chief lobbyist for the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, which opposes the bill.

The bill would extend tax breaks that allow small businesses to deduct up to $112,000 in new investments a year. It also would reduce the depreciation period for improvements to retail properties and extend a tax credit for businesses that hire low-income or disadvantaged workers.

"We think they are all significant," said Dan Danner, an executive vice president at the National Federation of Independent Business, whose membership consists mostly of business owners with 10 or fewer employees.

Senate Adds Tax Breaks As It Passes A Wage Bill (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, January 31, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 30 — The Senate voted overwhelmingly on Tuesday to move ahead on a bill to increase the minimum wage, signaling that the measure is likely to pass this week.

But the vote also sets up a conflict with the House that is likely to stall any increase.

The Senate bill includes $8.3 billion in tax breaks for small businesses that Democrats who sponsored the bill said were necessary to obtain Republican support.

DOJ_NMG_0125063

The 87-to-10 vote on Tuesday was to limit debate on the bill. Democrats say they expect to achieve a similarly wide margin of approval on the final bill.

The House approved a simpler bill, including the wage increase but no tax breaks, this month. The Democratic leaders there insist that it should not be necessary to offer tax breaks in exchange for the wage increase, the first in 10 years.

The two bills would raise the minimum wage $2.10 an hour, from $5.15 to $7.25.

Democratic leaders from both chambers now have to figure out how to reconcile the measures. Assuming that the Senate bill passes, Democratic leaders can hold onto it and negotiate with their House counterparts. Or the Senate can send the bill to the House, which could block consideration of it or strip out the tax breaks and send it back to the Senate for another vote.

In the House, 82 Republicans joined Democrats to approve the wage increase. The Senate rejected the bill without tax breaks.

Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader, said Tuesday that he expected leaders of the two chambers to work out the differences.

"There are many different ways it can happen," Mr. Reid said, although he offered no specifics.

Democrats have accused Republicans of trying to stall the bill by offering dozens of amendments. Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts and the chief proponent of the bill, promised to press ahead until the wage increase passes.

"If they're hoping we'll get tired," Mr. Kennedy said, "they're sorely mistaken."

Republicans, however, insisted that the Senate would not go along with the "clean" bill that the House wants.

"Clean means do it my way," said Senator Michael B. Enzi of Wyoming, ranking Republican on the Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee. "That's not how we often do it in the Senate."

Republicans noted that Democrats went along with a combined package for raising the minimum wage and tax breaks 10 years ago and that President Bill Clinton applauded them for it.

"And if it was O.K. in 1997, it ought to be O.K. now," said Senator Charles E. Grassley, Republican of Iowa.

Workers Held Hostage (WP)

The Washington Post, January 31, 2007

THE FEDERAL minimum wage hasn't been raised in a decade. During that time, businesses have received $276 billion in tax cuts. Another $36 billion has been directed specifically toward small businesses. The administration boasts -- though its numbers are overstated -- that, for 2006, 25 million small-business owners will receive an average tax cut of $3,641. So why, you might wonder, are President Bush and Republican lawmakers insisting that even more tax cuts be lavished on small-business owners as the price for approving a $2.10 increase in the minimum wage, from $5.15 to $7.25 an hour, in three steps over two years? The measure on the verge of being passed by the Senate would direct another $8.3 billion in such tax cuts over 10 years to small businesses, supposedly to offset the costs of the wage hike.

Without the tax breaks, the wage hike cannot pass the Senate's 60-vote hurdle for cloture, strategists on both sides insist. Meanwhile, the House version -- it passed 315 to 116, with 82 Republican votes in favor -- does not include tax breaks.

If the tax breaks are warranted, they should be granted as part of a larger review of tax policy -- not as a ransom for raising the minimum wage, now at its lowest level, adjusted for inflation, in half a century. It's good that the Senate has found other tax changes to pay for the cuts, but with the Democrats' commitment to pay-as-you-go rules, those kinds of offsets are going to be harder and harder to find; these could be used for other, perhaps more worthy, causes than another business tax break. To the extent that small businesses need help, the cuts are poorly targeted. For example, one provision would increase from $5 million to $10 million the threshold for businesses to be permitted to use cash accounting; a business grossing more than $5 million hardly sounds like a mom-and-pop shop.

The House got it right. It should stand firm -- and dare Senate Republicans and the president to block the long-overdue increase.

Who's That Senior Administration Official? (POL)

By Mike Allen

The Politico, January 31, 2007

There is no news organization in Washington, including this one, that could get by for long without them. Their wisdom echoes through dozens of Washington columns and broadcasts each day.

They are the ubiquitous "senior administration officials," and they remain one of Washington's more enduring mysteries. Never mind who they are. The puzzle is what they are.

DOJ_NMG_0125064

A casual reader might assume that there is some kind of formal protocol that makes it clear to reporters and officials alike exactly who qualifies as senior enough to be quoted anonymously as a senior official. But there is no such thing.

Simply put, the answer to how someone gets to be a senior official is: It depends. If the source insists on being called a senior administration official, chances are he or she can get away with it, no matter if by most objective measures -- title, salary, proximity to power -- they are not really all that senior. This is especially true when reporters are in a jam and eager to prove to editors or readers that they have covert access to serious inside players.

"I was quoted as a 'senior administration official' even before I became a senior administration official," says Joe Lockhart, who was White House press secretary under President Bill Clinton. "No one in the government wants to be a 'junior administration official,' and no one in the press wants to quote one."

Some of the best reporters, however, know it can be more impressive not to give promotions to anonymous officials. The late Ann Devroy, who covered the White House for The Washington Post, sometimes peppered her stories with vaguely described but apparently well-informed "mid-level" officials.

This attribution was far more worrisome to the real senior administration officials in the West Wing. That's because many of the senior officials quoted in White House stories are not insiders secretly dishing details they are not supposed to talk about. They often are authorized spokespersons who are charged with promoting the official line. The notion that mid-level officials are secretly chatting with reporters without talking points in hand can be genuinely alarming.

These days, the practice of talking as a "senior administration official" is so routine that officials will often begin an interview by saying, "OK, I'm doing this as an SAO."

Bob Schieffer, who has covered seven presidencies and is now host of CBS's "Face the Nation," says the term originated as a variant of "senior American official," which was the designation reporters used to describe a person extremely close to Secretary of State Henry Kissinger during his shuttle diplomacy in the Middle East in the early 1970s.

"'Senior American official' would say things that Henry Kissinger couldn't be quoted on, but he laid out what was happening and what the other side was going to have to do and other things that would have been awkward if Kissinger had been quoted as saying them," Schieffer says. "It sort of ballooned, and then you'd get back to Washington and you'd wind up with 100 people in a room and you'd have some official come in and brief as a 'senior administration official.' It's been abused for a long, long time."

One reason White House officials often want to be called "senior administration officials" is so the speaker could have been from the State Department, the Pentagon or elsewhere in the government. It makes it easier to put some distance from the quote if it spurs unwanted controversy. Sometimes State Department officials begin interviews by saying, "Senior official-no building," meaning they can't be identified by agency.

As recently as November, dueling SAOs also showed up at the White House press filing center in Riga, Latvia, after a memo containing National Security Adviser Steve Hadley's candid appraisal of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki was leaked to The New York Times. The official transcript shows introductory remarks by White House Counselor Dan Bartlett and Press Secretary Tony Snow, then an asterisk break and two speakers, each called "senior administration official," mysteriously take over.

Those two were senior officials by anyone's definition. But the term has become somewhat debased, so that the definition of "senior" often has very little to do with any organizational chart and instead is a shorthand way of saying "someone on the government payroll who would talk to me when I needed a quote or tidbit." An SAO can provide something as momentous as the president's position going into an international summit and as trivial as the menu when he had a few members of Congress over for breakfast.

Olivier Knox, White House correspondent for Agence France-Presse, has a fairly strict definition of who it's kosher to call a "senior" official -- at least in theory.

"It should be someone who talks directly to the president about substantive matters or who talks regularly to top aides about substantive matters," he says. "An assistant secretary is fine."

But does Knox really stick to that? "Nowhere near as often as I should," Knox chuckled. "That's the ideal."

Washington Mysteries will be a regular Politico feature, in which we explain capital customs that everyone takes for granted but no one really understands. If you have a Washington Mystery you want to see unraveled, email us at washingtonmystery@politico.com.

Join The Conversation

You need to be a registered user of Politico.com to "join the conversation". If you are not a member yet, what are you waiting for? Register Now!

by Desert Rat on 01.30.2007 at 10:38 PM

test , I just signed up

Before you start composing please note that you will need to be a registered user of Politico.com to "join the conversation". If you are not a member yet, what are you waiting for? Register Now!

Democrats Unveil $463.5B Spending Bill (AP)

By Andrew Taylor

AP, January 31, 2007

Democrats say they are making the best of a bad situation as they bring to the House floor a massive bill cobbling together $463.5 billion in unfinished budget business.

The bill, combining the budgets of 13 Cabinet agencies, won praise Tuesday from Democratic Party allies such as activists pressing the fight against AIDS overseas and advocates for boosting education funding.

Lawmakers in both parties hailed the bill for freeing highway construction funds, even as the White House complained that the bill will slow aid to communities harmed by a 2005 round of military base closings and cut a request for basic scientific research.

Still, the White House signaled that President Bush would sign the bill into law once it reaches his desk.

The House debate on Wednesday promises to be bitter, and the measure appears likely to pass on a largely party-line vote. But Republicans in the Senate appear unlikely to place procedural hurdles in its path.

The harshest criticism came from House Republicans, who complained that they were shut out of any chance to offer changes to the bill — and had barely any time to read it.

Rep. Jerry Lewis of California, the Appropriations Committee's top Republican — displaced as chairman last fall — ripped into the Democrats for rushing the bill to the House floor "without any prior debate whatsoever and without the opportunity to offer even one amendment on the floor."

Republicans also took issue with Democrats' claim to have "scrubbed" the bill free of homestate projects. They pointed to, for example, $50 million to match last year's funding for the Denali Commission, which funds rural road, sanitation, energy and other infrastructure projects in Alaska. Then there was the Senate's refusal to kill $45 million in funding for an indoor rainforest project in central Iowa, even though local backers have yet to come up with their required share of funding.

Democrats sought to focus attention of numerous — albeit generally small — funding increases they managed to provide in favored accounts, even while living within tight limits set by Bush and last year's GOP-dominated Congress.

The powerful veterans lobby won a $3.6 billion increase for medical care, earning praise from veterans groups and the White House, while low-income college students would receive a $260 boost in the maximum Pell Grant, to $4,310.

"After five years of broken promises from the administration, this is an important down payment by Democrats on our commitment to help families with high college costs," said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass.

State and local law enforcement agencies, meanwhile, won increases in grants for new equipment and hiring new officers.

Community development block grants, however, were frozen at current levels, as was Amtrak. But advocates for those programs took them as a victory relative to Bush's budget submitted a year ago.

Activists pressing for big boosts to combat AIDS, malaria and tuberculosis overseas won a $1.3 billion increase — to $4.5 billion. That's enough to fund the president's $225 million initiative to fight malaria and increase the U.S. contribution to the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria to $724 million.

The rock star Bono, who sparred with House Appropriations Committee Chairman David Obey in a meeting last month, praised Democrats for the AIDS-fighting boosts — though he might not be invited to Obey's office for a while after making demands the prickly Wisconsin Democrat found unreasonable.

The measure also lifted funding for highways, transit and motor carrier safety programs by $4 billion — to the amount specified in the six-year highway spending bill passed in 2005 and increases funding every year.

Bush's request for the Millennium Challenge Corp., which channels foreign aid to countries implementing economic and political reforms, was frozen at $1.7 billion, drawing a mild rebuke from the administration.

Senate Republicans predicted that Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., would schedule debate close to a Feb. 15 deadline and give them little choice but to pass the bill.

"What do they want?" Reid asked. "To close the government down?"

Asked how he thought debate might go, Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., said: "Quickly."

Oregon Senator Threatens Filibuster (LAT/AP)

By Matthew Daly

The Los Angeles Times, January 31, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0125066

WASHINGTON — An Oregon senator is threatening to filibuster a must-pass spending bill if Congress does not extend payments to rural counties hurt by cutbacks in federal logging.

"The federal government has an obligation to rural Oregon, and it's time to meet that obligation," said Sen. Gordon Smith, R-Ore. "We are talking about people's jobs, children's schools and general public safety in 700 timber counties in 39 states."

Congress is considering a $463.5 billion spending bill that would pay for 13 Cabinet agencies this year. Democratic leaders hope to move the bill through the House as early as Wednesday, with the Senate likely taking it up after that.

Smith said he would try to block the bill if it does not include funding for the Secure Rural Schools and Community Self-Determination Act, a seven-year-old law that has pumped more than $2 billion into Oregon and other states hurt by federal policies that restricted logging in the 1990s. The policies were aimed at protecting the spotted owl and other threatened species.

The law -- known as "county payments" -- expired last year, and the federal government sent out its final checks to counties last month.

Smith and other Western lawmakers have been trying to reauthorize the law, but they have been frustrated by budget constraints and concerns that Oregon gets too much money under the current formula.

Oregon, long a leading timber producer where more than half the land is owned by the federal government, received more than $149 million of the $385 million distributed nationally last year by the Forest Service, far surpassing No. 2 California, which received $66 million. Washington state was third at $42 million; Idaho got about $21 million.

Smith sent a letter Tuesday to Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., and Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., declaring that he will "put the brakes" on the budget bill if it does not include a one-year extension of the county payments program, which he called a "safety net" for rural America.

Some state and local officials have warned that libraries might be closed, deputy sheriffs laid off and other services curtailed if the timber program is not renewed.

The Senate would need 60 votes to overcome a filibuster effort.

Pentagon Is Stunned By $3 Billion Cut (HILL)

By Roxana Tiron

The Hill, January 31, 2007

A continuing resolution released Monday night axes more than half of the money the Pentagon needs to meet its base realignment and closure (BRAC) commitments, potentially preventing the military services from completing the process by 2011 as required by law.

The Army, which has 61 percent of the total BRAC budget, is preparing for the consequences of appropriators' decision to deny the Pentagon more than $3 billion out of the $5.8 billion authorized last year for BRAC.

That decision could have widespread knock-on effects on the rotation of troops in and out of Iraq and Afghanistan, the building of new brigades and the Army's plan to bring troops back from Germany.

Senior military officials had been pressuring lawmakers to add billions of dollars for necessary base closures as well as military construction and quality-of-life projects to the continuing resolution that would fund the government until the end of fiscal year 2007.

A failure to do so could have a grim impact on the services, military officials warned.

But appropriators did not heed the services' call and allotted $2.5 billion for BRAC costs for the military to begin work on the highest-priority programs. The money represents an increase of $1 billion over the 2006 budget level.

"It is pretty devastating for us," said an Army official who asked not to be quoted by name.

The service has put together a complex plan that links its military construction and troop movement plan with BRAC implementation.

Faced with the loss of billions of dollars this year, the Army is considering how to bring in additional funding for its projects. The delay of those projects ultimately will have an impact on the service's tactical and operational units, according to the official.

The Army and the rest of the military services could get more money in the upcoming emergency supplemental, but several sources pointed out that it is unlikely the military would get the entire $ 3.3 billion, if much of it at all, in the 2007 war supplemental.

Currently, there is no request of such nature in the supplemental, according to the Army official.

The Pentagon is submitting its supplemental request for the rest of 2007 together with its 2008 budget next week. The service would depend on Congress's "generosity" to get more money, the official added.

Moreover, the service may be forced to readjust its 2008 budget submission because several requests for military construction are predicated on the completion of projects in 2007, the Army official said.

"There is a trail of things predicated on getting BRAC money in a timely fashion," the official said.

DOJ_NMG_0125067

The Army is standing up new brigades as part of its so-called modularity effort. A lack of funds could shortchange the Army's plan to create a more easily deployable force and affect overseas operations.

The Army's force-rotation plan and overall readiness rely on completing its "modularity" plan on time. The Army now faces the possibility of lacking adequate facilities to train new forces and maintain equipment.

For soldiers rotating in and out of Iraq and Afghanistan, the Army also is building facilities; some of that construction is in part linked to BRAC.

In addition, without full BRAC funding, the Army may delay bringing back forces from Germany and keep units returning from conflicts inactivated for a longer period than desired, the official said.

A lack of funding may force the Army to resort to temporary housing — a practice that has long been criticized by Congress.

While it saves money in the short term, it becomes a "colossal waste of money," according to an industry source. The Army already was criticized for the use of temporary facilities to implement its modularity plans.

"Congress does not consider BRAC as an emergency that they have to do," the Army official said. "They seem to think that they can extend BRAC." Such decisions could have wider implications, the official added.

The Army may look for authority to transfer, or reprogram money from its basic military construction accounts into BRAC accounts, said the industry source.

Ultimately, the services and Congress may have to look at the possibility of delaying the implementation of BRAC, but that won't be able to happen without a change in the law. Currently, the Pentagon has six years after the approval of a BRAC round (in this case, 2005) to finish the process.

In order to increase money for BRAC 2008 and 2009 to catch up, the Army may have to trade money from its regular military-construction accounts, the official said, and that does not come without consequences.

The House is taking up the continuing resolution today and strong debate over the bill is expected.

Some Lawmakers Worried CR Could Affect Reelection Prospects (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan

The Hill, January 31, 2007

Democratic leaders' decision to exclude earmarks and to direct federal agencies to ignore legislative language that might look like pork has worried some House freshman Democrats, said one Democratic lawmaker and a senior Democratic aide.

In a meeting last Friday for Democratic chiefs of staff, some staffers worried that the absence of earmarks and an overall spending decrease — spending in the CR will not rise with inflation — would hinder their drive toward reelection.

While earmarks are not popular inside the Beltway, they do resonate with many voters. That is why most legislators do not announce their earmarks until after they have been signed into law. But in the wake of earmark scandals and both parties seeking to claim the mantle of fiscal discipline, boasting about earmarks will likely be on the decline in the 110th Congress.

Another drawback of the CR, congressional officials explained, is that Members' Representational Accounts (MRAs) will remain stuck at 2006 spending levels. A 4 percent increase, for example, would allow lawmakers to hire more staffers or pay current staffers more money. Others worried that libraries, hospitals and other institutions in their districts would be adversely affected by the spending freeze.

Budgets always present party leaders with challenges, and Democratic leaders decided to deploy their whip team to gauge support for the CR. Some lawmakers, such as Rep. Jason Altmire (D-Pa.), told House leaders that they would oppose the bill if it included earmarks and a pay hike for lawmakers. Democratic leaders met Altmire's conditions for a yes vote: increased spending on veterans' healthcare and no cost-of-living adjustment for lawmakers.

That lawmakers would complain about spending levels would not be unusual except for the unique predicament in which Democratic leaders found themselves upon assuming the majority earlier this month.

Faced with having to fund the government for the rest of fiscal year 2007, Democrats would have had to pass nine of 11 appropriations bill that the House Republican majority of 2006 did not. Rep. David Obey (D-Wis.) and Sen. Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.), the chairmen of the House and Senate Appropriations committees, respectively, decided to cram those nine spending bills into the continuing resolution and to consider the measure without any earmarks or debate.

Democrats and Republicans blamed each other for the process and substance in the budget. Republicans lit into Democrats, complaining once again that they were not allowed a role in drafting the bill or in amending it on the House floor.

"The CR results from the failure of Republicans to do their work," said Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.), referring to the House Republican majority's inability or unwillingness last year to pass the spending bills. "It would be an unending process to open it up."

DOJ_NMG_0125068

The bill, which the House will consider tomorrow, has taken on the form of both a conference report and an omnibus spending bill, depending on which party is talking. Hoyer emphasized that the CR was being treated as a conference report, which is not subject to amendments.

Rep. Paul Ryan (R-Wis.), the ranking Republican on the House Budget Committee, said, "What they're doing is they are rewriting appropriations. This is an omnibus appropriations bill. And to bring an omnibus appropriations bill to the floor with a closed rule and no chance of amendments and no chance at debate is really historic."

In policy memos distributed to GOP staff and reporters, Republicans alleged that the CR included long-term earmarks for programs housed at the Department of Energy and that changes in funding formulas would decimate the Section 8 housing program.

Nevertheless, Democratic lawmakers cheered their leaders at the Democratic Caucus meeting yesterday, said aides who were in the room. House Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman John Dingell (D-Mich.) led his colleagues in applauding Obey. Rep. Jerrold Nadler (D-N.Y.) was excited that Section 8 housing received more money in the continuing resolution.

In addition, some members were content with the CR, for now, because it paid for all transportation projects, added money for community health centers and funded a program created in the 2005 energy bill to provide loan guarantees for alternative-fuel programs. In addition, all of the Army Corps of Engineers' water projects will be funded. The projects initially were funded as earmarks, but Obey reached a deal with the Corps and the Office of Management and Budget to pay for the projects.

Accord On Increasing Pell Grants (NYT)

By Diana Jean Schemo

The New York Times, January 31, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 30— The maximum federal grant for middle- and low-income students to attend college would increase for the first time in four years under a catchall spending bill that House and Senate Democrats agreed to on Tuesday.

The measure would complete budget issues left over from 2006.

The increase, announced by the chairmen of the House and Senate Appropriations Committees, would raise the maximum grants, under the Pell program, to $4,310 a year from $4,050. The last substantial increase in the grants was in 2001.

Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts and chairman of the Senate education committee, called the increase "an important down payment by Democrats on our commitment to help families with high college costs."

The move follows a vote by the House, under the Democrats' agenda in the new Congress, to cut interest rates on some subsidized loans for middle- and lower-income students.

Although the rate cut passed with overwhelming bipartisan support, that bill was criticized by House Republicans and the Bush administration as benefiting just college graduates faced with repaying loans, rather than broadening access to college for low-income students.

With the announcement on Tuesday, days before President Bush is to release his 2008 budget, Democrats appeared to answer that criticism, part of a broader effort to claim the issue of college affordability.

Even if the president asks for an increase in Pell Grants, as the White House has indicated is likely, Democrats will have already acted to increase the grants.

Republicans generally appeared to support increasing the grants.

Each year, 5.3 million students with family incomes less than $40,000 a year receive the grants. Although the grants have remained steady, the cost of attending college has outpaced inflation, lowering the buying power of the grants.

The budget bill would increase federal grant money by $615.4 million, to $13.6 billion for this year.

An advocate for the U.S. Public Interest Research Group Higher Education Project, Luke Swarthout, said the increase was significant, though students had hoped for a much larger increase.

Letter Exposes Dingell (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, January 31, 2007

House Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman John Dingell (D-Mich.) has written a letter to Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) voicing his objection to working with fellow chairman Barney Frank (D-Mass.) to establish a new task force. The letter, which has been obtained by The Hill, directly contradicts claims Dingell made last week, when he said he was unaware that discussions on the task force were underway.

Dingell's letter also shows how the powerful chairman earned the reputation as a fierce defender of his turf when he headed Energy and Commerce in the 1980s and '90s.

DOJ_NMG_0125069

Spurring Dingell is the issue of data security, which is important to senior Democrats on the Commerce Committee and Frank's Financial Services panel. Consumer privacy heated up as a political topic recently when discount retailers Marshalls and T.J. Maxx reported that they had lost potentially millions of customers' financial information to theft.

In a letter to Pelosi dated Dec. 11 , Frank proposed setting up a multi-committee task force on data security but later said he dropped the idea because Dingell had objected to it.

Dingell, who created a stir early this month by opposing the creation of another task force on energy policy, last week sought to dispel more public attention by denying his objections to Frank's idea for data security.

"I haven't said anything about it yet — I haven't said anything at all," Dingell said last week when asked about the proposed data task force. "Frank mentioned something about this at a meeting and I made no comment whatsoever. I never knew it was any kind of formal discussion or offer or proposal or anything else."

But that denial contradicts a letter Dingell sent to Pelosi two days after she received Frank's letter formally suggesting the task force.

"I have received a copy of Rep. Barney Frank's letter dated December 11, 2006, regarding the need for legislation to protect the privacy of consumers' sensitive personal information," Dingell wrote Pelosi in a two-and-a-half page letter claiming jurisdiction over the issue.

"At this time, I do not see a need to subjugate the legitimate committee process to a task force unless regular order fails to produce responsible legislation," he wrote in conclusion.

Dingell's spokeswoman, Jodi Seth, said that her boss did not object to Frank's proposal because he remained open to setting up a task force at a later date.

But Frank proposed the task force to avoid a procedural logjam from developing.

"The House in the 109th Congress failed to address this issue, due in large measure to unresolved jurisdictional conflicts among the Republican leadership of the affected committees," Frank wrote to Pelosi. "In the next Congress, we should break that logjam by working out these conflicts at the very beginning of the legislative process."

Frank said he was surprised that Dingell denied objecting to the task force.

"I was surprised to see the comments in The Hill's recent story on data security," Frank said. "I followed up with my idea on the multi-committee task force in a letter to Speaker Nancy Pelosi, and Chairman Dingell responded with a letter to the Speaker with his objections."

In his letter, Dingell also took a few swipes at Financial Services, showing that his elbows are still sharp after 51 years of House service.

Dingell asserted that Rep. David Dreier (R-Calif.), a former chairman of the Rules Committee, "made it clear" that when Republicans set jurisdictional boundaries between Commerce and Financial Services they did not intend to limit Commerce's claim over consumer affairs and consumer protection matters.

"I therefore am puzzled by Rep. Frank's assertion that he is 'chairman of the committee with primary jurisdiction on this issue,'" Dingell wrote.

Dingell also raised questions with Pelosi over whether Frank had sufficient control over his committee to pass strong consumer protections.

"I respect Rep. Frank's strong commitment to consumer protection, most notably in the area of his longstanding commitment to affordable housing, but I also know that he faces considerable opposition in his committee," Dingell wrote. "Despite a steady stream of security breaches over the last two years, the banking industry has stated that it will oppose any legislation that imposes stronger requirements than currently exist under the privacy provisions of Gramm-Leach-Bliley."

Dingell went on to write that even the protections created by that law would not be in place "were it not for the strong leadership" of his committee. He also said that in its previous incarnation as the Banking Committee, Financial Services approved "extremely weak privacy protections for consumers' sensitive personal information."

Defending his panel, Frank said in an interview that Dingell's criticism about opposition to strong protections within Financial Services was true in the Republican majority and is still relevant now that Democrats control the panel.

Frank also explained that his committee has primary jurisdiction over credit cards and did not intend to argue that he had first claim over all legislation protecting the security of sensitive personal financial information.

Despite the recent flare-up, however, both Frank and Dingell say they are beginning to cooperate on data security, even though the idea for a multi-committee task force has been dropped.

"I now believe we'll be able to work this out," Frank said. "There's cooperation between our two committees and Ways and Means. Members are talking to each other."

Dingell's spokeswoman said that her boss told Frank on the House floor late last week that he did not have a problem with the staffs of Commerce and Financial Services "beginning to talk with each other" about data security.

FBI Probing Rep. Miller's Land Sales (LAT)

By William Heisel

The Los Angeles Times, January 31, 2007

The FBI is investigating Rep. Gary Miller (R-Diamond Bar) for a series of land transactions in which he avoided paying capital gains taxes after saying he had been forced to sell under eminent domain in Monrovia and Fontana.

The federal investigation was initiated after The Times reported in August that officials in both cities denied that they had acquired Miller's property using eminent domain, which enables governments to buy land for certain purposes even if owners do not want to sell.

After a land sale in Monrovia in 2002 and two subsequent sales in Fontana in 2005 and 2006, Miller claimed an exemption under Internal Revenue Code Section 1033, which grants those forced to sell property through eminent domain at least two years to reinvest the profits without paying capital gains taxes.

Miller's repeated use of the forced-sale exemption has enabled deferment of capital gains taxes through at least 2009.

Dick Singer, a spokesman for Monrovia, said federal agents had interviewed city officials and requested a videotape from a City Council meeting in 2000 cited by The Times in which Miller asked city officials four times to buy his land.

Glen Owens, a Monrovia planning commissioner quoted by The Times, said he was interviewed by two FBI agents in person. "They were asking mostly about the Monrovia deal and what kind of person he was," Owens said.

Since that time, the FBI has interviewed several other current and former city officials from Monrovia and Fontana, officials said.

The FBI declined to comment Tuesday.

Miller's spokesman said he had not been contacted by the FBI. "Congressman Miller is tired of all the rumor and innuendo that has been in the press regarding his past real estate transactions," spokesman Scott Toussaint said in an e-mail to The Times.

The investigation was first reported in Tuesday's San Gabriel Valley Tribune.

Citizens for Ethics and Responsibility in Washington, a nonpartisan government watchdog group, filed a complaint in August after The Times' story was published. The complaint asked the IRS to investigate and alleged that Miller had violated federal law by invoking the eminent domain provision to avoid paying taxes.

"It looks like this is not casual; it seems like quite a concerted effort," said Melanie Sloan, the group's executive director. "Miller has clearly acted illegally. The idea of running into eminent domain three times is absolutely ludicrous."

Toussaint said Miller had asked, after The Times' story in August, that the House Ethics Committee review the land deals and determine whether he had committed any infractions. A review by the committee would be unrelated to the FBI investigation.

"He voluntarily delivered all relevant documents to the Ethics Committee, as well as all newspaper articles on the subject, and asked for an investigation and opinion," Toussaint said.

When Miller sold 165 acres to the city of Monrovia in 2002, he made more than $10 million, according to a financial disclosure form he filed in Congress.

State and federal taxes would have taken up to 31% out of that profit, but Miller claimed an exemption under Section 1033. He said Monrovia had forced him to sell his land, even though the city bought it from him with state money that specifically prohibited the city from using eminent domain.

He then reinvested some of those profits into land in Fontana and Rancho Cucamonga. When he sold some of the land in Fontana in 2005, again he claimed that he had been forced to sell the land because of eminent domain. When he sold more of the land in 2006, he made the claim a third time.

In Fontana, he asked that the city manager write him a letter saying that eminent domain could be used in the case of his land sale. The city did so but noted that it would have to amend its rules to use eminent domain.

"We do not have the power of eminent domain in that area, and we have no plans of amending the plan to get the power of eminent domain," Kenneth Hunt, the city manager, told The Times in August. "You'll have to talk to him about why he asked for a letter."

Hunt told The Times initially that the city wrote those types of letters regularly.

But when The Times requested copies of all letters mentioning eminent domain, city officials conceded that they had written letters only for Miller and a property owner who owned land near the congressman's.

City Councilman Frank Scialdone said Tuesday that council members were concerned about the letters and asked Hunt to make sure that he didn't write letters like that again.

"The whole thing didn't look right, and we wanted to make sure that we as a city are not in that position again," Scialdone said. "You will not see letters like that coming from us in the future."

DOJ_NMG_0125071

The Times reported in December that while Miller was urging the city of Monrovia to buy his property, he tried to secure an appointment for one of Monrovia's City Council members, Robert Hammond, to the National Park System Advisory Board, a prestigious panel that makes policy recommendations. But there were no open positions on the board at the time.

Hammond told The Times in December that he had not been contacted by the FBI. On Tuesday, he did not return calls for comment.

FBI Examining Video In Miller Land Probe (SGVT)

By Fred Ortega And Gary Scott, Staff Writers

San Gabriel Valley Tribune, January 31, 2007

Monrovia officials have given the FBI a video recording of a 2000 City Council meeting featuring testimony from Rep. Gary Miller, part of a federal investigation into the congressman's Southland business dealings.

In the video, the Brea Republican is seen appealing to the council to purchase his 165-acre hillside plot during the Feb. 29, 2000 meeting. Miller later avoided paying capital gains on the $10-million profit he made on the land sale by claiming the city forced the sale.

City spokesman Dick Singer said federal agents asked for the video within the past three weeks.

The FBI began investigating the Monrovia deal after a government watchdog group accused Miller of violating tax laws in his sale of the property in 2002 and the subsequent sale of two Fontana properties that he bought with the proceeds.

The FBI has contacted at least four current and former city officials in Fontana and Monrovia in recent months to ask about the congressman's land dealings.

FBI officials have declined to comment. Miller has maintained his innocence, adding that he has not been contacted by federal investigators.

An official with Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW), the group

Advertisement

that filed the initial complaint about Miller's use of the tax code, said she is gratified by the FBI's level of response.

"This is not random, this is not casual, and it is not minor," said CREW Executive Director Melanie Sloan, a former federal prosecutor. "The number of people they have contacted means that they have dedicated significant resources on this."

CREW filed a complaint with the IRS last August following publication of a Los Angeles Times article detailing Miller's land transactions. The group alleges Miller improperly used IRS Code Section 1033, which allows individuals who have their land forcibly taken away by the government to postpone paying capital gains taxes for up to two years.

Miller used the same exemption to avoid paying capital gains taxes when he sold his Fontana properties in 2005 and 2006.

Fontana and Monrovia officials have denied forcing Miller to sell his land, and eminent domain was never used in any of the sales.

Glen Owens, a Monrovia planning commissioner, said Tuesday that an FBI agent questioned him about the chain of events that led up to Miller's land sale to the city.

Owens served on a advisory committee with Miller in the 1990s that was formed to come up with a plan for hillside development. He said he believes Miller did not intend to build on his property at the time of the sale.

"He soon realized that he could probably make more money by selling the land than by developing it," said Owens.

He added, "Gary just knows how to work the system and he is not afraid to push the envelope and that is what he's done. But I don't think he has broken any laws. He's just used bad judgement."

The FBI does not investigate minor ethical lapses, said Bruce Cain, director of the University of California Washington Center in Washington, D.C.

"The fact that they have taken an interest shows that this is something they are taking rather seriously," he said.

Cain added that potential conflict of interest charges against Miller might be even more damaging than allegations that he illegally postponed paying capital gains taxes.

Miller came under scrutiny in a 2005 Tribune article when he earmarked $1.28 million for street improvements in Diamond Bar near a planned commercial and residential development he co-owned with Lewis Operating Co., his largest campaign contributor.

Other news articles have also detailed Miller s 2005 use of a highway bill to allow Rialto to close down its airport, a move that allowed Lewis Operating to develop the airport land.

"This is something Democrats are targeting with their ethics reform, going after earmarks that are self-enriching or enriching your friends," said Cain. "It all resonates with the culture of corruption issue, and it could be a problem not only for Miller, but for Republicans as they try not to lose any more seats in 2008."

Miller said Monday that he asked the House ethics committee late last year to review his business dealings to put to rest any rumors of wrongdoing. His spokesman, Scott Toussaint, refused to release any documents relating to that inquiry.

A spokeswoman for ethics committee Chairwoman Rep. Stephanie Tubbs Jones, D-Ohio, would not comment on any committee inquiries. Committee staff members did not return calls seeking comment.

Any congressional inquest would likely have nothing to do with an FBI investigation, said Stanley Brand, a former special counsel to the House ethics committee.

"These are parallel processes," said Brand, now with the Brand Law Group in Washington D.C. "There have been instances where the committee launched major investigations where they have used former or existing FBI agents, but they do not as a matter of course dispatch FBI agents to conduct their work. They have their own investigators."

Sloan was dismissive of any investigation by the House.

"I am highly skeptical that the ethics committee is looking into it," she said. "The committee is a joke. They have never done anything effectual. They have never done anything to (former Rep. Bob) Ney, (Rep. William) Jefferson, to (former Rep. Randy) Cunningham, and they won't do anything to Miller."

Rep. Gary Miller, In Senior Perch, Is Part Of FBI Probe (HILL)

By Susan Crabtree

The Hill, January 31, 2007

After months of GOP ethics scandals, House Republicans chose Rep. Gary Miller (R-Calif.) as the ranking member of a panel charged with investigating financial institutions — even as the FBI was looking into his land deals.

Financial Services Chairman Spencer Bachus (R-Ala.) named Miller to the top GOP spot on the oversight and investigative subcommittee Jan. 9, according to a committee release. Watchdog groups have been raising red flags on several of Miller's land deals since The Hill and other media outlets first scrutinized them early last year. Yesterday, a spokesman for the southern California city of Monrovia confirmed that agency officials had contacted the city about Miller's land deals in the last two months.

Bachus's office did not return calls for comment.

Brian Kennedy, a spokesman for Minority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio), said the leadership team would act "decisively" if a member were found to have violated the law or House rules.

"Mr. Boehner has made it abundantly clear that he and the new Republican leadership team in the House intend to hold members to the highest possible ethical standards," Kennedy said. "If any Republican member is found to have violated ethics rules or broken laws, this leadership team and the Steering Committee will act accordingly and decisively."

After the election, Rep. John Doolittle (R-Calif.), who was under scrutiny for his ties to lobbyist Jack Abramoff, decided not to run again for his conference secretary leadership position, and instead Rep. John Carter (R-Texas) ran and won that post. But Republicans decided not to oust Rep. Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.), another member who is under FBI investigation, from the coveted top spot on the Appropriations panel.

In an interview earlier this year, Boehner said he believes Lewis is innocent until proven guilty, and that prevented him from toppling him from the top GOP spot on the spending panel.

But Melanie Sloan of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW) said Republicans are in the minority because they have operated under just that kind of policy for the past several years. The group filed a complaint about Miller's land deals with the IRS last August.

"Until you can understand that your members have to do better than just avoid indictment, then you're going to stay in the minority for many years to come," Sloan said. "We're gratified that there is an investigation. Miller has been clearly engaged in illegal activity and hopefully this will put an end to it."

A spokesman for Taxpayers for Common Sense, Steve Ellis, said the group has been looking into Miller's land deals over the last year and considers him to be "under an ethical cloud."

"It's questionable at best to put him in charge of the ranking-member slot on the committee," Ellis said. "If more comes out from the FBI investigations, it may end up blowing up in the Republicans' faces."

Miller's appointment to the ranking slot on the oversight and investigations panel plays into the Democrats' hands. Already this year, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee has repeatedly named Miller as one of its top targets in 2008 and has made it clear that targeting ethically challenged members will be a major piece of their strategy this cycle.

"House Republicans seem to mistakenly believe that being investigated by the FBI qualifies you for an influential position on the oversight and investigative subcommittee," DCCC spokeswoman Kate Bedingfield said. "This kind of lack of leadership and accountability from the GOP is exactly why Americans voted for a change of direction in Congress."

Monrovia spokesman Dick Singer yesterday acknowledged that a government agency had contacted city officials about Miller's land deals "within the last couple of months," but declined to offer any more specifics.

The San Bernardino Sun yesterday reported that the FBI had contacted officials and former officials from several cities in southern California about Miller's land deals.

Miller spokesman Scott Toussaint said the FBI had not contacted Miller or his staff. Miller has consistently denied any wrongdoing and yesterday lashed out at the press for conducting what he called a "smear" campaign against him.

"Congressman Miller is tired of all the rumor and innuendo that has been in the press regarding his past real estate transactions," Miller said in a written statement.

In order to "stop this smear once and for all," Miller said he handed over "relevant documents" to the ethics committee late last year and asked it to render an opinion.

"If he is contacted, he intends to cooperate fully because he has nothing to hide," the statement said.

Among various questionable land deals, The Hill first reported late last year that Monrovia city officials had tried to secure a federal earmark to help purchase a large swath of land to create a wilderness preserve in the nearby foothills, 165 acres of which Miller owned. The city's efforts were unsuccessful and it instead passed a tax increase and secured California state grant money to pay for the land. Miller ended up making nearly $10 million on the deal.

In August, CREW filed a complaint with the IRS alleging that Miller failed to report or pay capital-gains tax on the sale of the land to Monrovia. The Los Angeles Times reported that Miller claimed that the city had exercised eminent domain, which would lighten his tax load; but the city denied doing so.

White House Order Tightens Grip On Policy, Stirs Debate On Control (WSJ)

By John D. Mckinnon

The Wall Street Journal, January 31, 2007

WASHINGTON -- A White House move to tighten its control over federal regulations is providing fresh evidence of the Bush administration's intent to leave its conservative imprint on government over the next two years.

The White House action, in the form of an executive order, is a reminder that despite Democrats' success in November's congressional elections, Mr. Bush retains control of the basic machinery of government that often decides how corporations and citizens go about their business. It is a power that Congress has limited ability to affect.

· What's New: President Bush extended White House oversight of agency regulation to include more informal guidance and more data on costs.

· What's at Stake: Businesses are hoping they've gained new tools to avoid costly regulation, while consumer and liberal groups worry about a conservative power grab.

· What's Next: Democrats in Congress are likely to take a look, but have few options.

Now Mr. Bush aims to exercise more sway.

Most notably, the White House has given itself more review authority over many informal agency dictates known as guidance. Critics say the executive order gives the White House a chokehold over new guidance it dislikes. White House officials deny that, saying it is simply strengthening a review process that already occurs in many instances.

Even defenders of the administration say this change is likely to give the White House more say in how to interpret federal rules. As the White House has assumed more oversight on formal rulemaking, many critics say agencies have done more regulation through informal guidance, such as letters or manuals. Because these aren't formal regulations, the agencies don't have to go through the same elaborate procedures. Labor officials in recent years have issued guidance on hundreds of occupational-safety issues, critics note.

"I think that's important," James Gattuso, an expert on regulation at the conservative Heritage Foundation, said of the change. "If you believe in review of regulations to ensure they're consistent with administration policy, and no more costly than necessary, you really want guidance documents to be included as well."

Administration officials say the principal aim of the new policies isn't to stifle regulation but to clarify a process that can appear confusing and opaque to the people affected. Several of the changes are aimed at making sure that regulated companies and individuals get more of an opportunity to comment in advance on planned policies, said Jeffrey Rosen, general counsel of the White House Office of Management and Budget.

"Bad, bad, bad," Gary Bass, executive director of liberal advocacy group OMB Watch, said of the changes. He predicted they would hamper the government's ability to respond to regulatory crises -- such as the recent E. coli outbreaks on fresh vegetables.

The House Oversight and Government Reform Committee is considering a hearing on the issue. The administration's new approach "interferes with the ability of agencies to make decisions based on their expert opinions, and is something Congress should carefully review," Chairman Henry Waxman (D., Calif.) said in a statement. Sen. Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut, chairman of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, said in a statement that his panel would monitor the situation to "make sure that essential federal protections are not being undermined."

DOJ_NMG_0125074

Mr. Rosen said it's "ironic that a measure that increases availability of guidance documents to the public and allows input by the public would be seen as a problem instead of a benefit." He also said there is an exception for emergencies.

The executive order has three other main parts. It sets a new standard for formal rulemaking that requires agencies to find a "market failure" before proceeding with formal regulation. That's a concept that has been championed by Susan Dudley, the academic Mr. Bush nominated to oversee regulatory matters for the White House. Her nomination has been blocked in the Senate, and the White House has said she instead will be tapped for a senior adviser post.

Public Citizen, a liberal advocacy group, said that provision could derail much new regulation. But Mr. Rosen says it is an attempt to clarify a provision that has governed executive-branch rulemaking since the Clinton administration issued its executive order on regulations in 1993. That 1993 provision called for an agency undertaking a rulemaking to identify the problem it intends to address, including "the failures of private markets," he said.

The new Bush order also requires agencies to put a senior official -- technically, a presidential appointee -- in charge of regulatory policy. Critics say that will extend the reach of the White House further into agencies' operations. But White House officials say it's just institutionalizing a longstanding practice. Most agencies already have designated a presidential appointee as their regulatory policy chief, Mr. Rosen said.

Another change requires agencies to develop annual plans for weighing the combined costs and benefits of all regulation planned for the year. Liberal critics say such analyses are biased against regulation and will cause agencies to postpone new rules.

Lawmakers Unveil Election Financing Bill (SFC)

By Jim Kuhnhenn

San Francisco Chronicle, January 31, 2007

As the cost of presidential campaigns moves toward the $1 billion mark, leading congressional advocates of tougher campaign finance laws want to reduce the influence of special interests by pumping more taxpayer money into the system.

Three House members and one senator on Tuesday introduced legislation that would increase the amount of money in the presidential public financing system and increase the spending limits for candidates who participate in it. It would not change the rules for the 2008 presidential election.

"This system that's in place now is not sustainable," said Rep. Martin Meehan, D-Mass., who introduced the legislation in the House with Reps. Christopher Shays, R-Conn., and David Price, D-N.C. Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., introduced similar legislation in the Senate.

The legislation would triple the amount available to candidates during state primaries and eliminate state spending limits. It would increase the amount available for general elections to $100 million (More than $80 million would be available in 2008). It also would offer more money to candidates whose opponents chose to decline the public money and raise more on their own.

To pay for the extra money, the sponsors would increase the voluntary presidential campaign checkoff on income tax returns from $3 to $10.

The proposals follow Democratic Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's decision to avoid the public system entirely during her 2008 presidential bid. Other candidates, including Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., and Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., are contemplating taking a similar step.

In 2004, President Bush and Democrats Howard Dean and Sen. John Kerry turned down the money in the primaries. Kerry and Bush did accept general election funds.

Sponsors of the changes said they didn't blame candidates for rejecting public financing altogether.

"The reality is if somebody did comply with this system, they couldn't get elected," Meehan said.

Notable by his absence from the group was McCain, whose name is synonymous with past efforts at toughening campaign laws. Conservatives have criticized him for his previous stands, claiming campaign finance laws have diluted their free speech rights. The Republican National Committee this month passed a resolution denouncing the campaign law that McCain championed in 2002.

"We'd love to improve the system," McCain said in a brief hallway interview Tuesday. But he said he'd been away from Washington and was not familiar with the details of the new proposal. "I haven't focused on it."

Get up to 50% off home delivery of the Chronicle for 12 weeks! ©2007 Associated Press

Honesty In Elections (NYT)

The New York Times, January 31, 2007

On Election Day last fall in Maryland, fliers were handed out in black neighborhoods with the heading “Democratic Sample Ballot” and photos of black Democratic leaders — and boxes checked off beside the names of the Republican candidates for senator and governor. They were a blatant attempt to fool black voters into thinking the Republican candidates were endorsed by black Democrats. In Orange County, Calif., 14,000 Latino voters got letters in Spanish saying it was a crime for immigrants to vote in a federal election. It didn’t say that immigrants who are citizens have the right to vote.

Dirty tricks like these turn up every election season, in large part because they are so rarely punished. But two Democratic senators, Barack Obama of Illinois and Charles Schumer of New York, are introducing a bill today that would make deceiving or intimidating voters a federal crime with substantial penalties.

The bill aims at some of the most commonly used deceptive political tactics. It makes it a crime to knowingly tell voters the wrong day for an election. There have been numerous reports of organized efforts to use telephones, leaflets or posters to tell voters, especially in minority areas, not to vote on Election Day because voting has been postponed.

The bill would also criminalize making false claims to voters about who has endorsed a candidate, or wrongly telling people — like immigrants who are registered voters in Orange County — that they cannot vote.

Along with defining these crimes and providing penalties of up to five years’ imprisonment, the bill would require the Justice Department to counteract deceptive election information that has been put out, and to report to Congress after each election on what deceptive practices occurred and what the Justice Department did about them.

The bill would also allow individuals to go to court to stop deceptive practices while they are happening. That is important, given how uninterested the current Justice Department has proved to be in cracking down on election-season dirty tricks.

The bill is careful to avoid infringing on First Amendment rights, and that is the right course. But in steering clear of regulating speech, it is not clear how effective the measure would be in addressing one of the worst dirty tricks of last fall’s election: a particular kind of deceptive “robocall” that was used against Democratic Congressional candidates. These calls, paid for by the Republicans, sounded as if they had come from the Democrat; when a recipient hung up, the call was repeated over and over. The intent was clearly to annoy the recipients so they would not vote for the Democrat.

While there are already laws that can be used against this sort of deceptive telephone harassment, a more specific bill aimed directly at these calls is needed. But the bill being introduced today is an important step toward making elections more honest and fair. There is no reason it should not be passed by Congress unanimously.

FDA Plans To Boost Safety With Newsletters, Drug Profiles (USAT)

By Rita Rubin

USA Today, January 31, 2007

WASHINGTON — Food and Drug Administration officials unveiled a variety of initiatives Tuesday to improve drug safety and expand information to the public about the medicines they take.

Among the steps announced at a news conference:

·A collaboration with the Veterans Health Administration to share information and expertise related to the review and use of medical products.

·A pilot program to produce safety profiles of new drugs after they have been on the market for 18 months.

·Periodic newsletters on the FDA website to update consumers about post-marketing reviews of drugs.

·Establishment of a committee of outside experts to advise the FDA about how to communicate risks to the public.

·Organizational changes to improve communication between FDA staffers who review drugs before approval and those who track the drugs' safety afterward.

The FDA's efforts come in response to an Institute of Medicine report released last September. The report, which was requested by the FDA, concluded that the agency needs to pay more attention to the safety of drugs once they are on the market, a move that requires more money and regulatory authority. FDA commissioner Andrew von Eschenbach said the agency regards the report as "a substantial amount of advice," not a "rigid blueprint."

Institute committee member Alta Charo, a professor of law and bioethics at the University of Wisconsin-Madison, called the FDA's new report "a very serious effort to respond to the IOM recommendations. It's filled with a variety of first steps that go in the right direction."

Still, Charo said in an interview, "I have to confess I'm disappointed that they ignored one of our most critical recommendations." Specifically, she said, the report advised the FDA to give more clout to the agency's Office of Drug Safety, which monitors drugs after they go on the market.

"If they pick up on a problem," Charo said, "they don't have the ability to force anybody to pay any attention to them."

Probably the best-known FDA drug safety staffer is David Graham, who got a lot of people to pay attention when he told the Senate Finance Committee in November 2004 that the agency was "virtually defenseless" against another "tragedy and a profound regulatory failure" like Vioxx. Merck pulled the arthritis drug off the market in September 2004 because it raised the risk of heart attack and stroke.

DOJ_NMG_0125076

Sens. Chuck Grassley, R-Iowa, and Christopher Dodd, D-Conn., said Tuesday that they were reintroducing legislation to revamp the FDA's after-market surveillance. In a statement, Grassley, who chaired the Finance Committee when Graham blew the whistle, said the bill "addresses the fact that the office approving new drugs carries too much sway over the FDA's drug-safety apparatus."

F.D.A. Widens Safety Reviews On New Drugs (NYT)

By Gardiner Harris

The New York Times, January 31, 2007

The Food and Drug Administration announced changes yesterday that were intended to ensure that marketed drugs are as safe as advertised, including the first effort to do a comprehensive assessment of the safety of drugs 18 months after introduction.

The agency also announced the creation of an advisory panel to improve the way it announces safety worries and a collaboration with the Veterans Health Administration to track how real patients fare after taking drugs.

The F.D.A. plan is the latest effort to fix the agency after a series of missteps. In September 2004, Merck withdrew its arthritis drug, Vioxx, after a study showed that it doubled the risks of heart attack. About the same time, the agency announced that antidepressants cause some teenagers to think more about suicide.

In both cases, the agency took years to acknowledge risks to millions of patients that had been apparent to some researchers.

“We don’t see this as the only answer,” said Dr. Andrew C. von Eschenbach, the F.D.A. commissioner, at a news conference in Washington announcing the initiatives. “It’s merely a step as we continue a process of improvement that will be ongoing.”

Senator Christopher J. Dodd, Democrat of Connecticut, said in a written statement that far greater changes were needed at the agency. Mr. Dodd promised to introduce two bills today that would reorganize the F.D.A. and require drug makers to disclose the results of all clinical trials involving humans. The bills’ co-author, Senator Charles E. Grassley, Republican of Iowa, has called the agency far too “cozy” with drug makers.

In many cases, the date that the agency will begin the efforts announced yesterday is uncertain. For instance, Dr. Steven Galson, director of the agency’s drug center, said at the news conference that the pilot program to assess systematically a drug’s safety 18 months after its introduction would probably take about a year to put into place — with the assessment due 18 months after that.

“We’re just organizing that process to get started,” Dr. Galson said.

In a scathing assessment released in September, the Institute of Medicine concluded that the F.D.A. was rife with internal squabbles and hobbled by underfinancing, poor management and outdated regulations. The institute, the most important medical advisory organization in the country, suggested that the agency undergo 25 major changes, many of which would require Congressional authorization.

Alta Charo, a professor of law and bioethics at the University of Wisconsin and one of the authors of the Institute of Medicine’s report, described the F.D.A. announcement yesterday as “a good set of first steps towards improving the safety of the drug supply in the United States.”

Professor Charo said she was “disappointed” that the agency had failed to adopt some of the institute’s bolder recommendations, including one suggesting that the agency give greater authority to officials who assess the safety of drugs after they go on the market.

“We viewed that as critical,” she said.

Alan Goldhammer, deputy vice president for regulatory affairs for the Pharmaceutical and Research Manufacturers of America, praised the F.D.A.’s announcement as a “very thoughtful and comprehensive response” to the Institute of Medicine’s report.

“The agency has made substantive and significant progress in improving and enhancing the drug safety system in the U.S.” said Mr. Goldhammer, whose organization represents drug makers.

Still, the plan does little to address a problem that nearly all agree underlies many of its woes: a chronic shortage of government money. As Dr. von Eschenbach noted at the news conference, the agency has regulatory authority over about a quarter of the American economy. After the Sept. 11 attacks, the agency was asked to increase its efforts to prevent bioterrorism. Despite having greater responsibilities, its budget has remained relatively flat for years.

DOJ_NMG_0125077

There are now thousands of drugs in routine use. Figuring out which of these medicines may have undiscovered side effects will take a lot of money. The agency gets about $400 million of its $1.9 billion budget from fees assessed on drug makers. Under a formula negotiated with the drug industry, this money comes with strings attached. One restriction was that the F.D.A. could use little of the money to track the safety of approved drugs.

That deal between the F.D.A. and drug makers expires this year, and the drug companies have agreed to allow more of their money to be used for postmarket safety assessments. Whether those fees are enough, whether there should be any strings attached to them and whether that money should be coming from drug makers at all has become the subject of fierce debate.

"Drug makers clearly get their money's worth with all this money," said Dr. Sidney Wolfe, director of Public Citizen's health research group. Dr. Wolfe and other consumer advocates say that the F.D.A.'s dependence on drug industry fees has softened its oversight.

Dr. Scott Gottlieb, who last week left his job as the F.D.A. deputy commissioner to return to the American Enterprise Institute, a free-market research group, said the real debate unfolding around the agency is between those who believe that it needs more money and tools to assess drug risks, and those who believe that the agency should begin regulating the practice of medicine.

"I think we need to give the agency the resources it needs to get information about drug risks quickly," Dr. Gottlieb said. "But we don't need the government telling doctors and patients what to do."

The F.D.A. plan promises to return the agency to its scientific roots. It once had robust laboratories that conducted original studies to assess drug risks on its own. Those laboratories were largely eliminated in the past decade to apply more money to the drug-approval process and the support of a bare-bones computer program to track side effects of drugs.

But in the past two years, the agency has begun an effort to improve the science of drug safety, making itself an active participant in scientific endeavors once left exclusively to drug makers and basic scientists.

The efforts announced yesterday included the creation of a database of genetic codes associated with bad drug outcomes, the development of a computer model to identify patients who are most likely to suffer liver injury, and the design of screening tests that would identify patients most at risk of general drug problems.

Changes Will Ensure Drug Safety, FDA Says (LAT)

By Ricardo Alonso-zaldivar

The Los Angeles Times, January 31, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Food and Drug Administration pledged Tuesday to make major changes in the nation's drug safety system, responding to a blue-ribbon panel that last fall found the agency's priorities skewed toward approving new medications without adequate follow-up to identify rare but risky side effects.

FDA Commissioner Andrew C. von Eschenbach said the improvements would help the agency regain the "trust and confidence" of doctors and patients after a series of highly publicized safety lapses, including the withdrawal from the market of Vioxx, a previously approved and popular painkiller found to cause heart attacks.

But the FDA's internal fixes stopped short of addressing key issues such as increased funding and broad new legal powers for the drug safety program — reforms that depend on congressional action that may come this year. And some critics said the agency had not done enough to bring safety officials into the drug approval process.

Von Eschenbach conceded that more remained to be done, saying, "The initiatives we announce today are not the whole story, and they are not the final chapter in the story."

The changes recognized the need to address safety over the entire lifecycle of a drug, from development to use by patients. They included measures to improve the scientific underpinnings of the safety system, increase monitoring for hazardous side effects, expand communication with patients and doctors, and address long-standing turf battles among FDA scientists that have gotten in the way of alerting the public to safety problems.

A pilot program also will be established to assess the safety record of new drugs 18 months after approval. It will be tried initially with a small number of medications, and results will be reported to the public.

Consumer groups dismissed the FDA's initiative as too little, too late, but members of the panel of medical, legal and policy experts that spent more than a year investigating the drug safety program called it a respectable first step.

"It was a thoughtful and engaged response," said Dr. Bruce M. Psaty, a professor of medicine and epidemiology at the University of Washington in Seattle and a member of the panel that studied shortcomings in the FDA's safety program.

"It looks like they are launching a number of initiatives to address drug safety. Many of them are new, so the degree to which they will improve safety remains to be seen, but I think it's a fairly comprehensive response," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0125078

The panel's head, Sheila Burke, a former Republican Senate staffer who is now chief operating officer of the Smithsonian, took a tougher line. "I would have wanted to see more formal involvement of the safety staff in the drug development process," she said.

Nonetheless, she said, "I think they are serious about trying to make some progress."

The committee she led was sponsored by the Institute of Medicine, part of the National Academies that provide scientific, engineering and medical advice to the government. Convened at the FDA's request, the panel issued a scathing report in September that seems to have chastened agency leaders.

Concerns about the safety of newly approved medications have been building for years. But they gained national attention in fall 2004 when Merck withdrew the blockbuster painkiller Vioxx, after company-funded studies confirmed heart attack risks that safety experts inside the FDA bureaucracy had unsuccessfully tried to warn about.

Testimony later at a congressional hearing showed that agency managers had dismissed their own experts' warnings.

Tuesday's announcement marked the second time in two years that the FDA had pledged to fix the drug safety system. Early in 2005, the agency set up an internal drug safety oversight board. But partly because the board meets in secret, its effects have been hard to gauge.

Some of the improvements announced Tuesday would require congressional approval to increase industry user fees, which would finance new safety initiatives.

Some of those initiatives will apply to drugs in development and after approval. Others attempt to resolve long-standing communication problems within the FDA, and between the agency and the public.

In the development phase, the FDA said it was working on new tests that might predict early on whether a drug would be toxic to humans. It has launched a research program to help identify the potential heart and stroke risks of medications, and is working with the National Institutes of Health to develop a computer model that could indicate a drug's potential to cause liver damage — a common risk.

It also is looking at how the burgeoning field of genetic research might aid drug safety.

Drugs in development are tested on several hundred or a few thousand human subjects. But rare side effects may emerge only after tens of thousands of patients have taken a medication. Many academic experts think new drugs should be considered "experimental" for the first two or three years after they are approved for marketing.

Indeed, the advisory panel recommended a special caution label for new medications, and restrictions on advertising.

To increase detection of unexpected side effects during the early years, the FDA announced several improvements to its drug safety monitoring system.

The agency said it would modernize its "adverse events" database — which now captures only a small fraction of problems — to make it easier for researchers to recognize that something was going wrong. The FDA also said it was teaming up with Veterans Affairs and Medicare to share extensive information that those agencies collect on doctors' prescribing patterns and their patients' outcomes.

And it is proposing the creation of a Sentinel Network that would coordinate private and government vigilance of drug safety problems.

Finally, the FDA said it would improve communication among its own scientists, as well as with doctors and patients. Agency officials said they would redouble efforts to find ways to resolve disputes between scientists who approve drugs and those who act as safety watchdogs.

"We need to improve the way scientific disagreements are handled and resolved," said Dr. Steven K. Galson, director of the agency's Center for Drug Evaluation and Research.

FDA Proposes Report Cards On New Drugs (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 31, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) -- The public outcry over the withdrawal of the painkiller Vioxx is leading to closer government scrutiny of new drugs to identify and disclose late-developing safety problems.

As part of a pilot program, the Food and Drug Administration will issue drug "report cards" that would detail unexpected side effects that emerge within 18 months of a drug's approval. The reports also would include follow-up studies and details about how the drugs are being used.

The proposal is among more than a dozen initiatives the FDA unveiled Tuesday in response to a recent report by a committee of experts at the Institute of Medicine that criticized the agency's handling of drug safety in the wake of the Vioxx case. Nor will it be the last word, said FDA Commissioner Dr. Andrew von Eschenbach.

DOJ_NMG_0125079

"It will be a continuous process of improvement. The initiatives we are announcing today are not the full story, nor are they the final chapter in that story," von Eschenbach told reporters.

Their release comes just days before Sens. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., and Mike Enzi, R-Wyo., introduce legislation to overhaul how the FDA handles drug safety.

"Today's report is thoughtful and provides important recommendations for administrative action, but only legislation can give FDA the tools it needs to ensure that FDA is the gold standard for safety," Kennedy said in a statement.

The Institute of Medicine report was prompted in part by the 2004 withdrawal of Vioxx after research showed it increased risk of heart attacks and strokes. The report said the FDA needs more funding, people and authority to ensure it focuses on the safety of drugs while they remain on the market.

The FDA also hopes to step up its mining of large public and private health care databases to detect emerging safety problems, said agency drug chief Dr. Steven Galson. The Department of Veterans Affairs recently signed an agreement to share such information with the FDA.

The agency also said it would regularly publish newsletters to summarize its safety reviews of older drugs and disclose emerging issues. However, the newsletters would be scrubbed of whatever the FDA deemed confidential commercial and predecisional information, the agency said.

The Institute of Medicine, part of the federally chartered National Academy of Sciences, had pushed for even more public disclosure of that underlying information, said Alta Charo, a member of the committee that wrote the report who is also a University of Wisconsin professor of law and bioethics.

"Crucial to our recommendation was that these postmarketing data be shared with an advisory committee made up of independent safety experts. Their proposal would have the data remain internal," Charo said.

Both the FDA and the drug industry are concerned that broad disclosure of preliminary information about apparent safety problems could do more harm than good.

"One thing we don't want to see happen is if patients get concerned and they decide to stop therapy and don't talk to their doctors," said Alan Goldhammer of the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America, a drug industry group.

The FDA did not address the Institute of Medicine report's specific recommendations for Congress, including its push for additional agency funding and authority.

Without that, the FDA's proposals amount to "small potatoes," said Bill Vaughan, a senior policy analyst at Consumers Union.

FDA Revamps Process For Safety Of Drugs After Approval (WP)

By Shankar Vedantam

The Washington Post, January 31, 2007

The Food and Drug Administration said yesterday that it is making changes in the way it operates to prevent the kind of drug safety controversies that have dogged the agency in recent years.

Officials outlined plans to better monitor safety problems after drugs are approved and to make internal changes to increase the profile of agency scientists who raise red flags about drugs. The steps were announced in response to a report last year by the congressionally chartered Institute of Medicine (IOM) that called for an overhaul of the FDA's culture and structure following safety controversies over drugs such as the painkiller Vioxx.

Officials said the steps will restore the trust and confidence of Congress and the public. They also pledged a renewed commitment to good science as the best way to counter critics who say the agency is too cozy with drug companies.

"We will fight back against those perceptions and that cynicism," said Steven Galson, head of the agency's Center for Drug Evaluation and Research, the division that evaluates new drugs and that has been at the center of the maelstrom.

A member of the Institute of Medicine panel said the FDA had taken steps in the right direction but had fallen short.

"In a number of cases, the FDA does not go as far as the IOM recommendations, but they are first steps and in the right direction," said R. Alta Charo, a professor of law and bioethics at the University of Wisconsin.

A central contention of the IOM report was that the agency did not focus enough on monitoring drugs once they were approved. Most approvals are based on clinical trials involving a few hundred or a few thousand patients, and many uncommon side effects do not emerge until a drug is being used by millions.

The IOM report said FDA officials who monitor drug safety were being ignored, because top officials were focused on approving new medications rather than monitoring those already on the market.

"There was an asymmetry in esteem and funding between these two groups," Charo said. While the changes the FDA announced yesterday to integrate drug safety experts in the process were a start, she said, the agency's drug safety specialists still lacked power.

DOJ_NMG_0125080

When FDA safety officials see a problem with a drug, Charo said, the agency is required to discuss proposed warnings, labeling changes or limits on distribution with the manufacturer. What FDA safety officials need, she said, is the power to impose fines and restrictions on companies that do not voluntarily follow the FDA's directives.

Agency officials said some of the changes proposed in the IOM report require congressional action, because they call for new powers. But officials also said they are starting a pilot program to produce report cards on some new drugs 12 to 18 months after their approval -- a process that would bring problems to light.

FDA Commissioner Andrew von Eschenbach and other senior officials said they were largely in agreement with the institute but called its report useful advice, not a blueprint. The agency is taking steps to break down internal walls and strengthen the role of safety specialists on advisory panels, they said.

Referring to the IOM's concern about a "lack of respect" between agency staff who approve new drugs and those who monitor drug safety, Galson said, "We need to improve the way scientific disagreements are handled and resolved."

Besides the "cultural" issues within the agency, officials outlined a number of initiatives to better understand which patients may be susceptible to particular types of side effects, and which patients may be most likely to benefit from a particular drug. "This new science of safety will help us make products safer from the get-go," said Janet Woodcock, the FDA's deputy commissioner for operations.

The agency also said it is seeking alliances with the Department of Veterans Affairs, the Centers for Medicare & Medicaid Services and private insurers to gather better information about problems with using drugs and the challenges that physicians and patients encounter in the everyday use of medications.

Officials also promised greater transparency in how they select experts to serve on influential panels that assess new drugs and devices, as well as policy issues facing the agency. Some of these panel members have come under criticism for having ties to the drug industry.

While greater transparency is a good thing, Charo said, the FDA also ought to limit the overall number of panel members who have conflicts of interest.

FDA Plans Drug-Safety Moves (WSJ)

By Anna Wilde Mathews

The Wall Street Journal, January 31, 2007

The Food and Drug Administration said it plans to address concerns over how it handles drug safety, including issuing a regular online newsletter summarizing findings about drugs already on the market.

The new initiatives, which also include a pilot program that will review the safety of two or three new drugs after 18 months on the market and issue a "report card" on their performance, are part of the agency's response to an analysis it commissioned from the Institute of Medicine, an independent research organization. That report criticized the FDA's handling of drug safety, citing serious structural and cultural issues. It called for broad changes that would go beyond the steps announced yesterday. The biggest of these recommendations would require congressional intervention.

The initiatives announced yesterday aren't likely to usher in any major, short-term shifts in FDA policy. At any rate, they could soon be overtaken by action on Capitol Hill. Sens. Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts and Michael Enzi of Wyoming, the Democratic chairman and ranking Republican on the Senate Health Committee, respectively, are expected to soon introduce a new version of a drug-safety bill that they had proposed last year. That bill, which aims to boost FDA authority and oversight of drugs after they go on the market, among other changes, has a far better shot at passing this year partly because of the Democratic takeover in Congress.

"Only legislation can give FDA the tools it needs to ensure that the agency is the gold standard for safety," Mr. Kennedy said in a statement. Mr. Enzi said he will work "closely with the FDA to enact critical drug-safety reform."

Consumers Union, a consumer group, said in a statement that the new FDA initiative includes "minor improvements" but "falls dramatically short of the changes needed to overhaul the nation's drug safety system."

In its response to the Institute of Medicine report, the agency said it needs more funding but "believes it has the statutory and regulatory authority needed to carry out its commitment to ensure drug safety." The agency said it was moving to change its procedures and testing how to more fully involve staff who focus on the safety of drugs after they are approved. "We agree we need to improve the culture of safety at FDA," the agency said.

FDA Commissioner Andrew von Eschenbach said there will be "other steps as we continue a process of improvement that will be ongoing." Yesterday's announcement was the latest of several drug-safety initiatives announced by the FDA in response to criticism stemming from the 2004 withdrawal of the painkiller Vioxx and other incidents.

Under the initiatives announced yesterday, the agency will launch an online newsletter that will include the results of safety reviews after they are completed. But in a move likely to please the drug industry, it "will not include confidential commercial" data or information that could be part of a regulatory decision, the FDA said. The new pilot program "report card" will report on the performance of two or three drugs on the market, including their reported side effects, how the drugs are used and summaries of new studies on the drugs.

DOJ_NMG_0125081

The FDA previously proposed a new user-fee deal with the drug industry that would provide new money to pay for safety monitoring, as well as create a new fee to boost the staff that reviews consumer drug television ads.

---- Jennifer Corbett Dooren contributed to this article.

Write to Anna Wilde Mathews at anna.mathews@wsj.com1

Hastert Recovering From Surgery (CHIT)

By James Kimberly

Chicago Tribune, January 31, 2007

Former U.S. House Speaker Dennis Hastert was in a Chicago hospital today recovering from surgery to remove his gall bladder, his office announced.

Spokesman Brad Hahn said the Friday surgery was scheduled because Hastert (R-Yorkville) suffered from gallstones. Hahn did not know when Hastert would be released from the Rush University Medical Center.

"That's a medical decision," Hahn said. "He's looking forward to being released. He's getting restless."

Hahn said the congressman is expected to make a full recovery.

More than 500,000 Americans have surgery every year to remove their gallbladders, typically because the organ is inflamed or to treat painful gallstones.

The pear-shaped organ stores digestive fluid, or bile, produced by the liver. People can function well without a gallbladder; when it is removed, bile from the liver goes directly into the intestine.

Last July, Hastert spent several days in a suburban Maryland hospital after being treated for a skin infection. He also was hospitalized in early 2005 for removal of a kidney stone.

Hastert, 65, has served 20 years in Congress. He was speaker of the U.S. House of Representatives from 1999 until this month.

The Associated Press contributed to this report.

Senate Defies Cheney (RC)

By Ben Pershing

Roll Call, January 31, 2007

HOH thinks Congress has been getting a bad rap.

For years, a few squishy, possibly French, critics have claimed that the legislative branch has not done enough to stand up to the bullying Bush administration.

Need evidence to the contrary? Look no further than Tuesday's Senate Republican luncheon, where a brave group of Senators bucked the wishes of Mr. Executive Branch Power himself, Vice President Cheney.

As his groupies know, Tuesday was Cheney's 66th birthday. So when the Senate President showed up at the GOP luncheon, the assembled lawmakers thought they'd mark the occasion with a little party.

First, Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison (R-Texas) brought in a cake. Then the group, led by Senate Minority Whip Trent Lott (R-Miss.), was set to launch into a rousing chorus of "Happy Birthday."

Now, HOH usually associates Cheney with revelry and general merriment, but surprisingly, Cheney asked Lott and the others not to sing. Did they cower before his wishes? No!

"We did sing 'Happy Birthday.' He insisted that we not, which guaranteed that I insisted we should," Lott said afterward, adding: "I pointed out that he's older than I am."

Lott was then thrown into a military detention camp.

Ha! Kidding! In all seriousness, Cheney took the whole thing good-naturedly, and the chorus of Republicans reportedly sounded pretty harmonious.

"We were more in tune than we usually are on the issues," joked Sen. Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.).

Are Hurricane Jokes Now OK? After the drubbing they took at the hands of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee in November, you would think Republicans wouldn't be feeling so charitable toward former DCCC Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.).

But Rep. Heather Wilson (R-N.M.) — one of the few GOP incumbents who held onto her seat despite an onslaught from the DCCC — wanted to show that there are no hard feelings toward Emanuel, who now serves as Democratic Caucus chairman.

DOJ_NMG_0125082

It seems that after Election Day, Emanuel went over to Wilson on the House floor to congratulate her on her victory. Wilson told Emanuel that she had shirts made for her campaign staff that said, "I Survived Hurricane Emanuel November 7, 2006."

Emanuel said he'd like to get one of those shirts, so on Tuesday, he trucked over to Wilson's office in the Cannon House Office Building and picked one up.

While he was there, aides said, Emanuel apologized to Wilson's staff for making their lives miserable, prompting some laughter.

He then said: "I'm really looking forward to wearing this at the House gym tomorrow morning."

HOH can feel the love all around him.

How About Flood Jokes? In the aftermath of last week's well-chronicled House Republican retreat to Maryland's Eastern Shore, one little mystery remained unsolved — Which Member was it who asked President Bush a question about flood control?

After Bush addressed the assembled lawmakers Friday morning, reporters were hustled out of the room so Members could ask Bush the real, tough questions about Iraq and the future of our great nation.

Afterwards, word trickled out that some unnamed Member had taken the opportunity to ask about something decidedly local. As WashingtonPost.com blogger (and Roll Call alum) Paul Kane wrote Friday, "the flood-control lawmaker is, for now at least, a mystery."

No, it wasn't Rep. Virginia Foxx (N.C.) in the drawing room with a candlestick. It was ... Rep. Mike Ferguson (N.J.). And he's pretty proud of it.

Specifically, Ferguson asked Bush about the Green Brook Flood Control Project, which has been a priority in New Jersey's 7th district since Hurricane Floyd devastated the area in 1999.

"It's a really big deal in our district," Ferguson told HOH. "I urged him to include it in his budget."

Did Bush even know what Ferguson was talking about? "I'm certain the president remembers this project because I never miss a chance to advocate for it," Ferguson said.

The White House's budget request comes down Feb. 5. Keep an eye out.

Oh Boy, Famous People. If you enjoy seeing celebrities, particularly of the TV-star kind, you'll want to head over to B. Smith's at Union Station tonight for the Creative Coalition's event to welcome the 110th Congress.

Since this is Washington, the gathering will of course be hosted by two lobbyists, Morris Reid of Westin Rinehart and Ed Rogers of Barbour Griffith & Rogers.

Attendees will have the opportunity to mingle with a bunch of celebrities, including Heather Graham, Allan Cumming, Tim Daly, Fran Drescher, Morgan Fairchild, Wendie Malick, Joe Pantoliano, Rachel Shelley, Giancarlo Esposito, Anson Mount, Tim Blake Nelson and Tamara Tunie.

Oh yeah, more than 100 Members of Congress are also expected to attend. But you probably see them all the time.

Anyway, back to the celebrities. On Thursday night, Graham, Shelley, Cumming and the lovely Bridget Moynahan will be over at the House of Sweden on K Street for the premiere of the film "Gray Matters." Like Wednesday's event, the premiere and the subsequent reception will be hosted by the Creative Coalition and Capitol File.

Attendees should leave their flasks at home; Absolut is helping to put on the reception.

Liberalism's Energetic Architect (WP)

By Harold Meyerson

The Washington Post, January 31, 2007

Last Friday and Saturday, the eight Democrats who have in varying degrees announced their intention to run for president came before the executive board of the most powerful and strategic organization in American liberalism -- the Service Employees International Union (SEIU). No sooner had this first of countless candidate cattle calls been completed than the SEIU's president, Andy Stern, flew off to Iowa for several days, followed by a couple of more days in New Hampshire.

No, Stern insists, he's not running for president. Rather, he's setting in motion an SEIU program called "Walk a Day in My Shoes," in which the union will encourage (or hector) the candidates to spend a day with a working-class family in one of the first four states (Iowa, Nevada, New Hampshire, South Carolina) to hold primary and caucus elections in 2008.

Besides, Stern is already doing as much as if not more than the presidential hopefuls to shape the Democrats' agenda. This week, as Stern publicizes "Walk a Day" by building cabinets in Iowa and driving a snowplow in New Hampshire (at some danger, he notes, to his co-workers and himself), a new group called Americans Against Escalation is commencing an ambitious lobbying campaign to persuade members of Congress who have voiced their dismay at President Bush's Iraq surge to actually vote against it. The organizations consists of MoveOn.org, the Campaign for America's Future and other progressive groups, among which the SEIU is providing the lion's share of the funding.

DOJ_NMG_0125083

Two weeks ago, another new liberal group was officially unveiled. For years Stern has been talking about putting together an organization that would monitor the votes of Democratic members of Congress on economic issues and mount primary challenges against conservative Democrats who represent liberal districts. He suggested calling the group They Work for Us, and this month, a new group with that name -- and whose board members include representatives not just of the SEIU but also the Steelworkers, MoveOn.org, the American Association for Justice (trial lawyers) and the much-read progressive blog DailyKos -- announced its formation, with heavy backing, again, from the SEIU. Stern's longtime friend Steve Rosenthal, the onetime political director of the AFL-CIO and an acknowledged master of voter mobilization campaigns, is the group's executive director. And just to pique Democrats' interest, They Work for Us listed three Democratic members of Congress (California's Ellen Tauscher, Maryland's Al Wynn and Texas's Henry Cuellar) as examples of Democrats whom the group would be monitoring.

"I'm sure it's not what the Democratic Party is hoping for," Stern says, "but we need to give our members options when the people they elected don't live up to what they said they were going to do." Over the past two weeks, Stern has also announced the formation of the group Divided We Fail, which joins the SEIU with the Business Roundtable and AARP in support of a universal health-care program that decouples health insurance from employment. The SEIU is also deeply involved in the discussions over immigration reform and is active in retooling Rock the Vote, the preeminent young voter mobilization program.

There's a clear model for the part that the SEIU and Stern are playing in American liberal politics. Just as the SEIU is the largest and most dynamic union in today's service-dominated economy, so the United Auto Workers was the largest and most dynamic union in the industrial economy of the mid-20th century. Under the leadership of its legendary president, Walter Reuther, the UAW funded the 1963 civil rights march on Washington and provided crucial assistance to Cesar Chavez's United Farm Workers, the student movement of the early '60s, and the fledgling efforts of the National Organization for Women and the first Earth Day. The UAW was the anchor tenant in the house of postwar American liberalism, and the SEIU is embracing an analogous role today.

Even Stern's failures have a Reutherian air to them. In 1968, upset with what he saw as the rightward drift of the AFL-CIO under the leadership of George Meany, Reuther pulled the UAW out of the federation to form its own mini-federation, the Alliance for Labor Action, with the Teamsters. But the Alliance for Labor Action, alas, never really did anything. In 2005, upset with what he saw as the generalized drift of the AFL-CIO under the leadership of John Sweeney, Stern pulled the SEIU out of the federation and established the Change to Win Federation with several other large unions. A year and a half since the formation of Change to Win, however, it can't really be said to have done anything, either. Still, Stern's larger lesson from Reuther is a sound one: A powerful progressive union can ultimately thrive only in a progressive nation. And nobody's in a better position to build one.

meyersonh@washpost.com

Homeland Security Employees Feeling The Blues (Column) (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, January 31, 2007

The employees have spoken.

What they have said about job satisfaction has gratified four relatively small federal agencies and sent a jolt through the Department of Homeland Security, which scored last or almost last in job satisfaction, leadership and workplace performance.

The ratings came from the 2006 Federal Human Capital Survey, announced by the Office of Personnel Management yesterday. About 221,500 federal employees responded to the survey and provided a sense of what they think of their agencies as places to work.

The results were surely frustrating for Homeland Security, which has struggled to pull together 22 agencies in one of the government's largest reorganizations, endured endless criticism for its handling of Hurricane Katrina and suffered through high turnover in its leadership ranks.

Nearly 10,400 Homeland Security employees participated in the survey and gave the department essentially rock-bottom scores in key job satisfaction, leadership and management areas when stacked up against 35 other agencies in the survey.

"Obviously, we are somewhat disappointed," Paul A. Schneider, the department's undersecretary for management, said in an interview. He said the department's secretary, Michael Chertoff, and its deputy secretary, Michael P. Jackson, take the survey results seriously and are focused "on turning this thing around."

Chertoff has asked an outside group of advisers to suggest a strategy for creating a stronger common culture at the department, Schneider said. He said he would join Chertoff and Jackson in analyzing the survey results to understand problem areas.

DOJ_NMG_0125084

Those areas appear to include communicating with and getting feedback from employees and how the department rewards employees for their accomplishments, Schneider said. He called the survey results "a wake-up call for the leadership that we have to pay attention to these basic communication skills."

On the bright side, Schneider said he was encouraged that Homeland Security employees say they like their jobs, think their work is important and find their co-workers to be cooperative and supportive. Those responses, he said, are "a strong foundation for building on."

To a large extent, the 2006 responses by Homeland Security employees closely track what employees said in 2004, an indication that the department may face a significant morale problem in some of its bureaus. Schneider said the response rates varied dramatically among bureaus and that "we have a lot of work to do to understand where we have these problems."

Linda M. Springer, director of OPM, released the results at a briefing at the National Press Club. She highlighted several agencies that scored well in four indexes created by OPM but said she would not comment on any other agencies.

Springer said the survey results are intended to help employees know where they stand on personnel issues and give managers some insights into workforce problems that need quick attention.

The Office of Management and Budget, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, the National Aeronautics and Space Administration and the National Science Foundation finished in the top 10 for job satisfaction, leadership and knowledge management, results-oriented performance culture and talent management, Springer said.

Other agencies that won high marks from their employees included the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, the Federal Trade Commission, General Services Administration, National Credit Union Administration, Securities and Exchange Commission, Social Security Administration, Agency for International Development and the departments of State and Commerce.Congress Votes on Raise

The fiscal 2007 funding resolution, scheduled for a House vote today, would maintain President Bush's plan to provide an average 2.2 percent pay raise to the federal workforce this year.

The resolution would allocate $900 million to help agencies pay for half the cost of the pay raise, with agencies expected to absorb the remaining cost through reductions in overhead and other accounts, House Democratic aides said. The allocation for the pay raise breaks with the usual practice, which is to not provide any funding for civil service raises.

Aides said the resolution also provides enough money to prevent layoffs at agencies, including the Justice Department, Social Security Administration, the Federal Aviation Administration and the Food and Drug Administration.

Reid's Whitewater (NYS)

New York Sun, January 31, 2007

Voters looking for clues as to how — or, more to the point, whether — the Democrats are going to redeem their issue of honesty and integrity on Capitol Hill will be keeping an eye on the growing scandal around the majority leader in the Senate, Harry Reid. He is caught up in a corker of a controversy over a questionable land deal.

One might think that after all the legal fees and energy the Clintons spent defending Whitewater, a top Democratic politician would know better than to get into a complicated, questionable land deal. But the message doesn't seem to have reached Mr. Reid, who is the subject of a fascinating dispatch in Sunday's Los Angeles Times.

The Times' dispatch, from Bullhead City, Ariz., begins, "It's hard to buy undeveloped land in booming northern Arizona for $166 an acre. But now- Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid effectively did just that when a longtime friend decided to sell property owned by the employee pension fund that he controlled. In 2002, Reid (D-Nev.) paid $10,000 to a pension fund controlled by Clair Haycock, a Las Vegas lubricants distributor and his friend for 50 years. The payment gave the senator full control of a 160-acre parcel in Bullhead City that Reid and the pension fund had jointly owned.

" Reid's price for the equivalent of 60 acres of undeveloped desert was less than one-tenth of the value the assessor placed on it at the time. Six months after the deal closed, Reid introduced legislation to address the plight of lubricants dealers." And that's not all. The newspaper reports that "since taking full control of the parcel in 2002, Reid has pushed for federal funding for a new bridge over the Colorado River a few miles from his property."

When the Associated Press reported some of these transactions earlier, the senator's response was to launch an attack on the wire service. It'll be interesting to see how Mr. Reid responds to the Los Angeles Times. For our part, we understand why Mr. Reid would feel the need to speculate in real estate development. When in Washington, the senator, who is supposed to represent the party of the common man, lives in the Ritz-Carlton, where he initially tried to pay $3,000 in Christmas bonuses to employees out of his campaign funds.

It's hard to afford the Ritz on a senator's salary. Since Mr. Reid, unlike Senators Rockefeller or Kerry, doesn't have an oil or ketchup fortune at his disposal, real estate seems a reasonable area on which to fall back. From the perspective of hard-pressed taxpayers, though, it'd be a better deal simply to raise the senator's salary directly than to have to subsidize him indirectly through regulating the lubricant market or building bridges to nowhere.

DOJ_NMG_0125085

Particularly in this climate. It was the Democrats, after all, who decided to try to make congressional ethics into a national issue. We didn't — and don't — have an objection to that; on the contrary, we're all for a hard line in respect of honest government. But it's been hard to take at face value the idealism the Democrats claim for themselves. And it's going to be harder to credit the Democrats' motives with every day that the scandal over Mr. Reid goes unresolved.

OTHER NEWS:

Tax-cut Efforts Target Firms (USAT)

By Dennis Cauchon

USA Today, January 31, 2007

At least a dozen states are considering using multibillion-dollar budget surpluses to cut business taxes to become more competitive.

In a departure from earlier times of budget surpluses, few states plan significant reductions in personal income taxes, a trend that has frustrated tax-cut advocates.

"Lowering taxes for the sake of lowering taxes isn't what this is all about," says Nebraska Gov. Dave Heineman, a Republican whose state cut business taxes last year. "We're trying to create a more favorable tax climate to compete in the global economy."

Forty-six states report revenue exceeding projections, according to the National Association of State Budget Officers. State budget surpluses and reserve funds are at their highest level since 2000.

"It's a remarkable trend that states are focusing on business tax reductions," says Chris Atkins of the Tax Foundation, a research group in Washington. "Business tax cuts used to be taboo."

Kansas Senate Majority Leader Derek Schmidt says legislators are wary of across-the-board tax cuts because they contributed to budget shortfalls in 2002 and 2003. "We had big tax cuts in 1998," he says. "Four years later, we were in the tank. Everyone remembers that."

Tax-cut advocates complain that governors and legislators are too timid. "We've got a $2.2 billion surplus, and our relief package is a paltry $281 million. Thanks a lot," says David Strom, president of the Taxpayers League of Minnesota.

Demand for more spending is limiting individual income tax cuts, too. "Many new governors ran on improved health care and improved education, and they want to fulfill those promises," says Nick Johnson, a state budget expert at the liberal Center on Budget and Policy Priorities in Washington.

State tax collections rose 8.5% in the first nine months of 2006 from the same period a year earlier, the Census Bureau reports.

Georgia, Kentucky, Missouri, Texas and West Virginia are among states considering business tax cuts. Hawaii, Nebraska and South Carolina are among the few studying personal income tax cuts.

Deal Struck On Claims Of Nazi Era (NYT)

By Joseph B. Treaster

The New York Times, January 31, 2007

After nearly 10 years of struggling to have a big Italian insurance company pay claims on life insurance policies sold to victims of the Holocaust, lawyers who say they represent most of the victims are giving up the fight.

They say they have struck a deal with the insurer, Assicurazioni Generali, that will give Holocaust victims and their relatives far less money than they had originally hoped. But the lawyers say that their chances of winning a lawsuit seemed increasingly unlikely and that many of their clients are old and, in some cases, in poor health.

“It’s a compromise,” said Robert A. Swift, a lawyer in Philadelphia who began working on insurance cases from the Holocaust in 1997. “In a perfect world with more leverage, maybe I could have negotiated a better formula. But I’m playing the hand I was dealt.”

Judge George B. Daniels of Federal District Court in Manhattan has called a hearing for this morning to determine whether the settlement is fair to all parties.

If he approves the agreement, it will close a painful chapter in the insurance company’s history. It could also provide perhaps several million dollars more to victims of the Holocaust and their heirs.

DOJ_NMG_0125086

Judge Daniels will also hear arguments from lawyers who are refusing to participate in the settlement, contending that the deal will prevent tens of thousands of other Holocaust victims and their heirs from ever being compensated — just as new evidence on the Holocaust is being uncovered in Europe.

Last May, officials of a multinational group said they were taking steps to open half a dozen warehouses in Bad Arolsen, Germany, that have been sealed for 60 years and are filled with documents compiled by the Nazis and by American and Allied forces.

Samuel J. Dubbin, a lawyer in Miami opposing the agreement, said the settlement should be postponed until the German material is examined. But lawyers who worked out the deal — both for the survivors and Generali — want it to go ahead.

"The possibility of finding something in those records, at this point, is remote," said Lawrence Kill, one of the lawyers who negotiated the settlement with Generali.

In the settlement, Generali does not acknowledge assertions by survivors that it, like many other European insurers, routinely refused to pay death benefits for Jews who died in concentration camps and sometimes demanded copies of policies and death certificates from families that had lost everything. Generali says it was never the company's policy to deny valid claims and, in the settlement papers, it denies any wrongdoing.

The settlement includes Generali's reasons for resisting payment. It says, for example, that its offices in much of Europe were seized by Communist governments after World War II and that those governments — rather than the insurance company — should be held responsible for paying Holocaust claims.

Generali also argues that its insurance policies became all but worthless as a result of steep devaluations in European currencies after the war, that United States courts do not have jurisdiction over the Holocaust dispute and that the statute of limitations has long been expired for Holocaust victims.

European insurers over the years declined to publish the names of policyholders, a step that would have helped survivors determine if relatives had bought life insurance and whether they might have reason to make a claim. Generali permitted the publication of many names, its representatives said. But, advocates for the survivors counter, the lists were far from complete.

In the settlement, there is no provision that Generali publish the names of all its Holocaust-era policyholders.

"Where is the historical justice?" asked Thane Rosenbaum, a son of Holocaust survivors and a professor at the Fordham University School of Law. "Tens of thousands of Holocaust survivors are being shut out of the process. This is an abuse of the class-action process."

Christopher J. Carnicelli, a Generali executive in London, said in an e-mail message that the company was proud of the settlement and that only a handful of people opposed it. "The objections of a very small number of individuals with a track record of finding fault with any Holocaust-related settlement cannot obscure this settlement's important benefits," he wrote.

Lawyers first began investigating Holocaust insurance claims in the late 1990s and filed lawsuits against more than 20 European insurers. All the lawsuits except those against Generali were eventually dropped or, in the case of German insurance companies, resolved through a settlement negotiated between the United States and Germany.

Mr. Swift, the lawyer in Philadelphia, and lawyers at three other law firms began drafting the agreement after two courtroom defeats. In 2003, the Supreme Court ruled that a California law pertaining to Holocaust survivors interfered with the ability of the president of the United States to resolve international disputes.

A year later, Judge Michael B. Mukasey, in Federal District Court in Manhattan, cited the Supreme Court decision as the basis for dismissing the class-action claims by Mr. Swift and his colleagues, along with several separate lawsuits.

Mr. Swift and his colleagues and the lawyers pursuing separate cases appealed Judge Mukasey's decision. The appeal is expected to be argued in a few months. But Mr. Swift said he and the other class-action lawyers decided over the summer that the odds were against them and that they could do better by settling.

Sidney Zabludoff, a Holocaust insurance expert, estimated that 850,000 Jews were insured by European carriers at the time of the Holocaust. He put the value of those policies at $18 billion in today's dollars.

Mr. Zabludoff estimated that Generali had coverage on about 110,000 Jews and that the policies could be worth $4.5 billion in today's dollars.

In court papers, Generali says it has paid $135 million on about 5,200 claims. Marco E. Schnabl, a lawyer for Generali in New York, said the insurance company also paid $40 million through various international funds related to the Holocaust.

Generali agreed to pay about $35 million of the $135 million on about 700 claims as a result of the settlement, Mr. Schnabl said, and it has been accepting new claims over the last few months. Generali had received nearly 1,000 claims by Monday, Mr. Schnabl said, and plans to accept additional claims until the end of March, under the settlement.

On claims with no evidence of a policy, nothing will be paid. But survivors or relatives with at least some proof are expected to receive at least $1,000.

DOJ_NMG_0125087

Generali has paid more to Holocaust victims than any other insurance company and provided more than a third of the $288 million that a Holocaust insurance commission in Washington has said was offered on more than 46,000 claims.

The average payment offered on a claim — many involving more than one policy — has been about $6,200. But Generali says it has paid some claims for hundreds of thousands of dollars and more.

William M. Shernoff, a lawyer in California who represents several Holocaust survivors, said he and his clients did not want any part of the settlement.

"We have policies that we think are worth, instead of a few thousand dollars, would be worth hundreds of thousands of dollars," Mr. Shernoff said. "And punitive damages could be substantial. A jury could be so outraged that it could come in with a blockbuster award."

A Changing Battle On AIDS Is Reflected In A Quilt (NYT)

By Jesse Mckinley

The New York Times, January 31, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO, Jan. 30 — It has been 20 years since Cleve Jones started the AIDS Memorial Quilt here, painting the name of a friend who had died from the disease on a simple piece of fabric.

During the next two decades the quilt became the largest piece of community folk art in the world, a 54-ton collage affixed with the names of 91,000 victims of AIDS, a tapestry of grief that was one of the earliest and most effective tools in raising awareness of the disease.

Now Mr. Jones is locked in a legal tug of war with the quilt's caretaker, the Names Project Foundation, over custody of 35 of its 6,000 panels. The dispute is not just about the relatively small swatch of the quilt, or even the simmering personality clash between Mr. Jones, a founder of the group, and his successors. More broadly, the battle reflects the changing symbolism and purpose of one of the most recognizable symbols of the AIDS crisis as the crisis itself has changed.

The confrontation has touched on issues percolating through the AIDS community, including the new racial, social and international demographics of the disease; changes in philanthropic trends; and the question of whether memorials are appropriate at a time when other major problems, including a rebound in unsafe sex and the emergence of new drug-resistant strains, persist.

"The quilt was very effective in the late '80s and early '90s for AIDS awareness," said Michael Petrelis, a writer in San Francisco who has been active in the AIDS movement. "On the other hand, there's hundreds and thousands of people that need a housing subsidy, just trying to keep a roof over their head. Should we be putting our time and money into another vigil? I don't know."

The legal dispute dates to 2004, when Mr. Jones filed a wrongful termination suit against the Names Project Foundation, which is based in Atlanta and was established to care for the quilt, after being fired from a job as a fund-raiser and public speaker. The termination claims were dismissed, but a 2005 settlement granted Mr. Jones custody of the 35 billboard-size panels for his emotional distress. The panels are generally made up of eight individual quilts affixed with names of people who died.

The settlement called for Mr. Jones to establish a nonprofit organization to care for the quilt while it was in his possession. But in December, Mr. Jones informed the foundation that he would use an umbrella group instead of a newly formed nonprofit to sponsor the quilt, a plan the foundation said was unacceptable under the terms of the agreement.

A lawyer for the foundation, Charles Thompson, said the matter seemed closed. "Mr. Jones didn't comply with the agreement, and our obligations are over," Mr. Thompson said.

That assessment has angered some San Francisco city officials as well as Mr. Jones, who said he had planned to return his piece of the quilt "to the front line of activism" in the city, a hot zone in the AIDS crisis where the disease, according to the city's health department, is still a leading cause of death for men ages 15 to 54. Mr. Jones emphasized that he had no financial gain from the settlement, only a desire for more forceful advocacy.

"They've taken it upon themselves to decommission one of the most powerful weapons we have," said Mr. Jones, who now spends his time in Palm Springs and San Francisco and works for Unite Here, a union representing hotel workers, among others. "It's not intended as a passive memorial."

The foundation's executive director, Julie Rhoad, said more than half of the 6,000 panels had been displayed in each of the last three years, including dozens of times in San Francisco. That said, the quilt, which if unfurled would cover six city blocks, needs constant upkeep, and the foundation has rules about lending it out and caring for it, Ms. Rhoad said.

"Not only do we need to look at our daily work of sending the quilt on the road and making sure we have it as active as possible," Ms. Rhoad said, "but we also have to plan for long-term stewardship."

DOJ_NMG_0125088

She said the focus in Atlanta has included more efforts in black and Latino communities, which were not "at the epicenter of the disease when we were founded." Like many AIDS groups, the foundation has been trying keep people's interest in combating the disease even as it has become a less imminent threat to financially stable gay white men, who long drove fund-raising and awareness efforts.

Kandy Ferree, the president and chief executive of the National AIDS Fund, which channels private and corporate money to AIDS groups, said fund-raising for some groups in the United States had lost a sense of urgency as the disease had begun to devastate other, often poorer parts of the world.

"We did not do a good job as domestic AIDS organizations in keeping the changing face of AIDS on the domestic radar screen," Ms. Ferree said.

Ms. Ferree added that while she supported the quilt, she believed its place in the AIDS community had diminished in part because it was so large that it was rarely seen in its entirety. The whole quilt was last displayed in 1996 on the Mall in Washington, when it was visited by more than one million people, an event Ms. Rhoad called "transformative."

But it was also expensive, leaving the group deeply in the red, foundation officials say. That debt also coincided with the emergence of new drugs, which gave many long-suffering patients a new lease on life and caused a serious dip in philanthropic giving to AIDS groups.

By 1999, the foundation had laid off dozens of staff members and substantially curtailed its operations. In 2001, the foundation relocated to Atlanta from San Francisco, in part for financial reasons as well as to bring the quilt closer to minority groups and civil rights leaders. Mr. Jones, who has AIDS, said he spoke publicly in favor of the move, though it was met with outcry from some San Franciscans who thought the quilt should have stayed in the city.

But Mr. Jones said he personally regretted the relocation. "San Francisco is the birthplace of the quilt," he said. "It's part of our history. Are you going to move the cable cars to Spokane?"

In 2003, Mr. Jones was dismissed by the foundation. He said he lost his job after he sought to display the entire quilt in Washington during the 2004 presidential election. Foundation officials said such a display would have seriously taxed the group's financial and administrative resources but denied that the proposal had cost Mr. Jones his job. Court papers state that in 2003 Mr. Jones demanded that the board turn over the organization to him and oust its then-president, behavior the board found "unacceptably disruptive."

Foundation officials also said the legal proceedings with Mr. Jones had drained the group's resources and thwarted plans to establish a permanent satellite display in San Francisco, something Mr. Jones calls "nonsense." The foundation had a $1 million budget in 2006, down slightly from the year before.

"The quilt has always had a footprint in San Francisco," Ms. Rhoad said. "But certainly you can understand that the institution has to have the financial underpinnings itself to have a satellite venue." But she added that a San Francisco quilt display was still on her foundation's "to-do list."

City leaders here hope so. Earlier this month, the San Francisco Board of Supervisors adopted a resolution saying it would be an "unconscionable and unthinkable offense against the citizenry of San Francisco" if Mr. Jones's panels were not returned. Some people active with AIDS groups have suggested the quilt be enshrined here in a new museum devoted to the AIDS crisis.

Still, there is a sense among some people that the quilt, like the once-ubiquitous red ribbon on the lapel, may have seen its cultural moment pass. Robert McMullin, the executive director of the Stop AIDS Project, a prevention group in San Francisco, said the quilt, like any symbol, might have "lost its punch" over time.

"The quilt is about loss," Mr. McMullin said. "And while people are still dying, for most of us, the most important part of our message may not be about people dying."

McCain Taps House Team (RC)

By Lauren W. Whittington

Roll Call, January 31, 2007

Sen. John McCain (R) will unveil the members of his House whip team today, as the Arizonan seeks to jump-start his effort to build support for his 2008 presidential bid in a chamber where he has never been terribly popular with his fellow Republicans.

GOP Reps. Spencer Bachus (Ala.), Mark Kirk (Ill.), Dan Lungren (Calif.), John Shimkus (Ill.), John Shadegg (Ariz.) and Fred Upton (Mich.) will serve as McCain's emissaries in the House, with additions to the team expected to be announced later.

"We are incredibly fortunate to have the support of such distinguished officials," said McCain campaign spokesman Danny Diaz. "These Congressmen will play a lead role in growing the base of support Sen. McCain already enjoys in the U.S. House."

The announcement of McCain's six-man whip team comes as former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, one of his top rivals for the GOP nod in 2008, has been aggressively courting support from House Members.

DOJ_NMG_0125089

Romney is scheduled to address the Republican Study Committee's retreat in Baltimore on Friday. McCain will not attend the retreat for House conservatives, although his campaign said that former Sen. Phil Gramm (R-Texas) will be speaking on his behalf.

McCain has long had a prickly relationship with Republican House Members over the course of his two decades in the Senate.

At times he has riled conservatives with his willingness to buck the Republican establishment, and his efforts to limit pork barrel spending also have drawn the ire of appropriators and other Members seeking to fund pet projects back home.

Bachus, who is the ranking member on the Financial Services panel and also an RSC member, conceded that McCain has ruffled feathers over the years. But he believes McCain has "offended for all the right reasons" and said the fact that the Senator doesn't seem to be out to win a popularity contest is what ultimately drew him to support his presidential bid.

"He's not afraid of anybody," Bachus said, adding that it is evident that McCain won't be managed. "I don't want somebody who can be manipulated and used."

He added: "I think that John McCain is a courageous person. And I think that the president of the United States in the next decade is going to have to be courageous."

Lungren conceded that he had differences with McCain on issues such as reforming the campaign finance system and immigration policy.

But he said that McCain's record of fiscal conservatism trumped their disagreements over other policies and that he chose to support him because "on the big issues he's right."

"On the [Iraq] War, he's not a guy who's sitting there with his finger in the wind," Lungren said, referring to McCain's support for the Bush administration's plan to increase the number of troops in Iraq.

And as for those who might mistake McCain's maverick reputation for an across-the-board moderate ideology, Lungren had this warning: "I think a lot of liberals are going to be pretty surprised."

From a political standpoint, Lungren said he believes McCain is the type of candidate who could make California competitive in the 2008 general election.

"I think he puts my state in play," Lungren said.

Republican candidates have all but written off the left-leaning state in recent presidential elections. The last time California was considered in play in a presidential election was 1988, when then-Vice President George H.W. Bush carried the state with 51 percent of the vote.

Both McCain and California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) share a penchant for government reform and at least two operatives from Schwarzenegger's 2006 re-election bid have migrated to McCain's presidential effort: Senior Adviser Steve Schmidt and Deputy Director of Strategy Sarah Simmons.

California-based media consultant Fred Davis, who worked on Schwarzenegger's re-election, signed on to work for McCain in 2008.

Lungren, a former California attorney general, served with McCain in the House in the 1980s.

"Honor is extremely important to him," Lungren said. "Both his own honor and the honor of the institution."

But as for whether McCain will be successful in convincing some of Lungren's more skeptical colleagues to jump on board, the Californian said "time will tell."

Kirk, a leader of House Republican moderates, said that McCain's experience, especially on issues of national defense and foreign policy, were among the chief reasons he decided to get on board.

Kirk has known McCain ever since the Illinois Congressman was a staffer in the House, where McCain served from 1982 to 1986. He also shares a connection with McCain because both men served in the Navy.

"I've built an alliance with him really based on his character more than anything else," Kirk said, calling McCain a reformer in the mold of former President Theodore Roosevelt.

When asked if he was concerned that McCain's maverick image could hurt him among conservatives in the GOP base, Kirk said that last cycle's elections were proof that voters were looking for less partisan bickering and more thoughtful legislating coming from Washington, D.C.

Meanwhile, Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.), a leading fiscal conservative, is not taking a formal role in McCain's outreach efforts to House Members, but he is supporting his fellow Arizonan and asking colleagues to look at McCain's record.

"He's not taking conservatives for granted," Flake said.

Romney, ABM And McCain (HILL)

The Hill, January 31, 2007

Mitt Romney hopes that the endorsement of the ABM Caucus will propel him to the White House.

DOJ_NMG_0125090

ABM, in this case, does not stand for "Anti-Ballistic Missiles," but rather "Anyone But McCain."

Recently, Romney has had a boomlet of endorsements from House Republicans, including former Speaker Dennis Hastert (Ill.), Jim McCrery (La.), Buck McKeon (Calif.), Tom Feeney (Fla.) and Marsha Blackburn (Tenn.). Former Rep. and now-Sen. Jim DeMint (S.C.) is also on board, and there have been rumors that Minority Leader John Boehner (Ohio) will jump on the Romney bandwagon. For this early in the campaign, it is a pretty good list, especially for a former governor with no Washington experience.

What these endorsements have in common is that they come from a substantial group of House Republicans who have long disliked John McCain. For many House Republicans, McCain was the antithesis of what they were fighting for. The House would move conservative legislation, only to see the Senate water it down, and McCain was seen as the "waterer-down in chief." His House critics disliked his working with Democrats. They remembered his championing of campaign finance against the majority of the House majority's wishes.

These House Republicans are looking for an alternative, and so far, Romney has been the candidate to capitalize on these lingering resentments.

Romney is looking for a niche in this strange Republican field, which is full of mavericks but has a hole in the traditional mainstream conservative Republican slot. There is room for another candidate to the right of McCain and to the left of Brownback. George Allen (R-Va.) would have filled that space had he not self-destructed in his Senate race.

I have argued in this column that recent events surrounding the war have not benefited McCain, but he is still the frontrunner in the Republican field. It will likely come down to McCain and someone else, and Romney is angling to be that other candidate.

Romney, of course, has his own definitional problems. Is he a liberal Massachusetts Republican or a conservative Utah Mormon Republican? To his benefit and detriment, he has been a little of both. In another Republican field, he might have run as McCain did in 2000 — as the maverick appealing to moderate Republicans and independents. But that turf is too crowded with McCain, Giuliani, Pataki, and perhaps Sen. Chuck Hagel (Neb.).

To get to the right of McCain, he has trumpeted his stand in Massachusetts against gay marriage and reversed his position on abortion.

The issue that many believe Romney will use as a wedge between himself and McCain is immigration. McCain is firmly committed to a comprehensive plan along the lines proposed by President Bush. Romney has flirted with striking a more anti-immigration stance, which would endear him to a good portion of the Republican base and to many House Republicans. But as Sam Youngman reported yesterday in The Hill, Romney remained silent on the issue at a recent conservative summit.

McCain has made many strides mending fences with religious conservatives and Bush supporters; he has hired many talented Bush campaign veterans. But the divide between McCain and many House Republicans is too great to bridge.

House endorsements by themselves are worth almost nothing. But Mitt Romney is hoping that they send a signal to the wider world of Republican primary voters, party activists, and conservative donors that he is the real Republican in the race.

Fortier is a research fellow at the American Enterprise Institute.

Romney Faces Questions About His Faith (AP)

By Jim Davenport

AP, January 31, 2007

Republican Mitt Romney on Tuesday dismissed questions about whether his Mormon faith would be an impediment to his White House aspirations, echoing the argument that voters will be choosing a president not a pastor.

The former Massachusetts governor faced questions about his faith in this Bible Belt state where a few Republicans expressed deep reservations about backing a Mormon. Romney said he was making inroads with the GOP in this early voting state.

"I've had a number of meetings with pastors of various faiths and religious leaders," Romney said in an interview with The Associated Press. "Almost to a person they've subscribed to what Dr. Richard Land (of the Southern Baptist Convention) said, which was: 'We're not electing Mitt Romney as pastor in chief.'"

Romney added: "In the early days of an acquaintance between a candidate and the electorate, the focus is on the personal, social issues and then it changes to be a focus on the major critical issues of the day."

That failed to sway Republican State Rep. Gloria Haskins.

"I don't think that I could see someone who is a member of a faith so contrary to my faith having my support," said Haskins, a graduate of Bob Jones University, the Christian fundamentalist college. Haskins is backing Sen. John McCain of Arizona.

In September, Charleston County GOP chairwoman Cyndi Mosteller questioned Romney after a speech, asking him to explain his faith.

DOJ_NMG_0125091

On Tuesday, Mosteller, who is a Baptist, said, "The question is: Does Governor Romney support Joseph Smith's doctrines? We as evangelicals don't believe we can go in and change Paul's doctrine. I don't see how you move around this."

Romney said he is making inroads with Christian conservatives.

"I've been very encouraged so far," he said. "People have been willing to endorse my efforts."

Romney attended a House Republican Caucus meeting that always begins with a Bible verse and prayer in Christ's name, led by Republican state Rep. Bob Leach.

Leach told caucus members he asked Romney who Jesus Christ was and Romney responded that Christ "was his personal savior."

Leach said that was good enough to earn his vote.

___

WASHINGTON (AP) — A few presidential hopefuls offered their views on global warming Tuesday at a Senate hearing that sounded more like an echo chamber.

"This is a problem who's time has come," said Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y.

"This is an issue over the years whose time has come," said Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz.

"Will we look back at today and say this was the moment we took a stand?" said Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill.

The candidates may have competing political goals, but there was general agreement on global warming at the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee hearing. The panel chairwoman, Sen. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., convened the session to survey lawmakers as Congress prepares to work on the issue.

Obama and McCain have introduced a bill with Sen. Joe Lieberman, I-Conn., that would impose mandatory caps on greenhouse emissions for power plants, industry and oil refineries. They would also let businesses buy emissions "credits" from other companies that have exceeded their reduction targets.

Clinton and Sen. Joe Biden, D-Del., another candidate who submitted written testimony, also are co-sponsors.

But not everyone is on board.

"My sense is a rush to climate change at this moment, all due respect to Senator Clinton, is something about an '08 election," complained Sen. Larry Craig, R-Idaho.

Romney's Veto Could Hurt Him With Jewish Voters (POL)

By Ryan Grim

The Politico, January 31, 2007

Mitt Romney has been aggressively courting the Jewish community as part of his run for the presidency.

The former Republican governor of Massachusetts returned last week from a five-day trip to Israel, accompanied by Matt Brooks, executive director of the Republican Jewish Coalition, and Mel Sembler, a member of its board of directors.

He's attracted a small team of heavy hitters from the Jewish community. He named Sembler, a former ambassador, as his finance committee's co-chairman. In October, he brought on Noam Neusner, formerly President Bush's liaison to the Jewish community. And the Boston Phoenix reported that Sam Fox, nominated to be the U.S. ambassador to Belgium, gave $100,000 to Romney's Iowa PAC in July.

Now that he's in full presidential campaign mode, Romney may be wishing he hadn't vetoed a budget provision in 2003 that would have reimbursed nursing homes in Massachusetts that provided kosher meals to Jewish residents on Medicaid. The measure promised to pay an extra $5 a day per kosher diner. The state legislature overrode Romney's veto.

Nathan Diament, director of public policy for the Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations, said that his organization was disappointed about the veto. "Access to kosher food is a critical aspect of Jewish observance," he said. "From our perspective, it's a religious liberty issue."

Charles Glick was the government affairs specialist in 2003 for the Boston-area Jewish Community Relations Council, which backed the measure. He said Romney's decision came as a shock.

"The Jewish community had what they thought was a good relationship with the governor," he said. "We knew of his ambitions and his outreach to the community in terms of raising money. So it was a bit of a puzzle."

Romney spokesman Eric Fehrnstrom told The Politico that the governor vetoed the legislation to cut spending.

"The state was in a fiscal crisis, and it would have led to higher Medicaid reimbursement rates for nursing homes, which was unaffordable at the time," he said. "Once we restored fiscal balance, we were in a position to add spending where appropriate."

The provision is now law, and Fehrnstrom said the veto has not become an issue on the campaign trail.

Yet given the intensity of the battle for Jewish donors, it may become one. "Governor Romney has been pushing his strong and unadulterated belief in a very strong state of Israel," said a national Jewish leader with close ties to the Republican Party.

DOJ_NMG_0125092

"Any sort of dents to his armor become problematic to him. There is hesitation in the community to begin with because of his Mormonism. …These sorts of chinks in his armor will help his opponents."

"It's definitely going to hurt Romney in the Jewish community," said Ira Forman, executive director of the National Jewish Democratic Council. "You'd think for someone who's of a minority religion he'd be a little more sensitive to these concerns."

Romney has defenders in the Jewish community. Brooks, the Republican Jewish Coalition leader, said the issue should have only a minimal impact. "In difficult financial times, there are difficult decisions the chief executives have to make. They can't fund every project and every particular effort that comes before them," he said. "I don't think anybody's going to view that as an attack or an offense to the Jewish community."

Gary Erlbaum, a Pennsylvania businessman who raises money for both Democrats and Republicans, said the only impact of the veto would be in the Orthodox Jewish community.

"If this were going to affect anyone, it would be someone who's morally Orthodox or cares about those who are. Don't forget that's a small minority of Jews in the United States," he said.

Even in that community, Diament said, the veto issue wouldn't decide the candidate's fate. "We know that Governor Romney has appreciation for religious freedom generally," he added, "and we look forward to continuing to talk to him and work with him."

The veto was reported by The Jewish Advocate in December 2003, but got little coverage elsewhere. Recently, a liberal-leaning blog called the Blue Mass. Group picked up the story and had some fun at Romney's expense, titling the post, "Romney: Let them eat pork!"

Join The Conversation

You need to be a registered user of Politico.com to "join the conversation". If you are not a member yet, what are you waiting for? Register Now!

by jeremy on 01.30.2007 at 10:52 PM

80% of Jews vote democratic.

Are any Jews, except for a few of the deluded who signed up with President George Cuckoo Bananas and his Christianist crusade, even paying any attention to this guy? What mainstream politician isn't generally pro-Israel? Add on top that, as The Economist recently reported, American Jews are increasingly detached from Israel as an important political issue, and it all adds up to a non-issue.

Before you start composing please note that you will need to be a registered user of Politico.com to "join the conversation". If you are not a member yet, what are you waiting for? Register Now!

One Uninsured Group Can Now Exhale (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, January 31, 2007

Former associate attorney general and convicted felon Webb Hubbell, now working for an insurance agency, has an important message for marijuana smokers: You don't have to quit to get life insurance.

"If you've been declined for life insurance or are paying above-market premiums or simply want to know" about life insurance for "responsible" marijuana smokers, then give him a call, he says on an "audio message" he made for the National Organization for the Reform of Marijuana Laws' Web site to explain its new life insurance program.

"Hello, this is Webb Hubbell," the recording begins, with appropriate mellow jazz in the background. "For years, responsible marijuana smokers have not been able to access affordable life insurance," explains the former Little Rock mayor and Arkansas chief justice.

Hubble, longtime close friend of Bill and Hillary Clinton, told us that "responsible" dopers means occasional users as opposed to constant smokers -- something like social drinkers vs. lushes.

So these social smokers "have been forced to lie on applications, forgo the health benefits [for people with AIDS, glaucoma, cancer, multiple sclerosis and epilepsy] of responsible marijuana use . . . or purchase . . . [policies] that did not require an application or a physical. If they were honest about their use of marijuana they were either flat-out declined or rated so high" -- well, how high were they? -- "that they could not afford" the premiums.

"No longer," Hubbell declares triumphantly. Two carriers have agreed to write policies for users, he said. But wait a minute! This stuff is illegal. Well, "technically it is still illegal even in the Netherlands, where you can buy it over the counter," said Allen St. Pierre, NORML's executive director. "Eleven states, with some 100 million people, have decriminalized marijuana," St. Pierre said, "and medical marijuana has been legal for 10 years in some states." We're talking a substantial underserved market here.

So how did Hubbell, who did 18 months in federal prison in 1995-1996 for bilking his old law firm clients, become NORML's insurance agent? Hubbell told us he met NORML founder Keith Stroup in 1996 when both were working on reform in the criminal justice system. And on the three-minute recording he recounts the moving story of a NORML member who was unable to get a bank loan to expand his trucking business.

The "bank required additional life insurance," Hubbell explains, but "his local insurance agent had told him he simply had to quit smoking marijuana to get the coverage the bank was requiring." Well, " he didn't want to quit, and he wanted NORML's help [and] they contacted me," said Hubbell, who works for the McLaughlin Company -- not to be confused with television's McLaughlin Group.

Hubbell said he found a carrier to write a policy for the man and then "we decided the time was right to make traditional insurance . . . available" to other reefer aficionados. So far, two insurance companies have agreed to write life insurance policies, and Hubbell said he hopes to expand coverage to include health and disability insurance.

"Challenging as it may be," Hubbell says on the message, "NORML is . . . working hard to both reform cannabis laws as well as [to help] cannabis consumers all around the world." And Hubbell is ready to get them insured.

Loop Fans simply must listen to Hubbard's "audio message" about the NORML life insurance program -- and the plug for his agency -- at http://audio.norml.org/audio_stash/staff_psa/webb_jazz_test_2.mp3.One Star Still Shines

Despite her central role in getting the country into that increasingly unpopular war in Iraq, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's star is scarcely diminished. In fact, even though she was President Bush's national security adviser throughout Bush's first term, she still ranks quite high in the national popularity polls -- scoring twice Bush's ratings.

That may be why people keep asking her if she's going to be on the GOP ticket in 2008.

The question came up again last week in an interview on German television.

"Before we say goodbye," the interviewer said, "the German public also is viewing with interest that the presidential race is starting pretty early this season, almost after the midterm elections. So -- and they're also fascinated by you as a person, so let me ask you this. Could you imagine any circumstances under which you would be on a Republican ticket?"

"Oh, I'm going back to Stanford," Rice said.

"I want to generate some news here," the interviewer explained.

"No, maybe the Germans will see me at Stanford in Berlin," one of the university's overseas centers.

"Going back to Stanford," where she was provost? That's what she says. Of course, that's what she said at the end of Bush's first term -- and she's still here.Defer That Junket

Bad news for samba fans on the Hill and in the administration. The embassy in Brasilia says if you haven't booked a hotel room in Rio by now, forget about it. It's Carnival time!

The embassy has asked the State Department to send out an ALDAC -- All Diplomatic and Consular Posts -- message alerting them to the problem.

In its request, the embassy said to "please be advised that due to the high tourism season and the upcoming Carnival acceptable hotel rooms in Rio de Janeiro are booked from now through the end of February," and "it is highly unlikely that any accommodations will be available during this period.

"Post therefore requests that all officials and TDY travelers defer travel to Rio de Janeiro until March 5, 2007." Of course, if you're on one of the Hill appropriations committees or in the leadership and are desperately searching for facts . . .

Mama Hugs Iowa (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, January 31, 2007

DAVENPORT, Iowa

When she was little, Hillary Rodham would sit on a basement bench and pretend she was flying a spaceship to Mars. Her younger brother Hugh, perched behind, would sometimes beg for a chance to be captain.

No dice. “She would always drive, and I would always have to sit in the back,” he once told me.

Through all the years of sitting behind Bill Clinton on his trip to the stars, Hillary fidgeted and elbowed, trying to be co-captain rather than just wingman, or worse, winglady.

Finally, in Iowa, she was once more behind the wheel of her spaceship to Mars. She didn’t have to prop up Bill after one of his roguish pratfalls. She didn’t have to feign interest in East Wing piffle — table settings and pastry chefs and designer gowns. She didn’t have to defer to her male colleagues in the Senate, stepping back to give them the limelight.

She positively glistened as she talked about how “I” — rather than the “we” of ’92 — would run the world.

Humbly, graciously, deftly, she offered Iowa the answer to that eternal question, What Is Hillary Owed?

Everything.

DOJ_NMG_0125094

John Wood, a self-described "plainsman," Republican and machinery-and-tool salesman from Davenport, asked Hillary how she would handle the world's evil and bad men, provoking the slyly ambiguous retort: "What in my background equips me to deal with evil and bad men?"

He said afterward that he was more worried about her ability to face down villains, "being a lady," but conceded, "The woman did good today."

(His question was reminiscent of Ali G's interview of Newt Gingrich, when the faux rapper asked whether a woman president would be turned on and manipulated by evil dictators, given that, with women, "the worse you treat 'em, the more they want you.")

As YouTube attests, Hillary didn't care about style as first lady; she was too busy trying to get in on Bill's substance. She showed off a long parade of unflattering outfits and unnervingly changing hairdos.

In Iowa, her national anthem may have been off-key, but her look wasn't. It was an attractive mirror of her political message: man-tailored with a dash of pink femininity.

"I think you look very nice," a veteran of the first gulf war told her in Des Moines.

"Thank you!" she answered, beaming and laughing.

When Geraldine Ferraro made her historic run in '84, she tried to blend a mother's concerns into her foreign policy answers, but it did not work so well once she started getting her nuclear terminology mixed up.

Hillary dealt with the issue head on — "I'm a woman; I'm a mom" — hoping to stir that sisterly vote that Ms. Ferraro failed to draw after it turned out that many women were skeptical about one of their own facing down the Soviets.

Unlike Barack Obama, who once said he was bored by the suburbs, she introduced herself in the land of bingo and bacon as a product of the suburbs, wallowing in the minutiae of kitchen-table issues.

W. and Cheney have lavished attention and money on Iraq, leaving Americans feeling neglected. Hillary offered Iowans a warm bath of "you," homey rumination rather than harsh domination.

(Though Jon Stewart warned on "The Daily Show" that her slogan — "Let the conversation begin!" — will not help her with men. "I think the typical response would be, 'Now?' " he said, adding that her new Iraq policy is, "America, let's pull over and just ask for directions.")

Thomasine Johnson, a 66-year-old African-American from outside Des Moines, complained that Hillary talked too much about "traditional women's issues," but many in the audiences seemed enthralled.

The Achilles' heel of "The Warrior," as she is known, is the war. She expressed outrage about Iraq, but ended up sounding like a mother whose teenage son has not cleaned up his room: "The president has said this is going to be left to his successor ... and I think it's the height of irresponsibility, and I really resent it."

She uttered the most irritating and disingenuous nine words in politics: "If we had known then what we know now. ..."

Jim Webb knew. Barack Obama knew. Even I knew, for Pete's sake. The administration's trickery was clear in real time.

Hillary didn't have the nerve to oppose a popular president on a national security issue after 9/11, and she feared being cast as an antiwar hippie when she ran. Now she feels she can't simply say she made a bad decision. And that makes her seem conniving — not a good mix with nurturing.

The Clintonian Candidate (WP)

By Ruth Marcus

The Washington Post, January 31, 2007

There's a Clinton in the presidential race. The surprise: It may not be Hillary.

The truly Clintonian figure running for the Democratic nomination is Barack Obama. The senator from Illinois, it's struck me lately, seems in many ways more like Bill Clinton than does the senator from New York.

When it comes to Obama and Bill Clinton, there are superficial similarities -- the absent father, the humble roots combined with Ivy League pedigree. Leave aside who would be the first black president, as many said of Clinton -- both represent generational change, Clinton as the first baby boomer president, Obama as the first would-be president of the post-baby boom.

Man from Hope -- meet Audacity of Hope.

Of course, the fit isn't exact: Obama, unlike Clinton, doesn't seem to have been running for the presidency since birth. But there are deeper ways, in his intellectual approach, his message and his personal style, in which Obama evokes Clinton.

Like Clinton before him, Obama presents himself as a new kind of politician who can rise above and bridge partisan differences. Go back to Clinton's 1991 announcement speech, and it's easy to imagine Obama speaking.

"Today, our leaders in Washington seem incapable of working together in a practical, common sense way," lamented one politician. The other called for "a new kind of leadership . . . not mired in the politics of the past, not limited by old ideologies." Can you tell the difference? The first is Obama, the second Clinton, but either could have been channeling the other.

DOJ_NMG_0125095

Like Clinton, Obama has a homing instinct for the middle -- maybe too much of one. To read his book "The Audacity of Hope" is to be struck by his constant desire to understand -- even more, to respect -- conflicting views on whatever issue he happens to be discussing.

This is impressive until it becomes, finally, exasperating in its seemingly compulsive even-handedness. "I'm not unsympathetic to Justice Scalia's position," Obama, recovering law review president that he is, writes about the debate on constitutional interpretation. "Like many conservatives . . . I believe we ignore culture factors at our peril," he writes about the values debate. "Not all these fears are irrational," he writes of anti-immigrant sentiment.

In fact, Obama fits himself explicitly into the Clinton mold. "In his platform -- if not always in his day-to-day politics -- Clinton's Third Way went beyond splitting the difference," he writes. "It tapped into the pragmatic, nonideological attitude of the majority of Americans."

To Clinton critics drawn to Obama, equating them seems too facile: Obama's centrist tropism is born of a desire to accommodate and transcend differences, they argue, while Clinton's was an artifact of ruthless calculation in which he submerged differences for political advantage.

To Clinton advocates still unsure about Obama, the younger man has yet to demonstrate the capacity, in his own "day-to-day politics," to put his brand of Third Wayism into action. Clinton's Sister Souljah moment may have been the premeditated political move of a Slick Willie -- Obama suggests as much in his book -- but Obama doesn't have anything similar to brandish as a badge of New Democratic difference.

It's hard to name a prominent moment when, like Clinton pushing welfare reform, he deviated from party orthodoxy. Sorry, senator, but voting for class action lawsuit reform doesn't cut it. Obama's book features an erudite discussion of the folly, and futility, of resisting globalization -- at which point he summarily announces that he voted against the Central American Free Trade Agreement nonetheless. His signature divergence from the other leading candidates in the Democratic field comes from the left: He opposed the Iraq war from the start.

Obama is like Bill Clinton in his natural ease with people and his ability to win them over. A New York Times story about Obama's law school days described how Obama "cast himself as an eager listener, sometimes giving warring classmates the impression that he agreed with all of them at once." As they debated whether to use the term "black" or "African-American," "students on each side of the debate thought he was endorsing their side," the story said. " 'Everyone was nodding, Oh, he agrees with me,' " said professor Charles Ogletree.

Sounds like everyone who's ever emerged from a meeting with Bill Clinton.

If Obama is the Clintonian figure in the race, Hillary Clinton may be Al Gore, more disciplined policy wonk than natural politician. Like Gore, Hillary Clinton can be more adroit intellectually than politically; both face the challenge, fair or not, of convincing voters of their "authenticity."

It's hard to know whether the tempered Clinton or the untested Obama will prove the stronger candidate -- or would be the better president. But with both of them in the race, the 2008 campaign presents a twist on the 1992 offer: two Clintons for the price of one.

Biden Set To Kick Off Presidential Bid (WP/AP)

By Beth Fouhy

The Washington Post, January 31, 2007

NEW YORK -- Democratic Sen. Joe Biden has been saying for months he's running for president. He makes it official on Wednesday. The Delaware senator will file the paperwork with the Federal Election Commission and release a videotaped campaign message to voters on his Web site, joebiden.com. He also is planning another trip to New Hampshire early next week.

"After nine months of doing this, there is no exploratory committee _ I'm running," Biden told The Associated Press.

A 34-year Senate veteran known for his foreign policy expertise and somewhat windy oratory, Biden acknowledged his campaign would generate little of the buzz surrounding the celebrity candidates New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama.

Even he was moved by his colleagues' trailblazing candidacies, Biden said.

"There's good reason to be excited," he said. "You have the first woman running who is qualified, and a very attractive African-American who has demonstrated crossover appeal. I got involved in politics 40 years ago during the civil rights movement, so yes, it's an exciting thing."

That means Biden, 64, is gambling that in a dangerous world, voters will choose experience over excitement _ particularly regarding the Iraq war.

Biden voted in 2002 to authorize military intervention in Iraq but has since become a vocal critic of the conflict. In his view, resolving the situation in Iraq is by far the gravest concern to most Americans.

DOJ_NMG_0125096

"The average voter out there understands that the next president is going to have to be prepared to immediately step in without hesitation and end our involvement in Iraq," Biden said. "It's very difficult to figure out how to move on to broader foreign policy concerns without fixing Iraq first."

Biden will transfer $3 million from his Senate account to his presidential campaign, and said he believed he needed to raise $20 million total to be competitive in next year's early primaries. Analysts believe Clinton and Obama are likely to raise $100 million each this year.

"People ask if I can compete with the money of Hillary and Barack," Biden said. "I hope at the end of the day, they can compete with my ideas and my experience."

Biden was a candidate for the 1988 Democratic presidential nomination, but withdrew from the race in 1987 amid accusations that he had plagiarized passages in his speeches.

Biden Plans To Formally Launch Campaign For Presidency (KCS)

By Thomas Fitzgerald

The Kansas City Star, January 31, 2007

PHILADELPHIA - He's telegraphed it for months in early primary states and on Sunday talk shows, but Delaware Sen. Joseph Biden Wednesday formally launches his campaign for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination.

Stressing his credentials as one of the party's leading voices on foreign policy, Biden, 64, vowed to "make us safe in the world" as president.

Biden is attempting a comeback 20 years after his first presidential candidacy flamed out amid accusations he plagiarized parts of his speeches and cheated in law school.

"I got back up off my back," Biden said in an interview. "I hope I established in the minds of the American public and the press that I went on to be . . . at least a significant senator dealing with the major problems America faces."

Biden, a senator for 34 years, joins a primary field dominated by New York Sen. Hillary Clinton and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, who are drawing outsized media attention as the potential first female and black presidents, respectively.

Republicans who are running for president include: Sen. John McCain of Arizona, former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney; former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee; and Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback. Former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani is considering a run.

Biden planned to file papers establishing a campaign committee Wednesday and to launch a website, wwww.JoeBiden.com, with a video statement, rather than a traditional rollout in Iowa or New Hampshire or the Senate Caucus room. As the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Biden is working on a non-binding resolution opposing President Bush's plan to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq.

"I'm worried that, God forbid, we may be in the same position, only worse off 18 months from now," Biden said. He blamed Bush's "recalcitrance" and unwillingness to listen to advice from across the political spectrum.

Biden was one of the first to suggest that Iraq should be partitioned into three states along ethnic and sectarian lines in order to reduce violence there.

Though he is a harsh critic of the war now, Biden voted to authorize the use of force in Iraq in 2002, and, along with several other Democratic contenders who did the same, is likely to face questions from the party's influential anti-war left.

Biden said that the use-of-force resolution was designed to tighten the screws on the late dictator Saddam Hussein, and that Bush misused it.

"I didn't have any idea of the degree of incompetence that existed in the administration," said Biden, who was first elected in 1972. "I assumed that these guys were grown-ups. They turned out to be . . . arrogant, immature, and wrong. It actually took my breath away."

Biden, who was elected to his sixth term in 2002, has about $3 million in his Senate campaign account that will be transferred to his presidential committee. Biden has said he needs to raise about $20 million before the early primaries of 2008.

He will need it to keep up with Clinton, who already had more than $14 million at the end of November and Obama, who raised at least $7.5 million in 2006.

Biden also faces the better-known former North Carolina senator John Edwards as well as former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack and New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson.

"We all have different hurdles to overcome: Mine is to demonstrate that I can raise enough money to be competitive and to demonstrate that I can overcome these large figures that are looming out there," Biden said. "Theirs is to demonstrate they have the capacity to be president."

He said he would match up well with the latest stars in the Democratic firmament "once sort of the bloom is off the rose" and all the candidates face tough questioning in Iowa and New Hampshire.

DOJ_NMG_0125097

"This is not going to be an election that lends itself to celebrity nor lends itself to wedge issues," Biden said, arguing that voters are serious and looking for assurances of physical and economic security from their next president.

In Sept. 1987, Biden pulled the plug on his first presidential campaign. In addition to using passages from former British Labor leader Neil Kinnock and Robert F. Kennedy without attribution in some speeches, Biden exaggerated his academic record and, in a bizarre incident, berated a voter he thought had questioned his intelligence. (Biden later was cleared of unethical conduct by the Delaware bar.)

He said that lessons he learned had made him a better person and candidate.

"The first (lesson) is that words matter, that you can't say things lightly," Biden said. "And the other thing is that for one to lose his temper is not a good thing . . . I learned to take a punch. I learned what it's like to literally have the thing you value most in the whole world just absolutely decimated and climb back. I think I am tougher, I think I am more seasoned and I think I am more capable of dealing, you know, with tough circumstances."

Biden To Make It Official On Comedy Central (DNJ)

By Cris Barrish

The News Journal (DE), January 31, 2007

Sen. Joe Biden plans to announce his second run for president today with an online message. Then, at 11 p.m., he'll appear on Comedy Central's "The Daily Show with Jon Stewart." (Buy photo) The News Journal/JENNIFER CORBETT

When U.S. Sen Joe Biden launched his first bid for president in the 1988 campaign, he did so the old-fashioned way: with a flag-waving rally surrounded by hundreds of supporters at the Wilmington Train Station.

Today, when the Delaware Democrat announces his second run for the Oval Office, the process will be, well, different.

No rally.

The candidate will barely even be in his home state.

But in true cyberage style, today should provide Biden with plenty of national exposure, including the debut of his campaign Web site and an appearance on, of all networks, Comedy Central.

Biden's rollout – even his segment on "The Daily Show with Jon Stewart" tonight – is par for the 21st century course, said Stu Rothenberg, editor and publisher of a biweekly political newsletter that bears his name.

"The dramatic change was Bill Clinton, taking a saxophone on late-night TV" on the Arsenio Hall Show in 1992, Rothenberg said. "It's a matter now of reaching people with a variety of media, a variety of forums. It's understanding that different people watch different things. You are sending the message that if you can act funny and hip, people will think you are funny and hip. Candidates want to show the breadth of their personality."

Senate duties

Biden will start the day in more formal style, presiding over a 9:15 a.m. meeting in Washington of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. He and other senators will deal with one of the gravest issues facing America: options for securing war-torn Iraq.

The panel's guests will be former U.S. Secretaries of State Henry Kissinger and Madeleine Albright. Questioning by Biden and his colleagues could draw coverage on C-SPAN, CNN and other news networks, Biden spokeswoman Margaret Aitken said, noting that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's appearance this month was aired extensively.

Late in the morning, perhaps during the hearing, lawyers for Biden's presidential campaign will file formal papers registering him as a candidate with the Federal Election Commission.

Also, the Internet hub of the campaign – www.JoeBiden.com – will go live today, and include a video and information on issues. In the afternoon – the time is not set – Biden will discuss his candidacy in a teleconference with reporters.

Delaware voters, who have elected Biden to six Senate terms dating to 1972, seemed indifferent Tuesday to the fact that their senior senator wasn't holding an in-state event today, though Carol Johnson, 68, of Lewes said "that's kind of fresh."

Opinions differed on his candidacy, which even Biden admits is a long shot with Democratic foes likely to include Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, 2004 vice presidential candidate John Edwards, and upstart Illinois Sen. Barack Obama.

Johnson would vote for Biden. "He's highly respected and I think he has a good record and experience," she said.

'Tired of the stodginess'

On its Web site, "The Daily Show" bills itself as a comedic look at the news for people "tired of the stodginess of the evening newscasts." Stewart and his irreverent team, the site boasts, present "a nightly half-hour series unburdened by objectivity, journalistic integrity or even accuracy."

Biden, who has been on the show three times, said the producers have "been after me to come on, and it's a forum that's available, and by the way, a lot of people listen to The Daily Show."

DOJ_NMG_0125098

Today's 11 p.m. Biden segment will draw about 1.6 million viewers, show publicist Steve Albani said. With four repeats Thursday, the appearance could be seen by up to 3 million.

In recent presidential campaigns, candidate appearances on nontraditional news shows, such as MTV, have become commonplace. Edwards unveiled his 2004 candidacy on the Stewart show.

Biden knows, however, that while he can be looser on a comedy show than on "Meet the Press" or other news talk shows, he still must watch his words. "It's a dangerous show because he's funny and smart," Biden said.

Albani said the show provides newsmakers with a chance to reach a younger demographic.

"Of course they realize they are on a fake news show," Albani said. "But the median age of the Sunday news shows is in the 50s, the Jon Stewart show is in the 30s."

Biden, 64, said that voters shouldn't view his "Daily Show" gig on his filing day as a sign he's taking his candidacy lightly. He's running, he said, because he believes the Bush administration has damaged the nation and its credibility throughout the world.

"I don't want to live in the White House," he said, "but I do want to make the decisions."

Loretta Martin of Dover said Biden's ties to Delaware aren't that important on the national stage. "What he does in Washington is a lot more important than where he's from or the name recognition thing," Martin said. "He's got as good a shot as anyone else."

Janie Anderson, 48, disagreed.

"I wouldn't vote for him. I just really don't care for him," she said. "I just don't think he's trustworthy."

Over the next several months, Biden will give voters in Delaware and elsewhere dozens of opportunities to evaluate his worthiness. He plans a myriad of formal announcements on foreign and domestic issues, including rallies with supporters in several states.

Probably even one in Delaware.

The Pelosi Primary: Who Will Be Her Presidential Pick? (POL)

By Josephine Hearn

The Politico, January 31, 2007

Democratic presidential hopefuls will have to win over thousands of voters in primaries next year, but in one critical contest, they face an influential electorate of one: House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif.

The so-called Pelosi primary on Capitol Hill is largely occurring out of public view, though some second-tier presidential prospects, among them Sen. Chris Dodd, D-Conn., are openly saying that they hope to win the speaker's favor.

But the competition for Pelosi's backing, whether an official endorsement or a friendly nod, could matter most in what for now is the center ring contest between Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton, N.Y., and Barack Obama, Ill. Both earned chits by campaigning and fund raising aggressively last fall for House Democrats. And both are currying support from the liberal party activists for whom Pelosi is now an icon.

Pelosi is far from choosing a favorite and may never make an official endorsement, insiders said. But her good will could smooth a candidate's way with state and local party officials, open wallets and help deliver the support of key interest groups.

Many political power brokers will look to Pelosi and her loyalists for guidance in the presidential race, even if she never makes her choice publicly known.

For now, she's not talking. Asked her thoughts on the field of candidates, Pelosi was circumspect.

"I think they're all great," she said last week. "I think we have a very rich field … If I had anything to say to them, it's: 'Make sure at the end of day we know that one of you will be the nominee of the party, so we don't want to do anything in the primary that will hurt our prospects.'"

Several factors can guide whom Pelosi supports, House insiders said. She likely will look favorably on candidates who aided House Democrats in the 2006 elections and in turn helped her become speaker. She may look for candidates who share her liberal ideology and long-standing opposition to the Iraq War. Or she may opt for a candidate with whom she shares a long personal friendship.

In 2003, she backed a longtime House colleague Rep. Dick Gephardt, D-Mo., her predecessor as minority leader, in his presidential bid. The two reportedly had a working relationship, but not a close friendship.

From a fund-raising standpoint, Clinton and Obama distinguished themselves with their support of House Democrats during last fall's elections, political aides said. Clinton contributed $250,000 to the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee last October, matching the largest check written to the political committee that cycle and solidifying her reputation as the fund-raising front-runner.

DOJ_NMG_0125099

Obama anted up $10,000 from his Hopefund political action committee to the congressional campaign committee just days before last year's general election.

Both candidates also helped out by appearing at campaign events, writing fund-raising appeals and leaning on interest groups. Clinton can also take credit for her husband's work, since former President Clinton was more of an asset to House Democratic candidates than any of the presidential contenders, aides said.

"For us, he was a resource that was unmatched," said a top Democratic aide. "He was hyper-involved day to day. He constantly pushed himself to the point of exhaustion."

But some question whether Pelosi would ever support Sen. Clinton given their deep differences over the Iraq War. Clinton voted for it in 2002; Pelosi voted against. And the two often find themselves at odds on other issues, with Clinton favoring centrist positions over Pelosi's liberal ones. Obama has hewed closer to Pelosi in opposing the Iraq War.

Two of the Democratic presidential candidates, Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., D-Del., and long shot Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich, D-Ohio, told The Politico they did not expect Pelosi's support. "I don't think so, but I don't know," Biden said.

Former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack also appeared an unlikely pick; he and Pelosi reportedly have a frosty relationship stemming from ideological differences. Vilsack's campaign did not respond to a request for comment.

Dodd joined Clinton and Obama in contributing to the congressional campaign committee during the last election cycle. He made a $15,000 donation out of his leadership political action committee, Citizens for Hope Responsibility Independence and Service (ChrisPAC), in mid-October.

Although less active on the campaign trail for House Democrats than Clinton and Obama, Dodd enjoys a decades-long personal friendship with Pelosi. They met more than 40 years ago through Dodd's sister, Martha Buonanno, a close friend of Pelosi's when the two attended Trinity University in Washington, D.C.

Pelosi and Buonanno's friendship has continued since then, and Pelosi made sure her college pal had a seat in the House gallery when she was sworn in as speaker earlier this month. Pelosi reportedly stops in on Buonanno when she passes through New England. The two even competed together several years ago in a bocce ball tournament in East Hartford, Conn., organized by Rep. John B. Larson, D-Conn.

That connection is not lost on Dodd, who is considering asking Pelosi for her backing. He was one of the few presidential candidates who called Pelosi shortly after the November election to congratulate her.

"Obviously I've given a lot of thought to it. I haven't told her that yet! I'll be calling her to discuss things," Dodd said. "Nancy's a great friend. She doesn't forget her friends."

Join The Conversation

You need to be a registered user of Politico.com to "join the conversation". If you are not a member yet, what are you waiting for? Register Now!

by JayPe on 01.31.2007 at 12:26 AM

Pelosi picked the wrong horse in the Majority Leader race, so hopefully she's learned not to back anyone too publicly...

by Bette Jeanne on 01.30.2007 at 07:36 PM

Mrs. Pelosi did not get where she is by backing someone who cannot possibly win more than 10% of the early primary votes, if that. Dodd is not going to get her backing, period.

by vwcat on 01.30.2007 at 07:35 PM

I hope Pelosi picks the one she is most in agreement with and that is Obama. Clinton is more republican lite and she would do little to further our party or cause. she is more about triangulating and cozying up to republicans and follows the DLC line. Obama is the future and a real democrat.

Before you start composing please note that you will need to be a registered user of Politico.com to "join the conversation". If you are not a member yet, what are you waiting for? Register Now!

Md. Pushes Expansive Medical Coverage (WP)

By Lisa Rein

The Washington Post, January 31, 2007

Maryland lawmakers are drawing up ambitious proposals to provide medical insurance to hundreds of thousands of residents without coverage, stepping into the national debate over who should pay the soaring costs of health care.

Gov. Martin O'Malley (D) will call for expanded coverage of the state's 780,000 uninsured -- one in seven residents -- in his State of the State address today, aides said, highlighting a proposal that would bring more of the poorest residents into public programs and require private insurers to allow young adults to remain on their parents' plans until age 25.

DOJ_NMG_0125100

General Assembly leaders are offering more ambitious plans that would add a $1 tax on cigarettes to pay for covering tens of thousands of low-income workers and offer subsidies to small businesses that provide coverage. Many workers who can afford insurance but choose not to pay for it would have to buy it or face penalties.

"Maryland holds out much promise," said Ron Pollack, executive director of Families USA, an advocacy group pushing for affordable, universal health care. The state "may well jump to near the head of the line."

Maryland would join Massachusetts, California, Vermont and a handful of other states that are mapping a path toward universal coverage in the absence of action by Congress or the Bush administration. Instead of the dramatic national overhaul contemplated more than a decade ago, the states are working within the health system, tapping businesses, hospitals, insurers and workers to pay for expanded health care.

The medical repercussions of a lack of health insurance are prodding many states to act.

"Generally, the uninsured get about half the care that the insured get," said Arthur Garson Jr., dean of the University of Virginia's medical school, who has been an outspoken participant in the state and national discussions. And the ultimate consequence? "The uninsured have a 20 percent higher mortality rate than the insured."

Massachusetts is putting in place a plan that would cover 515,000 people. Maryland's approach is more limited: The most ambitious proposal -- a bill to be filed this week by Del. Peter A. Hammen (D-Baltimore), the health committee chairman -- would affect about a third of the state's uninsured but leave a half-million people without coverage.

O'Malley and lawmakers say they are balancing the political will to expand health coverage with the looming state budget shortfall they will tackle next year.

"The administration is interested in working with Delegate Hammen to make health care more accessible in Maryland," Joseph C. Bryce, O'Malley's senior policy and legislative adviser, said yesterday. "But we have some concerns about how some provisions in the bill would be funded."

The governor opposes a tobacco tax increase, and even if lawmakers approve it, there is some sentiment to use the revenue to cover other needs. And despite the momentum in the Democrat-controlled legislature, initiatives of this magnitude often take more than a single session to sell.

Hammen, with strong backing from House Speaker Michael E. Busch (D-Anne Arundel), is crafting a plan that would dramatically expand Medicaid coverage to many low-wage workers who now are eligible only if their income is 40 percent of the federal poverty level, which is set at $10,210 for an individual or $20,650 for a family of four.

"We can provide better care," Hammen said. "Health care is becoming more unaffordable in every community."

The state would subsidize small businesses to encourage them to provide coverage for their employees. And workers earning more than four or possibly five times the poverty level would have to buy insurance if their employer does not offer it. If they don't, they would face a penalty, possibly the loss of a personal income tax exemption.

Even so, the plan would leave about 500,000 people in the middle without easy access to health care. None of the proposals would cover illegal immigrants.

Insurance companies would be asked to offer a bigger menu of policies at affordable premiums. Under O'Malley's plan, small businesses would set up accounts for their workers to use tax-free dollars to buy coverage.

Hammen said he is still working out cost estimates, but his bill would rely on some federal money, a cigarette tax increase and, eventually, a reshuffling of Maryland's practice of reimbursing hospitals for the free care they now provide to the uninsured. The $700 million fund for uncompensated care would shrink as more residents have insurance, he said.

"Cost is an issue," he said, "but we have the potential of using money that's already in the system."

A $1-a-pack increase in the tobacco tax also is the centerpiece of an effort by the Maryland Citizens' Health Initiative to expand health care access through Medicaid and drug treatment. Although other states have approved tobacco tax increases to pay for health care, Senate President Thomas V. Mike Miller Jr. (D-Calvert) has expressed concern that if the tax acts as a deterrent to smoking, the revenue source could plummet.

About 14 percent of Maryland residents have no insurance, far lower than California's rate of 20 percent.

In the District, where about 13 percent of residents are uninsured, leaders last year agreed to subsidize coverage for children whose families have incomes up to three times the federal poverty level, including those who are undocumented.

"It's ridiculous to talk about two sets of kids," said D.C. Council member David Catania (I-At large), who estimates that the move could add several thousand children.

The District also is seeking federal permission to make more lower-income residents eligible for a subsidy that essentially provides free prescriptions.

In Virginia, 15 percent of the population has no coverage, including one in five adults. Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) has proposed providing prenatal care to more low-income women. A state health reform commission is studying greater access to care.

DOJ_NMG_0125101

Maryland lawmakers acknowledge they're taking on a complex, costly effort. "We haven't touched a fiftieth of the pieces here," said Sen. Thomas M. Middleton (D-Charles) , chairman of the Senate Finance Committee.

Staff writer Susan Levine contributed to this report.

Spiritual State Of Union Found Strong (WT)

By Jennifer Harper

The Washington Times, January 31, 2007

In God we (still) trust.

Almost two-thirds of Americans -- churchgoing or not -- say the overall health of the nation is heavily dependent on its spiritual health. About 77 percent say the nation's economy is dependent on its spiritual well-being, while 64 percent say religious expressions are either tolerated or encouraged in their workplaces, according to a Gallup Poll released yesterday.

The findings are part of a greater study plumbing the "spiritual state of the union," said Ted Malloch, director of the Florida-based Spiritual Enterprise Institute.

The poll "measures the extent to which Americans believe in God, act out their belief and impact secular America in real terms: in the workplace, in volunteerism, in business dealings," he said.

Believers are many: 82 percent of the respondents believe in God, while 13 percent believe in a "universal spirit or higher power." Three-quarters say they are Christian, 6 percent are labeled non-Christian and 18 percent have no religious tradition. A majority -- 58 percent -- say success in life is "pretty much determined" by religious and spiritual forces.

Of the respondents, 43 percent were Democrats, 41 percent were Republicans and 13 percent were independents. Ideologically speaking, 58 percent said they leaned conservative, while 32 percent said they were liberal.

The survey also revealed a slow shift in public attitude. Gallup figures in 1999 found 54 percent of Americans called themselves "religious," and 30 percent "spiritual but not religious." Those numbers are now 49 percent and 40 percent, respectively.

Meanwhile, "the 'Protestant work ethic' is alive and well," the survey stated. It found that 78 percent of the respondents would go on working even if they had enough money to quit, while 85 percent agreed that "being ethical will pay off economically." Three-quarters would not bend rules at work, while 97 percent said friends and family respected their line of work. Ninety-two percent said they believe "God wants us to do something with our lives that will be useful to the world."

Such thinking may have its own rewards: 83 percent said their work "is helping make the world a better place." When a 1992 Gallup Poll posed the same question, the percentage was 68 percent.

Spiritual inclinations are either sustained or increasing, the poll found. Eighty-eight percent of the respondents say they are "happy with who I am," up four percentage points from the 1992 survey. Seventy-nine percent said there are clear guidelines to good and evil that apply to everyone, about the same as the previous survey. Almost two-thirds -- 65 percent -- say they are "spiritually committed." The figure was previously 68 percent.

The nation is in a somber mood, the poll noted, with only 29 percent satisfied with the direction of the country, according to separate Gallup findings. But "Americans are fighting back," the current survey stated, noting that seven of 10 regularly volunteer and contribute to charity.

The poll of 1,004 adults was conducted during February and March last year with an error margin of three percentage points.

A Health-Care Bargain (WSJ)

By David Gratzer

The Wall Street Journal, January 31, 2007

Three years ago this month, insurance companies began offering Americans a new type of medical coverage: health savings accounts, which marry low-cost, high-deductible health insurance policies with pre-tax accounts to pay for day-to-day health care. But the anniversary is muted. A slew of reports have been critical, dismissing consumer-driven health care as unpopular and harmful; and with the Democrats in control of Congress, Washington's enthusiasm for the concept has cooled. Nevertheless, the Republicans should take credit where due. The White House ought to build on the growing success of HSAs, which are integral to the president's vision of "affordable and available" health care.

An executive of an upstart airline recently described her company as having three 757s, more than 200 employees, and one big headache: rising health-care costs. Thus, they made the switch to HSAs in 2006, and premiums rose just 5%, compared with a national average of over 8%. Such successes aren't making the news, but overwhelmingly negative stories are. A much reported Commonwealth Fund survey, for example, concluded that enrollment in consumer-driven plans is stagnant, people are grossly dissatisfied, and care is delayed. But the report was flawed on its face: For one, it was unrepresentative, drawn from a pool of "Internet users who have agreed to participate in research surveys."

DOJ_NMG_0125102

Here's the untold story: Despite recent entry into the market, these plans are gaining popularity. Drawing on information from major insurance carriers, William Boyles, publisher of the Consumer Driven Market Report, estimates that enrollment in HSA-type plans or HRAs (a forerunner to health savings accounts) more than doubled since January 2006, to 13.4 million Americans. The estimate is plausible, as last year twice as many employers offered this coverage than in 2005, and the number of financial institutions supporting HSAs tripled.

Early data suggest good results. Following a year-long analysis of consumer-driven health-care members, Cigna reports that costs are 16% lower than for enrollees in traditional plans, but the use of medications for chronic conditions increased. Enrollees in Aetna's consumer-directed HealthFund maintain their health (even if chronically ill), and purchase more preventative services, yet medical costs rose just 3% in HRA-based plans between 2002 and 2005. A Kaiser Family Foundation survey finds 71% of those with the new "consumer-directed health plans" consider cost when seeking health care, compared with 49% of those with more traditional employer-sponsored coverage.

Granted, not everyone is satisfied. Half of the Kaiser respondents, for example, want to switch to a traditional plan. Reservations aren't surprising -- HSAs can seem initially complicated. EOS, the upstart airline, held townhall meetings and offered health coaches to smooth the transition.

Looking back on GOP-era Capitol Hill, welfare reform stands out as the greatest achievement; health savings accounts may eventually be considered a close second. If HSAs can help tame health inflation, the timing couldn't be more critical. According to HHS projections, without significant changes, national health spending will double to about $4 trillion by 2014.

Democrats have their own agenda. The House has already voted to change Medicare's prescription drug benefit so that the federal government can "negotiate" prices. They also want to expand Schip, the Clinton administration's state health program for children. As the minority party, the GOP may be tempted to go on the defensive, opposing Democratic ideas (as they did with HillaryCare) or aiming to temper them (their strategy for Schip). But instead, Republicans should espouse a positive agenda, regardless of whether all its elements can be passed, including the improvement and expansion of HSAs.

One improvement is to loosen the mandated structure of the HSA. Employers have no flexibility, for instance, to decide what the deductible covers, thus lumping diabetic supplies and Viagra into one cost category. Another improvement would allow individuals to make larger annual deposits into HSAs, as President Bush has championed. So too would be, in line with the State of the Union health-care proposals, a leveling of the tax playing field, allowing individuals to purchase HSAs with the same tax preference as employers. While many Democrats loathe HSAs, it is still possible that HSAs can be improved and expanded if tactical opportunities arise. Remember, Ronald Reagan got his tax cut, even though many Democrats loathed that, too.

Republicans could also urge more state experimentation. Members from both parties -- Sens. Jeff Bingaman and George Voinovich, along with Reps. Tammy Baldwin, Tom Price and John Tierney -- recently proposed legislation to create a super-commission, charged with receiving reform ideas from states and then making grants to enable them. The White House has a bargaining chip here: Without action, Schip will expire, and it might be possible to meet the Democrats half way. They could extend Schip in states that are interested, while other states would have greater freedom to experiment with market reforms such as expanded HSAs.

And that could help make the fourth anniversary of HSAs even more significant.

Mr. Gratzer, a physician and a senior fellow at the Manhattan Institute, is the author of "The Cure: How Capitalism Can Save American Health Care" (Encounter, 2006).

Bush Unveils Security Aid For Palestinians (AFP)

AFP, January 31, 2007

US President George W. Bush has directed about 86.4 million dollars in aid to help Palestinian security forces under President Mahmoud Abbas's direct control, the White House said.

"The idea is to build the legitimate security forces, to help provide law and order in Gaza and the West Bank, fight terror, and to facilitate movement and access especially in Gaza," said national security spokesman Gordon Johndroe.

The money will go "to support efforts to reform Palestinian civil security forces under the direct command of the Office of the President," said the spokesman.

"Our funds will be utilized exclusively for non-lethal supplies and training," he said. "This has obvious security and economic benefits for the Palestinians."

Johndroe spoke after the White House released a memorandum from Bush to US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice directing her to transfer 86.362 million dollars in aid to the Palestinians.

DOJ_NMG_0125103

"We are utilizing West Bank and Gaza Economic Support Funds left over from projects suspended earlier this year. This assistance will not impact our ongoing humanitarian, democracy, and private sector programs," said Johndroe.

The spokesman said that aid was "consistent" with US obligations under the so-called diplomatic "roadmap" to peace between Israel and the Palestinians, and that Lieutenant General Keith Dayton, the US security coordinator for Israel and the Palestinians, would oversee implementation of the programs.

Fighting Eases On First Day Of A Cease-Fire By Gaza Factions (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, January 31, 2007

JERUSALEM, Jan. 30 — After five days of clashes in the Gaza Strip, Palestinian factions on Tuesday mostly observed the latest cease-fire, though one Hamas member was shot dead.

Also, the Israeli Air Force bombed a tunnel near the eastern edge of the Gaza Strip, saying that Palestinian militants were digging it to enter Israel and carry out an attack. The tunnel was near the Karni crossing, which is used to move goods between Israel and Gaza.

The two main Palestinian factions, Hamas and Fatah, held late night talks on Monday and agreed on a truce that took effect at 3 a.m. Tuesday. While Gaza was mostly calm during the day, several previous cease-fires have broken down and there were doubts about this one as well.

In one incident, a local Hamas leader was shot dead in the southern Gaza town of Khan Yunis. The shooting appeared to be a revenge attack by a family aligned with Fatah, which recently had a relative killed in the fighting, according to Palestinian residents of the town.

More than 30 Palestinians have been killed in gun battles since Thursday, and about 60 have died over the past two months.

Egypt, which has often mediated between the Palestinian factions in recent years, helped broker the latest truce.

While Gazans welcomed the reopening of shops and the semblance of normalcy that prevailed on the streets on Tuesday, many said the truce would remain vulnerable unless Hamas and Fatah could agree to work together in the government.

A good deal of the fighting has involved members of the Palestinian security forces. Many members are loyal to Fatah, which long dominated Palestinian politics, but Hamas created a security service, known as the Executive Force, after it came to power a year ago.

Months of negotiations have failed to produce a deal between Hamas, the radical Islamic group that controls much of the government, and Fatah, led by the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas.

Mr. Abbas, speaking in Cairo after a meeting with the Egyptian president, Hosni Mubarak, said Hamas's Executive Force was "illegitimate and illegal."

Mr. Abbas also condemned a suicide bombing on Monday by a Palestinian in the southern Israeli resort town of Eilat, which killed three workers at a bakery.

The Palestinian leader said the bombing was "not in the interest of the Palestinian people." Al Aksa Martyrs Brigades, which is linked to Fatah, had claimed responsibility for the bombing with Islamic Jihad.

Israel has given no indication that it plans a major military response to the suicide bombing, the first such attack in Israel in nine months.

"The initiative will be ours, and we have no intention of relaying what we plan to do," Amir Peretz, the defense minister, said during a visit to Eilat.

However, Israeli newspapers, citing political and military officials, said no large-scale operations were planned.

In a separate development, Israel's deputy prime minister, Shimon Peres, met in Qatar with the emir, Sheik Hamad bin Khalifa al-Thani. That was the highest-level meeting in years between officials of the countries.

The emir urged Israel to hold talks with the Palestinian government, according to the Web site of the Israeli newspaper Haaretz, which had a reporter traveling with Mr. Peres. Israel, which classifies Hamas as a terrorist group, refuses to deal with the organization, and Hamas does not recognize Israel.

Israel and Qatar do not have diplomatic relations, though there is an Israeli trade mission in the Qatari capital, Doha. Mr. Peres visited Qatar when he was prime minister in 1996.

Gaza's Warring Factions Holding Fire (AP)

By Sarah El Deeb

AP, January 31, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0125104

Gaza's warring factions began to hold their fire Tuesday as a truce took effect across the volatile territory and brought hopes for an end to the infighting that has left 36 people dead in five days.

But the killing of a Hamas militant by rival Palestinians — combined with an Israeli airstrike on a smuggling tunnel following a suicide bombing — underscored the fragility of any lull in Gaza's bloodshed.

Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas called for a total halt to the violence.

"The past few days were difficult, and everyone paid in blood," he said in Gaza. "Everyone is facing a difficult test, either we maintain this calm ... or everything collapses again, and then everyone will be held responsible."

Previous truces between Hamas and Fatah militants in Gaza have quickly collapsed into new fighting, and it appeared unlikely the two sides would comply with all the terms of the current agreement, such as handing over all those involved in killings and abductions.

Late Tuesday, the two sides began releasing hostages — fighters kidnapped over the past week — both sides said.

Hamas and Fatah gunmen have used prior lulls to prepare for more fighting.

On Tuesday morning, the streets of Gaza were calm, as radio stations loyal to Fatah and Hamas groups played national songs instead of factional music and stopped inciting their supporters against their rivals.

Hopes for an enduring truce fell in the afternoon after a Hamas gunman was killed in the southern Gaza town of Khan Younis. Hamas officials blamed the shooting on Fatah militants, and Hamas supporters took to the airwaves, saying those behind the campaign against their group must be targeted.

However, Hamas officials said they would not retaliate.

Both Fatah and Hamas say bringing suspects to trial is crucial to maintaining the truce.

"If the killers remain in the streets, the cycle of bloodshed will not stop," said Maher Mekdad, a Fatah spokesman. "Families of victims will take the law in their own hands, and revenge will rule," he said.

The truce agreement did nothing to resolve the underlying power struggle between Hamas and Fatah that has fueled the fighting. The two sides have been at odds since Hamas defeated Fatah in legislative elections a year ago, dividing power in the Palestinian government.

President Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah, elected separately two years ago, has urged Hamas, which faces international isolation because of its anti-Israel ideology, to join Fatah in a more moderate coalition. He hopes a softer platform will help end a crippling international aid boycott imposed after Hamas' victory and allow him to resume peace talks with Israel.

Coalition talks have broken down and appear unlikely to resume soon, though both Saudi Arabia and Egypt have offered to mediate.

Even if the truce holds, it does not necessarily mean peace for Gaza after a Palestinian suicide bomber from Gaza killed three people in the Israeli resort city of Eilat on Monday.

Early Tuesday, the Israeli army bombed a tunnel it said was meant for use by Gaza militants for another attack. No casualties were reported. In the past, militants dug such tunnels to attack Israeli army outposts and other targets.

"We will protect the citizens of Israel, and we will protect the tourism centers of Israel," Defense Minister Amir Peretz said Tuesday as he visited the scene of the bombing.

After meeting Tuesday with top military officials, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert decided to continue to observe a two-month-old cease-fire with the Palestinians, Israeli media reported.

Israeli Arab Official Favors Pragmatism (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, January 31, 2007

JERUSALEM -- Raleb Majadele says his success as the first Arab Muslim to serve in Israel's Cabinet will be judged one student and one classroom at a time.

Although many of his Arab political colleagues rail against symbols that equate the state with Judaism, such as the Star of David flag, Mr. Majadele is more concerned with practical matters, such as improving educational standards for Israeli Arab children.

"You need to be strong enough and influential to say, 'Excuse me, we are missing 2,000 classrooms.' Until now, no one has ever sat there and saw to it that that would be his test," the 53-year-old political trailblazer said yesterday.

Initially tapped for the Science Ministry post recently vacated by a lawmaker from his Labor Party, Mr. Majadele will serve as minister without portfolio while Prime Minister Ehud Olmert decides on a redivision of the vacant ministerial posts.

But Mr. Majadele made clear yesterday that education will be a top priority for him.

"That doesn't mean that I can solve all the problems in the next budget. But if we can build in the next year 500 classrooms, something that we haven't done in five years, it's progress," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0125105

It's an attitude that reflects the Arab lawmaker's preference for pragmatism over ideology, accommodation over confrontation and integration over separation in approaching Israel's Jewish establishment.

As Mr. Majadele plied the noisy corridors of the Israeli parliament yesterday, there was ample handshakes and expressions of good will. "Mabruk," congratulated one security guard in Arabic. "Mister Minister," greeted Effie Eitam, a far-right lawmaker and Jewish settler. "I wish you good luck."

Since the appointment of an Arab to Israel's Supreme Court some years ago, Mr. Majadele's entrance into the Cabinet is the most dramatic example of integration for a minority community that sees itself as marginalized and segregated.

But it comes at a time when Jewish-Arab relations are polarized over the Palestinian uprising and a plan by Cabinet member Avigdor Lieberman to force some Israeli Arabs out of Israel, leaving many in that community questioning whether any Arab should serve in the government.

"The question is: Does this really represent a turning point in the question of inclusion or exclusion," said Elie Rekhess, a scholar at Tel Aviv University and director of the Konrad Adenauer Program for Jewish-Arab Cooperation. "This is definitely not the dream that the more national segment of Arab politics in Israel had in mind."

Mr. Majadele said he considers himself first an Arab, then a citizen of Israel, then a Palestinian and lastly a Muslim. But three Arab parties in parliament voted against his confirmation on Monday.

"Majadele enters the government as a representative of the Labor Party and not of the Arab public," said Jamal Zahalka, a lawmaker from the National Democratic Assembly party.

"He's entering a government that doesn't want peace, carries out crimes against the Palestinian people, opened a war in Lebanon. It's a government that discriminates against Arab citizens in Israel.

"No less important, it's a government that includes" Mr. Lieberman, who would redraw the border with the West Bank to swap Israeli Arabs for Jewish settlers.

Mr. Majadele said that he does not think Mr. Lieberman belongs in the Cabinet, but that he won't feel awkward sitting on the same table as the hard-liner. "Nothing prevents me from feeling good," Mr. Majadele said.

Some liberal Jews hope that Mr. Majadele will both symbolize and take steps toward reconciliation. "You mustn't fail," said Akiva Eldar, a political commentator for the left-wing Ha'aretz newspaper at the end of an interview.

Despite his advocacy of integration and his membership in the Labor Party, Mr. Majadele said he is not a Zionist and won't sing the national anthem, Hatikvah, which romanticizes the Jewish longing for national liberation in the "Land of Zion."

"It doesn't speak to me. You want me to sing the national anthem? Show some respect, and bring one that speaks to me, and universal values -- something I, as an Arab, can live with," he said.

Muslim Nations Move To Prevent Violence (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, January 31, 2007

Terrified that sectarian Muslim bloodshed could soon engulf the region, U.S. allies and adversaries in the Middle East have stepped up joint efforts to head off a religious civil war.

Sunni Muslim Saudi Arabia and Shi'ite Iran have held intensive talks in recent days on ways to tamp down sectarian violence in Iraq and Lebanon. Over the weekend, Saudi King Abdullah issued an unusual public call for calm.

Top Islamic clerics and scholars in Egypt, Qatar and Iraq also have issued statements urging Muslim unity, often blaming the United States and other outside actors of trying to divide the faithful.

"All scholars are condemning the ongoing sectarian war between Sunnis and Shi'ites as a threat to the unity of Iraq and drawing the attention of Muslims away from the real enemy of the [Islamic world]," Aisha al-Mannai, an Islamic law scholar at Qatar University, said last week at the conclusion of an emergency conference in Doha on the growing tensions among various strains of Islam.

According to the Doha conference communique: "Any exchange of insults against the companions of the prophet Muhammad or his relatives should be treated as an un-Islamic act."

The swirl of activity reflects the deep regional fears that Middle East crises, from Iraq to Lebanon to the Palestinian territories, could pit the faith's two largest branches against each other.

In Iraq yesterday, authorities told the Associated Press that at least 58 Shi'ite worshippers were killed in three separate attacks on one of the holiest days in the Shi'ite Muslim calendar. Five Sunnis in Baghdad were killed in an apparent retaliatory mortar barrage later in the day, just the latest in a vicious cycle in nearly two years of sectarian reprisal attacks.

Al Qaeda and other radical Sunni movements have targeted Shi'ites and their holy sites in Iraq as a way to foment sectarian civil war, a strategy that even President Bush has conceded has been successful.

DOJ_NMG_0125106

Sunni Muslim rulers such as Saudi King Abdullah and Jordan's King Abdullah II have voiced fears of an aggressive Shi'ite revival, bankrolled and armed by Iran's Islamic republic. They cite the rise of Iraq's new Shi'ite-dominated government, the Shi'ite Hezbollah movement in Lebanon, and Iranian backing for Palestinian militant factions in the conflict with Israel.

Skeptical of U.S. strategy and resolve in Iraq, Saudi officials have met in Riyadh with Iranian national security chief Ali Larijani and with a delegation from Hezbollah in recent days. Arab-language newspapers close to the Saudi regime said the separate visits focused on containing the crisis in Lebanon and tamping down Sunni-Shi'ite tensions in general.

Saudi Foreign Minister Saud al-Faisal said Iranian leaders had appealed to Riyadh to "cooperate in averting strife between Sunnis and Shi'ites in Iraq and Lebanon."

Mohammed Mehdi Akef, the spiritual leader of the militant Sunni Muslim Brotherhood, late last week issued a statement condemning Sunni-Shi'ite divisions, implicitly blaming U.S. policy in Iraq and the region to fanning the tensions.

"The schemes of the foreign occupier are responsible for the discord," he said.

But the Doha conference also was marred by sharp exchanges between Sunni and Shi'ite clerics, with both sides blaming the other for the violence in Iraq. Sunni scholars also accuse Iran and its Shi'ite allies of a concerted effort to convert Sunnis to their form of Islam.

In a rare interview with a Kuwaiti newspaper over the weekend largely overlooked in the West, Saudi King Abdullah had a double-edged message for Iran.

The king told the Al-Seyassah newspaper that Saudi Arabia "does not support any party that is an enemy of Iran," but also cautioned Tehran against underestimating the danger of antagonizing the United States in Iraq and elsewhere.

"We advised Iran on how you go about cooperating internationally, and to avoid exposing the Gulf region to dangers," the king said of his meeting with Iran's Mr. Larijani.

The king also said he was aware of popular fears in the Sunni world about rising Shi'ite power.

"The majority of Sunni Muslims will never change their faith," he said.

Saudi Arabia FM Says Iran Cooperating (AP)

By Abdullah Shihri

AP, January 31, 2007

U.S. ally Saudi Arabia said Tuesday it was working with Iran, America's top rival in the Mideast, to find ways to ease the crises in Lebanon and Iraq — a departure from Washington's confrontational stance toward Tehran.

The mediation is an unusual step by two rivals that have been competing for influence in the region. Saudi Arabia, which is mainly Sunni Muslim, has been increasingly vocal about its suspicions of mainly Shiite Iran's intentions.

The kingdom's willingness to cooperate with Iran in mediating the conflicts likely points to the alarm that that the bloodshed in Iraq and the possibility of civil war in Lebanon has raised among the Saudi leadership.

But it could complicate Washington's efforts to isolate Tehran. President Bush has stepped up accusations that Iran is fueling turmoil in the Mideast and has vowed to break what he called Iranian support for militants in Lebanon and Iraq. Bush has soundly rejected calls to reach out to Iran for help in the crises.

Saudi Foreign Minister Saud al-Faisal said Tuesday that Iran had approached his country to "cooperate in averting strife between Sunnis and Shiites in Iraq and Lebanon."

"Saudi Arabia wants only peace in the region," al-Faisal said. "Contacts are ongoing between Riyadh and Tehran."

A Saudi envoy is in Iran studying all the efforts being exerted to calm the situation in Iraq and Lebanon and "exploring what Iran can contribute," he said.

The Shiite Muslim Hezbollah — which Iran is believed to support with money and weapons — has been waging a campaign of street protests for the past two months in an attempt to bring down the Western-backed government of Lebanese Prime Minister Fuad Saniora. Last week, the protests erupted into clashes between supporters of the two sides that raised fears in Lebanon and across the Middle East that the country could explode into a sectarian civil war between its Shiites and Sunnis.

Saudi Arabia has close ties to Sunni politicians in the government's ruling coalition and has strongly backed Saniora.

Hezbollah has demanded the formation of a new national unity government that would give it and its allies more than a third of the Cabinet seats, enabling them to veto major decisions. Weeks of talks between the government and opposition have stalemated.

In Iraq, Iran is believed to back Shiite militias that have been blamed in killings of Sunni Arabs and it has close ties to Shiite parties that dominate the government. Saudi Arabia has strong tribal links to Iraq's Sunni Arab minority.

The contacts come as Saudi Arabia has given tepid support to a new U.S. strategy in Iraq but has expressed skepticism over whether it will succeed. Besides sending 21,000 additional U.S. troops to Iraq, the new strategy takes a tougher stance on Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0125107

Hizbollah Blames Bush For Unrest (FT)

By Ferry Biedermann

Financial Times, January 31, 2007

Lebanon's Hizbollah movement used the Shia Muslim Ashura commemoration on Tuesday to accuse the US and Israel of being responsible for the unrest in the country.

Seven people died in political and sectarian clashes in the country last week.

"The one who fomented chaos in Lebanon, who destroyed Lebanon, who killed women and children, old and young in Lebanon, is George Bush," Sayyed Hassan Nasrallah, Hizbollah leader, told a rally in the southern suburbs of Beirut.

He accused the US of ordering Israel to wage war against his movement last summer as part of what he called the American campaign against "resistance groups" in the Middle East.

The war started in July when Hizbollah captured two Israeli soldiers and killed three. The speech followed remarks by the US president on Monday in which he deplored last week's violence and accused Hizbollah, Iran and Syria of trying to destabilise Lebanon.

Hizbollah and its political allies have been demonstrating for the past two months to bring down the pro-western government of Fouad Siniora, prime minister, and gain more of a say in a new cabinet.

Lebanon's schools and universities were set to reopen on Wednesday having been closed since Thursday, when fighting between rival student groups led to widespread clashes.

Violence last Thursday took place mainly between the supporters of the Shia Hizbollah and Amal movements and Sunni and Druze backers of the government. Rival christian groups had clashed earlier in the week.

In the southern town of Nabatiyeh, in the Shia heartland, thousands of young men on Tuesday carried out the Ashura ritual of cutting themselves and allowing the blood to flow freely. One of them said that the Shia harboured no ill will against the Sunni but that the Sunni were less tolerant of them.

One young woman watching the procession of bleeding young men said that the ritual showed the "Shia capacity for sacrificing for a cause".

In Legacy Of A Revered Martyr, Saudi Shiites Find Sustenance (WP)

By Faiza Saleh Ambah

The Washington Post, January 31, 2007

QATIF, Saudi Arabia, Jan. 30 -- Fawzia al-Hani dropped her black veil over her face and wept softly on Sunday, enveloping herself in the sadness of the last days of Imam Hussein, grandson of the prophet Muhammad and Shiite Islam's most tragic and revered martyr.

The women in the packed community center commemorating Ashura, the anniversary of Hussein's death in A.D. 680, watched on a projection screen as a turbaned cleric described how Hussein set out with a small band of family and followers to confront a large army, then was filled with anguish when his favorite son was slaughtered before he himself was killed.

Beside the cleric, men huddled on the floor with their heads bowed, dabbing at their eyes with tissues.

To many of the region's historically persecuted Shiites, the death of Hussein in what is now Karbala, Iraq, the event that triggered the schism between Sunnis and Shiites, remains central to their lives. Shiite belief that Hussein and his descendants were robbed of their rightful succession as rulers of the Islamic world heightens their sense of persecution and victimization.

The story of Hussein, who chose to confront an enemy army with only a small band of men rather than bow to an oppressive leader, permeates Shiite life from childhood, Hani said.

"You cannot understand Shiites if you don't understand the lessons of Hussein's death," the 44-year-old author added. "Hussein taught us not to fear death because you can achieve victory even through death, as long as you fight injustice and stay true to your principles."

That lesson has not been lost on Saudi Arabia's long-suppressed Shiite minority, a 2 million-strong community living mainly in the oil-rich Eastern Province. Shiites here have only recently been granted greater religious freedoms, including the right to commemorate Ashura publicly. But fears in the Arab world of growing Shiite clout have raised concern among local Shiites that sectarian tensions could roll back some of the progress.

Shiite Iran's increased regional influence, Iraq's newly dominant Shiite majority and the push for more power by Lebanon's Shiites have led to a closing of Sunni ranks in many countries of the region and calls for quashing a Shiite revival.

Shiites, who make up less than 15 percent of the kingdom's 16 million citizens, are considered heretics by the Wahhabi Sunni ideology practiced in the kingdom.

DOJ_NMG_0125108

Emboldened by Iran's 1979 revolution, Saudi Shiites began staging demonstrations during Ashura demanding more rights and freedoms. This led to a brutal government crackdown that resulted in scores of deaths, hundreds of arrests and tense relations in the 1980s.

The situation improved after Shiite exiles returned in 1994 following a truce with the government. And several years ago, reform-minded King Abdullah launched a policy of openness, allowing the community to build mosques and once-illegal community centers called husseiniyas. Shiites have also been granted a small measure of political power with wins in local municipal elections in 2004. But many complain that they still face severe discrimination in government positions, in the military and in schools.

Now, after a lull, Wahhabi clerics have again started issuing fatwas, or religious edicts, labeling Shiites infidels who are more dangerous to the faith than Christians and Jews. Abdullah ibn Jebreen, a prominent Saudi cleric, wrote on his Web site last week that Shiites should be expelled from Sunni lands.

The monarch has been brought into the fray. In a widely circulated interview last week, Abdullah was asked about claims in the Arab media that Iran is attempting mass conversions of Sunnis to Shiism. Without mentioning Iran by name, he told the Kuwaiti daily al-Seyassah that the kingdom was aware of the issue but that Sunnis were immune to conversion and would retain their historical dominance.

Shiites here say Iraq's sectarian violence in particular has inflamed local anti-Shiite feelings. Lawyer and activist Sadeq al-Jubran accused extremist Sunnis of importing the problems of Iraq into the kingdom unnecessarily.

"What's happening in Iraq is not my problem. If Sunnis and Shiites kill each other off, that's in Iraq," Jubran said. "But what's worrisome is that you have people here asking clerics whether it's permissible to kill Shiites because Shiites in Iraq are killing Sunnis."

Hassan al-Saffar, the country's most prominent Shiite cleric, said anti-Shiite fatwas are dangerous and should be criminalized. The community's sympathies with Shiites in Iran or Iraq should not be taken against it, the soft-spoken cleric said. "We are Saudi citizens concerned first of all with local issues. Our religious sympathies do not affect the security and stability of the country," he said.

Despite the common religious ties of the region's Shiites, Saudi Shiites have different interests and live in a different context, said Shiite writer and former dissident Taufiq al-Seif. "Shiites here have reached a level of political maturity and have realized that though they sympathize with co-religionists in the region, they have their own concerns and their own very unique situation. Our interests lie not with Iran but very much with other Saudis."

Speaking at a recent Ashura gathering, Seif urged his listeners to distinguish between religion and politics and not to be swayed by ideology. "We should not sympathize with Shiites just because they're Shiites, even when they are wrong," he told the dozens gathered.

Shiite cleric Nimr al-Nimr, who was detained last year for calling for greater religious freedoms, said Shiites have learned from the example of Hussein to refuse injustice imposed by tyrannical leaders.

"You can't separate Shiite Islam from politics," Nimr said. "It's in the nature of Shiites to fight oppression, and it's in the nature of governments to be oppressive, so naturally there is a confrontation." Nimr said that he did not condone violence or confrontation but that he had learned from the lesson of Hussein not to fear death and to fight for his rights.

Outside, Qatif, a predominantly Shiite enclave that is home to about 900,000 people, was an area in mourning. Black cloth covered entire sides of small apartment buildings, while young boys and girls ran around with red and green mourning bands tied around their heads with the words "O Hussein, O Martyr" sewn on them.

In the Awami neighborhood in the town of Tarut, huge portraits of Hussein, some with blood running down his forehead, lined an empty sandlot in preparation for a reenactment of the events in Karbala surrounding his death. Black and white tents were pitched next to red papier-mache rocks, and plastic sheets were laid out to look like the Euphrates River in Iraq.

On Sunday, after the call to afternoon prayers, Muhammad Zaki Khabbaz took off his jacket and joined several hundred young men for a funeral procession. They snaked their way through narrow, garbage-strewn alleys dotted with green and red banners, beating their chests rhythmically as a poem about the events in Karbala was recited through a bullhorn. The group passed under a covered alleyway with a large cloth banner that read, "Every day is Ashura, and Every Place is Karbala."

"Imam Hussein died rather than bow down to the oppressor," said Khabbaz, a 27-year-old computer company manager. "And by commemorating Ashura, we are confirming our allegiance to never giving up and to upholding those principles.

"When we beat our chests, we are saying that we will never forget Imam Hussein's tragedy," he said. "Every day there is oppression is Ashura, and every place there is oppression is Karbala. And every day, we will fight that oppression."

Talks To Resume On North Korea And Weapons (NYT)

By Joseph Kahn

The New York Times, January 31, 2007

BEIJING, Jan. 30 — China announced Tuesday that talks over North Korea's nuclear weapons would resume in Beijing next week, the latest in a long series of negotiations that have failed to curb its nuclear program.

Discussions are set to resume Feb. 8 though the United States and North Korea have not settled a dispute over freezing North Korean assets at a bank in Macau, a Chinese territory.

United States Treasury officials and their North Korean counterparts met Tuesday in Beijing to discuss American measures that have led to the freezing of $24 million in North Korean assets held at the bank, Banco Delta Asia. No breakthrough appeared imminent, but the talks were set to continue Wednesday.

The dispute overshadowed the last round of nuclear negotiations, which ended in a stalemate in December. Whether North Korea would bargain on its nuclear program while its money remained frozen was unclear.

The United States contends that the matter is separate from the nuclear issue and that the deposits are linked to North Korean counterfeiting and money laundering.

North Korea exploded a nuclear device in October, adding a sense of urgency to six-nation talks that have dragged on for more than three years without tangible progress.

Many American and Chinese analysts say they doubt North Korea will give up its nuclear arms voluntarily after spending decades working to buy and develop the technology.

But the analysts also say that the Bush administration and the North Korean leader, Kim Jong-il, may have more to gain by continuing the talks than abandoning them, at least partly because China, the key intermediary, insists that the talks are the only way to proceed.

The United States and China agreed to impose limited United Nations military sanctions on North Korea after its nuclear test. But China has opposed tougher penalties on North Korea, its former ally.

Christopher R. Hill, an assistant secretary of state and the chief American envoy at the talks, says the North Koreans have signaled their commitment to a 2005 accord on dismantling their arms program. He met his North Korean counterpart, Kim Kye-gwan, in Berlin this month, and both sides said they had set the stage for a productive round.

N. Korea May Accept Deal In Nuclear Talks (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, January 31, 2007

North Korea appears increasingly willing to bargain over the terms of ending its nuclear programs, prompting cautious optimism that some sort of agreement may be reached when the six-nation disarmament talks reconvene next week in Beijing, U.S. and Asian officials close to the talks said.

With just two years left in President Bush's term, State Department officials appear to have been given new freedom to explore different outcomes and proposals with their North Korean counterparts, most recently during unusual bilateral talks held in Berlin. North Korean officials have responded in kind, for the first time moving beyond quibbles about the wording in communiques and actually talking specifically about what they might do to end their nuclear programs, the officials said.

Officials cautioned that intensive bargaining will be necessary for any deal in a process that has generally yielded little but disappointment, most recently during a round of talks in December. In September 2005, North Korea agreed to a joint communique in which it said it would abandon its nuclear programs in exchange for economic and security incentives. But then it boycotted the talks for 13 months in anger over a Treasury Department action against a Macau bank allegedly acting as a conduit for North Korean counterfeiting.

North Korea tested a nuclear weapon in October, which put it at odds with longtime ally China. But other nations at the talks -- such as Russia -- recently put pressure on the United States to end the financial crackdown against Banco Delta Asia. The talks also include China, South Korea and Japan.

Sources close to the talks who spoke on the condition of anonymity said the United States, backed by China, is seeking some sort of disablement of the North Korean nuclear facility at Yongbyon, but Pyongyang has thus far proposed only to allow the return of inspectors from the International Atomic Energy Agency. North Korea in the past four years has obtained from spent fuel rods at the facility enough plutonium for an estimated 10 nuclear weapons, and it might consider freezing the facility. But that would be problematic for the Bush administration because that would result in a deal similar to the one obtained by then-President Bill Clinton -- which Bush has said was a bad bargain.

Any agreement is likely to include some sort of resolution of the Banco Delta Asia issue. Pyongyang officials have demanded that $24 million in frozen North Korean accounts be returned, but U.S. officials have indicated a willingness to discuss only the return of some funds that have no clear connection to illicit activity.

DOJ_NMG_0125110

Assistant Secretary of State Christopher R. Hill, the chief U.S. negotiator, declined yesterday to discuss specifics or to predict success. "We go there thinking our team has worked as hard as we can, and we have a basis for calling a meeting and a basis for moving forward," he said.

Michael J. Green, the top White House official for Asia policy until a year ago, said the administration will have to balance its interest in winning an agreement against the possibility that North Korea will agree only to a partial solution -- and will ultimately keep its nuclear weapons -- to relieve the pressure from U.N. sanctions. "The devil is in the details," he said.

Green, a Japan expert, added that there is increasing nervousness among Japanese officials that the Bush administration is getting soft on North Korea because of the turmoil in Iraq.

That nervousness extends to U.S. officials deeply skeptical of North Korea. "Any deal that they would agree to now is no good," said John R. Bolton, until recently U.S. ambassador to the United Nations and the top arms-control official during Bush's first term. "It is inconceivable that they will agree to the intrusive inspections regime that we need to have any confidence they would live up to the terms of the deal."

N. Korea Nuclear Talks To Resume (WT)

By Andrew Salmon

The Washington Times, January 31, 2007

SEOUL -- Chinese officials announced yesterday that six-party nuclear talks will resume on Feb. 8, raising hopes that North Korean objections over the freezing of a Macau bank account would be resolved by then.

U.S. Treasury Department officials held talks with North Korean delegates in Beijing on that issue yesterday, and published Asian reports said the Americans were prepared to see some funds released from the Chinese bank.

Chinese Foreign Ministry spokeswoman Jiang Yu said the new round of six-party talks -- involving the United States, China, Russia, Japan and the two Koreas -- should focus on implementing a September 2005 joint statement on the denuclearization of the entire Korean Peninsula.

Negotiations have been stalled almost since the statement was issued because of Pyongyang's unhappiness with U.S.-backed financial moves, particularly the freezing of a North Korean government account at Banco Delta Asia, or BDA, in Macau.

The Treasury Department charges that the account in Macau, a Chinese autonomous territory, was being used to launder the proceeds of financial crimes, including the counterfeiting of U.S. currency.

Daniel Glaser, the Treasury Department's deputy assistant secretary for terrorist financing and financial crimes, led the American side in the talks, which were to continue today. The North Korean team was led by O Kwang-chol, president of the North's Foreign Trade Bank.

The talks create "the opportunity to discuss the concerns of the international financial community about illicit conduct in the international financial system," Mr. Glaser told reporters.

"I know that there's a lot of focus on Banco Delta Asia, and we'll certainly be talking about the illicit conduct of that bank. We'll also be talking about counterfeiting and other related issues."

A news agency report from Beijing said the U.S. officials had confronted the North Koreans with documentary proof of illicit dealings at BDA.

The Treasury Department warned American and international financial institutions in September 2005 not to have dealings with BDA, because of suspicions of illicit activities on behalf of the North Korean government. Following the warning, international financial companies curtailed trade with BDA, for fear of being blacklisted by the U.S. government.

The Macau government took over the bank and froze an estimated $24 million in North Korean assets.

The North subsequently has made the lifting of what it calls U.S. sanctions against the bank a condition for progress in the six-party nuclear talks. With Washington refusing to link the two issues, the North boycotted the nuclear talks for over a year.

There was little progress when the six-party talks finally resumed in Beijing last month, with the U.S. and North Korean financial teams meeting on the sidelines. But both sides were upbeat after three days of closed-door bilateral meetings in Berlin earlier this month.

While Washington insists the Berlin meetings were held in the context of the six-party talks, it was the first time the countries had met without other countries' delegates in proximity since the process began.

Japanese and South Korean news media, citing unnamed sources, have since reported that the United States might permit the unfreezing of some $13 million held by North Korea in BDA. And yesterday, South Korea's Joongang Ilbo newspaper, without naming sources, said President Bush had ordered the Treasury Department to cooperate with the State Department on the North Korean issue.

Specialists say at least some of the North Korean funds held in BDA are from legitimate business dealings.

In an interview with The Washington Times last summer, Nigel Cowie, head of Daedong Credit Bank, the North's only foreign-run bank, said that some of his bank's funds were also locked up in BDA.

He confirmed the difficulties North Korea was facing, as international financial institutions were reluctant to deal with its banks after the Treasury's September 2005 warning. This situation had forced North Korea to rely on couriers to carry international currencies in and out of the country, he said.

Frozen Funds In Macau Could Thaw N. Korea Impasse (USAT)

By Paul Wiseman

USA Today, January 31, 2007

HONG KONG — By the standards of international finance, the amount is trifling: $24 million — less than a lot of CEOs take home in a year.

But that sum — North Korean money stuck in the sleepy Chinese territory of Macau — could hold the key to ending a 4½-year nuclear standoff with North Korea.

The money was frozen 16 months ago when U.S. Treasury Undersecretary Stuart Levey accused a small bank in Macau, Banco Delta Asia, of being "a willing pawn" in North Korea's "corrupt financial activities."

North Korea wants its money back, and the money has become a bargaining chip as the United States leads the diplomatic effort to get North Korea's isolated Stalinist regime to give up its nuclear weapons program.

International talks aimed at dismantling North Korea's nuclear program are to resume Feb. 8 after breaking off in December.

Tuesday, a U.S. delegation led by Deputy Assistant Treasury Secretary Daniel Glaser met at the U.S. Embassy in Beijing with North Korean officials to discuss the $24 million and related allegations: that the communist state is a financial rogue engaged in counterfeiting and money laundering.

If the money talks go well, North Korea might be willing to make concessions on its nuclear program, says Park Young Ho, senior research fellow at the Korea Institute for National Unification in Seoul.

Treasury officials won't comment on widespread speculation in Japanese and South Korean media that the United States is ready to OK the release of perhaps $13 million of the $24 million to give a boost to next week's nuclear talks, which will involve South Korea, China, Japan and Russia, in addition to the United States and North Korea.

The Bush administration alleges that North Korea raises hard currency through criminal activities — peddling pirated cigarettes and Viagra, trafficking in heroin and methamphetamine and printing counterfeit U.S. dollars. At least $45 million in North Korean "supernotes" — near-perfect duplicates of U.S. $100 bills — have been found in circulation, the Congressional Research Service (CRS) reported last year. North Korea earns $15 million to $25 million a year from counterfeiting, CRS has estimated.

Some of those bogus North Korean bills have made their way to Macau, 40 miles west of Hong Kong. Banco Delta Asia, which has $320 million in assets and eight branches (including one in a casino) was North Korea's banker in Macau.

In 1994, a teller at the bank caught two executives from Zokwang Trading, a North Korean front company, trying to deposit $250,000 in counterfeit bills; the men carried diplomatic passports.

Despite the incident, Banco Delta Asia continued to do business with Zokwang for more than a decade — a sign of the bank's tolerance for illicit North Korean business, the U.S. Treasury says. The Treasury chided the government of Macau, a former Portuguese colony that is a specially administered region of China, for lax money-laundering regulations.

The Treasury hasn't imposed any sanctions on Banco Delta Asia. The regulatory case against the bank has been pending since September 2005.

Still, when the bank appeared on the Treasury's blacklist, other banks stopped doing business with it. Customers withdrew $133 million — more than a third of the bank's deposits — within a week. Macau's government froze the $24 million in North Korean accounts, replaced the bank's senior management and suspended chairman Stanley Au, a well-known entrepreneur and former Macau legislator who continues to own the bank. The new management team ended the bank's business relations with North Korea.

The bank also hired U.S. lawyers and lobbyists, who have tried unsuccessfully to get the Treasury to drop its case. The United States hasn't offered detailed evidence against Banco Delta Asia, noting that it has relied on classified sources. Glaser says Treasury officials have studied 300,000 pages of bank documents. "We are quite confident of what we said in September 2005," he says. "Now that we've had a chance to look behind the veil a bit, we know we made the right decision."

In Macau, the bank is widely seen as a pawn in the U.S. diplomatic campaign against North Korea. "There's a general perception that the Americans are using this as a weapon, a way to pressure Pyongyang," says Paulo Azevedo, executive director of Macau Business magazine. "Everybody knew for 10 years about the strong connections between North Korea and Macau. (North Korean airline) Air Koryo was flying through Macau. The flights were full of luxury goods going to Pyongyang. Everybody knew — and the Americans didn't? What a coincidence" that the issue emerged in the middle of the nuclear standoff.

DOJ_NMG_0125112

Levey, Treasury undersecretary for terrorism and financial intelligence, says, "This is not about punishing North Korea. This is about protecting the international financial system."

Whatever the U.S. motivation, the North Koreans reacted with fury, pulling out of the six-party nuclear talks in November 2005. Park at the Korean unification institute says the North Koreans see the allegations of money laundering and counterfeiting as a slap at their leader and a suggestion that dictator Kim Jong Il is an international gangster. "Face-saving is very important to North Korea," he says.

Macau, which has overtaken Las Vegas as the world's No. 1 gambling market, has passed a stronger anti-money-laundering act.

"We're really pleased with the progress Macau's made," Glaser says. "It's important they play by the rules."

Azevedo of Macau Business agrees that Macau needed to crack down on money laundering. "If the Americans are the only ones with the muscle to stop it, then OK," he says. "Better late than never."

Seoul Wants Written Accord From NKorea Nuclear Talks (AFP)

AFP, January 31, 2007

South Korea has said it wants a binding written agreement to emerge from next week's six-nation talks on dismantling North Korea's nuclear weapons programme.

Foreign Minister Song Min-Soon said the new round, which starts in Beijing on February 8, should produce a document that sets out firm steps toward a nuclear-free North Korea.

Song said the round will aim to reach agreement on implementing a landmark September 2005 pact, under which the reclusive communist state agreed to abandon its nuclear ambitions in return for security guarantees, economic aid and diplomatic recognition.

"An agreement does not come in words. Lots of words have been exchanged among parties. I expect them to turn into a joint document," he told a weekly news briefing.

The United States said Tuesday it was hopeful that "substantial progress" can be made when the talks, grouping the United States, the two Koreas, China, Russia and Japan, resume.

The 2005 deal went nowhere after North Korea in November that year walked away from the forum in protest at US sanctions on Banco Delta Asia (BDA), a Macau-based bank accused of money-laundering for the regime in Pyongyang.

After conducting its first nuclear test on October 9 last year the North returned to the six-party talks in December. But it made it clear it would not discuss nuclear issues unless there was progress on the banking row.

US and North Korean officials began a second round of discussions on the banking curbs on Tuesday in Beijing.

"The BDA issue has so far had a negative impact on the six-party talks. I am looking forward to the settlement of the issue," Song said.

South Korea's Yonhap news agency said Sunday that North Korea would be told during the next round to dismantle its nuclear facilities within months.

The facilities subject to the shutdown include a five-megawatt reactor, a fuel reprocessing plant, a radiochemical lab and two reactors of 50 megawatts and 200 megawatts now under construction, it said.

'Radical Populism' On Negroponte's List (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, January 31, 2007

John D. Negroponte said yesterday that one of his priorities if confirmed as deputy secretary of state will be countering the rise of "radical populism" and anti-Americanism in Latin America championed by Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez.

Bush administration officials said that Mr. Negroponte, a former ambassador to Mexico and Honduras, is expected to re-energize Washington's policies in the Western Hemisphere, to which the administration has been accused of not paying enough attention.

"Latin America has been a mixed picture in the last couple of years," said Mr. Negroponte, who is still serving as the nation's first director of national intelligence, during his confirmation hearing before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee for his new post as Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's deputy.

"One of the trends we need to be concerned about is a kind of a frustration among some of the populations in Latin America that democracy is not necessarily delivering the kinds of results that people had hoped for, and that has in turn given rise to a certain amount of populism," he said. "That is most clearly symbolized by Mr. Hugo Chavez."

DOJ_NMG_0125113

Mr. Negroponte's remarks, as well as comments by other officials, suggest a more active approach to dealing with Mr. Chavez's influence in the region than the administration has had so far.

Thomas A. Shannon, assistant secretary of state for Western Hemisphere affairs, told The Washington Times last year that Washington had decided to "ignore" the Venezuelan leader.

"It would be a mistake for U.S. foreign policy in the region to overly concentrate on the guy," Mr. Shannon said. "If we allow ourselves to get trapped in the kind of confrontation that he wants to have with us, it lessens our influence with others in the region."

Last week, Mr. Shannon said he had spoken briefly with Mr. Chavez at the inauguration of Nicaraguan President Daniel Ortega earlier this month. Mr. Ortega joined the small but growing circle of Latin American leaders who are allies of Mr. Chavez -- Bolivia's Evo Morales, Ecuador's Rafael Correa and the ailing Fidel Castro in Cuba.

"President Chavez indicated a desire to improve relations and a belief that we could find areas where we could have a positive, constructive conversation," Mr. Shannon said at the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

U.S. Ambassador William Brownfield in Caracas "has held several conversations with the foreign minister and with others in the Foreign Ministry about what such an agenda would look like, and I think we are fairly close to a moment in which we might be able to sit down and talk," Mr. Shannon said.

Mr. Negroponte, a career diplomat since 1960, served as ambassador to the United Nations and Iraq before becoming the top U.S. intelligence official in 2005.

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat and Foreign Relations Committee chairman, promised a speedy vote on the nomination and predicted an overwhelmingly positive outcome.

Mr. Negroponte said that in addition to Iraq and Latin America, he will focus on Asia in his new position. His portfolio will be similar to that of his predecessor, Robert B. Zoellick, who resigned in July, although it is not clear if Mr. Negroponte will devote as much time to Sudan's Darfur region as Mr. Zoellick did.

Venezuela Poised To Hand ChÃ¡vez Wide-Ranging Powers (WP)

By Juan Forero

Washington Post, January 31, 2007

CARACAS, Venezuela -- The line forms every day after dawn at the Spanish Consulate, hundreds of people seeking papers permitting them to abandon Venezuela for new lives in Spain. They say they are filled with despair at President Hugo ChÃ¡vez's growing power, and they appear not to be alone. At other consulates in this capital, long lines form daily.

Two months after ChÃ¡vez was reelected to another six-year term by an overwhelming margin, Venezuela is experiencing a fundamental shift in its political and economic climate that could remake the country in a way perhaps not seen in Latin America since Fidel Castro took power in Cuba in 1959. On Wednesday, the National Assembly is expected to entrust him with tremendous powers that will allow him to dictate new laws for 18 months to transform the economy, redraw the structure of government and establish a new funding apparatus for Venezuela's huge oil wealth.

ChÃ¡vez's government announced earlier that it intends to nationalize strategic industries, such as telecommunications and electric utilities, and amend the constitution to end presidential term limits.

The new, more radicalized era is enthralling to the president's supporters. To them, ChÃ¡vez is keeping the promise he has consistently made over eight years in office -- to reorganize Venezuelan society, redistribute its wealth and position the country as an alternative to U.S. capitalist policies.

"This is a moment that could be key in the history of Latin America," said Joanna Cadenas, 36, a teacher in the state-run Bolivarian University. "I never thought you could love a president."

But the moves -- which opponents say are marked by intolerance and strident ideology -- are prompting some Venezuelans to leave the country and others to prepare for a fight in the last battlegrounds where the opposition has influence. A few are trying, against the tide, to remain apolitical in a country marked by extreme, even outlandish rhetoric.

"What we're seeing happen here is not good," said JosÃ© Manuel RodrÃ-guez, 42, an accountant seeking travel documents at the Spanish Consulate. "What we see here is the coming of totalitarianism, fewer guarantees, fewer civil rights. I want to have everything ready to leave."

ChÃ¡vez's moves are worrying Bush administration officials, who have voiced concern over the ideological nature of nationalization plans that have targeted companies such as CANTV, the dominant provider of fixed-line telephone service, and the utility Electricidad de Caracas, both of which have stakeholders in the United States. U.S. officials have also expressed concern that the government will not renew the broadcast license of RCTV television, which Venezuelan officials charge supported a short-lived coup against ChÃ¡vez in 2002.

DOJ_NMG_0125114

"We should all be concerned about the direction President ChÃ¡vez is taking his country," Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), chairman of the Senate Appropriations foreign operations subcommittee, said in a statement this week. "Any leader who tries to tighten his grip on power by destroying the institutions of democracy, curtailing press freedom and using his office to intimidate pro-democracy opponents is setting in motion a dangerous process with potentially ominous consequences."

Venezuelan government officials argue that the president's moves are the will of the people and that his latest electoral victory is a mandate for ChÃ¡vez to deepen what he calls his Bolivarian revolution.

"We cannot disqualify Hugo ChÃ¡vez as social leader who, with the support of big majorities, makes decisions," said Haiman El Troudi, a former chief of staff to ChÃ¡vez who now works at the International Miranda Center, which is funded by the government. "I don't see people moving forward against this. I see the same old opposition groups."

El Troudi, the author of a book about the kind of companies that should make up the 21st-century socialism that ChÃ¡vez extols, said the government will move quickly to transform the country into a mixed economy of state firms and private ones, "but with conditions." He said that politically and economically, Venezuela is steadfast against capitalism.

El Troudi also acknowledged that the government needs to better woo the 4 million Venezuelans who voted against ChÃ¡vez and now feel they have no political representation. "These 4 million people are not oligarchs, and they don't represent the ideas of the oligarchy," he said.

Still, ChÃ¡vez's own rhetoric, in daily speeches that can last hours, are filled with invective against opponents and the Americans, giving the former paratrooper the air of what prominent Mexican author Carlos Fuentes calls "a tropical Mussolini."

Even some of ChÃ¡vez's allies have raised eyebrows over some of his plans. The president has formed a coalition, the United Socialist Party, to unite the numerous parties in the National Assembly -- all of them pro-government. But the leaders of bigger, well-established parties such as the Communist Party and Podemos are balking, at least for now.

In a recent meeting for leaders of Podemos, one delegate, Pedro Peraza, said that although support was strong for folding into the president's party, Podemos needed to be cautious. "Things cannot be that way, that it's all about what the president says and that we just follow along," Peraza said. "That would be like communism."

Despite concern voiced by several Podemos members, the president of the party, Ismael GarcÃ-a, said that the dissolution of his party was only a matter of time. Asked if folding Podemos and other parties wouldn't give ChÃ¡vez too much power, GarcÃ-a cited the widespread support the president enjoys.

"We're not turning over anything to anybody," he said. "The president has won this through his prestige, his worth as a leader, his courage."

ChÃ¡vez's boundless energy, and broad ambitions, have hardly slowed plans that include putting a satellite into space, sending 100,000 poor Venezuelans on vacations to Cuba and purchasing 4,000 tons of Bolivian coca, once the drug crop is manufactured into flour and other products. Even in a country now long accustomed to ChÃ¡vez, the pace of the changes is hard to keep up with.

"We thought 2007 would be a time for change, a time for constitutional reform, but we never thought one month after the election we'd see a creation of a sole party, the shutdown of RCTV, the nationalization of CANTV and the electricity of Caracas, and the announcement of a new political map of Venezuela," said Julio Borges, an opposition leader.

Rigoberto Lanz, a prominent intellectual who is an adviser in the government's Science and Technology Ministry, said the size of ChÃ¡vez's ever-expanding government has done little to curb what he called the two most serious "enemies" of the ChÃ¡vez administration, corruption and bureaucratic inertia.

And while Lanz and others are working to empower Venezuelans, he said, there is not a mechanism for people's wishes to be reflected in major policy moves, such as nationalizing companies. Among ChÃ¡vez's plans are communal councils, funded by oil revenue, that would give ordinary people decision-making powers. "We're still far from the big decisions being made by the people," Lanz said.

A recent survey done in Venezuela by Greenberg Quinlan Rosner, a Washington polling firm, showed that a strong majority of Venezuelans were against the plan to eliminate presidential term limits and the decision not to renew RCTV's license. Venezuelans also said it would be preferable if the opposition had more power. And a vast majority said ChÃ¡vez, known for his pugnacious attitude, should be more conciliatory toward the opposition.

"It suggests Chavistas are uncomfortable with some of this and, more importantly, it shows that ChÃ¡vez is misinterpreting his mandate," said Mark Feierstein, a political adviser with the polling firm who helped oversee the survey.

Perhaps surprisingly, some in the opposition see this moment as a time for optimism. Once badly fragmented and discredited, they believe they could find adherents as ChÃ¡vez tries to inject socialist dogma into schools, as he has promised to do, or replace municipal governments with community councils.

"Our job is to present alternatives, and then we need to organize and make people conscious," said Leopoldo LÃ³pez, the opposition mayor of Chacao, an affluent district of Caracas. "I'm not despondent. The lack of hope is the worst enemy we have."

Cuba TV Shows Castro Meeting With Chavez (AP)

By Anita Snow

AP, January 31, 2007

Cuban state television Tuesday showed a video of a healthier looking Fidel Castro meeting with Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez and saying his recovery was "far from a lost battle," in the first images of the ailing leader in three months.

Castro stood and appeared alert in the 10-minute video clip, which state TV said was shot during Chavez's previously unannounced visit to Havana on Monday.

The video seemed to be aimed at knocking down recent rumors about Castro's health, including a report that he was in grave condition.

Castro looked heavier than in previous images that showed him much more thin and frail. Dressed in a red, white and blue track suit, the 80-year-old was shown sitting and drinking juice.

"This also is far from being a lost battle," Castro said of his current health problems.

He noted that when severe intestinal problems struck last summer, he was still not fully recovered from an October 2004 fall that severely injured a knee and a shoulder. "One after the other," Castro said of his health troubles.

Later in the video, Chavez was even more optimistic, saying Castro had already won the battle to recover his health. The Venezuelan president's brother, Education Minister Adan Chavez, was also seen in the video visiting Castro.

Cubans watching the video being shown repeatedly on nightly television news as they sat in open cafes and restaurants said the images reassured them about Castro's health.

"He looks a lot better now," said 28-year-old law student Nicolas Fernandez. "He's well; strong of mind and body."

State Department spokeswoman Joanne Moore declined to comment on the video.

The broadcast came six months after Castro stunned the nation with a July 31 announcement that he had undergone intestinal surgery and was provisionally ceding power to his younger brother Raul. Since then, Raul Castro has led a collaborative leadership that has kept the government running calmly in his brother's absence.

The date that Tuesday's video was taken could not be immediately confirmed. In it, Chavez said the two-hour private meeting took place on Monday and ended at 3 p.m. on Jan 29. In Caracas, a presidential spokeswoman, speaking on customary condition of anonymity, confirmed that Chavez made a one-day visit to Havana on Monday.

On the video, Castro was also heard reading aloud a headline from a printout of an article dated Saturday from the Web version of Argentine newspaper Clarin.

Castro has not been seen in public since July 26 — five days before he stepped aside. He looked more thin and frail the last time video images were broadcast, on Oct. 28.

Cuban officials told visiting U.S. lawmakers last month that Castro does not have cancer or a terminal illness and will eventually return to public life, although it was not clear whether he would return to the same kind of absolute control as before.

In the latest video, Chavez said he found his friend to be "of good humor, with a good face and in good spirits." He said the pair discussed a variety of issues, including the world's energy crisis, and that Castro showed "much clarity, as always in his ideas and analysis."

A report in the Spanish newspaper El Pais earlier this month said the Cuban leader was in "very grave" condition. The paper, citing two unnamed medical sources from Gregorio Maranon hospital in Madrid, had reported Castro was still recovering after three failed operations and complications from an intestinal ailment common in older people called diverticulitis.

The hospital employs surgeon Jose Luis Garcia Sabrido, who flew to Cuba in December to treat Castro. The article's authors later said Garcia Sabrido was not among their sources and he later dismissed much of the report as half-truths and rumors.

Incoming Rice Deputy Seeks US 'Engagement' With China (AFP)

AFP, January 31, 2007

Incoming number-two US diplomat John Negroponte has said Washington should adopt an engagement policy at all levels with China, which is countering traditional US influence in Asia.

Negroponte, currently the top US spy chief and set to become Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's deputy, also told a Senate hearing on his confirmation that it would not be wise for Washington to review its policy on Taiwan.

"I think we need to engage China on all levels and I think that ought to be our approach to that country, not one of confrontation but engagement," said the 67-year-old veteran foreign service officer whose career began in Asia.

Negroponte also said that he expected to resume a US-China strategic dialogue launched by the previous deputy secretary of state, Robert Zoellick, before his resignation in July last year.

DOJ_NMG_0125116

Zoellick had challenged China to be "responsible stakeholder" in the global economy.

Indicating that he has a firm grasp of China's history, Zoellick said he had gone to Beijing as early as 1972 with former top US diplomat Henry Kissinger shortly after then President Richard Nixon's landmark visit to that country.

"I was involved in the first outreach to China back in the early 1970s," he said.

When asked at the hearing about his opinion on Taiwan President Chen Shui-bian's push for a new constitution, Negroponte cited Washington's adherence to a "one-China policy" and three US-China communiques issued after Nixon resumed contacts with China in 1972.

"We believe that it would be unwise to do anything that might be at cross purposes with those three," Negroponte said.

Pressed by Senator Lisa Murkowski, an Alaska Republican, if the proposed new Taiwanese constitution would violate the communiques, he said, "I would want to study the implications but it certainly strikes me that that would be a distinct possibility".

In the three communiques signed between 1972 and 1982, the United States recognized that Beijing considers there is only one China, including Taiwan, but did not explicitly adopt that view as its own.

Negroponte also said that he expected to spend much time trying to secure peace in Northeast Asia, which has been threatened by North Korea's nuclear brinkmanship.

On ties with Japan, the top Asian ally of the United States, he said he expected to devote "an important amount of time" to nurture that relationship.

He said, "Our relationship with Japan has always been a corner storne of our policy towards East Asia.

"I don't think we should take the relationship for granted, I think it needs to be nurtured and Japan remains one of our most important allies in the world."

Members, Manufacturers Push President On China Trade Policy (HILL)

By Ian Swanson

The Hill, January 31, 2007

The Bush administration is under pressure from members of Congress and domestic manufacturers to change a long-standing practice of not imposing anti-subsidy duties on imports from countries with largely state-driven economies, such as China.

Some congressional sources and manufacturing representatives believe the move could counter rising congressional pressure for legislation tackling the trade deficit with China. The perception that the administration is not dealing effectively with the country could “build a head of steam for legislation,” according to Frank Vargo, vice president for international economic affairs at the National Association of Manufacturers, which has lobbied the administration to change its policy.

A second manufacturing source said it would be helpful if the administration opened up a “new avenue” to provide relief for U.S. companies struggling with Chinese competition. If the administration decides that countervailing duties may be applied to counter subsidies China’s government gives its exporters, U.S. companies could petition the government to impose duties on Chinese imports.

Senate Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus (D-Mont.) joined 22 other senators in a letter last week to Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez calling on the administration to make the change. “China’s trade surplus with the United States continues to explode, fueled in large part by subsidies provided by the Chinese government to favored industries in China,” the letter read. Thirty-two House members, including 20 Republicans, sent a similar letter to Gutierrez.

Manufacturing groups and companies pressing for the change include the National Association of Manufacturers, the National Council of Textile Organizations, Mittal Steel USA, United States Steel Corporation and the American Forest and Paper Association.

A handful of associations representing retailers and importers, however, has pressed Commerce to maintain its current policy, and broader groups such as the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the U.S.-China Business Council have not weighed in, possibly because their memberships include companies doing business in China. General Motors Corp. filed a submission that neither rejects nor supports changing the practice, but said Commerce practices should “not unduly handicap imports that are fairly traded or do not result in material injury to domestic producers.”

A GM source said his company’s concern is that if U.S. trade laws are applied in an arbitrary manner that is detrimental to Chinese trade, China could be in a position to retaliate against U.S. companies. GM’s sales in China grew by 20 percent to 700,000 units in 2006, and GM expects the Chinese market to continue to grow rapidly.

Nonetheless, both of Michigan’s senators joined Baucus in calling for the change in policy.

Baucus, Finance ranking member Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa) and Sens. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.) and Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) are expected to put together a China trade bill later this year, but have yet to meet on the issue this year, according to a committee aide. Finance expects to hold hearings on China’s trade policy in March, which could kick off efforts to develop a bill.

DOJ_NMG_0125117

"The trick is going to be to come up with ways that are productive and not counter-productive," said Brian Pomper, a former trade counsel to Baucus who is now a partner with Parven Pomper Schuyler. He said there would be an effort to move legislation dealing with China this year.

In September, Schumer and Graham agreed to back off demands that the Senate vote on legislation imposing tariffs on Chinese goods because of China's manipulation of its currency, which Schumer and Graham charge gives a trade advantage to Chinese exporters. They promised to work with Baucus and Grassley on broader trade legislation targeting China if China did not move forward on currency. One business source said the goalposts for legislation will be somewhere between Schumer and Graham on one side and Baucus and Grassley on the other.

Several business lobbyists noted that talks between administration and Chinese officials on currency may have had little impact, which has led some to conclude that talking with China will not lead to a solution. Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson will testify to Schumer and other members of the Senate Banking Committee today about Treasury's report on international exchange-rate policies and the U.S.-China Strategic Economic Dialogue, which met in China in December.

An aide to one Republican House member who signed the Jan. 19 letter to Gutierrez said an announcement that the Department of Commerce is changing its long-standing policy could be a turning point for China trade legislation. Commerce is set to make a decision on whether to change its policy by April 2.

However, a Senate Democratic aide predicted there would be legislation no matter what the administration does, although he agreed continuing the current countervailing policy will add momentum. He noted that Commerce's decision to change its policy could be appealed by groups arguing that it is illegal for the U.S. to impose countervailing duties on non-market economies.

If that happens, legislation might still be necessary, the aide said. At a minimum, a business source said legislation would be helpful in the context of possible court cases.

CHURCH AND STATE As China's Bishops Die Off, Clash Looms With Vatican (WSJ)

By Andrew Batson In Yinchuan, China, And Stacy Meichtry In Vatican City

The Wall Street Journal, January 31, 2007

As Beijing and the Vatican escalate their battle for control of the Roman Catholic Church in China, people like Bishop Liu Jingshan are caught painfully in the middle.

The head of a diocese in the dusty plains of western China, the 93-year-old bishop is one of the church's last living links with a pre-Communist China, when Catholics could freely profess their allegiance to the pope. Bishop Liu also serves in the compromised present-day world of Catholicism in this country, in a government-approved church which the Vatican and many Catholics view as illegitimate.

For more than two decades, Bishop Liu and many other Chinese Catholics have discreetly divided their loyalties between two masters, gently nudging both toward a hoped-for rapprochement. But as Bishop Liu's generation ages, the bridge between Beijing and Rome is wearing thin, worsening tensions on both sides.

Each seat of authority claims the right to appoint Catholic bishops, and neither will talk to the other. So every time a Chinese bishop dies or retires, there is the potential for a conflict to erupt over his successor. The average age of a bishop in China is now 74, and at least 18 bishops are known to have died in the past two years.

More than two dozen of the 138 dioceses in China are now without their own bishops. Bishop Liu, already 18 years past the normal retirement age for a bishop, knows only too well his time to step down is coming.

"I know I am old. The priests who were my classmates are all gone," he says.

Last year, the Chinese Catholic Patriotic Association, the official body which oversees local Catholics, appointed three bishops who had not been approved by the pope. That reversed years of quiet progress toward accommodation, which had included signals that the Vatican was willing to switch diplomatic recognition to China from rival Taiwan.

Anger over the consecrations has prompted the Vatican to re-evaluate its effort to restore ties with Beijing. Pope Benedict XVI earlier this month summoned religious leaders from Hong Kong, Macau and Taiwan -- where the church is free of Chinese government influence -- for a two-day meeting with his top foreign policy advisers. Pope Benedict now plans to issue a letter addressed to the estimated 12 million Catholics living in China, according to a Vatican statement. In two statements last year, the Vatican warned that any bishops appointed without papal approval could be excommunicated.

The struggle over who will lead Chinese Catholics is frequently opaque, revealed only in the nuanced signals that are a hallmark of both the Vatican and the Chinese Communist party. Still, the stakes for the church are enormous. China represents an unparalleled opportunity to increase the Catholic faith at a moment when its traditional stronghold of Europe is weakening. The conflicts within the Chinese church have left it lagging behind energetic Protestant sects in preaching to the Chinese.

DOJ_NMG_0125118

"It would be a great sorrow to me if, as China develops more and more into one of the most important forces in the world, it does not know the grace and wonder of Christ and his church," says Cardinal Theodore E. McCarrick, the former Archbishop of Washington, D.C., who has frequently traveled to China as an unofficial envoy for Rome.

A Test

The tensions over the Catholic Church are also turning into a test of just how much freedom China's government is willing to allow religious organizations in a materialist society whose people are increasingly hungry for spirituality. The difficulty is made more acute for Catholics by the central role of the pope and the religious bureaucracy he heads, which the Communist Party sees as a rival for political authority.

In the years following the 1949 revolution, Catholics were denounced as agents of an imperialist power. Foreign priests and missionaries were expelled, and many Chinese priests, including Bishop Liu, were imprisoned. Later, during the chaos of the Cultural Revolution, the church essentially vanished from public life, as mobs hounded believers and tore down many cathedrals.

Today's China is somewhat more welcoming. The country officially recognizes five religions, including Catholicism, but still keeps tabs on their leaders through a government bureaucracy and a collection of five "patriotic" organizations. Catholics, in particular, have long been viewed with suspicion as possible political activists with loyalties to a foreign power in Rome.

"The Chinese government and the Chinese people are afraid of the church turning and playing the role that it did in Poland," says Liu Bainian, vice chairman of the official Chinese Catholic Patriotic Association, referring to the church's influence in the uprising against Poland's Communist rulers in the late 1980s that paved the way for free elections.

On the other side, many Catholics feel the Patriotic Association has traded the true faith for allegiance to the Communist Party.

"The official church in China is not obedient to the pope. They are obedient to the Chinese government. By definition they are not Roman Catholic," says Joseph Kung, who runs the U.S.-based Cardinal Kung Foundation and is an advocate for China's "underground" church -- the semi-secret group of priests and bishops who don't register with the patriotic association and are often harassed and imprisoned. In recent years, at least 17 underground bishops and numerous priests have disappeared, been arrested or detained in isolation, according to Asia News, a Vatican-affiliated news agency that monitors Church affairs in China. Some have died in prison.

Building Up Ties

Even so, traditionalists within the open church have spent decades quietly building up ties with the Vatican. While participating in an organization that has openly called for the Chinese church's "independence" from the pope, they have privately sought his blessing and tried to increase exchanges between Chinese Catholics and those abroad.

"Even though I spent 19 years in prison, I do love my country. But do you think I only love my country? I also love my church," says Bishop Liu.

Born in 1913 to a Catholic family in Inner Mongolia, he studied at a seminary there run by Belgian and Dutch missionaries. After being made a priest, he served as a local pastor and, later, the head of his old seminary.

Bishop Liu was just 38 years old when he was first imprisoned, in the chaos and antiforeign frenzy that followed the Communist revolution. Even after his sentence ended, in 1970, he was a suspect individual. He supported himself by laboring in the fields while the Cultural Revolution engulfed society. It was only after Mao Zedong's death in 1976 that religion was slowly allowed back into the open.

In the late 1970s, as China's new leaders began easing government controls "the churches all opened. We could practice our religion," recalls Bishop Liu. "We didn't have any books or vestments, but we started to preach again."

But the Communist Party's opening to religion came with a stark choice: cooperate with the government, and be allowed to preach openly, or continue in hiding. Bishop Liu wanted to work in the open.

The government in Inner Mongolia, where Bishop Liu had served much of his sentence, still saw him as a political criminal. So, in 1983 he left and went to Yinchuan, capital of the western province of Ningxia. It was there that, at the age of 70, he truly began his life's work.

"I still had something to do for the Lord: find a way to build up the church," Bishop Liu says, holding forth in his room, next to Yinchuan's church, which holds a desk, some chairs for visitors, a spartan cot and a toilet.

Yinchuan has a harsh, dry climate and a heavily Muslim population. Yet it proved fertile ground for the Catholic missionaries who first arrived in 1879. By 1950, Catholic records showed about 35,000 believers in Ningxia.

But when Bishop Liu -- then just an ordinary priest -- arrived in 1983, Catholicism had been driven almost completely from public life. His first task was to make contact with those believers who were left. He traveled around its many isolated mountain villages, reconnecting with Catholics who had gone into hiding. He also scrounged together land, money and material to rebuild Yinchuan's crumbling cathedral.

DOJ_NMG_0125119

The government was prepared to give the church and the land back to local Catholics. Bishop Liu still had to find the resources to rebuild the church and keep it running. In 1984, he cut a deal, giving up part of the church's land to a government real-estate company in exchange for money to build a new church. The building, finished in 1987, still stands.

Building up the human base of the diocese proved just as challenging. A half-dozen nuns had survived, but they were even older than Bishop Liu. So he roamed around northwest China to recruit. Today, Bishop Liu has 11 priests by his side and 20 or so nuns and has also set up 14 churches outside Yinchuan.

His church is still struggling. "Our biggest difficulty here is that the congregation isn't big enough," says Bishop Liu. He estimates he looks after seven or eight thousand Catholics -- many more than in 1983, but just a tiny fraction of the province's roughly six million people.

In 1993, he was named bishop of Ningxia by the Patriotic Association. He squared that with his faith by seeking, and receiving, a blessing from Pope John Paul II. Having a recognized official status has been a help: Bishop Liu has used his government contacts to get some money sent from a seminary in wealthy Shanghai.

Jeroom Heyndrickx, a Belgian priest who has known the bishop for more than 20 years, says Catholics critical of the official church should still respect his accomplishments. "He is in my view a great man, a courageous man," says Father Heyndrickx. "These old priests and bishops have done a tremendous job to rebuild the church, and have been misunderstood for it."

Search for a Successor

While Bishop Liu has found a way to practice in the open church without breaking ties with Rome, he must now find a successor who can do the same. Three years ago, a bishop in a neighboring province recommended a priest who has become his preferred candidate: Li Jing, a German-trained theologian who is now vice-rector at the government-supported National Seminary in Beijing. Father Li, 38, says he feels too young and inexperienced to take up the post, but will not contest the judgment of his elders in the church.

Father Li hasn't been formally appointed yet. To become a bishop in China's open church he must be elected by the diocese, in a meeting that usually includes the local priests and some nuns and prominent laypeople. They will then seek approval for the choice from the patriotic association.

In recent years, the process has often included some kind of informal approach to the pope, where the candidate will write to ask for his blessing, as Bishop Liu did. (Though direct communication is technically not permitted, word can be passed through Catholics in Hong Kong and Taiwan.) The Vatican has tried to bring the open church into the fold, noting in its recent statement that "almost all of the bishops and priests are in communion with the Supreme Pontiff."

The Vatican has maintained hopes that such informal coordination could eventually serve as the basis of a more formal agreement that would end the conflict over the church's status in China, of the sort it has reached with other Communist nations like Vietnam. Just last week, Vietnam's prime minister met with Pope Benedict in the Vatican -- a historic first that Vatican officials believe could eventually lead to a restoration of diplomatic ties.

Mixed Signals

In China, though, the Patriotic Association has been sending mixed signals. Of the five new Chinese bishops consecrated in the official church in 2006, two of them were consensus appointments, with both papal and government approval. However, the other three, who now head the dioceses of Kunming in the southwest and Anhui and Xuzhou in the east, did not receive papal approval.

The Vatican doesn't publicly discuss the selection process, but church observers say the priests who didn't receive the pope's blessing were seen by some as too close to the government and unlikely to stand up for church interests.

One of the priests, Liu Xinhong, the new bishop of Anhui, had asked for the pope's approval. Although he didn't receive it, he took the post anyway. He acknowledged in an interview with state-run media that his decision caused the priests and nuns in his diocese much "internal turmoil."

The Vatican called his appointment and others "a grave wound to the unity of the church." A senior church official who has advised the pope on the issue said the consecrations have revived fears that China's leadership will reverse some of the accommodation of recent years and try to consolidate the open church's independence from Rome. That could mean a schism in the church, creating a rival version of the Catholic faith in the world's most populous country.

Bishop Liu, whose few remaining wisps of hair float out from his skullcap, knows he may not have enough time to see his ultimate hope realized.

"We are with the pope," he says. "We want to bring the churches together."

Bond In Beijing (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 31, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0125120

James Bond and Communist China, foes for more than 45 years, have called a truce -- at least long enough for the latest installment in the Ian Fleming spy series, "Casino Royale," to premiere in Beijing.

It's the 21st film in the Bond franchise and the first to officially screen in China, which has always found something to object to in the plots of previous films. "Die Another Day," starring Pierce Brosnan, portrayed Beijing ally North Korea as a crazy authoritarian regime. In "The World Is Not Enough," Hollywood's version of a Rupert Murdoch-like character buys off a Chinese general to gain exclusive broadcasting rights in mainland China. In "Casino Royale," 007 merely rolls the dice with bankrollers of terrorism.

The longtime Bond ban hasn't stopped Chinese fans from getting their fix. Pirated copies of Bond movies have been circulating in China for years, much like pirated copies of just about everything else made by Hollywood. Hours before "Casino Royale's" Beijing debut, director Martin Campbell found DVDs of his movie for sale on the street. He paid about $1 for one and his name wasn't even on the credits.

The first Bond movie was released in 1962, when Mao Zedong's China was on the brink of the Cultural Revolution. The Party hasn't been quick to embrace the debonair Western spy, who always outwits his hapless Cold War -- often Communist -- adversaries. Now that Agent 007 is finally on Her Majesty's Secret Service in Beijing, we hope it will stir some thought in the Communist Party's halls of power about the ideas that Mr. Bond fights for.

Will The African Union Help Somalia? (CSM)

By Scott Baldauf

The Christian Science Monitor, January 31, 2007

JOHANNESBURG, SOUTH AFRICA

As African leaders met for the second and last day of the African Union (AU) Summit Tuesday in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, there were many questions about unfinished business and what they have actually accomplished.

Chief among them is the shaky AU peacekeeping force planned for war-ravaged Somalia. While a few African countries – Uganda, Nigeria, and Malawi – have pledged 2,500 of the 8,000 requested troops, most remain silent.

South Africa, a regional power normally willing and able to send peacekeepers, gave a definite "no" this week, citing its own overstretched military, the lack of Western donor support, and the lack of a workable peace plan.

Its concerns underscore the stumbling blocks for the AU as a whole. And with multiple peacekeeping missions throughout the continent, the AU may be reaching the limits of its capacity to handle more conflicts.

"I get a sense that troop-contributing countries want a better understanding of the situation in [Somalia] before sending their troops," says Matt Bryden, an analyst for the International Crisis Group in Nairobi. Even if countries do soon commit to sending 8,000 troops, Mr. Bryden says that may not be enough. "With 8,000 peacekeepers, they'll be hard-pressed to provide airport and VIP protection, let alone protecting the cities," he says. "It's not realistic."

Top AU diplomat Alpha Konare chastised African countries Monday. "We cannot simply wait for others to do the work in our place," he said, warning of chaos in Somalia if peacekeepers aren't deployed soon.

In theory, the AU should behave like the European Union (EU), with common policies on trade, development, and defense. African nations should come to each other's aid, to help sort out conflicts, and to provide peacekeeping forces as needed by their fellow governments. But the AU already has missions in Ivory Coast, Burundi, and the Democratic Republic of Congo, to name a few.

"I think it's like the electricity here, at some point the demand is greater than the supply, and it just runs out," says Tom Wheeler, a former South African ambassador, and now a research fellow at the South African Institute for International Affairs in Johannesburg. "It's not an unwillingness on South Africa's part; we simply don't have people to send. I believe the US is also finding itself in that same situation."

As AU leaders at the summit scrambled Tuesday to convince member nations to send more troops, Somalia's President Abdullahi Yusuf agreed under intense pressure from the US, the EU, and the UN to start a reconciliation conference with all religious and clan leaders, including moderates among Somalia's Islamists, who were overthrown by Somalian and Ethiopian troops earlier this month.

Willingness to include moderate Islamist leaders in talks could pave the way to a peace plan that analysts say is key to getting African countries and Western donors to contribute enough troops and money for an effective peacekeeping force. The EU reacted to Mr. Yusuf's announcement by pledging to donate $20 million for the peacekeeping force.

Still, many experts believe that the mission will depend on how events unfold in the next few weeks.

Tuesday, Somalia's Islamists posted a videotape on their official Web site warning that any African peacekeepers would be seen as invaders, highlighting the dangers of the mission. But if Somalia's weak Transitional Federal Government (TFG) acts on its announcement to reach out and share power with a broad section of Somali society, then attacks on remaining Ethiopian troops may diminish.

DOJ_NMG_0125121

"I think you may well see a staggered deployment, with limited numbers going in doing the most limited tasks, protecting the TFG, and providing escorts for VIPs," say Bryden. "A lot depends on what happens with the first group of peacekeepers. If they find themselves facing attacks the way the Ethiopians and TFG are, you're not going to see a lot of appetite for expansion."

As attacks on Ethiopian troops intensified this week, Ethiopian President Meles Zenawi announced that his country would withdraw one-third of its troops.

Mr. Zenawi said last week that Ethiopia had accomplished its mission, and now the future of Somalia rests in the hands of its new leaders and Western donors.

"The problem might be those who have resources may be reluctant to provide the necessary resources," he said. "If the international community chips in that is fine. If they don't it will be up to them," he added.

AU peacekeeping planners estimate that the AU will need $160 million for the first six months of its mission. Besides the EU announcement to contribute $20 million, the US has promised $40 million.

But, perhaps most important, the AU needs a peace plan to enforce, says Richard Cromwell, a senior analyst at the Institute for Security Studies in Tshwane (as the South African capital city of Pretoria is now called.)

"There is no peace plan, and no political or diplomatic framework on which to hang a mission," says Mr. Cromwell. "If one looks at the context of the AU summit, it's nice to say you are going to send troops, but it's another thing to actually send them. Why would you devote rare African troops to a quagmire when you might need them for future conflicts?"

Early Accolades For UN's New Chief – With Caveats (CSM)

By Howard Lafranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, January 31, 2007

UNITED NATIONS, N.Y.

When spending and accounting questions arose recently about the United Nations Development Program in North Korea, new UN Secretary-General Ban Ki Moon wasted little time moving into damage-control mode.

After all, he was fully aware of the toll that the Iraq oil-for-food scandal had taken on both the UN and his predecessor, Kofi Annan.

And so Mr. Ban summoned a top UNDP administrator, organized media access to some of the program's senior staff, and issued a statement calling for "an urgent, system-wide and external inquiry" into the financial activities of all UN programs.

That quick action within the first month of his arrival on the job has won Ban some early accolades – including from some quarters among US conservatives that are never prone to kind words about the UN.

"Just by promising an investigation into the UNDP scandal, he sets a different tone, and that is very refreshing after the secrecy that cloaked the institution in the Kofi Annan years," says Nile Gardiner, a UN expert and frequent critic at the Heritage Foundation in Washington.

Yet even as he wins some initial praise, Ban is also raising some questions with his first appointments, while leading others to wonder if he isn't coming off as too much of a big-powers secretary-general. Ban, they worry, is showing signs of paying deference to a time-honored system that divvies up key posts among the powers that formed the UN system six decades ago – the US, Britain, and France in particular.

"So far, there's been some of the same division of senior posts on the traditional great-power spoils system that we've seen in the past," says Michael Doyle, a former senior UN official now at Columbia University in New York.

As necessary as Ban's quick jump to answer questions about UN operations in North Korea may have been, it also runs some risks, says Mr. Doyle.

"It raises the broader perception that Mr. Ban is dancing to a tune being played in Washington," he says. That is especially true, others say, because Ban issued his audits edict right after The Wall Street Journal editorial page – a prominent critic of Mr. Annan and his handling of the oil-for-food scandal – ran a column questioning UNDP's North Korea operations.

Ban's appointments so far

Ban did name a top British diplomat as the UN's humanitarian chief, and speculation is widespread at UN headquarters that Americans and French officials are in line for key diplomatic posts, which could be announced after a reorganization that Ban ordered is complete. Now out of the running for the humanitarian post, the US is seeking the top political-affairs post – a possibility that some UN experts say could actually run counter to US interests by making the UN look too much like a tool of American diplomacy.

DOJ_NMG_0125122

Yet other appointments could suggest a worrying turn to UN insiders and inexperienced officials, some say. "On the negative side, I think we're seeing some very questionable appointments," says Mr. Gardiner. "Ban has to be very firm on reform, and while the quick action on the UNDP is a good sign, some of his appointments look less promising."

Some critics are questioning Ban's naming of a Mexican environmentalist and bureaucrat long involved in Latin America development issues to be in charge of reform, or of Tanzania's foreign minister, Asha-Rose Migiro, as his deputy.

This week, Ban has attended the African Union summit in Ethiopia, and he'll be in Washington on Friday for a meeting on the Middle East with other international officials.

A public official with more than three decades of experience maneuvering the tricky diplomatic straits of the Korean peninsula, Ban demonstrated his political acumen by moving fast on the questions about international aid to North Korea: Not only was he recognizing the damage another festering scandal could do to the UN, experts say, but he was also highlighting that this was a problem he inherited, not one of his administration's doing.

"What I sense is a leader very determined to protect his reputation and that of the UN," says Lee Feinstein, an expert in international organizations at the Council on Foreign Relations in Washington.

As important as that may be, it will matter to the world most if Ban uses the strengths flowing from a refurbished UN image to pursue some daunting long-term goals, Mr. Feinstein says. Those goals, he says, include enhanced peacekeeping capacity and the means to head off future repeats of global humanitarian crises – such as what occurred in Rwanda in the mid-1990s and what many consider genocide that is now transpiring in Sudan's Darfur region.

"Can he put some meat on the bones of the concept the [UN] General Assembly endorsed of a 'responsibility to protect' when member states don't protect their own citizens?" Feinstein queries.

Aside from such lofty notions, Ban is also demonstrating what some consider freshness – or what others call unwise unguardedness. An unscripted Ban told reporters in response to questions about the execution of Saddam Hussein that the death penalty is a matter for individual countries to decide. That touched off an uproar among human rights activists who said the UN was on record in opposition to the death penalty – and it caused Ban to quip that he had been given the shortest honeymoon of any UN secretary-general.

A lighter side

He has also offered peeks at what those who know him say is a keen sense of humor. For example, he lavished praise on journalist Sam Donaldson at a Washington news conference, then deadpanned that it was a "great pleasure" to take a question from him. He also used a familiar Christmas tune (Guess which one?) to "warn" UN correspondents at a year-end dinner:

I'm making a list,
I'm checking it twice
I'm going to find out who's naughty or nice
Ban Ki Moon is coming to town.

He's also quickly showing aides carried over from the last UN administration how he is different from Annan. For example, whereas Annan was happy to have a synopsis of the news faxed to his Astor Place home to peruse over breakfast, Ban wants his personal morning-news briefing early and in the office.

"I told my wife that hours may have been long under Annan," one assistant in the secretary-general's operations says, "but that she should plan on them being even longer under Ban Ki Moon."

Lord Levy Arrested For Second Time (FT)

By Ft Reporters

Financial Times, January 31, 2007

Lord Levy, Tony Blair's chief personal fundraiser, was arrested for a second time in the cash-for-honours police inquiry, it has emerged.

Police sources said that the peer had been arrested on Tuesday on suspicion of conspiracy to pervert the course of justice.

Lord Levy was arrested when he turned up voluntarily at a police station to have his bail terms renewed. He has not been charged and was released on bail pending further inquiries.

This was the third time that Lord Levy had returned to the police to have his bail terms renewed since his first arrest on July 12 last year in connection with the 1925 honours act and the 2001 Political Parties, Elections and Referendums act.

Lord Levy's spokesman could not immediately be reached for comment.

The latest twist in a police inquiry into allegations that Tony Blair sought to reward wealthy businessmen who lent the party millions of pounds in loans by nominating them for peerages follows the arrest of Ruth Turner, Mr Blair's director of government relations and a senior gatekeeper, on January 19.

DOJ_NMG_0125123

Ms Turner was arrested on suspicion of perverting the course of justice and in connection with alleged offences under the 1925 honours act. She was later released without charge and bailed pending further inquiries. It was the third time police had quizzed her.

As well as looking into possible breaches of electoral laws and whether honours have been sold illegally, detectives are seeking to establish whether any evidence has been witheld or destroyed. The arrest and release of Ms Turner led to accusations, emphatically denied by Downing Street, of a "cover up" by the government.

Scotland Yard said at the time that, as a result, "additional investigation" would be required and the inquiry could run into March before the police send a file to the Crown Prosecution Service. Ms Turner was the first salaried government official to be arrested as part of the 10-month investigation.

On Tuesday the Metropolitan Police said in a statement: "On July 12 2006, a man attended a London police station where he was arrested in connection with alleged offences under the Honours (Prevention of Abuses) Act 1925 and Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000."

"He returned on bail on September 20 where he was interviewed then re-bailed pending further enquiries. He returned on bail on December 4 and was re-bailed pending further enquiries."

"He returned on bail today in connection with alleged offences under the Honours (Prevention of Abuses) Act 1925 and Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000 and was also arrested on suspicion of conspiracy to pervert the course of justice. He has been bailed pending further enquiries."

Police have given no indication whether anyone will be charged as a result of their inquiry.

In a regular briefing for reporters on Tuesday morning, the prime minister's official spokesman again denied reports that police had discovered there was a second computer system at Downing Street used by senior officials.

"There is only one system in Downing Street," he said, adding that police had had full access to it.

In a statement, a spokesman for Lord Levy said he "completely denies any allegations of wrongdoing whatsoever''.

Blair Ally Arrested In Corruption Probe (WP)

By Mary Jordan

The Washington Post, January 31, 2007

LONDON, Jan. 30 -- The chief fundraiser for Prime Minister Tony Blair's Labor Party was arrested Tuesday on suspicion of hampering a police investigation into whether the party offered seats in the House of Lords and other government honors in exchange for cash.

Michael Levy, a close friend of Blair's and special envoy to the Middle East, was arrested on "suspicion of conspiracy to pervert the course of justice." He was released on bail and has not been charged with a crime.

In July, Levy was arrested on suspicion of breaking the law by offering government honors to people who lent large sums of money to the ruling party.

A tennis partner of Blair's who became wealthy in the music industry, Levy has been dubbed "Lord Cashpoint" by British tabloids for his central role in the scandal. He issued a statement Tuesday denying "any allegations of wrongdoing whatsoever."

Many people here see the new charge as more significant than last summer's because it suggests an effort by people close to Blair to hide an offense. "The coverup seems to be the main focus now," said Tim Knox of the Center for Policy Studies in London. "It's a serious crime, and it could be easier to prove" than the initial charges.

Appointed seats in the House of Lords, the upper house of Parliament, could be offered to donors with only a "wink, nod and a handshake," Knox said. But he said it might be much easier for police to discover that e-mails or other documents had been destroyed or hidden in an effort to thwart the investigation.

"Increasingly, this sorry affair has the whiff of Watergate about it," Edward Davey, a member of Parliament from the Liberal Democrats, the third-largest political party here, told the BBC. Suspicion of a coverup is particularly angering people, Davey said.

In all, four people have been arrested in a burgeoning scandal that has made Blair the first sitting prime minister to be questioned by police in a criminal inquiry. The next step is for prosecutors to review the police findings and decide whether to press charges.

Blair announced last fall that he would step down, but he did not say exactly when. Under pressure from his own party and with his approval ratings plunging, Blair said he would not attend his party's next conference, to be held in September.

The cash-for-honors scandal, as it is known here, has increased public disillusionment with Blair, and many people say it could force him to resign earlier than he had planned. Blair has said he did nothing wrong.

Scotland Yard has said it is conducting a "cross-party investigation," and all major political parties are widely thought to have acted similarly with major donors.

DOJ_NMG_0125124

But the scandal has damaged Blair and his party more because they are in power. In addition, Blair promised to end the sleaze associated with former prime minister John Major's Conservative Party, which he trounced in an election a decade ago.

Earlier this month, Ruth Turner, a close aide of Blair's at his Downing Street office, was arrested on the same charges of offering government honors for money and suspicion of perverting justice. Two other people, Christopher Evans, an entrepreneur and major Labor Party donor, and Des Smith, a Labor government adviser, have also been arrested in the case. All were later released.

The Blair He Could Have Been (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, January 31, 2007

At the beginning of Tony Blair's political career, his Tory opponents gave him the nickname "Bambi" because of his fawn-like appearance. Now at the end of his 10 years as prime minister, Blair is mocked in Britain as America's "poodle," a slavishly loyal supporter of George Bush and the Iraq war.

Blair had a bit of both animal instincts, deer and dog, but he also had the brilliant political gifts that might have made him a truly great prime minister and the defining politician of his era. That's what makes his story so sad: This immensely talented politician was devoured by Iraq -- and by his support for an American president he kept thinking, wrongly, he could dissuade from mistakes.

Watching Blair deliver a farewell address to the World Economic Forum in Davos last weekend, it was impossible not to think of what might have been. He gave a visionary speech about the values of global interdependence that will be necessary in the 21st century if the world is to survive. The speech seemed to me, in part, a declaration of independence from Bush, the president who took so much from Blair and gave so little in return.

In terms of Blair's reputation, his global manifesto was too late to do him much good. When he leaves office as prime minister, probably this summer, his political legacy will be summed up in one ruinous word: Iraq. But perhaps other politicians -- especially some of the Democratic presidential candidates who are full of ambition but short on ideas -- will pay attention to what Blair had to say at Davos.

Blair tried to address the crucial disconnect of the modern world -- between a global economy that is seamlessly integrated and a global political system that is broken and ineffective. He went to the heart of this problem of global governance: How can institutions be fixed so that the overriding problems of the 21st century, such as climate change, poverty in Africa and the conflicts in the Middle East, can actually be solved?

The British prime minister proposed some specific fixes, most of which departed from current American policy. To strengthen the U.N. Security Council, he suggested adding Germany, Japan, Brazil, India, and perhaps a Muslim or African nation -- initially through a "bridging mechanism" that would provide semi-permanent status without a veto. To make the United Nations itself more effective, he urged consolidating its jumble of ineffective agencies so that it can speak with one voice in each country. He proposed merging the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank, improving their effectiveness and reducing their parochial European and American tilts, respectively. And he urged expansion of the Group of Eight nations to include emerging superstars such as China and India.

"We need a multilateralism that is muscular," Blair said. He argued that the problem wasn't so much a lack of political will as a lack of effective mechanisms to implement goals on which everyone agrees. He cited the genocidal conflict in Darfur, which he described as "a scandal; not a problem, a scandal." He also argued for a new binding agreement on global warming to replace the Kyoto accord and urged the world to meet the target he has set for Britain of a 60 percent reduction in carbon emissions by 2050. In all these comments, he sounded like a leader for a world that badly needs one.

The mystery is how this man who believes so passionately in a multilateral agenda became the apologist and enabler for the most unilateralist U.S. administration in modern history. Blair's supporters say he saw no alternative after Sept. 11, 2001, but to stand with America. At each step deeper into Iraq, he appeared to have misgivings -- as in his insistence on the need for a second U.N. resolution to provide legal authority for the war. But when the U.N. vote failed, and when his later efforts to sway the administration's Middle East policy went unheeded, Blair followed along meekly. The final indignity was when he stood silently by Bush in December as the president trashed proposals to engage Syria and Iran -- an idea Blair had privately championed.

Blair got it right when he said, in answer to a question after his Davos speech, that the West's fine talk of democracy and freedom has little meaning if it is not anchored in a sense of justice. Without such bedrock values, the grand goals of the Atlantic alliance are empty. Sadly, that might be Blair's own political epitaph: A great leader who too often subordinated his own values to please an American president.

The writer co-hosts, with Newsweek's Fareed Zakaria, PostGlobal, an online discussion of international issues athttp://blog.washingtonpost.com/postglobal. His e-mail address isdavidignatius@washpost.com.

DOJ_NMG_0125125

Self-rule Gets A Second Chance In Northern Ireland (USAT)

By Jeffrey Stinson

USA Today, January 31, 2007

LONDON — Northern Ireland's Catholics and Protestants got the go-ahead Tuesday for elections and joint self-rule this spring, following moves by the IRA and its political wing to end violence and accept rule of law.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair and Irish Prime Minister Bertie Ahern said voters in Northern Ireland would elect a new legislature March 7. They set a strict timetable: After elections, the new assembly has a week to form a Cabinet and until March 26 to take control of most government functions.

The two leaders vowed to dissolve the assembly — effectively placing the region back under British administration — if it does not to meet the deadlines. The last attempt at power-sharing failed soon after a government was formed in 2002.

"If at any point it became clear that parties were unwilling to fulfill their commitments ... it would be unreasonable to expect the people of Northern Ireland to continue with an election," Blair and Ahern said in a joint statement.

More than 3,500 people have been killed in fighting in Northern Ireland since 1969. The conflict has pitted Protestant loyalists or unionists, who favored retaining ties to Great Britain, against Catholic republicans, who wanted the north united with the Republic of Ireland.

The 1998 Good Friday peace accord, brokered by the United States, was an attempt to end sectarian violence in Northern Ireland by creating an autonomous government in which Protestants and Catholics shared power.

In the past year, "There has been significant and welcome progress ... and we remain fixed in our determination to see shared government returned to the people of Northern Ireland," Blair and Ahern said. "There is no reason for any further delay."

Once-bitter enemies — firebrand Protestant preacher Ian Paisley and former Irish Republican Army leader Martin McGuinness — head the main Protestant and Catholic parties. They would be in line to be the new government's top minister and deputy.

Tuesday's announcement followed two major developments:

— The Catholic republican party Sinn Fein (pronounced "shin fayn"), the political wing of the IRA, voted to support Northern Ireland's police force and criminal justice system. Sinn Fein had long rejected the authority of the police force. It accused the Protestant-dominated police of acting as an arm of the Protestant majority and the British government.

— A report issued earlier Tuesday by a joint British-Irish monitoring body affirmed that the IRA has ceased involvement in violence and crime and is no longer buying weapons. The Independent Monitoring Commission, which tracks paramilitary activity, said the IRA was adhering to its 2005 pledge to reject violence in favor of achieving its goals through politics.

The commission said IRA members had not been involved in shootings or assaults for more than a year.

The commission said some IRA members "continue to be engaged in crime, including offenses such as smuggling ... and tax evasion." That criminal activity, however, was against IRA policy and was occurring despite IRA efforts to end it, the report said.

Merkel To Fight Vehicle Emissions Plan (FT)

By Hugh Williamson

Financial Times, January 31, 2007

Angela Merkel on Tuesday vowed to fight plans for European restrictions on vehicle emissions.

The German chancellor said the government would “fight with all its strength” against moves by the European Commission to impose a cap on vehicle carbon emissions to combat global warming.

Signalling her determination to defend the interests of Germany’s powerful car industry, the German chancellor told a business conference in Berlin that she “would certainly block” any binding regulation that did not differentiate between different car sizes.

Her forceful intervention – in contrast with her usual co-operative tone towards the Commission – is likely to increase tensions in a heated battle involving the car industry, environmentalists and José Manuel Barroso, Commission president.

Mr Barroso believes legislation is needed to force carmakers to reduce the carbon emissions of the cars they manufacture, but last week announced a delay in reaching agreement on a legislative strategy because of divisions among his commissioners on the issue.

The car industry looks almost certain to fail to fulfil its voluntary agreement to cut emissions to 140 grammes per kilometre by 2008.

Ms Merkel said it was a “regrettable fact” that the European car industry was not fulfilling this agreement, but said a “general regulation for all [car] sizes” would be wrong.

DOJ_NMG_0125126

She said a “sectoral approach”, with different emissions limits for different car sizes, would be appropriate. German companies, including DaimlerChrysler, Volkswagen and BMW, specialise in larger models with higher emissions, so would be hit hard by a general cap, industry officials argue.

She said that not just such emissions, but also other environmental initiatives, especially the increased use of biofuels, should count towards a country’s performance in reaching climate change goals for the car industry. She said Germany was ahead of other European Union member states in its use of biofuels and this “should be taken account of” by Brussels.

Ms Merkel’s intervention was reminiscent of similar comments by her predecessor Gerhard Schröder, who was seen as close to the car industry, and who regularly picked battles with Brussels on aspects of industry policy. Her comments also come at a sensitive time, with Germany just one month into its presidency of the EU.

Mr Barroso’s aides said he was not overly concerned by Ms Merkel’s comments, which were seen in Brussels as an understandable attempt to reassure one of the country's most powerful industries.

His aides also noted that a general cap was not under consideration.

The Nuclear Threat (WSJ)

By Mikhail Gorbachev

The Wall Street Journal, January 31, 2007

The essay "A World Free of Nuclear Weapons1," published in this newspaper on Jan. 4, was signed by a bipartisan group of four influential Americans -- George Shultz, William Perry, Henry Kissinger and Sam Nunn -- not known for utopian thinking, and having unique experience in shaping the policies of previous administrations. It raises an issue of crucial importance for world affairs: the need for the abolition of nuclear weapons.

As someone who signed the first treaties on real reductions in nuclear weapons, I feel it is my duty to support their call for urgent action.

The road to this goal began in November 1985 when Ronald Reagan and I met in Geneva. We declared that "a nuclear war cannot be won and must never be fought." This was said at a time when many people in the military and among the political establishment regarded a war involving weapons of mass destruction as conceivable and even acceptable, and were developing various scenarios of nuclear escalation.

It took political will to transcend the old thinking and attain a new vision. For if a nuclear war is inconceivable, then military doctrines, armed forces development plans and negotiating positions at arms-control talks must change accordingly. This began to happen, particularly after Reagan and I agreed in Reykjavik in October 1986 on the need ultimately to eliminate nuclear weapons. Concurrently, major positive changes were occurring in world affairs: A number of international conflicts were defused and democratic processes in many parts of the world gained momentum, leading to the end of the Cold War.

As U.S.-Soviet arms negotiations got off the ground, a breakthrough was achieved -- the treaty on the elimination of medium- and shorter-range missiles, followed by agreement on 50% reduction in strategic offensive weapons. If the negotiations had continued in the same vein and at the same pace, the world would have been rid of the greater part of the arsenals of deadly weapons. But this did not happen, and hopes for a new, more democratic world order were not fulfilled. In fact, we have seen a failure of political leadership, which proved incapable of seizing the opportunities opened by the end of the Cold War. This glaring failure has allowed nuclear weapons and their proliferation to pose a continuing, growing threat to mankind.

The ABM Treaty has been abrogated; the requirements for effective verification and irreversibility of nuclear-arms reductions have been weakened; the treaty on comprehensive cessation of nuclear-weapons tests has not been ratified by all nuclear powers. The goal of the eventual elimination of nuclear weapons has been essentially forgotten. What is more, the military doctrines of major powers, first the U.S. and then, to some extent, Russia, have re-emphasized nuclear weapons as an acceptable means of war fighting, to be used in a first or even in a "pre-emptive" strike.

All this is a blatant violation of the nuclear powers' commitments under the Non-Proliferation Treaty. Its Article V is clear and unambiguous: Nations that are capable of making nuclear weapons shall forgo that possibility in exchange for the promise by the members of the nuclear club to reduce and eventually abolish their nuclear arsenals. If this reciprocity is not observed, then the entire structure of the treaty will collapse.

The Non-Proliferation Treaty is already under considerable stress. The emergence of India and Pakistan as nuclear-weapon states, the North Korean nuclear program and the issue of Iran are just the harbingers of even more dangerous problems that we will have to face unless we overcome the present situation. A new threat, nuclear weapons falling into the hands of terrorists, is a challenge to our ability to work together internationally and to our technological ingenuity. But we should not delude ourselves: In the final analysis, this problem can only be solved through the abolition of nuclear weapons. So long as they continue to exist, the danger will be with us, like the famous "rifle on the wall" that will fire sooner or later.

DOJ_NMG_0125127

Last November the Forum of Nobel Peace Laureates, meeting in Rome, issued a special statement on this issue. The late Nobel laureate and world-renowned scientist, Joseph Rotblat, initiated a global awareness campaign on the nuclear danger, in which I participated. Ted Turner's Nuclear Threat Initiative provides important support for specific measures to reduce weapons of mass destruction. With all of them we are united by a common understanding of the need to save the Non-Proliferation Treaty and of the primary responsibility of the members of the nuclear club.

We must put the goal of eliminating nuclear weapons back on the agenda, not in a distant future but as soon as possible. It links the moral imperative -- the rejection of such weapons from an ethical standpoint -- with the imperative of assuring security. It is becoming clearer that nuclear weapons are no longer a means of achieving security; in fact, with every passing year they make our security more precarious.

The irony -- and a reproach to the current generation of world leaders -- is that two decades after the end of the Cold War the world is still burdened with vast arsenals of nuclear weapons of which even a fraction would be enough to destroy civilization. As in the 1980s, we face the problem of political will -- the responsibility of the leaders of major powers for bridging the gap between the rhetoric of peace and security and the real threat looming over the world. While agreeing with the Jan. 4 article that the U.S. should take the initiative and play an active role on this issue, I believe there is also a need for major efforts on the part of Russian and European leaders and for a responsible position and full involvement of all states that have nuclear weapons.

I am calling for a dialogue to be launched within the framework of the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, involving both nuclear-weapon states and non-nuclear-weapon states, to cover the full range of issues related to the elimination of those weapons. The goal is to develop a common concept for moving toward a world free of nuclear weapons.

The key to success is reciprocity of obligations and actions. The members of the nuclear club should formally reiterate their commitment to reducing and ultimately eliminating nuclear weapons. As a token of their serious intent, they should without delay take two crucial steps: ratify the comprehensive test ban treaty and make changes in their military doctrines, removing nuclear weapons from the Cold War-era high alert status. At the same time, the states that have nuclear-power programs would pledge to terminate all elements of those programs that could have military use.

The participants in the dialogue should report its progress and the results achieved to the United Nations Security Council, which must be given a key coordinating role in this process.

Over the past 15 years, the goal of the elimination of nuclear weapons has been so much on the back burner that it will take a true political breakthrough and a major intellectual effort to achieve success in this endeavor. It will be a challenge to the current generation of leaders, a test of their maturity and ability to act that they must not fail. It is our duty to help them to meet this challenge.

Mr. Gorbachev was the leader of the Soviet Union from 1985 to 1991.

A Dirty Case (WP)

The Washington Post, January 31, 2007

WHEN THE former Russian KGB agent Alexander Litvinenko died of polonium poisoning in November, many people assumed that his murder, like those of numerous other opponents of Russian President Vladimir Putin, would never be solved. But Mr. Litvinenko was killed in London, not in Moscow, and Scotland Yard believes it has cracked the case. According to reports in several of Britain's leading newspapers, the police have concluded that two former KGB agents who met Mr. Litvinenko at a hotel on Nov. 1 are prime suspects in his death.

The two men are Andrei Lugovoy, a former KGB bodyguard to top Communist apparatchiks, and Dmitry Kovtun, a former army officer in Czechoslovakia and East Germany. They allegedly left traces of polonium-210, the rare substance that killed Mr. Litvinenko, nearly everywhere they went on their journey from Moscow to London and back. The teapot used at their meeting with Mr. Litvinenko was found to be heavily contaminated, according to the newspaper reports. In fact, the assassins apparently delivered something like a "dirty bomb" of radiation to London: According to Britain's Health Protection Agency, contamination was found at 20 sites around the city, and 129 people appear to have been exposed.

Given the seriousness of the crime, a vigorous prosecution of the Russians might be expected. Only, they have a powerful protector: Mr. Putin's own government, which, while denying any culpability in Mr. Litvinenko's killing, is nevertheless blocking British access to Mr. Lugovoy and Mr. Kovtun. During a visit to Moscow in December, British detectives were not allowed to directly question the two men, who were then staying in hospitals. Russian officials then opened their own "investigation" and drew up a long list of Putin enemies in London -- from Chechen rebels to former executives of the Yukos oil company. No evidence connects anyone on the Russian list to the murder, but Moscow is saying it will not allow Scotland Yard access to the real suspects unless it can interrogate its targets in Britain.

There's no proof yet that Mr. Putin ordered or approved the London dirty bomb, but the questions for him keep multiplying: Why, if the Russian authorities are innocent, do they deny access to Mr. Lugovoy and Mr. Kovtun? Why do they continue to blame enemies of Mr. Putin without offering any evidence? What explains the leakage of a dangerous quantity of polonium, which is produced and held almost exclusively in Russia? And why, as a Polish newspaper documented last week, were pictures of Mr. Litvinenko being employed for target practice last November at a training center used by elite Russian special forces? The director of the center, a founder of a special operations unit, was accused by Mr. Litvinenko of being a KGB agent whose facility prepared contract killers. Mr. Putin is holding his annual international news conference tomorrow; we hope he'll be prompted for some answers.

DOJ_NMG_0125128

DOJ_NMG_0125129

Miller, Charles S

From: Miller, Charles S
Sent: Wednesday, January 31, 2007 10:49 AM
To: Ablin, Erik; Agarwal, Asheesh (CRT); Ames, Andrew; Battaglia, John T; Baxter, Felix (CIV); Beckner, Rick (CIV); Blomquist, Kathleen M; Branda, Joyce (CIV); Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); Bukvics, Jennifer (CIV); Claterbos, Barbara (CIV); Cohen, David M. (CIV); Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Davidson, Jeanne (CIV); Davis, Dan (CIV); Davis, Deborah J; Fargo, John (CIV); Fielding, Gabrielle (CIV); Fischer, Gerard (CIV); Flentje, August (CIV); Frost, Peter (CIV); Garren, Timothy (CIV); Glynn, J.Patrick (CIV); Gorsuch, Neil M; Gunn, Currie (SMO); Hertz, Michael (CIV); Hollis, Robert (CIV); Hunt, Jody (CIV); Hussey, Thom (CIV); Jeweler, James (CIV); Katsas, Gregory; Keisler, Peter D (CIV); Kohn, Chris (CIV); Kopp, Robert (CIV); Letter, Douglas (CIV); Levine, Larry (EOIR); Lindemann, Michael (CIV); Magnuson, Cynthia; McCallum, Robert (SMO); McDonald, Esther Slater; McMahon, Linda M (CIV); Miller, Charles S; Nichols, Carl (CIV); Nowacki, John (USAEO); O'Quinn, John C; Osborn, Tara (CIV); Pyles, Phyllis (CIV); Rivera, Jennifer (CIV); Roehrkasse, Brian; Schiffer, Stuart (CIV); Scolinos, Tasia; Seidel, Rebecca; Senger, Jeffrey M; Shaw, Aloma A; Spellberg, Dianne (CIV); Swenson, Lily F; Thirolf, Eugene; Wilson, Karen L; Zwick, Ken (CIV)
Subject: 1/31/07 Civil Division News

Surveillance case to pit strong views; The U.S. argues that the ACLU challenge of Bush's domestic wiretap program is moot

Federal appeals court to hear spying issue

Washington Post Drops Demand To View Cheney's Visitor Logs

Arrest warrants for alleged CIA kidnap; Munich prosecutors seek 13 people linked to rendition of German citizen

Hicks charges false, lawyer claims

EDITORIAL: Where's the contrition for rendition? Maher Arar, wrongfully deported and tortured in Syria, got an apology from Canada but not the United States

Ex-border agent wants job back after being cleared in 2nd trial

Los Angeles Times

January 31, 2007

Surveillance case to pit strong views; The U.S. argues that the ACLU challenge of Bush's domestic wiretap program is moot.

By Henry Weinstein

Times Staff Writer

CINCINNATI — One of the Bush administration's most controversial initiatives in the war on terrorism is set for its first hearing in a federal appeals court in Cincinnati today, but if government lawyers have their way, the case will quickly be dismissed.

Justice Department attorneys contend that the challenge by the American Civil Liberties Union to the government's warrantless domestic surveillance program is moot because the program is now being monitored by a special court. They are asking that the ruling saying the program is unconstitutional be thrown out.

But ACLU lawyers say the case is still viable and are calling on the U.S. 6th Circuit Court of Appeals to affirm U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor's ruling in August that the Terrorist Surveillance Program violated the 1st and 4th amendments to the Constitution and ran afoul of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act.

Each side has described the case in stark terms.

The government lawyers, led by Solicitor General Paul D. Clement, say in their brief that "this case presents issues of the gravest order to the nation." If the appeals court construed FISA to prohibit the surveillance program, "it would be an unconstitutional encroachment on the executive's constitutional authority (and duty) to gather foreign intelligence, defend the nation against attack, and command the armed forces during wartime," the brief says.

The ACLU says in its brief that the case raises the fundamental questions of "whether the president has the authority to violate statutory law and the Constitution by engaging in warrantless wiretapping inside the United States. The district court correctly held that he does not."

The case stems from a program the Bush administration started after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. National Security Agency personnel listen in on phone calls and obtain e-mails into and out of the U.S. involving individuals suspected of being affiliated with terrorists.

Until very recently, the program bypassed the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court, which was created by Congress in 1978 after revelations of government abuses.

From 1978 through 2004, this court, made up of judges from around the country, rejected only four out of nearly 19,000 surveillance requests. The Bush administration nevertheless concluded that getting the court's approval limited its flexibility in looking for terrorists.

On Jan. 17, just two weeks before the government's appeal was to be heard in Cincinnati, Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales disclosed that the panel of judges overseeing the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act had started reviewing and approving government requests to spy on people thought to have ties to Al Qaeda.

Consequently, the government said the court challenge "no longer has any live significance."

At the same time, Justice Department lawyers said they were not backing away from their fundamental position: that the president has the "inherent authority" as the nation's commander in chief to conduct such surveillance activities.

ACLU attorney Ann Beeson countered that the government's failure to concede that point means that the case is still very much alive. "The government cannot have it both ways," Beeson wrote in a brief filed Friday. "It cannot argue that the case is moot because the government is currently in compliance with FISA, and at the same time expressly retain the authority to violate FISA tomorrow."

Before Gonzales' announcement, friend-of-the-court briefs had been filed supporting both positions.

Leading constitutional scholars, the Los Angeles County Bar Assn., the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press and several other organizations lodged papers in support of the ACLU. The Center for Security Policy, the Committee on the Present Danger, Judicial Watch and several other groups submitted briefs in support of the administration.

"Article II of the Constitution commands the president to respond to attacks against the nation from foreign aggressors…. This plenary authority to wage war includes the authority to gather intelligence concerning enemy activity," wrote attorney Andrew G. McBride in one of the pro-government friend-of-the-court briefs.

But a brief written by Stanford constitutional law professor Kathleen M. Sullivan says the government had gone much too far. "Whatever inherent powers the president might have under Article II [of the Constitution], they do not include the power to conduct a warrantless domestic surveillance campaign, of indefinite duration and unlimited scope, where a duly enacted statute expressly prohibits such conduct," Sullivan wrote.

A panel of three federal appellate judges — one appointed by a Democratic president and two by Republican presidents — are to hear the case.

Legal scholars are divided in predicting how the panel will approach the case, but some say the government appears to be facing more sympathetic jurists in Cincinnati than it did in Detroit before Judge Taylor, a liberal who came out of the civil rights movement.

In fact, the government has been unusually critical of Taylor in its briefs, saying she handled the case in a "heavy-handed" and "blunderbuss" fashion.

As is the custom, Taylor, an appointee of President Carter, has not commented on those characterizations. In her opinion in August, she specifically rejected the contention that the president had inherent authority to create a surveillance program that would not be subject to judicial scrutiny. "There are no hereditary kings in America and no powers not created by the Constitution," Taylor said in her 44-page decision.

END

AP

January 31, 2007

Federal appeals court to hear spying issue

Dan Sewell Associated Press

Cincinnati - President Bush's program of secretly monitoring communications without a court warrant faces legal assaults on its constitutionality in arguments today in a federal appeals court.

The government is appealing the ruling of a federal district judge in Detroit who said the warrantless surveillance violated rights of privacy and free speech as well as separation of powers. The Justice Department last week urged the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals to throw out the case, saying it was no longer at issue.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said this month that the secret panel of judges that oversees the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, passed by Congress in 1978, is now reviewing and approving applications to monitor people believed to have terrorist links. The Justice Department said in a court brief that means there's "no longer any live genuine controversy to adjudicate."

The American Civil Liberties Union, which sued over the warrantless surveillance a year ago, countered that there's no guarantee that the president won't resume what the government calls the Terrorist Surveillance Program outside the court. The ACLU also is challenging government secrecy in the case, saying it can't determine whether current actions are following the law.

"For all the drama around the case, we see the ultimate legal issue to be a very narrow, noncontroversial one - that is, when Congress passes a law, the president has to follow it," said Ann Beeson, the ACLU's lead attorney on the case. "If they were really committed to following the FISA law in the future, they should have no objection to being bound by the district court order."

The Justice Department said in a brief filed Tuesday that the court shouldn't be asked to rule on a hypothetical question about the future. U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor had ordered the government to halt the warrantless surveillance.

The National Security Agency program monitors international phone calls and e-mails to or from the United States when one party is believed to be a terrorist or to have terrorist ties. The government had said it sometimes needed to act without waiting for the secret court.

END

New York Sun

January 31, 2007

Washington Post Drops Demand To View Cheney's Visitor Logs

BY JOSH GERSTEIN - Staff Reporter of the Sun

The Washington Post has quietly retreated from a legal battle with Vice President Cheney by dropping a lawsuit demanding Secret Service logs of visitors to his office and residence.

The newspaper's Freedom of Information Act lawsuit prompted a flurry of press attention and court action just prior to the November election. In October, a district court judge in the capital, Ricardo Urbina, cited the looming vote when he ordered the Secret Service to comply immediately with the Post's request. However, just six days before the election, the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals issued an emergency stay blocking Judge Urbina's order.

"We have decided not to pursue litigation further, though we believe we would have prevailed in the court of appeals as we did in the trial court," a Post attorney, Eric Lieberman, said in an e-mail yesterday. He said the paper had "a fundamental goal" of getting the records to inform voters before the election and failed in that regard. "We also considered the fact that there are several other well positioned FOIA lawsuits seeking these same types of records, and we are confident that the public's right of access will ultimately be vindicated in them," Mr. Lieberman said.

Before the Post abruptly backed down, its case was shaping up as a high-profile clash between Mr. Cheney's broad notions of executive privilege and the newspaper's insistence that the public has the right to know about lobbying and influence peddling at the highest levels of government.

The Post withdrew its lawsuit in a one-page notice filed with Judge Urbina on January 8. An official at the newspaper said concerns about the cost of the litigation and about angering the White House did not play a role in the paper's decision.

A spokeswoman for Mr. Cheney, Lea Anne McBride, told The New York Sun that the government did not veer from its position that releasing the logs would violate the Constitution by interfering with the vice president's ability to seek candid advice. "That has not changed," she said yesterday.

"Disclosure of the records at issue could reveal an ever-expanding mosaic that would allow observers to chart the course of Vice Presidential contacts and deliberations in unprecedented fashion," government attorneys wrote during the legal maneuvering last fall. "Such an unwarranted intrusion into the most sensitive deliberations of the Vice Presidency cannot be countenanced."

In its records request, submitted in June, the Post sought information from the Secret Service about all visitors to Mr. Cheney and members of his senior staff since October 2004, both at the vice president's offices in the White House complex and at his official residence at the Naval Observatory in northwest Washington.

To fight the Post's lawsuit, government lawyers relied on a May 2006 memorandum of understanding that designated the Secret Service's visitor data as presidential records. While records of the Secret Service are subject to disclosure under the Freedom of Information Act, that law does not apply to the files of the president or his senior advisers.

The White House-Secret Service agreement was signed at about the same time the government released records of visits to the White House by a lobbyist who pleaded guilty to felony charges in an influence peddling scandal, Jack Abramoff. When it disclosed the Abramoff visits, the Secret Service said it had obtained the White House's consent and was not conceding any legal duty to release the data.

An attorney with a liberal watchdog group, Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, said the White House and the Secret Service cannot designate the protective agency's records off limits simply by executing an agreement.

"You can't do in a private memorandum what the law doesn't allow you to do," the lawyer, Anne Weismann, said. She said she thinks the memo was written to affect ongoing litigation. "The timing of it is very suspicious."

Ms. Weismann said the Post was aware of similar lawsuits her group is pressing. One seeks information about White House visits by prominent conservative religious leaders. The group is also suing the National Archives and Records Administration for details about an order it sent to the Secret Service in 2004, telling the agency to halt its practice of routinely deleting visitor log information after sending copies to the White House.

Ms. Weismann said her organization took a somewhat different tack than the Post, requesting information about named individuals rather than every visitor during a certain time frame. "We're not asking for records of all visitors," she said. "Our requests have been much more narrow."

Ms. Weismann stressed that the government could decline to release portions of the records on a variety of grounds, including personal privacy, but that the Secret Service has made the blanket claim that it doesn't have to comply with the requests at all. "The government is saying these records are not subject to FOIA even though they're sitting in Secret Service computers," she said.

END

AP

January 31, 2007

Arrest warrants for alleged CIA kidnap; Munich prosecutors seek 13 people linked to rendition of

German citizen

The Associated Press

BERLIN - Arrest warrants have been issued for 13 people in connection with the alleged CIA-orchestrated kidnapping of a German citizen in the agency's extraordinary rendition program, a Munich prosecutor said Wednesday.

Prosecutor Christian Schmidt-Sommerfeld said the warrants were issued in the last few days. He did not say for whom the warrants were issued, but indicated a statement would be issued later Wednesday.

Extraordinary rendition is a practice in which the U.S. government sends foreign terror suspects to third countries for interrogation.

Munich prosecutors have previously said that they had received from Spanish investigators the names of several U.S. secret agents believed to be involved in the kidnapping of Khaled al-Masri, a German citizen of Lebanese descent.

Al-Masri says he was abducted in December 2003 at the Serbian-Macedonia border and flown by the CIA to a detention center in Kabul, Afghanistan, where he was abused. Al-Masri says he was released in Albania in May 2004 after the CIA discovered they had the wrong person.

In September, German authorities said they received a list of about 20 suspects from Spanish investigators believed to have been involved in the case.

At the time, German media reported that Spanish authorities were probing the identities of the people they suspect flew aboard a Boeing 737 from the island of Palma de Mallorca on Dec. 24, 2003, to pick up al-Masri after he had been detained by Macedonian authorities.

ARD public television reported that investigators worked from passport photocopies made by a hotel where the suspects stayed. The report gave what it said were the cover names of three men who were pilots and lived in North Carolina.

In October, Munich prosecutors said that based on the list, they were seeking to ban several CIA agents suspected of kidnapping al-Masri from entering German territory. They did not elaborate.

The al-Masri case has been a sore point in otherwise good German-U.S. relations.

The U.S. Justice Department has declined to provide Munich prosecutors assistance, citing ongoing legal proceedings in the United States.

Al-Masri has asked a federal appeals court in Richmond, Va., to reinstate a lawsuit he filed against the CIA. A judge dismissed the lawsuit in May, ruling that a trial could harm national security by revealing details about CIA activities.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and other U.S. officials have declined to address the case. However, German Chancellor Angela Merkel has said the United States has acknowledged making a mistake with him.

END

The Age (Australia)

February 1, 2007

Hicks charges false, lawyer claims

Penelope Debelle, Adelaide

US PROSECUTORS were trying to create the false impression David Hicks would soon be charged to meet the deadline set by Prime Minister John Howard, Hicks' US military lawyer claimed last night.

In a statement from Guantanamo Bay — where Hicks was allegedly interrogated against his will by the Australian consul-general on Tuesday — Major Michael Mori said US prosecutor Colonel Morris Davis did not have the power to charge Hicks. Under the US Military Commissions Act, any charges against Hicks would be independently decided by a convening authority that was not yet appointed, Major Mori said.

"It appears the prosecution is trying to create a false impression that the system is moving to meet Prime Minister Howard's deadline without the independent decision being made by a convening authority."

Colonel Davis said yesterday new charges against Hicks were in the final stages of being prepared and could be laid as early as tomorrow. "I'm confident that by Friday we'll have everything in order and be ready to swear the charges," he said.

But Major Mori said the swearing of charges represented prosecution allegations and did not mean the charges were approved by the convening authority or that they would even proceed to trial. "It appears the prosecution is worried that there will be no official decision in time for Howard's deadline."

Following reports of Hicks' alleged deteriorating physical and mental health from his lawyers at Guantanamo Bay, the consul tried to meet Hicks on Tuesday to report back to Foreign Minister Alexander Downer on his wellbeing.

Hicks' Adelaide lawyer, David McLeod, from Guantanamo Bay accused the consul of forcibly interrogating Hicks in an attempt at political damage control.

Mr McLeod said the consul arrived unannounced in Hicks' cell on Tuesday morning and tried to see him later in an interview room with his lawyers present. However, Hicks refused to see him and Major Mori handed the consul a letter dated January 30, 2007, written by Hicks. In it, Hicks tells the consul he does not wish to see him, is afraid to talk to him and in the past has been punished for doing so.

"You are not here for me but on behalf of the Australian Govt (sic) who are leaving me here," Hicks writes. "If you want to do something for me, then get me out of here."

Prime Minister John Howard said Hicks was making it harder for himself by refusing to see consular officials.

Opposition Leader Kevin Rudd accused Mr Howard of negligence in aiding Hicks.

The Federal Government said a camp psychiatrist had seen Hicks on January 29, assessing his state as "good".

"His mental health was assessed as good, although he was 'frustrated'," Mr Downer said.

Hicks' father, Terry, said yesterday his son was mentally unwell.

END

Los Angeles Times

January 31, 2007

EDITORIAL: Where's the contrition for rendition? Maher Arar, wrongfully deported and tortured in Syria, got an apology from Canada but not the United States.

MAHER ARAR, a software engineer who was wrongly deported by the United States to his native Syria, where he was imprisoned and tortured for a year, has received an apology and an offer of $8.9 million from the government.

Before you think that the Bush administration has repented for mistreating Maher, we should add that the apology and the settlement offer came from the Canadian government, whose police force supplied the U.S. with faulty intelligence identifying Maher as an Islamic terrorist. The U.S. government, far from apologizing to Maher for seizing him at John F. Kennedy Airport in 2002 and sending him to Syria, refuses to remove his name from a terrorist watch list.

The administration hasn't made public the reasons for continuing that designation, although Justice Department and intelligence officials have agreed to brief Congress on the matter this week. Canada's minister of public safety, who has reviewed the confidential U.S. file on Arar, has said that it contains "nothing new" that would justify treating him as a terrorism suspect.

A Canadian inquiry exonerated Arar and concluded that U.S. authorities "removed him to Syria against his wishes and in the face of his statements that he would be tortured if sent there." Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper last week apologized for the "terrible ordeal" Arar endured. But not the Bush administration.

Is that because it has a legitimate reason to consider him dangerous? Or is it because an apology would draw attention to the policy of "extraordinary rendition" under which he and other suspected terrorists were spirited to other countries unburdened by U.S. notions of due process?

Because of the way it has conducted the war on terrorism, the Bush administration has lost the benefit of the doubt. Bush has insisted that "torture is never acceptable, nor do we hand over people to countries that do torture," but the facts say otherwise. The CIA kidnapped German citizen Khaled Masri in 2004 and flew him to Afghanistan for severe interrogation, a case that led German investigators to recommend issuing warrants against 13 U.S. intelligence operators. The president himself has said that the CIA used "an alternative set of procedures" to extract information from suspected terrorists.

Couple that record with the administration's general reluctance to confess error, and it's no wonder members of Congress are skeptical. If they aren't satisfied by the administration's explanations for continuing to stigmatize Arar, they should say so. And even at this late date, the president should examine his conscience and decide whether he doesn't owe this man and his family an apology.

END

AP

January 31, 2007

Ex-border agent wants job back after being cleared in 2nd trial

(McALLEN, TX) - A former U.S. Border Patrol agent who was convicted in 2001 of violating an illegal immigrant's civil rights during a fight has been cleared of the crime in a second trial.

David Sipe, 35, of Bethany, Okla., said he wants his old job back and wages lost during his hiatus from the Border Patrol.

"After having this over my head the last seven years, I am almost at a loss as to how I am supposed to behave now," Sipe said after Friday's verdict. "I haven't had a job that pays more than $9 an hour because when you are a pending felon nobody hires you.

"There is a lot of time that I lost that I don't get to have back."

In 2001, a federal jury found Sipe guilty of hitting Jose Guevara of Mexico in the head with a flashlight during an arrest near Penitas, which is just west of McAllen in South Texas.

Sipe argued that he was defending himself. Guevara required five staples in his head and later won an $80,000 lawsuit settlement from the government.

Sipe requested a new trial on the grounds that prosecutors suppressed evidence that would have helped his defense. U.S. District Judge Ricardo Hinojosa granted Sipe's request, and a federal appeals court upheld the Hinojosa's ruling.

According to court records, prosecutors withheld information such as benefits the government gave illegal immigrants used as witnesses in the case, including the right to work and travel freely in the United States. Court records also showed that the defense withheld accurate criminal histories of witnesses, and information about a personal dislike of Sipe by a fellow agent who saw Guevara first after the beating.

Defense attorney Jack Wolfe condemned the government's handling of the 2001 case, saying part of the testimony was "bought and paid for."

After Friday's verdict, U.S. District Judge Andrew Hanen told Sipe the second trial could have easily resulted in a guilty verdict. He admonished Sipe to handle authority carefully when dealing with anyone with less power.

"I think it's important that you understand, well, one, which I am sure you do, given the history of this case, that this decision could have easily been a guilty verdict," Hanen said, according to the court transcript.

Donald DeGabrielle Jr., U.S. attorney for the Southern District of Texas, said the jury in the second trial could have been influenced by the fact that Guevara couldn't identify Sipe years after the incident.

"It was a difficult case and we certainly don't like to lose cases; however, we respect the decision of the jury in this case, as we always do," he said. "I think the judge's comments in open court speak volumes about the way the case was tried."

END

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Thursday, February 1, 2007 8:12 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Thursday, February 01, 2007
Attachments:	agnb070201.pdf; agnb070201.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

DOJ To Share NSA Surveillance Program Documents With Congress....3
US Probing Equity Firm With Links To Islamic Investors....5
Judge Puts Guantanamo Detainee Suits On Hold....5
Germany Issues Warrants For 13 CIA Operatives In Abduction Case....6
UK Police Arrest Nine In Alleged Terror Murder Plot....6

Homeland Response:

Bush Sets Aside $25 Million For Ground Zero First Responders Health Care....7
Travel Industry Group Proposes Trusted Traveler Program....7
"Suspicious Devices" Shut Down Parts Of Boston....8
WPost Sees Better Options For Nuclear Plant Safety Than Building "Beamhenges."....8

War News:

Warner, Levin Join Forces On Anti-Surge Resolution....9
Bush Says US Taking Iran Threat "Very Seriously."....11
Twenty-Four Iraqis Killed Yesterday....13
Iraq Halts Flight To Syria, Iran Border Crossings....13
Top US Commander Says Shiite Militias Leaving Baghdad Positions....13
Kirkuk Could Become Another Front In Sectarian Conflict....13
Sunni, Shiite Lawmakers To Form New Blocks With Eye On Ending Sectarian Split....14
Oversight Agency Finds Waste, Failure In Iraq Reconstruction Projects....14
Al Qaeda Has Adapted, Organized Globally Over Past Year....15
Brooks Says Iraq War Has Spurred Expansionism, Not Isolationism....15
Some Fear Pentagon Reorganization May Jeopardize Special Operations Oversight....15
WPost Supports Troop "Surge" In Afghanistan....15

DOJ:

Leahy Hearing To Question US Attorney Departures....15
DOJ Names Knauss Interim Arizona US Attorney....16
Federal Judge Withdraws From Consideration For Los Angeles US Attorney....16

Corporate Scandals:

Judge Tosses Enron Broadband Conviction....17
Guilty Plea Is Latest Blow To Milberg Weiss....17
Cox Says SEC Is Aggressively Pursuing Options Cases....18
Dell's Founder Replaces CEO....18
Sonsini Advised Apple On Options Grant....19
Former Qwest CEO Settles Pension Suit For $1.5 Million....19
Senators Criticize SEC Hedge Fund Investigation....19

Criminal Law:

Cooper Testifies At Libby Trial, Says Rove Told Him About Plame....19
Indictments In Cunningham Probe Said To Be Near....20
Rhode Island Lawmaker Sentenced To 2½ Years In Prison For Bribery....21
Brooklyn DA Seeking Testimony From Mobster's Son Against DeVecchio....21
Blagojevich Orders Audit Of Drug-Testing Firm Under FBI Investigation....21
Execution Of New York Man Convicted Of Murdering Officers Could Be Years Away....22
Kodak Employee Sentenced To Probation For Kickback Scheme....22
Tennessee Man Pleads Guilty To Possessing, Producing Child Porn....23
Study Finds Vermont Sentencing Program Successful....23
Bush Urged To Pardon Convicted Border Agents....23
Closing Arguments Made At Coke Formula Theft Trial....24
Neighbors Stunned By Sex Offenders Posing As Family....24

DOJ Audit Finds More Problems With Massachusetts Crime Lab 24
O'Malley Praised For Opposing Death Penalty 24

Civil Law:

WellPoint Unit Settles Overcharges To FEHBP 24
FCC Proposes $10 Million Initial Payment In Radio Payola Settlement 25
Big Tobacco Worried About Smoking Ban Proposals In Virginia 25
Study Finds States Reporting Few Medicaid Fraud Cases To Special Unit 26

Civil Rights:

New Justice Unit To Target Human Trafficking 26
FBI Opens Preliminary Investigation Of Texas Police Shooting Death 27
Prosecutors In 1964 Racial Slaying Case Will Be Challenged By Fading Memories 27
Arrests Of Florida Student After Rape Claim Outrages Victims' Advocates 28 Study Finds Possible Racial Profiling At Two DC Locations 28

Antitrust:

Delta Creditors Reject US Airway's Hostile Takeover Bid 29
Express Scripts Seeks More Time For FTC Review Of Caremark Bid 30
Sanofi Seen As Well-Positioned For Successful Bristol Myers Bid 30
Vornado To Raise Bid For Equity Office Properties 31
Nasdaq Warns Of Consequences For LSE Should Takeover Bid Fail 31

Environment/Indian Affairs:

UN Panel Report Expected To Predict Warming Of 3 Degrees Celsius By 2100 31
Ethanol Transportation Strains Railroads 32
Federal Judge Schedules Near Hearing On "Divine Strake" Challenge 33
Quirk In Law Leaves Many Native Americans Without Counsel 33

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Schumer Proposes Plan To Fight Gang Violence, Drug Dealing Nationwide 34
Pro Leagues Face Criticism For Not Requiring HGH Blood Tests For Athletes 34
Bush Administration May Shift More Plan Colombia Resources Toward Economic Development 34
Deputy Marshal Pleads Not Guilty To Alleged Mob Leak 34

Immigration:

US Seeks Dismissal Of Cuban Militant's Bid For Freedom 35
Plan To Increase Immigration Fees Draws Criticism 35

Tax:

Massachusetts Man Faces Tax Fraud Charges 35
Wal-Mart Avoids State Taxes By Paying Itself Rent 36
IRS, Consumer Advocates To Promote Earned Income Tax Credit 36

Congress-Administration:

Bush Touts Economy, Addresses "Income Inequality" In Visit To Wall Street 36
Bush Seeks To Cut Farm Program Funds 39
House Committee To Probe Bush Signing Statements 40
Bush Says He's Found Presidency An "Exhilarating, Joyous Experience." 40
Hoyer Open To Negotiations On Social Security 40
Democrats Pass $463.5 Billion Spending Bill 40
House Panel To Examine Outside Ethics Enforcer 41
Pelosi Seeks Routine Use Of Military Aircraft 41
Senate Republicans To Discuss Domestic Agenda 42
GAO Adds Food Safety To List Of Flawed Federal Programs 42
Sanchez Resigns From Hispanic Caucus 42
Obama Introduces Election Fraud Bill 42
Senators Oppose Closure OF FDA Labs 42
FEC Reports Show Lawmakers' Legal Fees 43
Insightful Question Lifted Senate Aide's Profile 43
Senate Chaplain Backs Out Of Religious Conference 43
GAO Takes HUD, USPS Off "High Risk" List 43
NFIB President Makes Case For Senate's Minimum Wage Bill 44
White House Hopeful Budget Will Lead To Serious Negotiations 44
NYTimes Says Congress Should Set Rules For Stranded Plane Passengers 44

Other News:

Judge Adjourns Holocaust Settlement Hearing After Objections 44
Schumer Sees Middle Class Economic Anxiety As Key Issue 45
Biden's Entry In '08 Race Overshadowed By Furor Over Remarks 45
Rothenberg Says Hillary Clinton Could Win Presidency 47
Social Issues A Challenge For Giuliani In Seeking GOP Nomination 47

DOJ_NMG_0125141

Franken To Challenge Coleman 48
Spitzer Outlines Plan To Reform New York Healthcare Industry 48
Union Seeks To Unionize Laborers In Wealthy Florida Enclave 48
Mary Cheney Defends Pregnancy 48
Will Says School Choice Is Expanding 48
Rice To Push For "Roadmap" Fast-Track At Quartet Meeting 49
Frazer Says Islamic Militants From Somalia Regrouping 49
US Official Says Talks With Pyongyang Ready To Move Forward 50
Senate Express Impatience, Threaten Action On Chinese Currency 50
UK Arms Deal Charges Would Require Testimony Of Saudi Royals 50
UK Concludes Poisoning Probe 51
Chavez Seen Moving Closer To "Dictatorship." 51
Expert Urges US To Develop Global Social Agenda To Appeal To Poor 51
Expert Urges Partition As Solution To Kosovo 51

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 51

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 52

Online Version

Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

TERRORISM NEWS:

DOJ To Share NSA Surveillance Program Documents With Congress. The Los Angeles Times (2/1, Serrano) reports, "A two-week standoff over documents in the White House domestic spying program came to an end Wednesday when Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales agreed to turn over to Congress classified material about secret eavesdropping." The Times continues, "The Bush administration last month said it would put its surveillance of potential terrorist activities under supervision of a federal court but did not disclose details of the revised program. A key Senate panel, newly controlled by Democrats, demanded access to the records to gauge whether the administration was going too far or breaking any laws in tracking terrorism suspects. … The decision to share information with Congress was the latest concession by the Bush administration, which had argued that it had the right to conduct its 'war on terror' as it deemed necessary and that secrecy was vital to national security."

The AP (2/1, Jordan) reports, "Investigators' applications, legal briefs and orders issued by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court are now open to the leaders of the Senate Judiciary Committee and the House and Senate intelligence committees, Gonzales said." The AP continues, "Two weeks ago, the Senate Judiciary Committee — led by Democratic Chairman Patrick Leahy of Vermont and Republican Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania — criticized the attorney general for refusing to answer specific questions about the secret court's new oversight of the controversial program. … 'We obviously would be concerned about the public disclosure that may jeopardize the national security of our country,' Gonzales told reporters Wednesday. 'But we're working with the Congress to provide the information that it needs.' … The documents would not be released publicly, the attorney general said. 'We're talking about highly classified documents about highly classified activities of the United States government.'"

The Washington Post (2/1, A2, Eggen) reports, "Under yesterday's accord…more than three dozen lawmakers will have access to the secret court orders governing the spying program that were issued Jan. 10 and the applications from the Justice Department that preceded them. The lawmakers include the House and Senate leaders, the members of the two intelligence panels and the heads of the two judiciary committees, officials said." The Post continues, "Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, said the documents would help determine 'what further oversight or legislative action is necessary. … Only with an understanding of the contours of the wiretapping program and the scope of the court's orders can the Judiciary Committee determine whether the administration has reached the proper balance to protect Americans while following the law and the principles of checks and balances,' Leahy said. … Gonzales -- in remarks to reporters during an unrelated event announcing the formation of a human-trafficking unit at Justice -- played down any conflict with lawmakers. He said: 'It's never been the case where we've said we would never provide access.'"

DOJ_NMG_0125142

The New York Times (2/1, Mazzetti) reports, "Last week, Representative Silvestre Reyes, the Texas Democrat who is chairman of the House Intelligence Committee, joined other committee members in threatening to subpoena documents related to the program. … Those threats prompted negotiations over the weekend between staff members of the House and Senate intelligence committees and Steven G. Bradbury, who leads the Office of Legal Counsel in the Justice Department." The Times adds, "A central question is whether the court will approve requests case by case or issue broad orders giving the government wide leeway to choose targets."

The Washington Times (2/1, Seper) reports, "The surveillance program, begun in 2001 after the September 11 attacks, gave law-enforcement authorities the ability to monitor telephone calls and e-mails to and from the United States involving people suspected by the government of having terrorist links. … The Bush administration vigorously defended the legality of the program, saying it would be impossible to obtain warrants in time to intercept phone calls of those suspected of belonging to al Qaeda. … The Justice Department has said the program is 'essential' in the war on terrorism, adding that it 'ensures we have in place an early warning system to detect and prevent a terrorist attack.'"

McClatchy Newspapers (2/1, Gordon) reports, "The material was delivered to members of the House and Senate intelligence committees late in the day, congressional aides said. … The documents also will be made available to Democratic Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont, the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, and Pennsylvania Sen. Arlen Specter, the panel's ranking Republican, both of whom have asked to review the new arrangement." McClatchy adds, "Leahy, Specter and members of the intelligence committees have voiced concern that the eavesdropping on some Americans' overseas phone calls and e-mails may have violated their constitutional rights. Leahy and Specter praised President Bush for granting their requests to review details of the latest arrangement. … 'The president has made the right decision in changing his previous course of unilaterally reauthorizing the warrantless surveillance program, to now following the law by seeking court approval for these wiretaps,' Leahy said. … But he said he would 'have to look at the court's order to determine whether the administration has reached that proper balance to protect Americans while following the law.' … Specter called the move 'a significant step forward' but said he would reserve judgment until he had reviewed the documents."

6th Circuit Panel Hears Arguments In NSA Surveillance Challenge. The New York Times (2/1, Liptak) reports from Cincinnati, "Three federal judges hearing the first appellate argument about the legality of a National Security Agency domestic surveillance program on Wednesday indicated that they were not that convinced the issue was moot now that the Bush administration had agreed to submit the program to a secret court." The Times continues, "In a series of sharply worded questions to an administration lawyer defending the program, the judges noted that the administration did not promise to continue working with the secret court in the future. … Deputy Solicitor General Gregory G. Garre acknowledged the possibility. … But the judges pressed Mr. Garre's adversary, Ann Beeson of the American Civil Liberties Union, just as hard on a different point -- whether her clients had suffered injuries direct and concrete enough to give them standing to sue. … Ms. Beeson said the plaintiffs, who include lawyers and journalists, have had to change the way they communicate with clients and sources in the Middle East because they feared that their discussions would not be confidential. … But Judge (Julia S.) Gibbons and Judge Alice M. Batchelder seemed skeptical about whether that sort of general and speculative fear was sufficient. … The government has refused to say whether it eavesdropped on the plaintiffs." The Times notes, "The A.C.L.U. brought suit last year after an article in The New York Times disclosed the existence of the program, which monitors the international communications of people in the United States without court approval. … In August, Judge Anna Diggs Taylor of the Federal District Court in Detroit ordered the program shut down. The decision has been stayed during the appeal to the Sixth Circuit."

The Los Angeles Times (2/1, Weinstein) reports, "Garre said that when Congress authorized the use of military force after the Sept. 11 attacks, it clearly contemplated that the president would have the authority to conduct counterintelligence surveillance of the type used in the program. Garre said it would be unprecedented for a U.S. court to say that a president did not have such power." The Times continues, "Beeson said that the administration's post-Sept. 11 surveillance program clearly violated FISA, which requires a warrant to be issued before surveillance is conducted. … She told the judges that if they accepted Garre's argument, it would, in effect, mean that the FISA law had been overridden without Congress saying that it wished to do so. 'To rule for the government' in this case would mean 'the president has unbridled power,' Beeson told the judges. … 'Congress did its part,' by passing the FISA statute, Beeson said. Now, after the government acted in 'direct violation' of FISA for more than four years, she said, 'it is this court's duty to serve as a check on the arbitrary exercise of government power to wiretap American citizens on American soil.'"

DOJ_NMG_0125143

AFP (2/1) reports, "Government lawyers argued that the case is moot because the president has agreed to court supervision. … The judges, however, suggested a constitutional issue remains, since Bush has said he could resume the program without court oversight in the future. … 'You could opt out at any time, couldn't you?' asked Judge Ronald Lee Gilman. … 'That's absolutely true,' said Gregory Garre, a deputy solicitor general." AFP adds, "Critics said that's why the 6th Circuit must declare Bush's original program unconstitutional. … 'A failure to decide this case would leave it up to the president to decide whether or when to follow the law,' said Ann Beeson, an attorney for the American Civil Liberties Union, which sued last year to halt the program."

US Probing Equity Firm With Links To Islamic Investors. The Washington Post (2/1, D3, Cho) reports, "The counterterrorism division of the Justice Department is investigating whether a private equity firm in Boston that manages hundreds of millions of dollars for Muslim investors overseas violated tax laws." The Post continues, "The investigation of Overland Capital Group was disclosed in a filing with U.S. District Court in Boston and reported by the Wall Street Journal yesterday. … The filing claims that Overland and a subsidiary of Dar Al-Maal Al-Islami Trust (DMI), a financial group in Geneva, conducted acts 'that implicate potential violation of the Internal Revenue Code.' The filing does not mention terrorism, though it was submitted by a U.S. attorney who works in counterterrorism." The Post adds, "Subsidiaries of DMI, an umbrella organization for Islamic financial institutions, have been named as suspects in probes by U.S. counterterrorism agencies. DMI also is a defendant in a civil lawsuit brought by families of victims of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, who claim that it funded al-Qaeda. DMI has denied those claims and noted that none of its officials has been charged with terrorism-related crimes." The Post notes, "The filing came to light through litigation between Overland and a former employee, Laird A. Fairchild, who claimed that he was wrongfully dismissed. Fairchild cooperated with federal investigators after his termination, an act that Overland said violated his confidentiality agreements with the company. … Geoffrey Harper, Fairchild's attorney, said yesterday that U.S. attorneys went to 'elaborate lengths' to make sure that Fairchild would not reveal what he told government investigators. He said the Justice Department has concerns beyond the tax practices of Overland and DMI."

The Boston Globe (2/1, Pfeiffer, Bailey) reports, "The chief executive of a Boston private equity firm under federal investigation for its connection to groups that allegedly finance Islamic extremists denied yesterday that his company is linked to terrorism. … 'We do everything appropriately and by the book, and we adhere not just to the letter of the law but to the spirit of the law,' said James M. Godec of Overland Capital Group. 'I am extraordinarily cautious about this kind of stuff.'" The Globe continues, "The Justice Department lawyer named in the filing, Corey J. Smith, works in the terrorism financing unit of the department's criminal division; since the Sept. 11, 2001 terrorism attacks, prosecutors have increasingly used tax laws to bring terrorism cases against wealthy Middle Easterners suspected of funneling money to terrorist groups. The investigation was disclosed in yesterday's Wall Street Journal. A Justice Department spokesman declined to comment. … 'By policy, we never confirm or deny whether or not there's an investigation into an entity or a person,' said the spokesman, Dean Boyd."

Judge Puts Guantanamo Detainee Suits On Hold. The AP (2/1) reports, "Sixteen lawsuits by Guantanamo Bay detainees were put on hold Wednesday by a federal judge who said he may no longer have jurisdiction to hear their cases." The AP continues, "U.S. District Court Judge Reggie B. Walton in Washington said the Military Commissions Act, signed into law in October, has left him unable to consider whether the detainees can challenge being held at the Navy facility in Cuba." The AP adds, "An appeals court in Washington is considering whether civilian jurists can rule on those cases. Until that issue is resolved, Walton said, 'it is this court's view that it lacks the authority to take any action in these cases.' … Walton's six-page order denying the motions challenging detention of the 16 men left open the possibility of refiling the requests if the appeals court decides civilian courts can review detainee cases. … The Justice Department welcomed the ruling, said spokesman Erik Ablin. He called the military tribunals, which can be appealed, 'more process than the United States has ever provided to enemy combatants in our past conflicts.'"

DOJ_NMG_0125144

Germany Issues Warrants For 13 CIA Operatives In Abduction Case. On its front page, the New York Times (2/1, A1, Landler, 1.16M) reports under the headline "German Court Challenges CIA Over Abduction," that a German court Wednesday issued an arrest warrant for 13 people in the mistaken kidnapping and jailing of a German citizen of Lebanese descent, "in the most serious legal challenge yet to the Central Intelligence Agency's secret transfers of terrorism suspects." Prosecutors in Munich said the suspects, whom they did not identify, were part of a CIA "abduction team" that seized the man, Khaled el-Masri, in Macedonia in late 2003 and flew him to Afghanistan. German prosecutor August Stern "said investigators would seek to establish the true identities of the 13 people, most of whom are believed to use aliases." The Justice Department has "declined to help the German prosecutors in their investigation," which the Times says "has made the Germans dependent on information from other sources, including journalists."

The Washington Post (2/1, A1, Whitlock, 690K) adds, "European law enforcement authorities acknowledged that it is highly unlikely that any CIA officers -- most of whom work undercover, using false identities -- would be apprehended or extradited from the United States." But the arrest warrants "mark yet another case in which CIA activities in Europe…have strained diplomatic ties and underscored deep differences between the United States and its transatlantic allies over how to fight terrorism." Similarly, the Los Angeles Times (2/1, Fleishman, 850K) says the case, "at times, has agitated the improving relationship between Berlin and Washington."

The Washington Times/AP (2/1, A1, Rising) also reports on the case.

UK Police Arrest Nine In Alleged Terror Murder Plot. NBC Nightly News (1/31, story 4, 1:40, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Nine men are in British custody tonight after police disrupted a terrorist plot there they say in a series of pre-dawn raids. The suspects were arrested in Birmingham in a plot that is the first of its kind in Britain which is raising questions about terror tactics and strategy." NBC (Miller) added, "The plan? Kidnap a British soldier and post his beheading on the Internet. … Scotland Yard said the six-month investigation is ongoing. … The alleged target of the kidnapping was a Muslim British soldier in his 20's, on leave from duty in Afghanistan." ABC World News (1/31, story 2, 2:40, Gibson, 8.78M) reported that the plot "could have come straight from the streets of Baghdad, rather than the streets of Birmingham." ABC (Sciutto) added, "Birmingham, Britain's second-largest city and home to a large Muslim minority, has been scenes of terror raids before. Many were skeptical of today's allegations. When I asked these young Muslims if they doubted the plot, every one said yes. … But the head of a nearby mosque told us, there's a wide generation gap among Muslims here. Older residents more supportive of the police and today's raids."

The CBS Evening News (1/31, lead story, 2:15, Couric, 7.66M) noted, "Reports in Britain say it was all an attempt to blackmail Prime Minister Tony Blair to pull British troops out of Iraq." CBS (Phillips) added that the plotters were "apparently inspired by the capture and execution of Westerners in Iraq, widely publicized on the Internet. … Police have made high profile arrests of Muslims suspected of ambitious terror plots before, only to have the let the suspects go when the intelligence proved wrong. If they can't make this one stick, they risk further alienating an already suspicious community." USA Today (2/1, 8A, Stinson, 2.27M) reports, "Magnus Ranstorp, a terrorism analyst at the Swedish National Defense College, said a plot like that described by British news outlets would signal that terrorists are trying new methods to spread fear in Europe. … Terrorists, familiar with tactics used by insurgents in Iraq, can be expected to export whatever method they can to induce shock and spread fear, Ranstorp said. 'The critical issue is: Are we ahead of the terrorists' innovations?'"

The Financial Times (2/1, Guthrie, Burns) reports, "On Wednesday night a senior government official said he was taking seriously a plot he believed underlined the extent to which radicalised British-born Muslims were committed to a terrorist war against the west. The official said the alleged plot suggested a direct challenge to the British army's policy of encouraging the recruitment of Muslims as a way of integrating them into society and countering the negative publicity regarding the army's involvement in Iraq and Afghanistan." The AP (2/1, Harris) called it "a major kidnapping plot" and also notes that it "raised fears that a new type of terrorism has reached Britain, one which uses individual victims to send a message through kidnappings and publicized beheadings." The Christian Science Monitor (2/1, Rice-Oxley, 59K) also reports that "experts said this plot's new tactic, if confirmed, would amount to a significant departure in strategy," and the "experts said that it was important to establish whether the kidnapping plot, if confirmed, was a one-off action or a new tactic."

DOJ_NMG_0125145

The Washington Post (2/1, Jordan, Sullivan, 690K) reports, "David Shaw, a top police official, said the arrests were the 'culmination of many months of activities' and 'a very, very major investigation' that is 'by no means finished.'" However, "Many Muslims who gathered at police lines said they viewed the raids as unfairly targeting their community and probably based on false intelligence. 'We feel like we are under siege,' said Allah Ditta," a Birmingham businessman. "Ditta said that he had already felt a backlash from the police operation when several men drove past him in a van and swore at him simply because he was dressed as a Muslim." The New York Times (2/1, Cowell, 1.16M) similarly reports on the arrests.

Plot Fuels British Debate About Home-Grown Terrorism. The CBS Evening News (1/31, story 2, 2:00, Couric, 7.66M) reported that this "kind of home-grown terror…has led to soul searching in Britain. Why would people there want to attack their own country?" CBS (Palmer) added that "Britain's Secret Service says it has at least 30 active terrorist plots and 1,600 suspects under surveillance. Many British Muslims believe that's an overreaction. … But even though whose think anti-terrorism operations unfairly target Muslims have to admit there's a persistent problem. … Unless Britain can find a way somehow of winning the allegiance of these angry young men, the country faces what one American security expert called an era of 'YouTube terrorism.'"

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Bush Sets Aside $25 Million For Ground Zero First Responders Health Care. ABC World News (1/31, story 7, 2:15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "A breakthrough was announced today, in the long struggle to convince President Bush to help the so-called forgotten victims of 9/11. … For the first time, Mr. Bush has set aside money in his budget to help" the first responders who worked at Ground Zero during recovery operations. "$25 million for health care." ABC (Muir) added, "They've been fighting for health care for five years now." Rep. Carolyn Malone was shown saying, "It has taken five, long years and many visible deaths for them to move forward and make this commitment."

The AP (1/31) reported that Ceasar Borja Jr., whose father, Cesar Borja was a police officer who worked at Ground Zero after 9/11 and "died at 52 while awaiting a lung transplant," met "with President Bush on Wednesday to urge expanded health services for those who are still sick." Borja "said he told the president that the funding should be expanded not just for 'the heroes and heroines" who risked their lives to save victims under the twin towers, but also for men, women and children exposed to toxins because they lived or worked in the area."

Fox Your World With Neil Cavuto (1/31, Cavuto) interviewed Bush yesterday. Asked about his planned meeting with Borja, he said, "I'm going to thank Cesar and his family for raising an important issue. And, at the same time, I will tell Cesar his dad's a hero. And I truly believe those who rushed into harm's way were heroes. And they ought to be honored. And I also believe that they ought not to go without health care. If they were on that pile, and if they were first-responders, they need to get help. And one of the things that our -- Cesar will be briefed on is, you know, in the line-item in our budget, we have got Federal money to help make sure that people don't go without health care that -- that were on the pile."

Travel Industry Group Proposes Trusted Traveler Program. USA Today (2/1, 4B, De Lollis, 2.27M) reports the Discover America Partnership "asked Congress on Wednesday to launch a special trusted traveler program for international visitors," saying that "it would help stem the USA's diminishing appeal to travelers from abroad," which "cost about $43 billion in visitor spending in 2005 alone." Speaking at a hearing of the Senate trade and tourism subcommittee, the group "asked the government to spend $300 million to finance its proposals, which include stepped-up tourism marketing and faster customs processing."

The Washington Times (2/1, Haberkorn, 88K) continues, "Other DAP proposals included evaluating U.S. Customs officers on their friendliness, greeting foreign travelers by saying 'Welcome to America' and offering foreign visitors customer-service evaluations to fill out when they leave the United States -- proposals aimed at improving America's image abroad." Committee chairman Sen. Byron L. Dorgan said at the hearing "that he would like to 'find some sort of way' to introduce a bill based on the proposal. Committee Co-chairmen Sen. Daniel K. Inouye, Hawaii Democrat, and Sen. Ted Stevens, Alaska Republican, also said they supported drafting a bill to boost international tourism."

DOJ_NMG_0125146

"Suspicious Devices" Shut Down Parts Of Boston. A bomb scare in Boston Wednesday, prompted by a number of "suspicious devices" that turned out to be lighted signs for a cartoon show's ad campaign, drew heavy media attention yesterday and in this morning's major dailies. ABC World News (1/31, lead story, 2:00, Gibson, 8.78M) call it "a measure of just how jittery, how on-edge this country still is," adding that it was "a good object lesson that when suspicious packages are found, people do react." ABC (Harris) added, "It started this morning when a passenger on a city bus saw a suspicious device attached to a support beam for a highway ramp. The police shut down the roads and the subways in the immediate area and sent in the bomb squad." The discovery of eight more devices around the city "paralyzed traffic." Harris: "But after a day of chaos and concern, the authorities learned that the devices posed no threat to public safety. They were lighted signs with cartoon characters on them."

NBC Nightly News (1/31, story 5, 1:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Cable news viewers in this country were treated to hours of live coverage this afternoon as suspicious packages were discovered all over Boston. Roads were closed, the Charles River was closed and questions were asked about terrorism." However, the devices "turned out to be this thing," added NBC (P. Williams) as a picture of one of the signs was shown on screen: "Outdoor lighted signs to promote a movie coming out in May based on a series on the Cartoon Network called Aqua Teen Hunger Force."

An AP (1/31, Maguire) article appearing on hundreds of news websites reported, "Peter Berdovsky, 27, of Arlington, and Sean Stevens, 28, of Charlestown, were each arrested Wednesday night on one felony charge of placing a hoax device and one charge of disorderly conduct, state Attorney General Martha Coakley said. In a news release announcing Stevens' arrest, she said the men worked together to place the devices. At an earlier news conference she said Berdovsky had been hired to place the devices."

The Washington Post (2/1, A3, Powell, 690K) reports, "A train passenger spied the first magnetic object, which looked like circuit boards with protruding wires, attached to a girder under Interstate 93 in the Charlestown neighborhood of Boston. A police bomb squad responded and blew up the device, leading to the shutdown of a railway station and the highway. For a while, the Coast Guard blocked off a section of the Charles River. 'I am deeply dismayed to learn that many of the devices are a part of a marketing campaign by Turner Broadcasting,' Massachusetts Gov. Deval L. Patrick said in a statement, vowing to consult with Coakley." The CBS Evening News (1/31, story 3, :35, Couric, 7.66M) reported Cartoon Network's "parent company, Turner Broadcasting, apologized for the mix up and it turns out these same electronic advertising devices have been placed in nine other cities around the country without incident."

USA Today (2/1, 3A, Hall, 2.27M) quotes Patrick as saying, "It's a hoax — and it's not funny." USA Today adds, "Most Boston-area residents weren't fazed." DHS spokesman Russ Knocke "said officials closely monitored the day's investigation. 'Whether it was intentional or not, the reality is these types of incidents put an enormous burden on law enforcement and counter-terrorism resources, and there's absolutely no room for that in a post-9/11 world,' Knocke said."

The Wall Street Journal (2/1, B2, Levitz, 2.04M) reports the scare brought much of the city "to a jittery halt yesterday. … Major arteries were closed. Commuters were booted off subways, river traffic was halted, and bomb squads combed the streets." The Journal also notes, "Turner hired a third-party marketing firm, Interference, to place the devices. The New York firm says on its Web site that it specializes in alternative and 'guerilla' marketing. Representatives of the company couldn't be reached for comment." Mayor Thomas M. Menino "said in a statement that it is 'outrageous, in a post 9/11 world, that a company would use this type of marketing scheme.'"

WPost Sees Better Options For Nuclear Plant Safety Than Building "Beamhenges." In an editorial the Washington Post (2/1, A14, 690K) suggest that Americans' "understandable preoccupation with securing sensitive sites" gave appeal to "the petition an advocacy group filed with the" NRC that asks them "to require plant operators to build protective 'beamhenges'" around "their power stations." The NRC commissioners' rejection of the request, is "a controversial decision. After all, without physical barriers to thwart airborne attacks, couldn't a hijacked plane smashing into a nuclear plant produce a widespread catastrophe? That's not likely, says commission member Jeffrey S. Merrifield." The Post summarizes the findings of an NRC study that concluded the chances of such an attack causing a radiological disaster are extremely low "because of the strength of the containment domes" and adds that while its "difficult to fully trust the NRC's calculations as long as the study it touts remains classified," regulators "and others concerned about plant safety should focus on measures" such as "ensuring that nuclear power stations are well defended from land attack and that storage units for spent nuclear fuel are robust."

DOJ_NMG_0125147

WAR NEWS:

Warner, Levin Join Forces On Anti-Surge Resolution. The AP (2/1, Flaherty) reports, "Two senators, a Republican and a Democrat, leading separate efforts to put Congress on record against President Bush's troop buildup in Iraq joined forces Wednesday, agreeing on a nonbinding resolution that would oppose the plan and potentially embarrass the White House." Republican Sen. John Warner and Democrat Carl Levin "had been sponsoring competing measures opposing Bush's strategy of sending 21,500 more US troops to the war zone, with Warner's less harshly worded version attracting more Republican interest. The new resolution would vow to protect funding for troops while keeping Warner's original language expressing the Senate's opposition to the buildup." Levin "replaced Warner as chairman of the Armed Services Committee when the Democrats took control of the Senate in January. Their resolution could well gain more support from members of both parties than their separate versions had been attracting. It lacks Levin's language saying the troop increase is against the national interest, and it drops an earlier provision by Warner suggesting Senate support for some additional troops." Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid "said he wants to begin debate Monday on the new measure, bypassing committee review." The resolution "is likely to pose a threat to the White House because of its potential appeal to Republicans who have grown tired of the nearly four-year war and want a chance to express their concerns. The White House has been hoping to avoid an overwhelming congressional vote criticizing Bush's handling of the war."

The Los Angeles Times (2/1, A1, Levey, 850K), in a story titled "Senate Closer To Rebuke For Troop Increase," reports Reid "said there was 'near unanimity' among Democrats" on backing the new measure, and "acknowledged that an alternative resolution sponsored by Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) and Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.)…could not garner the GOP support to reach the 60 votes needed to overcome a promised Republican filibuster."

The Washington Post (2/1, A1, Murray, Weisman, 690K) reports, "The resolution does not include the Democratic language saying the Bush plan is against the national interest, but it also drops an earlier provision by Warner suggesting Senate support for some additional troops." White House spokeswoman Dana Perino responded to the announcement of the Senate deal saying, "The president wants to win in Iraq -- he's proposed a comprehensive plan to do so, and he's asked Congress to give the plan a chance to work. … These resolutions send mixed signals to our troops and our enemy.'" House Democratic leaders have also ordered "committees to draft a resolution next week patterned on Warner's language. But House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) went further, publicly hinting she will push binding legislation that would begin bringing US troops home from Iraq."

The New York Times (2/1, Hulse, 1.16M) says Warner, "a lawmaker often admired for his demeanor and experience, has long wielded influence on military policy given his own years at the Pentagon and his tenure as the Republican chairman of the Armed Services Committee." But on this issue, Warner has "attracted unusually tough criticism from fellow Republicans who have suggested that he -- a World War II veteran and former Navy secretary -- is undercutting Mr. Bush, the new military command being installed in Iraq and the troops themselves." The Times adds, "It is a time of transition for Mr. Warner in the Senate. Not only are Republicans now in the minority, but he also lost the top Republican slot on the Armed Services Committee to John McCain of Arizona because of term limits and was not successful in efforts to win the top party seat on another panel. In addition, his fellow Republican, George Allen, lost his reelection bid in Virginia to a Democrat, Senator Jim Webb." Therefore, "while Mr. Warner fights to stay relevant in the Iraq debate, he has fewer tools at his disposal even as he considers whether to run for re-election next year."

DOJ_NMG_0125148

The Politico (2/1, Bresnahan) says "House and Senate Republicans with reservations about…Bush's plan to boost U.S. troop strength in Iraq by 21,500 are complaining of harsh criticism from their GOP colleagues. This intra-party squabbling, in some cases, has seen Republicans accusing fellow Republicans of undercutting the American effort in Iraq, a charge previously reserved for Democrats." These lawmakers, "several of whom spoke on the condition of anonymity for fear of retribution from party leaders or the White House, are stunned by the hostility expressed by fellow Republicans. They are particularly concerned that anyone who raises questions or challenges the Bush plan will be branded a defeatist who wants to see America lose the war. … One GOP lawmaker, who declined to be named, said it is 'starting to get really ugly' among Republicans when they try to talk about Iraq and the wisdom of the new Bush policy."

On MSNBC's Hardball (1/31, Matthews), host Chris Matthews interviewed Sen. Gordon Smith, who said, "My own sense is that you will have at least a majority for the Warner resolution. I'm for it. I'm a co-sponsor of it. It's, I think, respectful. It clearly opposes the surge but it does it in a way that also lays out the things we would like to see the President and the Administration, our military doing in Iraq, in a way that doesn't needlessly put our troops in harm's way, and protects America's larger interests in the war on terror."

McCain Disavows Statement Criticizing Bush. The AP (2/1) reports McCain "backed away Wednesday from a statement issued on his behalf criticizing the Bush administration for not putting more pressure on the Iraqi government to secure its country." A statement "attributed" to McCain and Levin "and quoted Tuesday by The Associated Press said, 'America supplying more troops while Iraqi leaders simply supply more promises is not a recipe for success in Iraq.' The statement was issued by the office of Levin, chairman of the Armed Services Committee." McCain spokeswoman Eileen McMenamin and Levin spokeswoman Tara Andringa "said Wednesday that the statement had been erroneously signed off on by a staffer who works for McCain on the Armed Services Committee." The AP adds, "It is unusual for a senator to pull back a statement issued on his behalf. McMenamin said McCain had not seen the statement and did not endorse it."

DeMint Derides "Resolution Of Defeat And Disgrace." The Washington Times (2/1, Hurt, 88K) reports, "Senate Republicans yesterday said those in Congress who have turned against the war in Iraq are forsaking the troops on the ground and are ensuring defeat with a resolution condemning…Bush's plan to send in reinforcements. 'This resolution is a resolution of defeat and disgrace,' said Sen. Jim DeMint, a South Carolina Republican who, as a member of the House, voted in 2002 for the war." GOP Sen. John Cornyn said yesterday, "If we don't support the mission, we shouldn't be passing nonbinding resolutions. We should be doing everything in our power to stop it."

Bush Not Surprised By Congressional Dissent. Fox Your World With Neil Cavuto (1/31, Cavuto) interviewed President Bush yesterday. Asked if he felt his partisans in Congress had abandoned him in a time of difficulty, Bush said, "I don't feel abandoned. And that's -- I mean, what do you expect? When times are good, you know, there's millions of authors of the plan. When times are bad, there's one author. And that would be me."

Asked about Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell's statement that the Iraqis have only six to nine months to succeed in righting their country, Bush said, "Well, I think it's a mistake to put timetables on difficult missions, because an enemy can adjust. On the other hand, I certainly understand the urgency and -- in Mitch's voice. I also understand the skepticism on Capitol Hill. … What ultimately is going to matter is whether or not the plan works on the ground. … Prime Minister Maliki has made some pledges to me personally. He's beginning to fulfill some of those pledges." Asked if he trusted Malaki, Bush said, "What matters is whether or not he performs. And trust is earned by doing what you say you're going to do."

House Democratic Measure Would Pay Reparations To Iraqis. The Hill (2/1, Kaplan), meanwhile, reports Democratic Rep. Barbara Lee of California, "co-chairwoman of the Progressive Caucus, is vowing to use the appropriations process to force lawmakers to vote on separate parts of a resolution calling for the immediate withdrawal of US soldiers from Iraq. The resolution would pay Iraqis reparations of up to $10,000 for damages caused by the war if they made claims; ban American firms from pumping oil in Iraq; cut off funds to build long-term bases in Iraq; pay for the destruction of landmines; and create a House-Senate select committee to study the origins of the war in Iraq." Lee and Rep. Lynn Woolsey, "the other co-chair of the House Democratic Progressive Caucus, introduced H.R. 508, and they have signed up 28 co-sponsors. Woolsey says she plans to meet next week with House Armed Services Committee Chairman Ike Skelton (D-Mo.) to ensure the resolution is considered in committee."

DOJ_NMG_0125149

Kissinger, Albright Call For Diplomatic Push To Accompany Surge. The AP (2/1, Schweid) reports, "Former Secretaries of State Henry Kissinger and Madeleine Albright urged President Bush on Wednesday to go beyond a planned buildup of U.S. forces in Iraq to develop a comprehensive strategy for the area." They "called for wide-ranging talks with Iraq's neighbors, including Iran and Syria, and increased autonomy for clashing Iraqi groups. The administration has brushed aside the proposal to engage Syria and Iran." Kissinger "said the planned buildup of 21,500 U.S. troops appears to be 'the best way to get the maneuvering room to the changes in deployment and strategy that will be required by the evolving situation.'" Albright "said she might have backed Bush's buildup in Iraq if it 'had been tied to a clear and achievable mission, and if we were guaranteed our troops would have the best training and equipment.'" She added, "I think we need a surge in diplomacy."

Dana Milbank, in the Washington Post (2/1, A2, 690K), writes that "like James Baker, who went before the committee Tuesday, Kissinger was inclined to defend Bush's Iraq policy. But Bush had left the two men, both former Republican secretaries of state, with little ammunition." The Administration "rejected the core recommendation from Kissinger and from Baker's Iraq Study Group: a massive diplomatic offensive involving Syria and Iran. And yet, neither man was prepared to turn against the White House." Baker, testifying on Tuesday, "acted as if Bush had, in fact, supported his ideas." And Kissinger, "the master of nuanced phrases such as 'not incompatible,' provided few such broad pronouncements yesterday. Indeed, he pronounced very little in his low, German-accented rumble."

Bush Presidency Said To Have "Jumped The Shark." In a Los Angeles Times op-ed (2/1), author Andy Borowitz says, "Bush's decision to send additional troops to Iraq has puzzled many pundits. Is the president stubborn, isolated, out of touch with reality? While all three may be true, there is another explanation. George W. Bush has been on television for the last six years, and like many TV shows entering a seventh season, Bush has jumped the shark. Wikipedia defines 'jumping the shark' as 'the tipping point at which a TV series is deemed to have passed its peak, or has introduced plot twists that are illogical in terms of everything that has preceded them.'"

Bush Says US Taking Iran Threat "Very Seriously." In an interview with Fox Your World With Neil Cavuto (1/31, Cavuto), President Bush was asked Wednesday about reports that Iran is three years away from a nuclear weapon, Bush said, "We take their threats very seriously. And we have got, you know, several serious issues with the Iranian government -- not with the Iranian people, but with their government. One, of course, is their interference in Iraq. And I have made it very clear that we will protect our troops and protect innocent Iraqi people. Secondly, I believe the best way to convince the Iranians to give up their nuclear-weapons ambitions is for the world to work in concert in sending Iran a serious message. … We're spending a lot of time keeping that diplomatic initiative strong, and clearly stating to the Iranians: You don't need a nuclear weapon."

Burns Says US Has Right To Detain Iranian Officials. NPR (2/1) broadcast, "The Bush Administration says the US has been tracking Iranian involvement in the Iraqi insurgency for a couple of years. Deputy Secretary of State Nicholas Burns says Iran must halt such action and that the US is taking steps to make its position clear." NPR played audio of Burns saying, "We warned Iraq – Iran, excuse me – privately on a number of occasions over the last year and a half. And the Iranians did not, of course, appear to listen to that, so now we've begun to detain those Iranian officials. And we think it's absolutely within our rights to do so under Article 51 of the UN Charter, which is self-defense." NPR added, "Burns' remarks were taken from an interview airing today on NPR's 'Morning Edition.'"

Analysts Warn US Rhetoric Could Trigger War With Iran. The AP (2/1, Krane) reports, "Citing Iranian involvement with Iraqi militias and Tehran's nuclear ambitions, the Bush administration has shifted to offense in its confrontation with Iran -- building up the US military in the Persian Gulf and promising more aggressive moves against Iranian operatives in Iraq and Lebanon." However, the "behind-the-scenes struggle between the two nations could explode into open warfare over a single misstep, analysts and US military officials warn." Iraq, the say, "has become a proxy battleground between Washington and Tehran, which is challenging -- at least rhetorically -- America's dominance of the Gulf." In Washington, "The war of words has raised fears among both Democrats and Republicans in Congress that the United States and Iran are drifting toward armed conflict at a time when America is struggling against determined foes in Iraq and Afghanistan."

DOJ_NMG_0125150

US Delays Plans To Release Details Of Charges Against Iran. The Los Angeles Times (2/1, Richter, 850K) reports the Bush administration has "postponed plans to offer public details of its charges of Iranian meddling inside Iraq amid internal divisions over the strength of the evidence," US officials said. US officials "promised" last week to provide evidence of Iranian activities in Iraq, "but some officials in Washington are concerned that some of the material may be inconclusive and that other data cannot be released without jeopardizing intelligence sources and methods." They also "want to avoid repeating the embarrassment that followed the March 2003 invasion of Iraq, when it became clear that information the administration cited to justify the war was incorrect," the officials said.

Similarly, the New York Times (2/1, 1.16M) writes in an editorial today, "Given America's bitter experience in Iraq, one would think that President Bush could finally figure out that threats and brute force aren't a substitute for a reasoned strategy. But Mr. Bush is at it again, this time trying to bully Iran into stopping its meddling inside Iraq." While expressing "no doubt about Iran's malign intent," the Times warns that "more threats and posturing are unlikely to get Iran to back down. If Mr. Bush isn't careful, he could end up talking himself into another disastrous war, and if Congress is not clear in opposing him this time, he could drag the country along."

"Failure" Of US Intelligence On Iraq Sparks Scrutiny On Iran. NBC Nightly News (1/31, story 8, 2:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "While there is no question of Iranian involvement inside Iraq, the failure of intelligence in the run up to the Iraq war has produced intense scrutiny of the tough talk currently coming from the Administration on the topic of Iran." NBC (Mitchell) added, "As the civil war in Iraq grows deadlier by the day, the Bush Administration is increasingly blaming Iran." But a senior US intelligence official told NBC News, the US "can't prove…at this point" that Iran was involved in an attack on US troops in Karbala. Responding to US claims that Iran is providing Iraqi insurgents with weapons, another senior US official told NBC even "if the weapons are made in Iran, doesn't mean Iran provided them directly."

Maliki Urges US, Iran To Resolve Problems. In an interview aired Wednesday on CNN's Situation Room (1/31, 4:00PM), Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki said, ""We have told the Iranians and the Americans, 'We know that you have a problem with each other but we're asking you, please, solve your problems outside of Iraq.'" Al-Maliki warned, "We do not want the American forces to take Iraq as a base to attack Iran...we will not accept Iran using Iraq to attack American forces. But does this exist? It exists and I assure you it exists."

Chirac Retracts Statements On Iran. The New York Times (2/1, A1, Sciolino, Bennhold, 1.16M) reports on its front page that French President Jacques Chirac "said this week that if Iran had one or two nuclear weapons, it would not pose a big danger, and that if Iran were to launch a nuclear weapon against a country like Israel, it would lead to the immediate destruction of Tehran." The remarks, made in an interview Monday with The New York Times, The International Herald Tribune and Le Nouvel Observateur, a French weekly magazine, were "vastly different from stated French policy and what Mr. Chirac has often said." On Tuesday, Chirac then "summoned the same journalists back to Élysée Palace to retract many of his remarks." The president "said repeatedly during the second interview that he had spoken casually and quickly the day before because he believed he had been talking about Iran off the record." On Monday, Chirac began by describing as "very dangerous" Iran's refusal to stop producing enriched uranium, but stressed that "what is dangerous about this situation is not the fact of having a nuclear bomb," but rather nuclear "proliferation." The Times notes that it was "unclear whether Mr. Chirac's initial remarks reflected what he truly believes. If so, it suggests a growing divide with American policy." In noting the sanctions against Iran that were imposed last month by the UN Security Council, Chirac "warned Tuesday that escalation of the conflict by both sides was unwise."

US Cautions European Energy Firms To Avoid Deals With Iran. The Washington Post (2/1, A12, Mufson, 690K) reports the Bush administration is "warning European oil and gas companies against investing in Iran, trying to head off a push by Tehran to attract new investment by international petroleum giants." In the past two weeks, the Administration "has met with European oil company executives about the Middle East, and during one session a senior State Department official cautioned that the situation with Iran was 'hot and is going to get hotter,' one executive said." Another European executive said, "The administration is putting the full-court press on foreign companies and is going all out to impress upon them that it would be a mistake to do anything with" Iran. Despite the Administration's pressure, however, "many of the world's biggest oil companies were expected to attend a meeting in Vienna today and tomorrow held by National Iranian Oil Co. to drum up interest in 12 onshore and five offshore blocks."

DOJ_NMG_0125151

EU Resisting US Calls For Increased Financial Pressure On Tehran. AFP (2/1, Lanteaume) reports US demands to toughen financial sanctions against Tehran "are opening fault lines in the US-European stand to punish Tehran for defying calls to rein its suspect nuclear program." Although European countries have agreed to impose sanctions under a UN resolution, they are "resisting US calls to go even further and force global financial institutions to sever all ties" with Iran. Meanwhile, Under Secretary of Treasury in charge of fighting terrorist funding, Stuart Levey, "has made several whirlwind trips to Europe over the past months to try to persuade European multinationals and banks to stop investing in Iran. But so far he has run into a brick wall, with European countries maintaining they are not ready to cut off banking links with Iranian companies, arguing that such a move goes beyond the spirit of the UN resolution."

Sanctions Prompt Talk Of Shake-Up Of Iranian Officials. The Washington Times (2/1, A1, Athanasiadis, 88K) reports on its front page that the unanimous passage of U.N. Security Council sanctions against Iran in December "has shaken the nation's public and ruling elite, prompting talk of a shake-up of top officials and fears of a US attack." Prior to the sanctions' approval, President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad "had been weakened by his inability to fulfill campaign promises to stem rising inflation and by doubts over the wisdom of his statements questioning the Holocaust and threatening Israel." Now, "suggestions are being raised that Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, is to change several key officials, including Ali Larijani, the head of the National Security Council; Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki; and Ambassador to the United Nations Javad Zarif." Western officials have also noted "rising domestic criticism" of Ahmadinejad since the Council approved the sanctions.

Twenty-Four Iraqis Killed Yesterday. The Los Angeles Times (2/1, Zavis, 850K) reports, "At least 24 Iraqis were killed and dozens injured today in bomb blasts, gunfire and other violence. The heaviest toll was inflicted in Baghdad, where US and Iraqi forces are promising to clear out Sunni Arab insurgents and sectarian militias in a neighborhood-by-neighborhood sweep." The US military "announced the deaths of two soldiers and one Marine in combat in Al Anbar province on Tuesday."

Iraq Halts Flight To Syria, Iran Border Crossings. USA Today (2/1, 8A, 2.27M) reports, "Iraq indefinitely halted all flights to and from Syria and closed a border crossing with Iran as the government prepares for a security crackdown aimed at crushing violence in the capital and surrounding regions, a member of the parliament and an airport official said Wednesday." The "airport official told the Associated Press that flights to and from Syria will be canceled for at least two weeks and that service had been interrupted Tuesday. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to reveal the information." Hassan al-Sunneid, a member of the parliament's Defense and Security Committee, "said the move 'was in preparation for the security plan. The state will decide when the flights will resume.'" The Washington Post (2/1, A10, 690K) also reports the story.

Top US Commander Says Shiite Militias Leaving Baghdad Positions. The Washington Post (2/1, A10, Ricks, 690K) reports, "Shiite militia leaders already appear to be leaving their strongholds in Baghdad in anticipation of the US and Iraqi plan to increase the troop presence in the Iraqi capital, according to the top US commander in the country." Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr. "said in a written statement submitted to the Senate Armed Services Committee as part of his confirmation hearing today" to be Army chief of staff, "We have seen numerous indications Shia militia leaders will leave, or already have left, Sadr City to avoid capture by Iraqi and coalition security forces."

The Washington Post (2/1, A10, 690K) also reports on "instructions delivered by emissaries of anti-American Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr at a recent meeting in Baghdad," which "were clear to militiaman Massan Abdul Hussein. 'They informed us to hide the weapons,' Abdul Hussein recalled of the Jan. 21 meeting in the Shula neighborhood. 'They said: "We will not allow anyone to carry any arms, even if it's a pistol under their shirt. This is not acceptable."'"

Kirkuk Could Become Another Front In Sectarian Conflict. The Los Angeles Times (2/1, Roug, 850K) reports, "American officials, regional leaders and local residents are increasingly worried that this oil-rich city in northern Iraq could develop into a third front in the country's civil war just as increased numbers of U.S. troops arrive in Baghdad and Al Anbar province as reinforcement for battles there. Al-Qaida-linked fighters have recently surfaced here, launching a wave of lethal attacks, US and Iraqi officials say." The attacks "come amid a rise in communal tensions in the months before a referendum on the status of the city and the surrounding province." Meanwhile, "Kurdish bureaucrats are pushing through little-noticed administrative decisions that will take away the voting rights of tens of thousands of Arabs." In another story, the Los Angeles Times (2/1, Hennessy-Fiske, 850K) says "resource-rich Kirkuk and its surrounding province are prized by Iraq's various ethnic groups and could soon become another full-blown battleground in the widening civil war. The rolling hills produce 40% of the country's oil and 70% of its natural gas." This year, Kirkuk "residents face landmark votes that military experts say could spark sectarian violence: on how to draw provincial borders, and whether to conduct a census and join the semiautonomous Kurdish regional government."

DOJ_NMG_0125152

Sunni, Shiite Lawmakers To Form New Blocks With Eye On Ending Sectarian Split. The Los Angeles Times (2/1, Zavis, 850K) reports, "Sunni Arab and Shiite Muslim lawmakers announced plans Wednesday to form two new blocs in Iraq's parliament they hope will break away from the ethnic and religious mold of current alliances and ease sectarian strife." But "while both blocs said they hope eventually to draw in members of all ethnic and religious groups, one initially will be made up entirely of Shiite politicians and the other of Sunnis." The Times adds, "Moderate politicians across the sectarian divide have voiced mounting frustration at parliament's seeming impotence." A group of "mostly independent legislators in the United Iraqi Alliance, the dominant Shiite faction, said that within days they will launch a new 'Solidarity bloc' intended to be a voice of moderation within parliament's largest political formation. … Organizers claimed the support of at least 10 of the UIA's 128 legislators, but said others had expressed interest in joining them." On the Sunni side, "a number of independent lawmakers said they had already broken away from the Iraqi Accordance Front, the largest Sunni bloc in parliament with 44 members. The new 'Gathering of Independent Iraqis' is lead by Abid Mutlaq Jabouri, a former major general in Saddam Hussein's army, said Abdullah Eskandar, another founding member."

Oversight Agency Finds Waste, Failure In Iraq Reconstruction Projects. The New York Times (2/1, Glanz, 1.16M) reports that "a federal oversight agency reported Wednesday that despite nearly $108 billion that had been budgeted for the reconstruction of Iraq since the 2003 invasion, the country's electrical output and oil production were still below prewar levels and stocks of gasoline and kerosene had plummeted to their lowest levels in at least two years. The United States alone has accounted for nearly $38 billion of the rebuilding money, according to the agency, the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction." Many suspect US contractors of wasting money when "the latest reports…appear to show that it is not for lack of money that the performance of Iraq's basic infrastructure has fallen to disastrous levels in some cases; if anything, the rebuilding program seems to have been given more money than it has been able to use to any effect." The actions of American companies like DynCorp and individuals such as former Pentagon contractor Robert J. Stein Jr. have led to investigations into fraud and waste as Iraq's electricity production has dipped below pre-war levels with crude oil production slipping as well.

The ABC World News (1/31, story 6, 2:45, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, in "a scathing, new report from the government's inspector general detailing massive waste in the American-funded reconstruction of Iraq. $21 billion has been spent" and "$3 billion of that has been wasted" according to the report. With "virtually all of the $21 billion the US spent on reconstruction went to contractors, equipment and supplies from outside the country" which one Pentagon official, Bob Love "says…was a wasted opportunity." Bob Love, Pentagon Business task Force: "There's so many Iraqis that are desperately in need of jobs or the ability to come back to work. And to see -- to see all of this coming from other countries is really -- is really not only frustrating. It's heart-wrenching."

The CBS Evening News (1/31, story 4, 2:40, Couric, 7.66M) reported that this report, covered "more than 13,000 different projects, everything from schools to oil pipelines," and according to Deborah Avant of George Washington University "it's hard to say there's been an improvement." Still, current "military commanders are already complaining the deployment of civilian reconstruction teams" are "running months behind the surge of combat troops" because "without reconstruction, there's no point in sending the troops."

The NBC Nightly News (1/31, story 3, 2:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "one big American contractor, Parsons, has been singled out for shoddy work. … One of the worst failures of the Iraq reconstruction program, a flagship training academy for Iraqi police" that "turned it into a disaster from the start." "Stuart Bowen, inspector general for Iraq reconstruction, says the Iraqis recently refused to take over the complex, calling the work disgusting," finding deficiciencies in almost all of Parsons' construction projects.

DOJ_NMG_0125153

Al Qaeda Has Adapted, Organized Globally Over Past Year. The Christian Science Monitor (2/1, Huang, 59K) examines different countries where "some of last year's most significant gains and losses for the terrorist organization" of Al Qaeda have occurred. Al Qaeda agents "continued their attacks" as "violence in Iraq intensified, and Afghanistan saw its most violent year since 2001." Although counterterrorism efforts continue to be a priority in the West, it has not "weakened the appeal of Al Qaeda's agenda" as "home-grown militants around the world joined its jihad, as regional fighting heightened perceptions of a global war on Islam." The UN has stated that sectarian violence in Iraq has killed "more than 34,000 Iraqi civilians…last year, most in Sunni-Shiite violence that Al Qaeda is bent on fomenting."

Brooks Says Iraq War Has Spurred Expansionism, Not Isolationism. In a piece in the New York Times (2/1, 1.16M), David Brooks compares the Vietnam Syndrome of turning inward and growing "suspicious of power politics" to the sorely lacking Iraq Syndrome which "was over before it began" and has merely caused many Americans to lose "faith in the Bush administration and in this particular venture, but there has been no generalized loss of faith in the American system or in American goodness" as during the Vietnam War. Whereas "Vietnam sparked a broad cultural revolution, a shift in values and a loss of confidence. Iraq has not had the same effect." Brooks concludes that lawmakers seem to "take it for granted that the U.S. is going to be in the Middle East for a long time to come" and "when you look further into the future, you see that the next president's big efforts will not be about retrenchment, but about expansion;" and although "the US has taken its share of blows over the past few years…the isolationist dog is not barking" and "the hegemon will live" on.

Some Fear Pentagon Reorganization May Jeopardize Special Operations Oversight. The Hill (2/1, Tiron) reports that "a major reorganization of the Pentagon's policy shop is raising concerns among defense authorizers, who say the move could dilute the efficacy of a congressionally mandated civilian office tasked with oversight and support of special operations." This report "addressing lawmakers' concerns about the overhaul of the Office of the Undersecretary of Defense for Policy is due today to Congress, and a Pentagon spokeswoman said the report is ready and will be delivered by deadline. Several sources, however, have indicated that the report may be delayed because of a long approval process." The goal of the reorganization is "to bring the office into line with the U.S. military's need to respond to transnational threats, manage international military coalitions and equip partner nations to fight terrorists. The report is expected to address congressional concerns that policy office leadership so far has been unable to alleviate despite several meetings on the Hill."

WPost Supports Troop "Surge" In Afghanistan. The Washington Post (2/1, A14, 690K) shows support for a troop "surge" in Afghanistan and editorializes that while the US "debates the Bush administration's 'surge' of American troops into Baghdad, a similar American buildup has begun in Afghanistan. As in Iraq, it comes in response to rapidly escalating violence," and some "question…whether the reinforcements are too little or too late." In Afghanistan, "there are still far fewer Afghan and foreign troops than are needed to secure the country" from Taliban insurgency. The Post concluded that supporting Afghanistan with troops and equipment should remain a priority with Congress and with NATO allies, and that the resent surge off troops in Iraq and new funding for Afghanistan; gained attention through efforts of the Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice can hopefully lead to "more allied commitments over the next several weeks."

DOJ:

Leahy Hearing To Question US Attorney Departures. The Financial Times (2/1, Masters) reports, "Democratic senators are fighting to halt what they say is a Bush administration campaign to remove forcibly top federal prosecutors, including the US attorneys responsible for key investigations of Congressional corruption and stock options back-dating." The Times continues, "Senator Patrick Leahy, the new chairman of the Judiciary Committee, will hold a hearing next week on whether the justice department is politicising the hiring and firing of top federal prosecutors. …

DOJ_NMG_0125154

Thirteen of the 93 US attorneys have left since the March 2006 passage of a little-noticed amendment to the Patriot Act that – in effect – allows President George W. Bush to install top prosecutors without Senate confirmation." The Times adds, "Departing attorneys include Kevin Ryan of San Francisco, who was leading the probes of stock options at Apple, and Carol Lam of San Diego, who prosecuted Republican congressman Randy 'Duke' Cunningham and was investigating a politically connected defence contractor. … Democrats say those two as well as US attorneys in New Mexico, Arizona, Arkansas, Washington State and Nevada have been forced out. Mr Ryan has said he left as a result of a 'mutually agreeable decision with Washington'." The Times notes, "Alberto Gonzales, the attorney-general, denied that the Bush administration was trying to circumvent Senate confirmation. Justice department officials said on Wednesday they would seek Senate confirmation for all replacement attorneys. … Traditionally, the justice department sets policy but the US attorneys have significant discretion in deciding which cases to investigate and prosecute. … The president names US attorneys but permanent US attorneys must be confirmed by the Senate. Until last year, 'interim' replacements could serve 120 days and then generally had to seek approval from a state's federal judges to stay on. .. .However, during 11th-hour negotiations over the re-authorisation of the Patriot Act, Republican Senator Arlen Specter added an amendment that allows the president to make interim appointments that can last indefinitely."

DOJ Names Knauss Interim Arizona US Attorney. The Arizona Republic (2/1, Wagner) reports, "The Department of Justice, dodging recommendations from Arizona's two U.S. senators, has named veteran federal prosecutor Daniel Knauss as interim U.S. attorney for the District of Arizona." The Republic continues, "Republican Sens. John McCain and Jon Kyl had recommended Diane Humetewa, an assistant U.S. attorney and member of the Hopi tribe, for the position vacated by Paul Charlton. … In a news release, the Justice Department announced Wednesday that Attorney General Alberto Gonzales had appointed Knauss, a chief assistant in charge of the U.S. attorney's satellite office in Tucson." The Republic adds, "Kyl, a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, which must confirm permanent candidates, responded: 'Daniel Knauss is a quality lawyer and will make an excellent interim U.S. Attorney. . . . It's our hope that eventually Diane Humetewa will be nominated by the president.' … Wyn Hornbuckle, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office for Arizona, stressed that Knauss' appointment is a temporary measure. He said President Bush has yet to nominate a candidate for Senate approval, and Humetewa is not excluded from that process." The Republic notes, "Candidates recommended by senators typically win such assignments, but the attorney general has authority to appoint interim administrators as he sees fit. … Knauss, a 34-year employee of the federal prosecutor's office in Arizona, also filled in as boss during 1993 after the resignation of Linda Akers. His temporary appointment at the time angered Sen. Dennis DeConcini, who had nominated Janet Napolitano for the job, though she was not then a federal prosecutor. … Napolitano later received President Clinton's permanent nomination and served as U.S. attorney before winning elections as Arizona's attorney general, and then governor."

Federal Judge Withdraws From Consideration For Los Angeles US Attorney. The Los Angeles Times (2/1, Krikorian) reports, "Longtime federal judge Dickran M. Tevrizian has withdrawn his name from consideration as the next U.S. attorney in Los Angeles, it was learned Wednesday." The Times continues, "Though Tevrizian declined to comment, others in the legal community said the 66-year-old jurist had recently notified a search committee for the Justice Department that he no longer was a candidate for the job. … Only days ago, Tevrizian, a U.S. District Court judge, was viewed as one of the leading candidates for the position, which has jurisdiction over federal prosecutions in a seven-county area. … But Tuesday, the judge told attorneys in a case before him that he would not pursue the post, a lawyer said. … 'Basically he said he wasn't that interested in the job and had put his name in consideration because others had asked him to,' said attorney Dale Rubin." The Times notes, "Rubin is representing one of two men facing the death penalty in Tevrizian's court for a kidnapping and murder rampage. … One day before Tevrizian's disclosure, attorneys for the two defendants had asked him to recuse himself because of the possibility that he might soon be running the very office prosecuting the case, Rubin said. … 'It is not that he is biased,' Rubin said. … 'It was just the appearance of impropriety we were trying to avoid,' the attorney said."

DOJ_NMG_0125155

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Judge Tosses Enron Broadband Conviction. The AP (2/1, Lozano) reports, "Just days before he was set to be sentenced, a former Enron Corp. executive's fraud and conspiracy convictions related to the company's broadband unit were overturned Wednesday by a federal judge." The AP continues, "Former broadband unit finance chief Kevin Howard was convicted in May on five counts of fraud, conspiracy and falsifying records after a monthlong trial. Howard had been set to be sentenced Monday. … Former in-house accountant Michael Krautz was acquitted of the same charges in the same trial. Both men were accused of participating in a small piece of the fraud that brought down Enron in 2001." The AP adds, "On Wednesday, U.S. District Judge Vanessa Gilmore vacated the convictions on all five counts Howard had been found guilty of, saying in a 19-page ruling the convictions were tied to a flawed legal theory prosecutors used to explain the fraud and conspiracy charges. … Gilmore based her decision on a ruling in August in which the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals reversed several convictions against four former Merrill Lynch executives found guilty of helping engineer Enron's 1999 sale of mobile power plants to the brokerage to help the energy trader appear to have met earnings targets. … The appeals court found fault with the government's arguments of criminal liability and deprivation of honest services."

The New York Times (2/1, Murphy) reports, "The first trial against Mr. Howard lasted three months in 2005 and ended in a hung jury. He was tried along with five other Broadband employees. His conviction on five charges of conspiracy and fraud occurred during a retrial last year. … His only co-defendant in the second trial was Michael W. Krautz, Enron Broadband's former accountant, who was acquitted of all charges because the jury contended he was only following orders." The Times continues, "In a 19-page decision filed on Wednesday, Judge Vanessa Gilmore of Federal District Court said her ruling matched the Fifth Circuit's in another Enron fraud case involving Merrill Lynch and Nigerian barges. .. In that case, the appeals court overturned several convictions against four former Merrill Lynch executives found guilty of helping engineer Enron's sale of mobile power plants to the brokerage firm in 1999 to help Enron appear to have met earnings targets. .. .The court said the government did not prove that defendants had deprived the company of 'honest services.' … Federal prosecutors had conceded that four of the five convictions against Mr. Howard should be dropped because of the Fifth Circuit's opinion but held that the fifth, for falsifying records, should stand. The judge disagreed because the jury could have relied on the convictions on the other counts to determine his guilt on the final charge. … A spokesmen for the Justice Department, Bryan Sierra said, 'We are reviewing our options,' but declined to comment further."

Guilty Plea Is Latest Blow To Milberg Weiss. The New York Times (2/1, Creswell) reports, "A few years before he faked the theft of two works of art from his home in Brentwood, Calif., Steven G. Cooperman, a former ophthalmologist, received a personal check from a partner of the law firm Milberg Weiss & Bershad for $175,000 as an 'option payment' on one of those works, Picasso's 'Nude Before a Mirror.' … But court documents filed by federal prosecutors in Los Angeles yesterday said the check was a secret payment made to Mr. Cooperman for acting as a named plaintiff in a class-action lawsuit filed by Milberg Weiss." The Times continues, "The government's agreement with Mr. Cooperman, contained in the documents, in which he agreed to plea guilty to a conspiracy charge, is another blow to Milberg Weiss. The law firm was indicted along with two of its partners last year by a federal grand jury in Los Angeles on charges that it participated in a scheme to make secret payments to numerous plaintiffs." The Times adds, "Mr. Cooperman's plea deal is the latest move by federal prosecutors, who have spent seven years investigating the firm and its tactics. Last year, another former Milberg Weiss plaintiff, Howard J. Vogel, pleaded guilty to making a false declaration to a court in connection with secret payments he received from the firm, court filings state. … Still, prosecutors have been unable to bring charges against their primary targets: Milberg's co-founder, Melvyn I. Weiss, and William S. Lerach, who started his own firm on the West Coast in 2004. People close to the investigation say the two men are identified as 'Partner A' and 'Partner B,' respectively, in court documents. … Mr. Cooperman, however, is a challenging witness for prosecutors. Convicted of insurance fraud in the staged theft of the artworks, Mr. Cooperman cut a deal with prosecutors in 1999, agreeing to provide them information on Milberg Weiss."

The California Recorder (2/1, Hirsch) reports, "Superstar plaintiffs lawyer William Lerach has remained outside the reach of investigators looking at a kickback scheme at his former firm, Milberg Weiss, but a guilty plea in the case on Wednesday might change that." The Recorder continues, "Steven Cooperman, a former ophthalmologist previously convicted of insurance fraud, admitted to taking payments for serving as lead plaintiff in class actions filed by Milberg Weiss over 12 years. … Court documents filed Wednesday detail Cooperman's role and also appear to put 'Partner B,' long believed to be Lerach, at the heart of the lucrative kickback scheme." The Recorder adds, "Though the charging documents don't identify Lerach by name, one source close to the investigation said Wednesday, 'If you look at it, there's an awful lot of facts in there about Bill Lerach.' … That Cooperman has helped prosecutors build their case against Milberg Weiss is nothing new. He has been cooperating since its beginning. In fact, he's the one who first told prosecutors about the kickbacks and fingered Lerach. … The problem for the U.S. Attorney's Office has been that Cooperman has a major credibility problem. He offered to cooperate in the Milberg investigation only after he was convicted and sent to prison for orchestrating an insurance scam by claiming some fine art in his Beverly Hills home had been stolen. Because of his past, anything Cooperman could say in trial about Lerach, or anyone else linked to Milberg Weiss, could look like an attempt to escape another stint in the slammer. … But on Wednesday, Cooperman's credibility may have become less of a problem. His plea -- to conspiring with Milberg Weiss and several of its senior partners to obstruct justice and make false statements in class actions -- shows that he's not cutting a deal to get off entirely scot-free."

DOJ_NMG_0125156

Cox Says SEC Is Aggressively Pursuing Options Cases. The AP (2/1) reports, "The Securities and Exchange Commission's investigations of suspicious timing of stock options grants at more than 100 public companies are proceeding vigorously and the agency continues to work closely with federal prosecutors in pursuing cases, SEC Chairman Christopher Cox said Wednesday. … 'This is a very aggressive program,' Cox told reporters." The AP continues, "He also said there is no disagreement among him and the four other SEC commissioners over how stringently to penalize companies found to have engaged in improper backdating of grants to executives. Cox was responding to questions about a news report that said the agency's enforcement efforts were stalled because of dissension among the commissioners over whether companies should be fined. … In addition, he said, the SEC is working 'very closely' with the Justice Department in pursuing stock options cases." The AP adds, "The federal prosecutors and the SEC have filed criminal and civil charges, respectively, against former officials of two technology companies, Brocade Communications Systems Inc. and Comverse Technology Inc. … Some observers have criticized the pace of the enforcement effort. … SEC officials say the agency is focusing on cases of serious fraud -- with elements such as deliberately lying, forging documents or deceiving directors or investors."

Dell's Founder Replaces CEO. The New York Times (2/1, Darlin) reports, "Michael S. Dell has taken back the leadership of the computer company he founded, replacing Kevin B. Rollins after more than a year of mounting problems at Dell." The Times continues, "The company announced yesterday that Mr. Rollins had resigned as chief executive and as a director. Mr. Dell, who is the chairman, immediately assumed Mr. Rollins's duties as well. … The company presented the change, which had been speculated about by Wall Street analysts and industry insiders for more than a year, as a decision by the board, which met earlier this week. Sam Nunn, the former Georgia senator who is the presiding director of Dell's board, was quoted in a company release as saying: 'The board believes that Michael's vision and leadership are critical to building Dell's leadership in the technology industry for the long term.'" The Times adds, "The company also said that it expected fourth-quarter revenue and earnings to fall below the consensus predictions on Wall Street. That was also not an unexpected announcement after industry analysts said several weeks ago that other PC makers had strong sales in the fourth quarter, while Dell's sales lagged. … Mr. Rollins is not entitled to severance or a pension plan. Still, he will walk away with stock options worth about $30 million that he earned during his tenure, according to earlier company filings. According to Equilar, which analyzes executive pay, Mr. Rollins earned $42 million in total direct compensation as the chief executive. A Dell spokeswoman said Mr. Rollins's departure agreement had not yet been completed."

Bloomberg (2/1, Guglielmo) reports, "The PC maker said results will miss analysts' estimates for the third time in the past four quarters. Dell already replaced his finance chief and takes over as the company struggles to regain its position as the world's largest PC maker from Hewlett- Packard Co.

DOJ_NMG_0125157

and faces a government probe into its accounting. … The company said in August that the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission had been reviewing its revenue recognition and other financial reporting for a year. That review was elevated into a formal investigation in November. The U.S. Justice Department is also probing the company's accounting."

Sonsini Advised Apple On Options Grant. The California Recorder (2/1, Scheck) reports, "When Apple Inc. tried to hammer out a new compensation agreement for iconic CEO Steve Jobs in 2001 -- an agreement now being probed by federal prosecutors -- the company called on Larry Sonsini, the lead partner at Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati." The Recorder continues, "People with knowledge of the federal probe say the lawyer -- an expert on corporate governance -- was consulted by Apple's board and legal department on a 7.5 million-share grant that's become the core of the criminal probe by the Securities and Exchange Commission and San Francisco U.S. attorney's office." The Recorder adds, "Investigators have focused on the grant because a set of falsified meeting minutes was drawn up to make it appear as though the options were granted at an earlier date -- and a more favorable price -- than when the deal was actually finalized. The minutes were fabricated by a low-ranking in-house Apple lawyer, though prosecutors also have been looking over her head -- at ex-GC Nancy Heinen and Apple's former CFO, Fred Anderson. … According to people with knowledge of the investigation, Heinen discussed the options award with Sonsini between its approval by the company's board of directors and her department's completion of the paperwork. … Through a spokesperson, Sonsini declined to comment Wednesday, and people familiar with the probe wouldn't discuss what he told the lawyers at Quinn Emanuel Urquhart Oliver & Hedges who conducted Apple's internal investigation." The Recorder notes, "It's unclear how much Sonsini knew about the grant, including how it was accounted for. … But for the second time in less than a year, a high-profile Silicon Valley scandal may turn on questions about the advice Sonsini did -- or didn't -- give. Just as in the Hewlett-Packard boardroom spying scandal, company officials may point to Sonsini's counsel to explain or defend their actions."

Former Qwest CEO Settles Pension Suit For $1.5 Million. The Rocky Mountain News (2/1, Smith) reports, "Former Qwest Chief Executive Joe Nacchio has agreed to pay $1.5 million to settle a fraud lawsuit filed by one of the country's largest pension funds." The News continues, "Nacchio's deal - part of a $46.5 million settlement paid to the California State Teachers' Retirement System - is believed to be the largest he's agreed to make with regard to his alleged misdeeds at the Denver telco. … Qwest, several investment banks and former auditor Arthur Andersen will collectively pay about $45 million to settle the suit, filed in December 2002 by CalSTRS." The News adds, "In 2003, Nacchio paid $400,000 to two law schools to settle charges by New York state Attorney General Eliot Spitzer that Nacchio improperly made more than $1 million from lucrative initial public offerings provided by Citigroup's Salomon Smith Barney brokerage. … Nacchio still faces securities fraud allegations in a federal class-action case, civil fraud charges by the Securities and Exchange Commission and 42 insider trading counts filed by the Justice Department. He is scheduled to go on trial in Denver on the insider trading charges March 19. He has denied wrongdoing."

Senators Criticize SEC Hedge Fund Investigation. The New York Times (2/1, Bogdanich) reports, "Two prominent Republican senators renewed their criticism yesterday of the way the Securities and Exchange Commission carried out its investigation into a major hedge fund, Pequot Capital Management." In separate speeches on the Senate floor, Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania and Charles E. Grassley of Iowa, "said the S.E.C. — which filed no charges against Pequot — had failed to aggressively follow up on investigative leads developed by the lawyer who led the inquiry, Gary J. Aguirre. Both senators said their statements reflected the findings of an interim report, which is expected to be released today, on their investigation of the S.E.C.'s conduct in the case." The Times adds, "An S.E.C. spokesman, John Nester, said he had not yet had the chance to read the interim report, but he said the commission would 'carefully consider the report's findings and recommendations.'"

CRIMINAL LAW:

Cooper Testifies At Libby Trial, Says Rove Told Him About Plame. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/1, Sniffen) reports, "Reporter Matt Cooper testified Wednesday he thought I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby had confirmed" Valerie Plame Wilson "worked at the CIA but acknowledged he never asked the White House aide where he'd heard that. … Cooper's appearance allowed defense attorney William Jeffress to ask repeatedly about President Bush's chief political adviser, Karl Rove, because Cooper identified Rove as the first official to tell him about Plame's job at CIA." The AP adds, "Cooper also said he didn't take any notes on that exchange and that he had posed his question to Libby 'off the record.'" Meanwhile, the AP (2/1, Apuzzo) reports, "Former New York Times reporter Judith Miller acknowledged Wednesday that she had conversations with other government officials and could not be 'absolutely, absolutely certain' that she first heard about" Plame from Libby. "Libby's attorneys seized on the hesitation and tried to portray Miller as someone who selectively remembers some conversations and not others."

DOJ_NMG_0125158

The New York Times (2/1, A1, Lewis, 1.16M) reports, "William H. Jeffress Jr., the lawyer for Mr. Libby, asked Ms. Miller what other officials she had spoken with about Ms. Wilson. 'I remember having conversations, sir,' she said, casting quick glances at the jury and at her lawyers sitting in the back of the courtroom. But she said she could not remember talking to anybody else about Ms. Wilson." Meanwhile, Matt Cooper "said that Mr. Rove told him to be wary of Mr. Wilson's criticisms in The Times. 'Don't go too far out on Wilson,' Mr. Cooper recalled Mr. Rove saying, warning him that Ms. Wilson worked at 'the agency.' Mr. Cooper testified that when he spoke to Libby, he had heard that Mr. Wilson's wife worked at the C.I.A. He said that Mr. Libby responded, 'I heard that too.'"

The Washington Post (2/1, A3, Goldstein, Leonnig, 690K) also reports that Cooper said Rove was the first to tell him about Plame, and notes, "Cooper is the third prosecution witness to say that Libby was actively spreading information about Wilson and his wife soon after he sought to learn who they were." Meanwhile, USA Today (2/1, Willing, 2.27M) reported on Cooper's testimony, under the headline "Reporter: Rove First To Leak CIA Info."

Trial Said To Show "Ugly Mutual Exploitation" Of DC Officials, Reporters. Under the headline "Libby Trial Shows An Insular, Backbiting Washington," the Los Angeles Times (2/1, A1, Miller, 850K) reports, "With the Bush administration taking a pounding over erroneous prewar claims about Iraq in the summer of 2003, Vice President Dick Cheney's chief of staff consulted his office's top communications advisor on how to strike back. As they talked by phone, I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby scribbled down a series of Machiavellian suggestions from Cheney's then-communications guru, Mary Matalin: What to do about MSNBC talk show host Chris Matthews and his steady barrage of Iraq war criticism? 'Call Tim,' Libby wrote, referring to Tim Russert of NBC News. 'He hates Chris.' … And how best to use the power of the White House to beat back the attacks? The president 'should wave his wand,' Matalin advised, and quickly declassify portions of intelligence reports that backed up the White House case for war." The Post adds that the memo reveals "the ugly mutual exploitation that goes on every day in Washington between powerful government officials and influential members of the media that is on trial in U.S. District Court in Washington."

Juror Questions Seen As Providing Insight Into Witness Testimony. The Washington Post (2/1, A13, Leonnig, 690K) reports, "It is very unusual for jurors to be able to ask questions during court proceedings, but U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton is allowing it" at the Libby trial. "Some of the questions have been dead on, showing that the highly educated jurors -- who include an art curator, a retired math teacher and an international health policy adviser -- seem to home in on key evidence or testimony. Other questions have elicited new insights into witnesses' thinking, and still others have evoked a few laughs. The whole practice has been controversial among attorneys on both sides -- worried about losing control of the points they hope to score with each witness's testimony -- who argue quietly with Walton at the bench over what can be asked."

Indictments In Cunningham Probe Said To Be Near. The AP (2/1, Hoffman) reports, "Federal prosecutors are preparing to seek indictments against a former top CIA official and a San Diego defense contractor at the center of the bribery scandal that sent former U.S. Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham to prison." The AP continues, "Two government officials familiar with the investigation told The Associated Press on Wednesday that prosecutors plan to ask a San Diego grand jury to return charges of honest services fraud and conspiracy against Kyle 'Dusty' Foggo and his close friend, Brent Wilkes, whose lawyers have said he is one of four unidentified co-conspirators described in the 2005 plea agreement for Cunningham, a San Diego Republican." The AP adds, "Honest services fraud is a combination of mail and wire fraud often used in public corruption cases involving officials who have engaged in a pattern of improper activities, such as accepting gifts, trips or promises of future employment from private individuals. … The officials said a second indictment is being prepared that would charge Wilkes and two of the other Cunningham co-conspirators - New York businessman Thomas Kontogiannis and his nephew, John T. Michael - with bribery and several conspiracy counts." The AP notes, "The officials spoke only on condition of anonymity because grand jury proceedings are secret and the charges have not been finalized. Indictments could be returned as early as Thursday, though it's more likely to occur within the next several weeks. … The fourth co-conspirator, Mitchell Wade, is cooperating with prosecutors after pleading guilty in February 2006 to bribing Cunningham in exchange for more than $150 million in government contracts since 2002. Wade is former president of MZM Inc. … The grand jury began hearing evidence in 2005 against Cunningham, at the time an eight-term congressman who served on the House Appropriations Defense Subcommittee and the Intelligence Committee. Cunningham's subcommittee assignment made him a key figure in the awarding of defense contracts."

DOJ_NMG_0125159

Rhode Island Lawmaker Sentenced To 2½ Years In Prison For Bribery. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/1, Tucker) reports, "A once-powerful lawmaker at the center of a corruption scandal was sentenced Wednesday to 2 1/2 years in federal prison for taking payoffs, and prosecutors said their investigation now includes 14 politicians and companies." Former Rhode Island state Sen. John Celona "admitted he abused his position as chairman of a key legislative committee to benefit the drugstore chain CVS Corp., Roger Williams Medical Center and Blue Cross and Blue Shield of Rhode Island. Prosecutors said the former state senator was paid nearly $320,000 for the favorable treatment." The AP adds, "Assistant U.S. Attorney Gerard Sullivan told the judge that Celona's extensive cooperation has led the investigation to seven politicians and seven corporations. Sullivan did not identify anyone being investigated but said FBI agents from other cities have been transferred to Rhode Island to help with the probe."

The Providence Journal (2/1, Stanton, 167K) reports that in sentencing Celona, "Robert A. Urciuoli and Frances P. Driscoll to prison yesterday, Senior U.S. District Judge Ernest C. Torres said that he wanted to send a message to others who might be tempted to follow in their footsteps down the long, gray line of Rhode Island's corrupt past. … Urciuoli, 59, received 3 years. And in an emotional conclusion to the day's proceedings, Driscoll, 67, who has health concerns, was sentenced to 8 months in prison plus 8 months home confinement." The Journal adds, "Sullivan told Torres that Celona's assistance has provided tips and leads for a growing number of agents. FBI agents have been brought to Providence from New York and Baltimore to work with two Providence agents and the Rhode Island State Police. In addition, agents from the Internal Revenue Service and the U.S. Department of Labor have joined the task force."

Brooklyn DA Seeking Testimony From Mobster's Son Against DeVecchio. The New York Sun (2/1, Capeci) reports in its "Gang Land" column, "Brooklyn prosecutors are seeking to line up a star witness for their sensational upcoming trial of a former FBI supervisor, R. Lindley DeVecchio, who is charged with helping legendary mob capo Gregory Scarpa commit four murders. The prospective witness is none other than Gregory Scarpa Jr., the imprisoned son of the late Colombo crime big, who after his death in 1994 was revealed to have been a much-prized government informant (and whose handler was Mr. DeVecchio). Unfortunately, the would-be witness comes with heavy baggage: He's already been called a perjurer by a federal judge and other authorities. So far, the matter is still in the talking stages." The Sun notes, "Sources say that the jailed gangster is willing to testify without any guarantees, and that the DA's office is seriously considering the option."

Blagojevich Orders Audit Of Drug-Testing Firm Under FBI Investigation. The Chicago Tribune (2/1, Kidwell, Chase, 617K) reports, "Gov. Rod Blagojevich's office has ordered an audit of no-bid state contracts dating to 1990 with a Chicago drug-testing firm under criminal investigation for alleged billing fraud. The administration outlined its actions involving K.K. Bio-Science Inc. on Wednesday, a day after Cook County investigators and the FBI searched the company's offices for evidence of fraud, money laundering and a continuing criminal enterprise, according to the search warrant. The company came under scrutiny last fall when the Tribune disclosed that the governor's wife, Patricia, had earned more than $113,000 as a real estate agent for the company's owner. There is no indication that the fraud investigation has any connection to the real estate deals." The Tribune notes, "No criminal charges had been filed as of Wednesday, and law-enforcement officials also remained silent."

DOJ_NMG_0125160

Execution Of New York Man Convicted Of Murdering Officers Could Be Years Away. The New York Times (2/1, Brick) reports, "Ronell Wilson sits alone in a prison cell near Gowanus Bay in Brooklyn. He has been on suicide watch since his return late Tuesday evening from federal court in Brooklyn, where a jury called for his execution. … 'He's holding up well,' said one of his lawyers, Ephraim Savitt, 'under the circumstances.'" The Times continues, "On federal death row, he will join 46 other inmates, their cases in varying stages of appeal. If the sentence is carried out one day, Mr. Wilson, 24, will probably die by lethal injection at the federal death chamber in Terre Haute, Ind., where Timothy J. McVeigh, who bombed the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building in Oklahoma City, and two Texans have preceded him. But Mr. Wilson's lawyers said he will appeal his sentence, an unpredictable and complicated process that could take years." The Times adds, "No other federal trial in New York has produced a death sentence in half a century. Three men have been put to death in federal cases since 1988, when a moratorium on federal capital punishment was lifted. Of these, the two Texans — Juan Raul Garza, convicted of three drug-related murders, and Louis Jones Jr., convicted of rape and murder — were each on death row for about eight years. Mr. McVeigh, who abandoned his appeals after being denied a stay of execution, was executed four years after his sentencing for the bombing. … Mr. Wilson was convicted of 10 crimes in December, chief among them the murder of two undercover detectives during a gun transaction on Staten Island in March 2003. Judge Nicholas G. Garaufis, who was not in his chambers yesterday, must set a formal sentencing date, according to his staff. … On five counts, the judge is bound by the jury's verdict to impose death sentences. But for the other charges, including robbery conspiracy, attempted robbery and use of a firearm, the judge must determine prison terms. Some of the crimes are relatively minor, on the scale of regular business for a federal court in New York City."

Experts Say Emotions, Geography Influenced Verdict. The New York Times (2/1, Barron) reports, "They were police detectives, shot at close range, in the backs of their heads. Fellow officers and relatives filled the courtroom, day after day, during the trial of the man accused of pulling the trigger, who mostly kept his emotions to himself. … Add to that where the jurors came from — Brooklyn, Queens, Staten Island and Long Island, but not Manhattan. And that the detectives knew, and were known in, the neighborhood, which gave the case a strong local connection — unlike, say, a case involving terrorist acts overseas. … Taken together, all those elements were so powerful, death-penalty specialists said yesterday, that the jury's verdict seemed almost inevitable. The seven women and five men decided that the defendant, Ronell Wilson, should die." The Times continues, "That made him the first person to face death in a federal case in New York since the 1950s, a fate that other defendants have managed to avoid, even though some of them have been accused of killing far more people. 'There was a confluence of factors,' said Deborah W. Denno, a professor at Fordham University School of Law. 'I think it's highly unlikely there will be another case with all these particular elements anytime soon.'" The Times notes, "For that reason, she and other lawyers interviewed yesterday said they doubted that the Wilson verdict signaled a shift in public attitudes about the death penalty. Michael Greenberger, a law professor at the University of Maryland, noted that advances in DNA testing have uncovered faulty convictions and made juries nationally more hesitant to impose the death sentence. But he said there were no such doubts in the Wilson case. … 'This case is one that shocks the conscience,' he said. 'The brutal nature of it, I think, aligned the stars for this kind of verdict.' … Still, some attitudes may have changed. Several years ago, when Attorney General John Ashcroft ordered United States attorneys to seek the death penalty, he ran into resistance in New York, where some prosecutors feared such a possibility could cause jurors to acquit. … Counting Mr. Wilson, there are now 47 federal prisoners on death row. But prosecutors in New York have failed to obtain death sentences in recent years, even in closely watched terrorism trials involving embassy bombings in Africa in 1998."

Kodak Employee Sentenced To Probation For Kickback Scheme. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/1) reports, "A fired Eastman Kodak Co. employee involved in a kickback scheme to defraud the photography company was placed on probation for three years Tuesday and ordered to pay almost $190,000 in restitution. Roger Benton, 49, pleaded guilty to mail fraud in June for helping to steer inflated contracts to a molding services company, Pro-Mold Ltd., between 1997 and 2000. At sentencing in federal court, he was fined $3,000 and paid $63,058 of the $189,174 he was ordered to return to Kodak."

DOJ_NMG_0125161

Tennessee Man Pleads Guilty To Possessing, Producing Child Porn. The Knoxville News Sentinel (2/1, Satterfield) reports, "A Grainger County man with a decade-long history of collecting child pornography admitted Wednesday he has been creating his own illegal images. David Edward Ratkewicz pleaded guilty before Senior U.S. District Judge Leon Jordan to a federal child pornography possession charge. As part of his plea, Ratkewicz admitted not only downloading sadistic shots of young children being sexually victimized but also 'photographing underage boys in sexually explicit positions and storing the images on his computer,' Assistant U.S. Attorney Charles Atchley said." The News Sentinel notes that "the Knoxville Police Department Internet Crimes Against Children Task Force, with help from the Grainger County Sheriff's Department, hit Ratkewicz with a search warrant in August 2004. … Atchley said Ratkewicz agreed to be interviewed by Pierce and other task force officers, including FBI agents."

Study Finds Vermont Sentencing Program Successful. The AP (2/1, Ring) reports, "A woman who stole from a patient in a nursing home where she works was sentenced to making potpourri-filled vases for a senior center. … A man convicted of driving with a suspended license agrees to carve a cane for an elderly person. … An artist convicted of driving under the influence had to paint a painting for an organization whose lawn she drove over. … Those are some of the examples of the unusual sentences crafted by Vermont's ground-breaking Reparative Probation system, under which criminals meet with community volunteers -- and in some cases victims -- to craft their sentences instead of taking them from a judge." The AP continues, "The system works, according to a new survey. … The survey by three college professors that was paid for with a grant from the Justice Department, found that in 9,078 cases handled between 1998 and 2005, offenders were 23 percent less likely to commit another crime while on probation than those sentenced to traditional probation. … And they were 12 percent less likely to commit another crime after probation ended." The AP adds, "The people who work with the system every day say its successes go beyond just reducing recidivism. … 'Those numbers are important, but I can tell you it works on so many other levels, in terms of the relationships built and the conversations that are had and the new perspectives that people have about their own lives and other peoples' lives,' said Cara Gleason, the Community Justice Coordinator for the City of Burlington." The AP notes, "LThe Corrections Department set up the pioneering program in 1995, when the state was looking for alternatives to traditional corrections. … Reparative probation was part of a package of sentencing alternatives -- such as requiring offenders to complete intensive substance-abuse programs or closely supervised furlough in the community -- made available to Vermont judges. … In the reparative probation system, the offender meets with community members and they try to craft a sentence that builds on the interests of the offender and the needs of the victim and the community."

Bush Urged To Pardon Convicted Border Agents. McClatchy Newspapers (2/1, Montgomery) reports, "Are they mistreated heroes or rogue lawmen? … That question is at the heart of a nationwide uproar over Border Patrol Agents Ignacio Ramos and Jose Alonso Compean, who are beginning decade-long sentences in federal prison for the non-fatal shooting of a suspected drug smuggler, who was given immunity to testify against them." McClatchy continues, "Scores of Republican lawmakers, and thousands of grassroots petitioners, have besieged President Bush with demands that the agents be granted an immediate pardon. But to federal prosecutor Johnny Sutton and his defenders, the two Texas-based agents abridged the public trust by attempting to cover up an unauthorized shooting and must face the consequences. … 'Prosecutors take cases as they come. We don't get to choose the facts and we don't get to choose the witnesses,' the San Antonio-based U.S. attorney said in a telephone interview Wednesday. 'We hate the thought of having to prosecute law enforcement because those are the people we work with every day. But nobody is above the law.'" McClatchy adds, "In an interview on the Fox television network Wednesday, Bush again said he is bound by strict federal guidelines on pardons and cannot immediately grant a pardon to the two agents. … Bush explained that 'there is a series of steps that are analyzed in order for the Justice Department to make a recommendation as to whether or not a president grants a pardon.' … And, Bush added, 'we're not at that stage yet.' … Bush's position is likely to further agitate a growing circle of mostly Republican lawmakers, who have repeatedly pressed the White House to step into the case. Many also blame the Bush administration for the agents' imprisonment, pointing out that it was Bush who appointed Sutton as federal prosecutor in 2001."

DOJ_NMG_0125162

Closing Arguments Made At Coke Formula Theft Trial. The AP (2/1, Weber) reports, "A former Coca-Cola secretary was deeply in debt, unhappy in her job and seeking a big payday, so she conspired to steal trade secrets from the beverage giant in an effort to sell them to rival Pepsi, a prosecutor said Wednesday during closing arguments in the woman's trial. But Joya Williams' lawyer asked jurors to use their common sense and ask themselves if the government has proved its case beyond a reasonable doubt." The AP adds, "Jurors deliberated Williams' fate for about 3½ hours Wednesday afternoon," and "deliberations were to resume Thursday. Assistant U.S. Attorney Byung J. Pak said Wednesday that the case against Williams is about cash, ongoing access to documents, lies and acts in furtherance of the crime."

Neighbors Stunned By Sex Offenders Posing As Family. The New York Times (2/1, Steinhauer) reports from El Mirage, AZ, "To neighbors, Casey Price was a seventh grader with acne and a baseball cap who lived an unremarkable life among a bevy of male relatives. … He built the occasional skateboard ramp and did wheelies on his bicycle down the streets of this subdivision of stucco homes north of Phoenix. … In nearby Surprise, where Casey was enrolled as a 12-year-old in a public school for four months, he was regarded as a shy, average student with chronic attendance problems. A man identified as his uncle had registered him, attended curriculum night and e-mailed his teachers about homework assignments." The Times continues, "Now Casey is in jail, and his former neighbors and classmates have learned the unthinkable: Not only is Casey not Casey — his real name is Neil H. Rodreick II — but he is also a 29-year-old convicted sex offender who kept a youthful appearance with the aid of razors and makeup. … And the men known as his uncle, grandfather and cousin, who until recently shared a three-bedroom house with him here, were not family at all, but a web of convicted sex offenders and predators, law enforcement officials say, preying in part on one another." The Times adds, "A retracing of Mr. Rodreick's tracks over the past several years shows that he is under investigation in three states. The authorities in four jurisdictions say he repeatedly failed to register as a sex offender, housed a large cache of child pornography in his computer and, based on videos found by the police, had sex with at least one boy. … The men have been indicted on numerous counts and are scheduled to appear in court in late February; they have already pleaded not guilty to charges of fraud and failing to register as sex offenders."

DOJ Audit Finds More Problems With Massachusetts Crime Lab. The Boston Globe (2/1, Saltzman) reports, "A federal inspection of the State Police crime laboratory completed in September found problems with the handling of DNA evidence that go beyond those that prompted the agency to suspend a civilian administrator and led to two sweeping reviews of the lab." The Globe continues, "Auditors from the US Justice Department's Office of the Inspector General concluded that the laboratory entered incomplete genetic profiles into its computerized database in 12 cases of a sample of 100 involving unidentified suspects who left DNA at crimes scenes, making the profiles inadequate." The Globe adds, "The auditors also found instances in which laboratory officials entered the same genetic profile under two different ID numbers in the database and failed to follow FBI protocols for analyzing profiles and double-checking results, according to an executive summary of the inspection report. … In addition, the summary said, the laboratory waited nearly eight months to confirm a tentative match between DNA from a crime scene and DNA from a convicted felon whose genetic profile was entered into the database. Federal guidelines call for confirmation within 30 days."

O'Malley Praised For Opposing Death Penalty. The Washington Post (2/1, A14, 690K) says in an editorial, "Abolishing Maryland's death penalty did not figure in Martin O'Malley's successful campaign for governor last year or in his announced agenda for this year's session of the state legislature. So the path of least resistance would have been for him to say nothing, or very little, in response to opponents of capital punishment, who are clamoring for its repeal. Instead, he has joined their fight. In doing so he has lent his fledgling administration a sense of purpose and moral clarity."

CIVIL LAW:

WellPoint Unit Settles Overcharges To FEHBP. Bloomberg (2/1, Moore) reports, "A unit of WellPoint Inc., the second- biggest U.S. health insurance provider, agreed to pay $975,000 to settle allegations of overcharging the government in Missouri, the U.S. Justice Department said." Bloomberg continues, "The settlement resolves claims that the WellPoint medical insurance unit made false claims against the Federal Employees Health Benefits Program, the government said today in a statement. The U.S. alleged that WellPoint's subsidiary paid higher rates to a network of physicians than the doctors received from other plans, passing the inflated costs to the government." Bloomberg adds, "Ronald Ekstrand, a former WellPoint employee, initiated the case with a whistleblower suit under the Civil War-era False Claims Act. Total U.S. and state recoveries under the law since 1986 exceed $20 billion, with almost $1 billion announced in the first quarter of fiscal 2007, according to Taxpayers Against Fraud, a Washington-based group that tracks the litigation. … The settlement 'should send a signal to all health-care providers who receive federal funds that we are committed to protecting the health-care system from fraud or abuse,' said Catherine Hanaway, U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Missouri, in the statement. … Ekstrand, the whistleblower, will receive $165,750 of the payment under a provision in the False Claims Act intended to encourage private individuals to expose frauds against the government. The government reviews such cases and decides whether to take part."

DOJ_NMG_0125163

The St Louis Business Journal (2/1) reports, "The government alleged that RightCHOICE, which participates in the FEHB Program as part of the Blue Cross and Blue Shield Service Benefit Plan (SBP), passed on excessive costs to the FEHB Program in connection with compensating a preferred provider network of physicians known as 'Alliance.' The government contended that RightCHOICE paid higher fees to Alliance physicians for serving patients insured through the SBP than these same physicians were reimbursed for providing the same types of services to patients insured through various other health plans. The government also alleged the physicians passed on these higher rates to the Office of Personnel Management as purportedly 'reasonable' costs to the FEHB."

FCC Proposes $10 Million Initial Payment In Radio Payola Settlement. USA Today (2/1, 4B, Davidson) reports, "The nation's four largest radio broadcasters would make payments and other contributions valued at about $10 million under a proposed settlement of a year-long probe by the Federal Communications Commission into pay-for-play claims in the music industry, say FCC officials and others with direct knowledge of the matter." USA continues, "While the FCC's three Republicans generally have backed less-punitive terms, Democrats Jonathan Adelstein and Michael Copps have been pushing for tougher concessions, FCC officials say. The officials requested anonymity because the proceeding is pending. … The investigation centers on claims that radio stations owned by Clear Channel Communications, CBS Radio, Entercom Communications and Citadel Broadcasting have accepted cash or gifts, known as payola, from major music labels in exchange for playing their releases." USA adds, "Under settlement terms proposed several weeks ago, the broadcasters would devote $7 million of airtime to independently produced music. The radio giants also would pay $3 million to a fund for the National Association of Broadcasters to provide training to member stations to stop payola. … But some FCC officials are concerned that the agency doesn't have the authority to require such contributions. As a result, the original proposal was expected to be pulled Wednesday night. A new proposal is expected to require the broadcasters to pay a more traditional penalty of $10 million to $15 million to the U.S. Treasury, say people with direct knowledge of the matter. They would not be identified because the proposal is still subject to negotiation." … In addition, the companies would draft compliance plans detailing which practices are unacceptable. FCC Democrats worried the original proposal did not give the agency sufficient oversight."

Big Tobacco Worried About Smoking Ban Proposals In Virginia. The Washington Post (2/1, A1, Gardner) reports, "Not too many years ago, all tobacco lobbyist Charlie Davis had to do to ensure swift defeat of anti-smoking legislation was to lean into the microphone at a committee hearing and say, 'Philip Morris opposes this bill.' … Times have changed for Philip Morris USA at the Virginia General Assembly. Lawmakers are voting this week on several bills to restrict smoking in restaurants and other public places, bills that are closer than ever to approval. And Philip Morris, the Richmond-based tobacco giant and emblem of the historic role that the golden leaf has played in Virginia's prosperity, suddenly has something to worry about. … 'They're scared, and they should be scared,' said Teresa Gregson, a lobbyist for the American Heart Association. 'It's just a matter of time before this passes.'" The Post continues, "For two years, in part to improve a public image tarnished by the ill effects of smoking, Philip Morris announced no position on proposed smoking bans across the nation. But in Virginia this year, Davis and other company representatives are meeting with lawmakers -- in their offices or in the corridors -- to steer them away from the more restrictive proposals, lawmakers said." The Post adds, "A number of bills are making their way through the legislature. Sutton would not say which proposals are acceptable to the company. A bill banning smoking in most public spaces and workplaces failed in a House subcommittee Friday, and a bill that requires restaurants to display a sign if smoking is permitted was passed. … Another version of the broader bill emerged from the Senate on Wednesday and is headed to the House of Delegates. … In part because of general anti-regulatory views in the legislature, approval of the bans is not assured. But because tobacco-growing regions have less influence than in the past -- and because of growing pressure from such vote-rich suburban regions as Northern Virginia and Hampton Roads -- more and more lawmakers, Republican and Democratic, are seeking smoking bans in workplaces, bars, restaurants and other places."

DOJ_NMG_0125164

Study Finds States Reporting Few Medicaid Fraud Cases To Special Unit. The AP (1/31) reports, "More than half the states are sending few Medicaid fraud cases to special units established to pursue the wrongdoing, averaging less than one referral a month, The Associated Press learned Wednesday. … 'These states were rural, urban, small, large, from all regions of the country,' the internal watchdog for the Health and Human Services Department found." The AP continues, "Medicaid is the medical insurance program for the poor and is financed by the states and the federal government. … When fraud is suspected, the state Medicaid agency does the initial investigation and is supposed to turn over cases to be pursued to Medicaid Fraud Control Units -- usually part of a state's attorney general's office." The AP adds, 'On average, states spend about 18 percent of their own money on Medicaid. It is the second largest program in most state budgets, following elementary and secondary education. … The HHS inspector general, Daniel Levinson, studied the referrals for the three-year period from July 2002 through June 2005. He found: … Twenty-six of the Medicaid fraud units reported accepting, on average, no more than one referral a month from their state Medicaid agencies. Acceptance means the fraud unit retains the case for further investigation. … Twenty-one fraud control units said that in the last year of the study, they received fewer than 12 referrals each from state Medicaid agencies, an average of less than one referral per month. … In that last year, Arkansas and Connecticut had only two referrals, South Dakota had four, Virginia reported eight and Wyoming 11. … Only three fraud units received more than 100 referrals in the last year of the study: Florida (215), Arizona (192) and Texas (180). California, with the largest Medicaid program based on enrollment, reported 79." The AP notes, "The report found that while the referrals from state Medicaid agencies increased from 1,161 in 2002-03 to 1,403 and 1,470 in the next two years, the numbers are deceiving. Most of the increase came from one state, Florida. … Sen. Charles Grassley of Iowa, ranking Republican on the Senate Finance Committee, was critical of the efforts of some states. … 'You can't recover what doesn't get reported,' Grassley said. 'And if ... state agencies are reporting only part of the fraud, then whistle-blowers and others probably account for a good part of the rest of recoveries that would otherwise be lost to Medicaid fraud.'"

CIVIL RIGHTS:

New Justice Unit To Target Human Trafficking. The Washington Times (2/1, Seper) reports, "Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales yesterday created a Human Trafficking Prosecution Unit and assigned it the task of developing strategies to combat modern-day slavery and expand the Justice Department's anti-trafficking enforcement programs. … 'With the creation of the Human Trafficking Prosecution Unit, we will expand and enhance our ability to fight this crime by working together with federal, state and local investigators to tackle the enormous challenges posed by this evil,' Mr. Gonzales said. 'We will continue to develop new ways to help victims and to bring their captors to justice.'" The Times continues, "Human trafficking often involves the recruitment and smuggling of foreign nationals into the United States for forced labor and illicit sexual activity. … Mr. Gonzales said the unit will work to enhance the department's investigation and prosecution of significant human trafficking and slavery cases, such as multijurisdictional cases and those involving financial crimes. … It will be led, he said, by prosecutors who have brought cases against traffickers and 'freed hundreds of foreign and domestic victims from sex trafficking in brothels and forced labor in fields, homes and factories.'" The Times notes, "Mr. Gonzales has made combating human trafficking a top priority. In the past six years, the department has increased by sixfold the number of human trafficking cases filed, quadrupled the number of defendants charged and tripled the number of defendants convicted. … In fiscal 2006, the department began 168 investigations, charged 111 defendants in 32 cases and obtained 98 convictions. In fiscal 2007, which began Oct. 1, the department has initiated 60 investigations, charged 26 defendants in eight cases and obtained 36 convictions."

DOJ_NMG_0125165

CNN.com (2/1) reports, "The United States has launched hundreds of new investigations to combat human trafficking for prostitution and labor exploitation inside its borders, U.S. authorities have announced." CNN continues, "Calling human trafficking 'the equivalent of modern day slavery,' U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales vowed on Wednesday to keep the issue a top priority for federal law enforcement agencies. … The Justice Department also has created a unit designed to pursue human trafficking cases, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Wan Kim." CNN adds, "Justice authorities said it would be the first time the Civil Rights Division would have a team of lawyers working exclusively on human trafficking cases. … The unit initially will have four attorneys experienced in prosecuting human trafficking cases, Kim said. … Justice Department and FBI officials said they are using more attorneys and investigators to find and prosecute international human trafficking rings, which lure primarily young women from Asian, Eastern European and Latin American countries to the United States with false promises of jobs and husbands. … 'This is a perversion of the American dream. The American dream is used as a lure to attract victims,' Assistant U.S. Attorney Kim said. … Kim said the degree of coercion may vary, 'But nobody signs up for involuntary servitude.'"

The Washington Post (2/1, A4) also reports this story in its "Washington In Brief" section.

Tennessee Woman Pleads Guilty To Sex Trafficking. The Memphis Commercial Appeal (1/31, Conley, 163K) reported, "A key figure in a human-trafficking ring Monday admitted to luring underage girls to West Tennessee from Mexico and forcing them into prostitution. Cristina Andres Perfecto pleaded guilty in federal court to two counts of commercial sex trafficking, charges that could result in a lifetime prison sentence. Perfecto and her partner, Juan Mendez, were charged in November after a series of raids and the arrest of several men for running brothels in Memphis." The Commercial Appeal notes, "Mendez remains under indictment on two counts of child sex trafficking and a count of conspiracy to harbor an illegal alien." The AP (1/31) also briefly reported on Perfecto's guilty plea."

Judge Sentences Massachusetts Couple To Prison For Prostituting Teen. The AP (2/1/) reports, "A federal judge sentenced two Massachusetts residents who arranged for a child to work as a prostitute in five New England states. Robert Williams will spend nearly 13 years in prison, while Brooke Denman will serve three years probation. … They allegedly took some or all of the girl's earnings and helped her obtain false identification documents. The girl served as a prostitute between the ages of 13 and 15." The Boston Globe (2/1, 413K) notes, "The FBI and US Department of Justice investigated the case as part of the Innocence Lost initiative, a crackdown on interstate sex trafficking involving children."

FBI Opens Preliminary Investigation Of Texas Police Shooting Death. The Longview (TX) News-Journal (2/1, Koonce) reports, "The family of a 21-year-old man who was fatally shot by a Gregg County sheriff's deputy on New Year's Eve is calling for the release of documents entered in the case. At the same time, the FBI is conducting an investigation to determine whether the victim's civil rights were violated." Abel Jaimes "died after he was shot…during a suspected DWI traffic stop." The News-Journal adds, "Peter Galbraith, supervisory senior resident agent with the Tyler FBI office, said the department had an open civil rights color of law investigation into the case. Galbraith described the investigation is 'pretty standard' when there has been a shooting death by a law enforcement agent. The department will conduct a preliminary investigation and forward findings to the Department of Justice."

Prosecutors In 1964 Racial Slaying Case Will Be Challenged By Fading Memories. The AP (1/31, Pettus) reports from Jackson, MS, "Witnesses' potentially fading memories could present a challenge in the prosecution of a reputed Ku Klux Klansman who faces federal kidnapping charges in the 1964 abduction, beating and drowning of two black teenagers in Mississippi, a law professor says." The AP continues, "Mark A. Godsey, professor at the University of Cincinnati College of Law, said some witnesses might have fading memories, while others might recall details about what happened on May 2, 1964, when prosecutors say two 19-year-old hitchhikers - Charles Eddie Moore and Henry Hezekiah Dee - were seized and killed. … 'Something like this doesn't happen every day. It could be something that is very traumatic to witnesses,' said Godsey, who's faculty director and lead counsel for the Lois and Richard Rosenthal Institute for Justice/Ohio Innocence Project, where he represents convicted inmates who seek new trials because evidence such as DNA has emerged." The AP adds, "Reputed Klansman James Ford Seale, 71, has been jailed outside Jackson since federal authorities arrested him last Wednesday in Roxie, the tiny southwest Mississippi town where he lives in a motor home on land owned by his stepdaughter and her husband. He pleaded not guilty Thursday to three charges of kidnapping and conspiracy. … U.S. Magistrate Judge Linda R. Anderson denied Seale bond Monday, saying he was a flight risk because he has no job or property, is a pilot and lives in a vehicle that can be driven away. Anderson also said she had concerns because Seale concealed from federal authorities that he has a brother living in Louisiana. … Seale's trial is set for April 2, but that could be pushed back." The AP notes, "Paige Fitzgerald, an attorney for the Justice Department's civil rights division, said Seale took part in 'a crime so horrific it boggles the mind.' … Prosecutors say Klansmen seized Dee and Moore, took them to the Homochitto National Forest and beat them, then drove north to a site near Vicksburg where they tied heavy metal objects to the still living teenagers and tossed them into the Mississippi River. Their bodies were found about two months later as authorities dragged the river in search of three civil-rights workers who had disappeared about 180 miles away in Neshoba County. … Defense attorneys filed a motion to dismiss the charges against Seale, arguing that the statute of limitations has expired."

DOJ_NMG_0125166

Arrests Of Florida Student After Rape Claim Outrages Victims' Advocates. USA Today (2/1, 3A, Bazar) reports, "Victims' rights groups in Florida are calling for police to review their policies after a college student was jailed within hours of reporting she had been raped." USA continues, "The woman, 21, spent two days in jail after Tampa police discovered a warrant stemming from a crime she committed as a juvenile. Her lawyer said a jail employee refused to give the woman a second dose of emergency contraception because it conflicted with the employee's religious beliefs. The unidentified employee's lawyer, Jennifer D'Angelo, told the Associated Press the employee is prohibited from giving inmates medication without specific orders." USA adds, "Tampa police apologized. On Tuesday, Chief Steve Hogue announced a policy giving officers discretion on whether to jail people reporting violent crimes who have felony warrants. 'The chief was not happy to have a rape victim end up in jail,' police spokeswoman Laura McElroy says. 'He took very swift action to make sure it doesn't happen again.' … 'Every rape-crisis program is concerned about this,' says Jennifer Dritt executive director of the Florida Council Against Sexual Violence. 'I don't know anybody who isn't outraged.'" USA notes, "Police in Kansas City, Mo., also are under scrutiny after the release Tuesday of a videotape showing officers ignoring a pregnant woman in custody who said she was bleeding and needed to go to a hospital. Sofia Salva was held overnight on traffic violations and the next morning had a miscarriage, according to a lawsuit filed Friday in Jackson County Circuit Court."

Study Finds Possible Racial Profiling At Two DC Locations. The Washington Post (2/1, B4, Klein) reports, "D.C. police officers stopped black and Hispanic pedestrians in Georgetown and Adams Morgan at higher rates than others on the street, according to a year-long study commissioned by the police department." The Post continues, "The review was the department's most ambitious examination yet of racial and ethnic profiling. It found that police appear to be targeting blacks at Wisconsin Avenue and M Street NW, in the heart of Georgetown, and Hispanics and blacks at 17th and Euclid streets, in the Adams Morgan core -- two of the city's biggest commercial and tourist magnets." The Post adds, "An outside consultant reviewed data covering traffic stops and pedestrian stops from February 2005 through January 2006 at 25 intersections across the city. The police stops were made for panhandling, jaywalking, suspicious behavior, attempted car theft and 'anything a police officer could stop a pedestrian for,' said John C. Lamberth, the author of the study. … The study flagged no problems at 23 locations and identified no concerns about traffic stops. But it raised questions about the pedestrian stops at the two intersections." The Post notes, "Lamberth's firm -- Lamberth Consulting, based in West Chester, Pa. -- specializes in racial profiling assessment. Its report said that the findings suggest that a 'limited, yet significant' number of D.C. police officers are acting 'in a manner consistent with the definition of racial profiling.' … The report urged police to bolster training and monitor police activities at the intersections, particularly those where most pedestrians are white."

DOJ_NMG_0125167

ANTITRUST:

Delta Creditors Reject US Airway's Hostile Takeover Bid. The Washington Post (2/1, D1, Wilber) reports, "US Airways lost its aggressive takeover bid for Delta Air Lines yesterday when Delta's creditors rejected the $10 billion offer that would have created the nation's largest carrier." The Post continues, "The decision was a blow to US Airways' chief executive W. Douglas Parker, a blunt and fierce advocate of industry consolidation who led US Airways' merger with America West in 2005 that created the fifth-largest U.S. airline. … A committee of Delta's creditors said in a written statement that it decided against a merger because of the 'timing and risks' of concluding a deal. The creditors said they would back Delta's plan to emerge from Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection as a stand-alone airline. … Parker said in a written statement that he was 'disappointed' and that the committee was 'ignoring its fiduciary obligation' to creditors. He did not respond to interview requests." The Post notes, "Delta aggressively fought the proposal on Capitol Hill and in the news media. Delta, the third-largest U.S. carrier, has told creditors that it expects to be worth as much as $12 billion after emerging from Chapter 11."

USA Today (2/1, 1B, Adams) reports, "The decision appears to dampen much of the talk of an impending merger mania in the airline industry, which only recently has returned to profitability after being slammed by terrorism and recession in 2001. Wall Street analyst Ray Neidl of Calyon Securities predicted airlines would not see anymore significant deals for a year." USA continues, "In the end, the offer of $10 billion in stock and cash did not outweigh the perceived risks. US Airways is a major Delta competitor in the East, and the combination would have created the USA's biggest domestic carrier, eclipsing American Airlines. … Critics of the merger said the Department of Justice could spend months reviewing a pending deal and ultimately block it on antitrust grounds. Delta, meanwhile, told creditors its plan calls for a speedy exit from bankruptcy and that the company would be worth $9.4 billion to $12 billion as a stand-alone airline."

The Washington Times (2/1, Lengell) reports, "The Atlanta airline, which has been operating in bankruptcy protection since September 2005, said it will be worth $9.4 billion to $12 billion upon emerging from bankruptcy. … Delta rejected US Airways' initial offer of $4 billion and 78.5 million shares made public Nov. 15, saying the plan would burden the combined carrier with debt, face insurmountable antitrust issues, and result in job cuts and a loss of flights to smaller cities. … US Airways on Jan. 10 increased its offer to $5 billion in cash and 89.5 million shares. The stake Delta creditors would have held in the merged company rose to 49 percent from 45 percent."

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (2/1, Grantham) reports, "Publicly, employee groups voiced vehement opposition through rallies and 'Keep Delta My Delta' buttons. The airline also enlisted political allies who raised questions about whether a merger would survive scrutiny by federal regulators. Both tactics were designed to plant doubts in creditors' minds. … Behind the scenes, the hostile bid lit a fire under Delta's effort to put forth a standalone reorganization plan that the creditors would like better than the merger offer. Delta lined up $2.5 billion in exit financing from six big Wall Street firms, announcing the arrangement just 48 hours before the creditors committee had to make a decision." The AJC continues, "Airline experts said Delta's 74-year-old chief executive, Gerald Grinstein, should get credit for rallying Delta — riven by hard times, job cuts and executive pay controversies in recent years — around the cause of independence. … The withdrawal of Tempe, Ariz.-based US Airways' bid clears Delta management to continue its plan to emerge from bankruptcy this spring as an independent airline. A court hearing on Delta's reorganization plan is set for Feb. 7 and could enable Delta to begin seeking creditors' votes for its plan."

Airlines Consolidation Dealt A Blow. The Wall Street Journal (2/1, A8, Dade, Carey) reports, "With yesterday's collapse of US Airways Group Inc.'s hostile takeover bid for Delta Air Lines Inc., the widely anticipated wave of consolidation in the U.S. airline industry is likely to remain on hold -- at least for now." The Journal continues, "The official committee of unsecured creditors for Delta yesterday rejected US Airways' $10 billion offer and formally endorsed the Atlanta airline's plan to exit bankruptcy this spring as an independent company. The publicly traded bonds of Delta and Northwest Airlines Corp., which is also operating under bankruptcy protection, slid as investors and analysts said any major mergers now may not materialize for another year or more." The Journal adds, "The failure of the deal 'moves consolidation onto the back burner for a while,' said Philip Baggaley, Standard & Poor's Corp.'s senior airline analyst. He added there is a 'reasonable chance there will be consolidation over the next year or two.' People familiar with the situation said there is little chance that discussions regarding any other combination with Delta, including earlier exploratory talks with Northwest and UAL Corp.'s United Airlines that were put on hold, would resume as long as Delta and Northwest remain in bankruptcy court."

DOJ_NMG_0125168

The New York Times (2/1, Maynard, De La Merced) reports, "The deal's demise is the latest example of the difficulty any airline faces when it tries a hostile takeover of another carrier. Even friendly deals run into a myriad of problems in combining unions, routes and fleets. The task is even more complex in bankruptcy, where management essentially retains the right to put together a restructuring plan unless a judge decides otherwise, giving even the weakest carriers control over their fate. … So although industry specialists and executives have long predicted that airlines will eventually combine — as perhaps the only way they can achieve consistent profitability — others do not see that happening for the moment. … 'I thought consolidation was a lot more likely a couple of years ago,' when the industry was in the throes of its decline, said Herbert D. Kelleher, chairman and co-founder of Southwest Airlines. … Since then, however, lenders have come forward to help a number of airlines emerge from bankruptcy, including United Airlines, Aloha and Delta, which announced Tuesday that it had arranged $2.5 billion for its exit as soon as this spring."

Express Scripts Seeks More Time For FTC Review Of Caremark Bid. The AP (2/1, French) reports, "Pharmacy benefits manager Express Scripts Inc. of suburban St. Louis maneuvered Wednesday for more time for an antitrust review of its hostile takeover bid for rival Caremark Rx Inc." The AP continues, "Express Scripts said it intends to voluntarily withdraw its existing Hart-Scott-Rodino filing on Friday and will refile it on Tuesday, allowing the Federal Trade Commission another 30 days to review the proposed transaction. Otherwise, the federal agency had to announce by Friday if it had antitrust concerns about the Express Scripts offer." The AP adds, "Nashville-based Caremark, which favors an acquisition offer from by CVS Corp., is the nation's second-largest pharmacy benefits manager. Express Scripts, headquartered in Maryland Heights, Mo., is No. 3. … Woonsocket, R.I.-based CVS, the nation's largest operator of drugstores, announced Nov. 1 that it planned to acquire Caremark for CVS stock, a deal valued currently valued at about $24.6 billion."

